continued under-hand workings of some persons still to list men, that divers agents are sent into several parts of the kingdom to levy forces, and Worcester the place appointed for a general rendezvous, whither the troops designed for Ireland, that were part of this army, are, by some of the committee at Derby-house, ordered to march; and several of those companies that went from us for the service of Ireland having it intimated to them, and by divers carriages, perceiving they were intended as a foundation for a new Army, and of a new war, they so much abhorred the thoughts of it, as both the officers and soldiers of divers companies are of late entirely returned to the army; likewise that no means is left unattempted to bring in forces from Ireland, France and Scotland, against the peace of this poor kingdom: We upon the whole matter, offer to your and all men's consideration, whether with your, our, or the public safety, we can remove further backwards, until, upon your and our joint endeavours with the parliament, those things of immediate and pressing necessity be provided for, which we desired in our Paper last given in to the Parliament's commissioners, in order to the better proceeding upon the Heads of the Representation and Charge with more hopes of safety, and of a timely and happy issue to ourselves and the kingdom, viz. That the persons impeached by us may not continue in power and capacity to obstruct due proceedings against themselves, and, by their own escape from justice, do threaten ruin to the whole nation. That all Forces lately raised or listed, in or about the city, may be forthwith discharged, except the usual number of Trained Bands and Auxiliarie; and that all endeavours, publickly or privately, to raise any further forces, may cease and be suppressed: And that the same measure may be allowed to this army, in paying them up to the same foot of account as is already given to those who have deserted the same. And for the things expressed in our Representation, though of weighty importance, yet, because they will require much time, they shall be no occasion to impede our remove; and, in the mean time, both by proclamation from his excellency, and all other ways, we shall endeavour that the accustomed supplies to your city may be speedily sent up. To conclude: We say from our hearts, That as our special ends are the glory of God and the good of the whole land, so our endeavours shall be to prosecute the same, without prejudice to the being or well-being of the parliament in general, the maintenance whereof we value above all our own lives, as we have formerly said of this parliament in particular, but altogether in order to the good and peace of this nation, and with a most tender regard to your city; to which we profess we shall, by all actions, make good all engagements tending to the security thereof, in what way yourselves shall desire, consisting with the good of the whole kingdom, you making good your mutual correspondence with us, and not doing any thing to our prejudice, in the prosecution of our just desires and endeavours. St. Albans, June 21.—P. S. We hear, even now, since the writing of this letter, that yesterday divers of the Reformadoes came again in a threatening manner to Westminster, the house of commons then sitting, to the great affrightment and terror of divers faithful members then present, and to the discouragement of others from their attendance there so that we cannot but perceive that the freedom of this parliament is no longer; that those members who shall, according to their conscience, endeavour to prevent a second war, and act contrary to their ways, who for their own preservation intend it, must do it with the hazard of their lives; which is a thing indeed so destructive to parliaments and freedom, that we conceive ourselves in duty bound to endeavour, to the utmost, to procure redress therein. By the appointment of his excellency sir Tho. Fairfax, and the Council of War. Jo. Rushworth, Sec. June 21. 1647."

For Alderman WARNER, and the rest of the Honourable Committee, sent from the City of London to the Army.

"Gentlemen: We desire, to the end we may keep a right understanding with the City of London, that some of your number may continually reside with us in the head quarters, until it shall please God to put an end to the present distractions. I shall, as I told you, remove my head quarters to Berkhamsted, expecting to hear from you to-morrow night; being resolved to order my affairs the next morning, as I may not prejudice a business of such concernment to the kingdom by the loss of a day. Your assured loving friend, T. Fairfax, St. Albans, June 23."

The Answer given, in the name of both houses, by their respective Speakers, was to this effect, "That they took well this respect of the city in communicating the General's letters; and should leave them freely to their own liberty to send down what committee they shall think fit to the Army:" That they have voted, "That if any forces be listed by the committee of lords and commons, and committee of the militia, or of the committee of safety, that they be discharged: and, as to the Reformadoes and soldiers about the town, the houses have put the business into such a way as they, in their wisdoms, have thought fit: and that they return the citizens thanks for their good affections expressed upon all occasions."

Votes of the Commons relating to the 11 Members charged by the Army.] There had been great debates in the house of commons for several days together, about the Army's Charge against the 11 Members. They had written to the General to inform him, That what should be particularly charged against their Members, with testimony of witnesses, should be received; and the house would proceed in a legal way therein. On the 25th, after debate, they voted, "That, by the law of the land, no judgment could be given to suspend those Members from sitting in the house upon the Papers presented from the Army, before the particulars be produced and proof made; and that it did not appear that any thing had been said or done in the house by any of those members, touching any matters in the Papers sent from the army, for which the house could in justice suspend them." But, on the 26th, upon the Army's advance nearer to London, which they gave out was not to over-awe the parliament or the city, but only to see that the Members charged by them should be suspended the house; and that then they would give in a more particular Charge, with the Proofs to make it good against them, the commons had no other way left, to save their own honour, than to suffer these impeached members, at their own desires, to leave the house, and thereby escape their pursuers. It is remarkable, that the very day these Members withdrew, a question for proceeding immediately upon the Desires of the Army was carried by a majority of 53 against 27: and the next day another question in favour of the Army passed by 121 against 85.*

Letters relating to the Motions of the Army.] June 26. The following Letters were read in the house of lords: and first, a Letter from the Commissioners with the Army to the earl of Manchester.

"May it please your lordship; This morning the General acquainted us that the Army intended to be this night at Uxbridge. We desired to know the reason thereof, and endeavoured to prevent it. The General hath just now given us this account inclosed, which I thought it my duty immediately to transmit to your lordship; and rest, &c. C. Nottingham. Berkhamstead, June 25."

Next, General Fairfax's Letter referred to in the foregoing:

"My lords and gentlemen; In answer to your desire of a reason for the Army's motion this day, we thought fit to let you know that our quarters are more contracted, but not

* "The great end," says general Ludlow, "of this Charge of Treason being rather to keep these Members from using their power with the parliament, in opposition to the proceedings of the Army, than from any design to proceed capitally against them, they resolved rather to withdraw themselves voluntarily than to put the parliament or army to any further trouble, or their persons to any more hazard. By these means the Army, in which there were too many who had no other design but the advancement of themselves, having made the parliament, the Scots, and the city of London, their enemies, thought it convenient to enlarge their concessions to the king; giving his chaplains leave to come to him and to officiate in their way, which had been denied before." Memoirs, vol. 1. p. 197.

nearer London than before, viz. at Watford, Uxbridge, and the towns about it, where we wait for an Answer to our just Demands presented to the parliament. We have often said, we cannot stand as lookers on, and see the kingdom ruined by the obstruction and denial of justice; and therefore we desire you to move the parliament that we may not be held still in doubts and upon disputes of their commands, to which we shall yield ready obedience when we see the kingdom in a possibility of settlement; which we conceive cannot be, unless that the fountain of justice be delivered from those that corrupt it. By the Appointment of his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax and his Council of War. Jo. Rushworth. Berkhamstead, June 25."

Then a Letter from the Commissioners with the king:

For the Right Hon. the Earl of MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore.

"My lord; We received yours this morning at 6 o'clock, and have delivered the Letter from both houses to the King accordingly. His majesty, though much pressed to the contrary, was fully resolved upon his journey to Richmond; and had given orders for his dining at Ware, whither the provision of his house was gone before; but he hath now pleased to let us know that he will stay here this day, and that we shall understand his further pleasure hereafter. Col. Rossiter's regiment is upon their march to the Army by the General's orders; and col. Whaley commands the same guards here which attended at Newmarket: Your, &c. Ed. Montague. Royston, June 25."

Lastly, a Letter from the Commissioners with the Army:

"May it please your lordship; We came hither last night, where we found the general with 3 regiments of foot, the train of artillery, and some horse; 4 regiments of foot more being quartered at Watford, 3 at Colebrook, and most part of the horse behind and on the sides of the foot; and that by order, the soldiers came provided with 4 days victuals. This morning sir Tho. Widdrington and Mr. Povey came to us very early, and brought us the Votes of the houses that passed yesterday concerning the Members charged by the Army. We having some intimation that the army was to march this morning, went instantly to the general, and communicated these Votes, and such other proceedings of the houses as came to our knowledge in relation to the Army, the better to let them see the inclinations of the houses towards the army's satisfaction; and did desire that nothing might arise from them that might disturb the houses or their councils, or minister further occasion of jealousy, which we told them we very much feared the army's moving nearer London would do; a report of which had lately come to us, the certainty whereof we desired to know, and what their intentions were therein, and of their removing.

We then understood from the general and his officers that at 12 last night, orders were given, upon consideration that the whole body of the foot were so closely contracted, that the quarters should be enlarged every way, as well towards London as otherwise, for the mutual ease of the country and soldiery. Against this resolution we immediately declared our objections, and very earnestly expostulated the business with the general and officers, as that which, according to our apprehensions, would minister jealousies and discontents to the houses, and obstruct the composure of things, which we found your inclinations and actions leading unto. In reply to which the general and officers prayed us to represent, that though, in their proceedings in this business, they might have been necessitated to some actions of this nature, that might carry in the face of them occasion of jealousy, yet in truth they were done for the ease of the country and soldiers; and they did also desire that this action might be so looked upon by the parliament: but withall, in this conference, we so far prevailed with the general and officers, that though the quarter masters were gone before, and some regiments were on their march towards Harrow on the Hill, and other places thereabouts, the orders were immediately countermanded, and new quarters were assigned them, with this Declaration, That none of them are appointed to be nearer London than 15 miles.—In this debate, we labouring to possess them with our good intentions for their satisfaction, and to draw them to a certainty that their removal from hence may be at a further distance from London, they made this Answer, That there were some things unresolved by the houses, contained in their late remonstrance, that were of immediate and absolute necessity to the being of the army, viz. the first article concerning the recalling of the Declaration inviting men to desert their army. The second, for equal pay for the army with those that have deserted it. And the fifth article, for discharging and dispersing of such as have deserted this army; in which, if they may receive the houses pleasure speedily, they give us hope of a certain Answer touching the motion of the army to a further distance from London. These things I thought fit to acquaint your lordship with, finding the army's expectations to be very great upon the resolutions of parliament this day to be taken. The general told us that the king was unwilling to go back to Newmarket, and that he would be this night at Hatfield. Thus I rest, &c. C. Nottingham. Uxbridge, June 26."

After reading these Letters the lords ordered all private business to be put off for ten days.

Votes passed for satisfying the Army.] Two Resolutions sent up by the commons were this day agreed to, and ordered to be sent to the General, viz. "Resolved, &c. 1. That they do declare that no Officer or Soldier, from and after the publication of this Order in the Army, shall leave it without the particular leave and discharge of the general. 2. That they do declare they own this Army as their Army; will make provision for their maintenance; and will take order, so soon as money can conveniently be raised, that they shall be paid up equally with those that have left the army."

June 29. Both houses agreed in a Vote, that the King should not come from Hatfield to Richmond, but go back to Holdenby; and ordered a letter to be sent to their commissioners, with another to the General for that purpose.

July 1. The lords resolved, that a Letter be sent to sir Tho. Fairfax, requiring him to see the two Votes of the 28th and 29th of June last put in execution, and to give order to the guards now with the King to observe all directions they should receive from the commissioners of parliament; also another Letter to those commissioners to put the said Votes in execution. Two Letters were accordingly drawn up by the earl of Manchester, and sent to the commons for their concurrence, who agreed to them without alteration.

A complaint being also made that Dr. Hammond and Dr. Sheldon had oftentimes, of late, used the Common Prayer Book, and officiated before the King with divers superstitious gestures, contrary to the Directory, thereby incurring the penalty prescribed by Ordinance of parliament for the same, the lords ordered that they do forthwith appear at their bar to answer such matters as should be objected against them.

July 2. The commons sent up a Vote they had passed, and desired their lordships concurrence to it, viz. "That the King should not reside nearer to London than where the quarters of the Army shall be allowed to be." After some debate, the lords, on the question, passed it also, the earls of Rutland, Suffolk, and Stamford, only dissenting.

Petition from the City of London, for payment of the Souldiery, a speedy Settlement of the Nation, &c.] This day a Petition from the city of London was presented and read, in hæc verba:

To the Right Hon. the Lords assembled in the High Court of Parliament: The Humble PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled,

"Humbly sheweth; That the petitioners cannot but call to mind the deliverance which they and the whole kingdom did justly expect from this parliament, after so many years suffering under the power of an arbitrary government, both in their spiritual and temporal concerns; and they do humbly acknowledge that this parliament hath removed many obstacles, and are confident would, by this time, with God's blessing, have restored the kingdom to its just liberties, and settled a sure foundation for its future happiness, if they had not been diverted by the great contrivers of the kingdom's slavery; who, rather than submit to the justice of this High Court, have raised and maintained a bloody, unnatural, and long war against the parliament of England; in the suppression whereof, as much blood hath been spilt, so a great treasure hath been spent; and the kingdom is still left involved in many engagements and debts, both to their brethren of Scotland, (who, like true Christian brethren, came in to our aid against the common enemy) and also to a multitude of officers, soldiers, and others the well-affected people of this land, who did engage in the defence and support thereof. And although the petitioners, in the obligation which the cause of God and the public safety did cast upon them, have all this time both freely contributed, and cheerfully submitted, to many great and unusual assessments, which also could not be levied but in an extraordinary way; yet they cannot but be sensible how arbitrary power hath been, during these distempers, exercised by committees and others, by whom the good subject hath been oftentimes more oppressed than the delinquent suppressed; and who have managed the receipts and revenues, which were designed to maintain the public charge, so disorderly and ineffectually, that the kingdom cannot but be unsatisfied concerning the due employment thereof; and doubt that much of the public money hath been employed to private ends, and remains obscured in the hands of such as were intrusted with the collection of those assessments, and the improvement of all sequestrations to the best advantage of the public. And indeed the petitioners have reason to attribute much of the late discontent and disorders of divers Officers and Soldiers unto the want of such Money as, if duly collected and faithfully managed, might have, in good part, if not fully, satisfied the soldiery; and do humbly conceive that the parliament hath so much the more reason to enquire into the same, because that, from this defect, hath risen those late attempts of some of the soldiery; and there is such use made of the Vote passed by the parliament for their satisfaction, to invite and draw together very great numbers of officers and soldiers from all parts of the kingdom, under pretence of sharing the money so obtained, that it may very much endanger the peace and safety of the city. The petitioners, therefore, for remedy of the said Grievances, and prevention of those Dangers which otherwise may be feared, and for Settlement of this miserable and distracted kingdom, do humbly pray, 1. That present command be given, that no Officers of War nor Soldiers, other than such as are already come in, do enter the line of communication, under any pretence of sharing in the Monies lately appointed by parliament towards the satisfaction of any arrears.—2. That such Officers and Soldiers, who are already paid according to the late several Ordinances of parliament in this behalf made, if their usual habitation and employment have been within the line, be enjoined forthwith to betake themselves to their calling, or some honest condition of living; and be prohibited from their loose and tumultuous wandering and meeting within this city, and other places adjacent, under penalty of losing their arrears. And that such Officers and Soldiers as have dwellings or other relations in the country, be required to depart the line within two days after publication, and to return to their homes or habitations, and there apply themselves to their several callings, on the like forfeiture of their arrears; except such whose present and lawful occasions may require their continuance, to be approved of by a committee for that purpose to be appointed. And that the parliament would please to make some speedy and certain provision for the satisfying of all arrears unto the soldiery, who have served the parliament, within some short and convenient time, to be paid in the several counties and places of their abode, according to the conditions of their entertainment. 3. That all Officers and Soldiers, who have been in arms against the parliament, or others who have assisted or contributed thereunto, be enjoined, upon pain of imprisonment, within 24 hours after publication, to repair to their several habitations, and to fall to their lawful callings; and that such Officers, Soldiers, and others, as have no habitations nearer, be commanded forthwith to withdraw themselves, and to continue at least 20 miles from London for the space of 40 days; except such as, by a committee authorized and appointed for that purpose, shall have licence, upon just cause by them allowed, to remain in or near London, so long time until they have dispatched such businesses as they shall have in or near the city; which ended, then presently to retire 20 miles from the city, upon pain of imprisonment as aforesaid. 4. That such commanders and soldiers as, according to former Orders of the parliament, have come in from the Army, having received their Monies, may be otherwise disposed of as the parliament shall think fit. 5. That all persons whatsoever that are possessed of any Monies or Goods belonging to the public, may be enjoined to bring the same, within one month after publication, into such public treasury as is or shall be appointed for that purpose; under penalty to forfeit treble the value of that which shall be duly proved to be so concealed, the half of the forfeiture to be given to such persons as shall make proof of such concealment, and the other half to be applied to the service of the state. 6. That all Revenues, as well such as are due by Sequestration or otherwise, be managed under such commissions, and by such persons as, notwithstanding any privilege of parliament or otherwise, may be held to such rules as are, or shall be, prescribed therein, by Ordinance of Parliament; and be liable, for breach thereof, to answer the same in due course of law; and that no arbitrary power may be exercised to the contrary by any person whatsoever. 7. That the parliament would, for the present, please to lay aside all businesses of lesser consequence, or private concernment, and improve their time and utmost endeavour that such laws may be prepared for his majesty's royal concurrence as may settle the government of the Church, secure the people from all unlawful and arbitrary power whatsoever in future, and restore his majesty to his just rights and authority, according to the Covenant, without all which the petitioners can never expect any lasting establishment; that so this long divided and distracted kingdom may attain to the blessings of peace and unity in church and commonwealth. 8. And, that the people may be the better secured to enjoy the intended effects of such laws as shall be so made with the royal assent, that especial care be taken that all officers of state, and other ministers of justice, may be persons of honour, of considerable interest, and of known integrity to the parliament and kingdom. 9. That the parliament would please to provide for the carrying on of the affairs in Ireland, by a speedy transporting the forces which lie ready on the seaside, and such others as shall be willing to engage in that service, and by such continual supplies as are requisite to reduce that kingdom to the obedience of the crown of England, and rescue the good party left there out of the bloody hands of those barbarous rebels. And, for the better encouragement of the subjects of this kingdom to continue their supplies for that service, that, with as much speed as conveniently may be, the parliament will please to take care that the people be eased of such extraordinary charges and burdens as have long lain, and still remain, upon this kingdom. 10. That, by just and good means, the correspondence with our Brethren of Scotland may, according to the National Covenant, be maintained and preserved. 11. That this honourable house would please to give order for a speedy Examination of all unlawful Elections and Returns of the members thereof, and purge the house of all such as have been unduly chosen, or have been in arms or in action against the parliament; and provide for the supply of their rooms, according to the laws of the land. 12. That some speedy course may be taken for the deciding of all causes formerly determinable in the Court of Admiralty; the Trade and Navigation of this kingdom, and the correspondence with foreign nations, being very much prejudiced, disturbed, and endangered for want of due provision herein, as hath formerly been at large represented unto this honourable house. 13. And lastly, that satisfaction being made by Delinquents, according to the wisdom of parliament, an act of oblivion may be passed, for an utter abolition and final reconciliation of all parties and differences, and for the quiet settling of peace, love, and unity among the subjects of this kingdom. All which the petitioners submit unto the wisdom of this honourable house."

The above Petition was presented also to the commons, and had only this Answer returned to it from both houses, "That the presenters had their thanks for their constant and good affections to the parliament; that the particulars of the Petition were many and long, and a great part thereof under consideration already; and the rest they would speedily consider on *."

Papers preparatory to the Treaty between the Parliament and the Army.] The Commissioners residing with the Army having sent up several Papers to the house of lords, they were read as follows:

"May it please your lordship; Upon consideration of the General's Papers, which we sent you this morning, we have this day made a further address to the general, desiring him to make known unto us the persons who should treat with us upon the Papers and Desires sent from the Army to the houses, and the Votes sent to us, and the time and place of meeting; a copy of which Letter of ours to the general I send you here inclosed: In Answer to which the general sent unto us this evening, by col. Fleetwood, a commission under his hand and seal for certain of his officers to treat with us, beginning in the morning at our lodgings by 8 o'clock; a copy whereof I also send you. We have likewise received this day, from the general, a Vindication of the Army from a printed pamphlet, published to the scandal and prejudice of the Army, a copy whereof you receive inclosed from, Your, &c. C. Nottingham. Wickham, July 1."

Copy of a Letter from the Commissioners to the General, mentioned above.

"May it please your Excellency; We have considered your Letter to us, dated yesterday, in which we perceive your excellency is ready to appoint officers to treat with us upon the Papers and Desires sent from the Army to the houses, and the Votes sent to us; and therefore we desire again that the persons, time, and place may be made known unto us, the principal of our last Propositions being, to our apprehensions, already fully answered, and the rest under consideration; which we hope will be this day perfected. We are, sir, Your, &c. C. Nottingham, P. Wharton, P. Skippon, Hen. Vane, Tho. Widdrington, July 1."

Copy of the General's Commission to treat with the Commissioners of Parliament.

"Whereby appoint lieut. gen. Cromwell, commissary-general Ireton, col. Fleetwood, col. Rainsborough, col. Harrison, col. sir Hardress Waller, col. Rich, col. Hammond, col. Lambert, and major Desborough; these ten or any five of them, of which the major part of the five last, to treat and debate with the right hon. the Commissioners of Parliament residing with the Army, upon the Papers and Desires sent from the Army to both houses, and the Votes sent to the Army according to the effect of the Order of both houses, dated the 26th of June, 1647; and for that purpose, to attend the said Commissioners at their lodgings at the Catharine-Wheel, to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock, and so, from time to time, and place to place, as shall be mutually agreed upon. Given under my hand and seal at Wickham, the 1st day of July, 1647. Tho. Fairfax."

Proceedings on the Treaty between the Parliament's Commissioners and those of the Army.] July 3. A Letter from the Commissioners residing with the Army, with several Papers inclosed, were read:

"May it please your lordship; This day we have entered upon the Treaty. The commissions on both parts have been read, and some Propositions touching the method of our proceeding in the Treaty mutually consented unto, the copies whereof we send here inclosed. We have notice given us that the general and his council of war are resolved to remove the head-quarters to-morrow to Reading; at which place, they assure us, they will proceed in the Treaty with all diligence and expedition, on Monday morning by 7 o'clock; thus we rest, your, &c. C. Nottingham, P. Wharton. Wickham, July 2.

At the Treaty begun at Wickham, July 2, 1647, present, of the Commissioners of the Parliament, the earl of Nottingham, lord Wharton, field-marshal Skippon, sir Henry Vane, jun. sir Tho. Widdrington, col. White, Tho. Scawen, esq. and Tho. Povey, esq.: Present, of the Commissioners of the Army, commissary-general Ireton, sir Hardress Waller, col. Rich, col. Lambert, major Desborough:

"For the method of proceedings, it is offered by the Commissioners of Parliament, that seeing the Treaty is to be had upon the Papers and Desires sent from the Army to the houses, and the Votes of the houses sent to their commissioners residing with the Army. 1. That in all matters to be treated on, there shall be a free debate had by conference. 2. That the results of such debates, in points that relate to the Desires of the Army, shall be, by the Commissioners of Parliament, delivered to the Commissioners of the Army in writing, to be presented to the Council of War for their consideration, that a speedy conclusion may be thereupon had. 3. That in this Treaty nothing shall be taken for the Desire, Opinion, or Resolution of the commissioners, on either part, but what is given in writing, signed by their respective Secretaries. 4. That in the managing of the Treaty, and for the more speedy expedition, at any time, Papers signed as aforesaid may be sent and received betwixt the commissioners upon emergent occasions. 5. That we shall be desirous to hear from the commissioners of the Army the way and method wherein they intend to proceed in the managing of the Desires of the Army; wherein we shall not doubt but that they will take such course as may tend to the greatest Expedition. 6. That meetings of the Commissioners shall be, from time to time, by mutual agreement of the Commissioners, or upon the desire of either party respectively, at such place within the head-quarters as the Commissioners for the Parliament shall appoint. Signed by the appointment of the Commissioners of Parliament. Geo. Pyke, Secretary."

* Mr. Whitlocke observes here, "That several Members attended the house less when these matters were in agitation, being unsatisfied that the Army and City should thus seem to impose upon the parliament." This is confirmed by the frequent instances in the Journals, about this time, of Orders of leave for Members to go into the country.

Wickham, Catharine-Wheel, July 2, 1647.

"To the Officers of the right hon. the Commissioners of Parliament, for the method of proceeding, the commissioners of the army do answer: To the first we agree fully. To the second we agree. To the third we wholly agree. To the fourth we agree. To the fifth we shall willingly perform what is desired, at least in parts, from time to time as there is occasion; but we desire that there may be no stop to the proceedings in the Treaty, upon any part of the things to be treated on, in expectation of a general method for the whole. To the sixth we wholly agree. Signed by the Appointment of the Commissioners of the Army. Will. Clerke."

July 6. A Letter from the lord Montague was read, directed as usual.

"My lord; Yesterday the King removed from Windsor to Caversham, where now he is. Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Hammond, and others in like condition, have the same liberty of access as they had before his majesty came to Windsor. Your, &c. E. Montague. Caversham, July 4."

A Letter from the Earl of Nottingham was read; dated Reading, July 5, 11 at night.

"May it please your lordship; We acquainted you, by our last, that this morning, at 7, we were again to meet the Commissioners of the Army, to make farther proceeding upon the Treaty; in expectation whereof we continued until past 12 this day, when we had notice given us by commissary-general Ireton, sir Hardress Waller, and some others of the Commissioners, that the business of the charge concerning the eleven Members, and some other intervening occasions, had taken up so much time that they could not possibly come to us sooner; but they assured us that this afternoon, about 2 o'clock, they would give us a meeting; about which time they came accordingly, and, in the first place, propounded for our debate some things which they affirmed to be wanting in the late Votes of the houses, in relation to the Desires of the Army sent from Uxbridge, June the 27th, 1647. At this meeting also intimation was given unto us, that they have several things of weight to offer, very much conducing, as they say, to the preserving of the Peace and safety of the kingdom: Unto which we replied, That if the things they had to offer were contained within the Papers and Desires of the Army, to which our commission refers, we should then be ready to debate upon them when they were communicated to us. Your, &c. C. Nottingham, P. Wharton."

A particular Charge of Impeachment, presented to the Commons, in the Name of the Army, against eleven Members of that House.] This day, a particular Charge of Impeachment, for high Crimes and Misdemeanors, was presented, by several Officers of the Army, to the house of commons against the eleven Members, whom we have lately mentioned. The Officers being withdrawn, the impeached Members, (who, at their own desire, had leave to absent themselves from the service of the house on the 26th of last month) being sent for, and called in, the Charge was read; and they gave a general Answer to the particulars they were respectively concerned in. A day was also appointed for taking this matter into farther consideration. The following is a copy of the said Articles:*

A particular CHARGE OF IMPEACHMENT, in the Name of his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Army under his Command, against Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Philip Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir John Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir John Maynard, knights, major-general Massey, John Glynn, esq. recorder of London, Walter Long, esq. col. Edw. Harley, and Anth. Nicholl, esq. Members of the House of Commons.

"Whereas on the 15th day of June last, the Heads of a Charge were delivered, in the name of the said Army, unto the Commissioners of parliament, to be sent up to the parliament against the persons above-named; now, in prosecution and maintenance thereof, and according to the power thereby reserved, it is, in the name of the said Army, more particularly charged against the said persons as followeth:

I. That the said Mr. Denzil Hollis, during the late war, in prosecution of the evil designus expressed in the general Heads or Articles formerly exhibited, contrary to the trust reposed in him, contrary to his oath taken in June 1643, and contrary to the Ordinance of parliament, dated in Oct. 1643, hath assisted the king in the late unnatural war, and held correspondence and intelligence with the enemy against the parliament, in manner following, viz. He, being one of the special commissioners for the parliament, to present Propositions of both houses to the King at Oxford, did privately, and contrary to his Instructions, at several times, make his addresses unto the king's party there, then in arms against the parliament, namely, to the earl of Lindsey, the earl of Southampton, the lord Saville and others; and did secretly plot and advise with them against the parliament; and did intimate unto them, or one of them, that the said Propositions, then sent unto his majesty by the parliament, were unreasonable: and being demanded what Answer he would advise the king to make to the said Propositions, he did advise that the king should demand a Treaty however, and then declare how unreasonable the Propositions were; and that yet, for the peace of the kingdom, his majesty would treat upon them; but withal wished the Treaty might be in London, whither the king himself should come upon security: Adding, That there was nothing in the world that the violent party (meaning the well-affected party to the parliament against the enemy) did so much fear as his majesty's coming to London, which would be a certain dissolution of their authority and power: and the said Mr. Hollis had those said persons, or one of them, assure the king, That if his majesty knew as much as he knew, his majesty would take his horse and be at London the next day, or words to that effect.—And it being again demanded, Whether (if the king should be willing to come) it would be accepted of? He thereto answered, That certainly it would be much opposed, but yet he was confident that he and his party (meaning some of the members above-named, and others) should carry it, and wished the king to put it upon that trial. And the said Mr. Hollis was desired by the earl of Lindsey, earl of Southampton, and lord Saville, or one of them, that he would be pleased to draw such an Answer in writing to the said Propositions, as he desired the king should send; and the said earl of Southampton, who was that night to lie in the king's bed-chamber, would persuade the king to condescend unto it; and thereupon he withdrew, and, either the same day or the next, accordingly carried unto the said lords, or one of them, a Paper ready written; which, as he said, was such an Answer to the said Propositions as he had drawn for the king to send to the Parliament; which was taken by the said lords, or one of them, and carried to the king to be considered of; and so much thereof as advised the king's coming to London was laid by, the king fearing to adventure himself, but the rest of the said Paper the lord Digby (who wrote the king's Answer to the Propositions) made use of, in the same words as Mr. Hollis had set down; who, to ingratiate himself with the king's party, did, about the same time, revile the well-affected members of the house of commons, declaring unto the king's party at Oxford, or some of them, that those well-affected Members (which, to render them the more odious as he conceived, he named the violent Independent Party) had ill intentions, and great averseness to peace; and that nothing would be more pleasing to them than for the king to refuse the Propositions, how unreasonable soever the same were: and he also then said, That the Commissioners of Scotland were very weary of that violent party; and that they, being desperate to establish their Presbytery here as in Scotland, made their addresses to him and his party. All which tended to the protracting of the said late war, and to the hinderance of an happy peace.—And the said Mr. Hollis did also, after that, receive from the earl of Lindsey, at Oxford, a Letter written in white ink, concerning some secret design; and kept it from the knowledge of the house from Feb. till about July after, when it was discovered by him that brought it; but the Letter itself was by Mr. Hollis, after he had read it, burnt; and the earl of Lindsey moved the king for a pass for Mr. Hollis to go to Oxford; but the king refused to grant it, saying, That Hollis did him better service in the parliament than he could do him at Oxford.

II. That the said Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, during the said late wars, when the earl of Lindsey went from the Tower of London to Oxford, sent several messages of intelligence to the earl of Dorset and lord Digby; thereby assuring them, that they did better service for the king here in parliament than they could do him if they were at Oxford; and sir P. Stapylton desired that the earl of Dorset would preserve him and his friends in the good opinion of the party at Oxford, which was then the king's garrison, and he would do as much for his lordship and his friends here with the parliament.—And the said Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, the more to ingratiate themselves into the favour of the enemy, did, of their own accord, without any direction of the parliament, draw up other Propositions than those mentioned in the preceding Articles, which they affirmed were, in their judgments, fit for the king to grant, and for the parliament to desire; and being so drawn up, sent them privately to his majesty, without any authority of parliament to warrant the same.

III. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir John Maynard, major-general Massie, Mr. Glynn, Mr. Long, colonel Edward Harley, and A. Nicholl, in March, April, May, and June last past, and at other times, in prosecution of the evil designs in the several general Heads mentioned, have frequently assembled and met together at the lady Carlisle's lodgings in Whitehall, and in other places, with divers other persons disaffected to the state, (without any authority of parliament) for holding correspondence with the queen of England now in France, and her participants; with an intent, by such secret and clandestine Treaties amongst themselves, to put conditions upon the parliament, and to bring in the king upon their own terms; and having a great power upon the treasure of this kingdom, have therewith maintained and encouraged, by pensions and otherwise, the queen's party in France, thereby to beget a second and more bloody war in this kingdom: and they, or some, or one of them, assured the queen of 40,000*l.* per annum, if she would assist them in their design; and that they would do more for the king than the army would do; and that they would find out some means to destroy the army and their friends.

IV. That in further pursuance of the same evil designs, the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and major-gen. Massie, by the combination aforesaid, within 3 months last past, without any authority of parliament, invited the Scots and other foreign forces to come into this kingdom in a hostile manner, to abet and assist them in the prosecuting and effecting of their said designs.—And the said Mr. Hollis very lately sent to the said queen of England, then and still in France, advising her, among other things, speedily to send the Prince into Scotland, to march into this kingdom at the head of an army; and did send a special messenger to her for such ends and purposes.—And the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Maynard, Mr. Glynne, major-gen. Massie, Mr. Long, col. Edw. Harley, and A. Nicholl, have under-hand, of their own accord, without authority of parliament, listed, or caused or procured to be listed, divers commanders and soldiers, endeavouring thereby to levy and raise a new war in this kingdom, to protect themselves in their unjust oppressions and factious designs; and have, at several times within two months last past, invited, encouraged, abetted, and counselled multitudes of Reformado officers and soldiers, and other rude persons, tumultuously and violently to gather together at Westminster, to affright and assault the members of parliament in their passage to and from the house; to offer violence to the house itself, by locking the door thereof upon them, and so imprisoning them; and, by such violences, outrages, and threats, to awe and enforce the parliament.

V. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, and Mr. Glynne, have been, and are, obstructers and prejudgers of several Petitions to the parliament for Redress of public Grievances. And the said Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, in May last past, did abuse and affront divers petitioners, who, in a peaceable manner, then attended the committee, whereof col. Lee was chairman; not only reviling and reproaching them, but violently haling and boisterously assaulting them, and offered to draw their swords upon major Tuleday and others of the said petitioners; and, without any power or authority, committed Nicholas Tew, one of the said petitioners; and, soon afterwards, by the procurement of Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, and upon their misinformation to the house, the said major Tuleday and Nicholas Tew were imprisoned, not being permitted to speak for themselves. And Mr. Glynne, about 3 months since, caused the said Tew to be imprisoned in Newgate, and to be detained a long time there, for no other cause but for having a Petition about him which was to be presented to the house.

VI. That the said sir J. Clotworthy, sir W. Waller, and major-gen. Massie, have lately, in prosecution of the said designs, in the said general Heads mentioned, (against the known laws of this realm, and rules and articles of war made by the parliament) by an arbitrary power imprisoned some members of the army without any authority; particularly ensign Nichols, whose pockets they, without authority, caused to be searched, and several Papers to be taken from him, contrary to the liberty of every subject; and caused him to be sent a prisoner from the head-quarters to London, without the authority or privity of the general, or the chief officers of the army commanding in his absence.

VII. That in or about March last, there being a Petition intended from the Officers and Soldiers of the Army to their General, for such things only as were justly due unto them, and concerning them merely as soldiers, the said sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and col. Ed. Harley, a member of the army, having gotten into their hands a Copy of the said Petition, by combination with the other members above-mentioned, and with an intent to abuse the parliament into prejudices and jealousies against the proceedings of the Army concerning the said Petition, (they well knowing that the said Army stood in their way, and hindered them from bringing to pass the designs in the said general Charge expressed) did untruly and maliciously inform the house, That the said Petition was contrived and promoted to debauch and disoblige the Army from the parliament; and that it was managed and carried on by divers principal officers in the army; that orders were given out for reading of it in the head of every regiment, and whosoever would not subscribe it should be put out of the musters, and cashiered the army; and, by those and other aggravations, did represent it to the house as a design against the parliament; further adding, That some regiments, which were remote, were sent for to join with the rest of the army for that purpose; by which misinformation they did, the same day, procure a peremptory order to the general to suppress the said Petition.

VIII. That, some few days after, col. Ed. Harley, by the combination aforesaid, and in pursuance of the same designs, did produce to the house a Letter, supposed to be written from within the quarters of the Army to him, by a person not named; whereby it was informed, That col. Harley's lieut. col. had drawn his regiment to a rendezvous, and had caused the said Petition to be read at the head of it; and that he threatened to cashier and put out of the musters all that would not subscribe it; and that the design of the Army therein was to enslave the parliament and kingdom, if the parliament proceeded not to some high Resolutions, or to that effect, as by the said Letter, relation being thereunto had, may appear. And although the substance of the said Letter was most untrue, and no author thereof appeared, nor could be produced, although a committee was appointed for examination thereof, and it was much pressed the author should be discovered; yet the said col. Harley, sir J. Clotworthy, and sir Wm. Waller did so avow the reality of the said Letter, and that the contents thereof would be made good, as that thereby, and by other false suggestions of theirs against the army, they procured the house (upon long debate, which held till about 8 at night) to order, That a committee of 5 members, whereof the said Mr. Hollis was one, should prepare a Declaration to be brought into the house the next morning, signifying the house's dislike of the proceedings of the Army upon that Petition, as by the said Order, dated the 30th of March last, may appear; upon which settling of the said business for that night, most of the members departed, as conceiving nothing would be done thereupon till the next day, and that then they might have a free debate concerning the same; but the house still continuing to sit upon dispatch of some letters formerly ordered, the said Mr. Hollis, by the same combination, and in farther prosecution of the said evil designs, having of himself, without the committee, prepared a Declaration against the Petition itself, contrary to the intention and direction of the said Order, and contrary to the rules of justice and usual course of parliament, did, the same night, about ten of the clock, on purpose to surprize the house, present the same Declaration to the house, whereby the said petitioners were, without being heard, declared enemies to the state, and obstructers of the relief of Ireland, if they still persisted therein, as by the same Declaration, whereto relation being had, may appear; and did procure it to be then passed accordingly, to the great dishonour of the parliament and their proceedings; to the insufferable injury, the just provocation, discouragement, and discontent of the army; to the trouble and danger of the whole kingdom; to the hindering of the Relief of Ireland, and other the evil consequences in the said general charge expressed.

IX. That, by the same and the like false informations and suggestions, the said col. Harley, then a member of the army, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and the said other persons, did, shortly after the said Declaration so made as aforesaid, procure divers eminent and faithful officers of the army, namely lieut. gen. Hammond, col. Hammond, col. Lilburne, lieut. col. Pride, and others, to be sent for from their charges in the army, to appear at the bar of the house, to make Answer in relation to the said Petition; against whom, when they came thither, they could charge or prove nothing at all; insomuch as the house thought fit immediately to discharge them.—And whereas there was a committee appointed to examine and consider of the truth or falshood of them, and the said Members informing were appointed to produce their proofs and evidence to the same before the committee; though they have since then been often urged, called upon, and demanded to produce their proofs and evidence thereto, if they had any, and have been plainly told, That if they did not proceed effectually to do it, they should be accounted the authors and devisers of the said falsehood, and reparation would accordingly be demanded against them; yet they have not to this day produced any proofs or evidence to any of the said informations or suggestions, whereby the parliament and the army were so much abused as before is declared; nor could they, or any of them, be hitherto persuaded to give into the said committee any Charge against the said Officers of the Army, which they had then or since procured to be sent for as aforesaid; but have held divers of them in a long and chargeable attendance upon the house, without any thing laid to their charge, until the house was pleased to discharge them.

X. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and major-gen. Massie, in further pursuance of the designs mentioned in the general Heads charged against them, have been great instruments in the obstructing the Relief of Ireland; and, within two months last past, did untruly inform the house, That, by their procurement, there were 50 companies of foot and 10 troops of horse of this army engaged for Ireland, upon the terms and under the conduct then by the parliament propounded; and, the more to delude the parliament therein, they, or some of them, by the combination aforesaid, did procure divers officers then in this army, namely col. Butler, lieut. col. Jackson, maj. Gooday, and others, to let the said Members give in the said officers names, as listing themselves for Ireland on the said terms and conduct propounded; when as those officers did at the same time declare themselves unwilling thereunto, and resolved not to go to serve in Ireland on any terms whatsoever, though they the said members under-hand assured them, That though they made use of their names, yet they should not go for the service.—They have likewise untruly informed the house, and given in the names of many considerable officers of this army, namely capt. Pennyfather and capt. Burges of col. Butler's regiment, capt. Clarke, and four or more commission-officers of sir Hardress Waller's regiment, and others, as having been subscribed for Ireland, who did not so engage or subscribe, nor give any consent thereunto; but did then, and have ever since, utterly disavowed and denied the same.—And about the same time they also reported to the house the name and offer of lieut. col. Farrington, as being then lieut. col. of this army, and engaging for himself and his regiment for Ireland; whereas the said Farrington had been cashiered the army a year and an half before. By which, and other their untrue informations and reports of that nature, the parliament was abused and misled into a conceit and confidence of a strength out of the army, then supposed to be engaged and ready for Ireland on their own terms; when as, in truth, the same was but a meer delusion, and which was so contrived on purpose to occasion a slighting and neglecting of the army, as supposing no further use for them.

XI. Whereas part of three regiments of foot, viz. col. Herbert's, col. Kemp's, and col. Graye's, were, by order of the house, advanced towards the Relief of Ireland as far as Bromesgrove, in the county of Worcester; the said sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Lewis, maj. gen. Massie, sir Wm. Waller, and Mr. Glynn, by combination aforesaid, did, of their own accord, without the knowledge or direction of the house, on the 6th of June last, (being Sabbath-Day, and without summoning a committee) command those forces back again as far as Reading, with an evil intent to draw forces together to beget a new war in England.

XII. That the said sir J. Clotworthy, in prosecution of the designs in the said general Charge expressed, hath, in the years 1642, 1643, 1644, and since, converted several great sums of money (which, by several orders of parliament, and of the Irish committee, were designed for the Relief of Ireland) to his own particular use, namely the sum of 280*l.* which, by order of both houses, dated 11th of Feb. 1642, was to be paid for 20 butts of sack for Ireland; 700*l.* which the same day was also ordered for 2000 swords; 300*l.* which by order of the said Irish committee, dated the 5th of April 1643, was designed for 120 pair of pistols; and divers other sums of money, upon several Orders, which he, from time to time, received for the use and relief of Ireland; but were not employed to the uses by the said orders intended and directed, but to his own private use as aforesaid: and that he hath, within two years last past, received several sums of money, arms, and other provisions for a troop of horse, which he pretended he had raised in Ireland; whereas he had not, nor did raise or furnish any such troop as he pretended. And that he, for Money and other rewards, hath preferred John Davis, Wm. Summers, and others, to be intrusted with the Irish affairs, who have kept correspondence with the enemy, and have defrauded the state of other great sums of money; and he hath been privy to, and a sharer in, such their actions.

XIII. That, about November last past, the said sir J. Clotworthy being, by the parliament, sent a commissioner, with others, into Ireland, who all had a joint power and authority to treat with the earl of Ormond for the space of 4 days, and no more; he, contrary to the special trust reposed in him, held secret intelligence with the said earl, by cypher or character, without the consent or knowledge of those others in commission with him, many weeks after the time so limited was expired; and about the same time he held the like secret intelligence with the lord George Digby, then in Ireland, beyond the time prefixed, and without the consent of the said other commissioners; and, in order thereunto, the lords Ormond and Digby lately employed one Slingsby, who pretends a design about the Prince, to come into this kingdom.

XIV. That the said sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, by combination with the rest of the members before-named, in further prosecution of the designs mentioned in the same, well knowing that the lord Lisle, late president of Ireland, was both faithful and vigilant while he was trusted in the same kingdom, and had now this last spring made provisions ready to march into the field; and that the lord baron of Broghill, general of the parliament's horse in Munster, and col. sir Arthur Loftus, persons of honour and reputation, and of great fortunes in the said kingdom, lately came purposely into this kingdom to exhibit, and did exhibit, many Articles of High Treason against the lord Inchiquin, for betraying the parliament's army to the enemy, as formerly he had done; yet, by the great power and violent interposition of the said sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, by the practice and combination aforesaid, the said Articles have been obstructed, and the business not suffered to come to a hearing, and the said lord Lisle hastily called out of Ireland, and the power and command of the parliament's forces in that kingdom committed to the said lord of Inchiquin, to the loss of this summer's service, and the expence of much treasure to make new preparations of war. And whereas the said lord Lisle, being so suddenly called from thence as aforesaid, did design and depute sir Hardress Waller, knight, major-general of the forces there, a man of known integrity and courage both for his service in England and in Ireland, and of considerable fortune there, to take care of the said lord Lisle's forces till the pleasure of the parliament might be further known, the said lord Inchiquin, upon the receipt of a letter from the said sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, or one of them, or from some other person by their, or one of their, direction, privity, or procurement, did express that he had an order or direction from London that no man that favoured the Independents (under which name the said lord of Inchiquin hath comprehended all men that have shewed themselves opposite to tyranny and arbitrary government) should have any trust or command there; nay, though they were of another judgment, yet if they would not prosecute the Independents, they should not be employed there, or words to that effect; and, under colour thereof, the said sir H. Waller, and all others that formerly had held their commissions from the said lord Lisle while he commanded, were displaced, to the discouragement of those and other faithful persons to the parliament, and to the great disservice and danger of losing that kingdom.

XV. That whereas a committee of the house of commons hath been lately appointed by the parliament, to consider of Propositions for the settling and preservation of Wales, whereof the said sir Wm. Lewis and Mr. Glynn were and are members, and to report the same to the house; they, the said sir Wm. Lewis and

Mr. Glynn, with others of the said committee, did, on the 30th of April now last past, without any authority of parliament, before any report made to the house, of their own accord (instead of settling and preserving Wales) order that all committees for sequestration should forbear all proceedings of sequestration against all, or any, of the inhabitants of Wales; and although some few persons were upon general heads excepted, yet, by virtue of that illegal order, all the commissioners of the peace and commissioners of associations, who were as active in raising money and pressing men to serve against the parliament as any others; all the commissioners of array, that did or should at any time come in and submit to the parliament, or their commanders in chief, without any limitation of time; all that had borne arms against the parliament, unless they were governors, and other officers of war, that held out some town, castle, or fort against the parliament; all disaffected and scandalous ministers, though in their sermons they usually reviled and scandalized the parliament and their proceedings, calling them rebels and traitors, and not only incensing the people against the parliament, but usually taking up arms, and leading their parishioners in arms upon any alarm against the parliament; and many other desperate delinquents, have been, and still are, taken off and freed from sequestration; and the said order was sent to every committee in Wales in several letters, contrary to several orders and ordinances of parliament, and contrary to the rules of justice and equity, which should impartially be administered as well in Wales as in other places of this kingdom; whereby the ill-affected gentry and ministry of that country are grown so high and insolent, that honest men dare scarce live amongst them; so as that which was intended by the parliament, to settle and preserve Wales, is, by the practice of the said sir Wm. Lewis and Mr. Glynn perverted to the danger and destruction of it.

XVI. That the said sir Wm. Lewis and Mr. Glynn, have further ingratiated themselves with the delinquents of Wales, and prepared them for their said designs in manner following, viz. He the said sir Wm. Lewis hath, within two years last past, countenanced and protected many of the most notorious and dangerous delinquents within the several counties of South-Wales; namely, the lord Carbery and others in Caermarthenshire; Mr. Carew, and others in Glamorganshire; Mr. Morgan, late knight of the shire, Mr. John Herbert, and others in Brecknockshire; Mr. Gwyn, Mr. Lewis, and divers others in Radnorshire; by freeing some of them altogether from compositions, though sequestered; by labouring with divers members of the house and of committees to be favourable in compounding with others, and to admit of such to their compositions as were incapable thereof; and he hath animated and encouraged some of the said persons to continue their fidelity to the king's cause, promising them, that if they would engage their friends with the king for him, he and his would be their friends in the parliament; in so much as his friends, the delinquents in those parts, have lately looked upon him as a rising man when the king shall come to London; which hath lately been their constant boasting. And the said sir Wm. Lewis hath, within two years last past, caused divers that had been commissioners for the king, and pressed men and raised money to promote the late war against the parliament, namely, his brother, Mr. Tho. Lewis, Mr. Gwyn, Mr. C. Walwyn, Mr. Meredith Lewis, Mr. Edw. Williams, and many others, to be commissioners of the peace, and also committee-men for the said county of Brecknock; insomuch as those that have been most active and faithful to the parliament, have been, and still are, out-voted in those places, and can do no considerable service for the parliament; and the rather for that he hath also procured one Edw. Williams, his own kinsman, and one much disaffected to the parliament, to be solicitor of sequestrations in the said county, who is, and hath been, very remiss and corrupt therein. And the said sir Wm. Lewis hath, by the means aforesaid, lately procured Mr. Ed. Lewis, his son, though unfit for that employment, to be chosen and returned burgess for Brecknock; which that he might the better effect, he kept the writ for election of the said burgess above eight months in his own custody before it was delivered to the sheriff of the said county. And likewise that the said Mr. John Glynn, within two years last past, hath procured several persons, that have lately been commissioners of array, and in arms against the parliament in North-Wales, to be named in the commissions of the peace for the counties of Denbigh and Caernarvon, and other counties there, and to be put in other great places of trust and command there; and, amongst others, col. Glynn, his brother, who was lately a colonel in the king's army, is, by his procurement, become governor of the town and Castle of Caernarvon, and admiral or vice-admiral of the Irish seas; to the endangering of those counties lying upon the coasts towards Ireland, and to the fear and discouragement of the well-affected inhabitants of those places.

XVII. That the said sir Wm. Lewis, being heretofore, during these troubles, governor of Portsmouth, a garrison for the parliament, (in which time he received much of the public treasure, for which he hath not yet given an account) did, while he was governor there, frequently hold correspondence and intelligence with the king's party, about the delivery up of the said garrison; insomuch as, although sir Wm. Waller, and divers others in that garrison, were proclaimed traitors to the king, yet he, by the king's special command, was spared; the king affirming he was his friend, and that he was confident he would do him good service, or to that effect: and although he then was a parliament man and governor of Portsmouth as aforesaid, and was 3 years in the king's quarters, yet his estate in the county of Brecon, being of the value of above 600*l.* per annum, was never sequestered. And since the parliament hath prevailed, col. Herbert Price, (having been governor of Brecknock for the king against the parliament) being sequestered, the said sir Wm. Lewis, by his solicitations to the committee, procured the personal estate of the said colonel Price (which the committee of the county had found out, and caused to be brought to Morgan Aubrey's house in Brecon) to be restored unto him without any satisfaction to the state; and hath caused the said colonel Price's lands in the said county of Brecon, being worth about 300*l.* per annum, to be lett to a friend of the said colonel Price, to his wife's use, at 50*l.* per annum, contrary to the directions of several ordinances of parliament made in that behalf.

XVIII. That the said Mr. J. Glynn, or some other person or persons by his direction, consent, or privity, or to his use, hath, during his being a member of the house of Commons, taken rewards of several persons for services done them in the house; as namely, amongst others, divers drovers from Wales, who, by his means and procurement, had an allowance by order of the house, for 3000*l.* in satisfaction of losses they had sustained by the enemy, and did pay unto the wife of the said Mr. Glynn the sum of 100*l.* as a reward for his said service.

XIX. That the said Mr. John Glynn, as he hath been most active to bring into the commissions of Peace, and into other places of authority divers notorious delinquents in North-Wales as aforesaid, so he hath been as active, as much as in him lies, to put out and keep out of the militia and common council of the city of London, and out of the commission of the peace for Middlesex, many eminent and faithful men that have laid out their estates, and adventured their lives for the defence of the parliament and city in the time of their greatest necessity; namely, alderman Pennington, col. Tichborne, Mr. Eastwick, Mr. Moyer, and others, contrary to the Declaration of both kingdoms: which hath assured all lawful favour and encouragement to those that have been faithful, and shall so continue, to the parliament; which doings must needs tend to the giving a fresh occasion and power to the enemy against the parliament's best friends, to the dishonour of the parliament, and the endangering of the kingdom.

XX. That the said sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, and sir Wm. Lewis, have, by their power and countenance, as members of the house of commons, both jointly and severally, used means to obstruct the course of justice, and have interposed themselves in several causes, and by word of mouth, moved and persuaded judges and other officers on the behalf of such as they conceive to be their friends; amongst others, in the great cause that was lately depending in the house of lords, between alderman Langham and captain Lymery, when counsel was met for the pleading thereof, they did repair to the earl of Rutland about the same; and the said sir P. Stapylton told him that they were fully satisfied concerning the justness of Langham's cause, and therefore, as the said earl did respect them, he should give his vote for Langham, or used words to that effect; which also was seconded by the said Mr. Hollis in words, and agreed unto by the said sir Wm. Lewis, as appeared by his presence and gesture; and the said sir Wm. Lewis did exercise the same power in a cause of John Gunter and others.

XXI. That the said Mr. Anthony Nicholl, although, about 4 years since, he was, by the committee of privileges, voted not a fit member to sit in the house, by reason his election was void; yet the said Mr. Nicholl doth not only sit and vote there as a member, but, by his power and threats in the West countries, and by his solicitations and indirect practices, hath brought in, or procured to be brought in, about 28 members more out of Cornwall, on purpose to carry on the designs and practices before-mentioned, and to make a faction in the said house; and, notwithstanding the Self-denying Ordinance, he doth still hold a place in the Tower, formerly conferred upon him by the house, and receiveth the profits thereof to his own use.

XXII. That the said Mr. Nicholl hath, since his sitting in the house as aforesaid, taken rewards for service done there; namely, whereas sir Wm. Uvedall, knight, for deserting the parliament, and going to York with the king, was suspended the house; he, for the sum of 100*l.* or 150*l.* paid unto him, or to his use, did, by misinformations to the house, procure the said sir Wm. Uvedall to be re-admitted a member. And the said Mr. Nicholl, while he was a member of the Committee for safety, he and others of the said committee having issued forth a warrant for searching Greenwich-House, did, underhand, acquaint one of the queen's officers therewith; and thereby prevented the design of the said committee, to the great disservice of the parliament and kingdom.

XXIII. That the said Mr. Long, at the beginning of the late wars, not having courage sufficient to perform his duty in military affairs, did, out of covetousness, or other unworthy ends, procure a command of a troop of horse under his excellency the late lord-general the earl of Essex; but whenever his said troop came upon any service, he, out of fear or treachery, unworthily absented himself, and never was seen or known to charge the enemy in person, though his troop often engaged; namely, at the Battle of Edge-hill, when he saw there were like to be blows, he left the field, and never charged before his troop; and at the battle or fight at Brentford, though his troop were there, yet he staid at London till the danger was past and fighting done; And when his troop was sent into the West, he took no other notice of it, but to receive his pay; and in the mean while he repaired into the county of Essex, and procured a commission to be a colonel of horse, and, instead of fighting against the parliament's enemies, he betook himself to plunder and oppress the parliament's friends there; and, contrary to order, and without any authority, or exigencies of war compelling him thereunto, enforced great sums of money, and many horses and other provisions from the country: namely, from Mr. Tho. Manwood, a man well affected, who had the General's protection, and whose horses were taken from the plough, and others; to the great losses and oppression of the people, and to the great dishonour of the parliament, whose service he nevertheless neglected, and hath not hitherto given an account of the great sums of money and other things that he so exacted from the country as aforesaid.

XXIV. That the said Mr. Long afterwards, upon pretence of some losses sustained by the enemy, and some great service he had done for the state, did procure of the house a great office in the chancery; namely, to be the chief Register of that court, wherein his skill was little, and whereof he was, and still is, altogether incapable; and although for a time, upon the Self-denying Ordinance, he was displaced, yet, upon the motion, or by the power and means, of the said Mr. Hollis, he hath obtained the said office again; to the great prejudice of skilful clerks that have been bred up in the said court, to the disservice of the common-wealth and the dishonour of the house.

XXV. The said Mr. Long, on purpose to drive on the designs in the said several Charges expressed, hath for two years last past, usually pressed and urged several members to give their Votes such ways as he pleased; and to that end and purpose, doth constantly place himself near the door of the house; and, when any debate is concerning any design wherein his party is engaged, he hath used such tamperings and violence to such of his own party as would go out of the house, and hath persuaded them to continue there for their votes: and he, in case any such have gone out of the house, hath been very inquisitive where they might be found, that so he may go for them when the business in debate comes near to be put to the vote; and, when they come not according to his expectation, doth ordinarily and speedily run out of the house himself to call them and drive them in again, so that he hath been commonly called (by those that are without the house and have taken notice of his actions) the Parliament Driver; whereby the freedom of the members is taken from them, the manner of the parliament's proceedings much scandalized, and many times evil and dangerous designs drove on in a faction by votes, to the great prejudice of the common-wealth.—All which matters and things the said Army will be ready, in convenient time, to make good, by proof upon oath, as this honourable house shall direct. And for that by reason of the straitness of time, and other more weighty affairs of the Army, they could not so fully finish and accomplish the said Articles; therefore the said Army still reserve further liberty to add other Articles against the said Members, or any of them, at any time before their trial, as occasion shall serve. By Appointment of his excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Council of War. Jo. Rushworth, Secretary.*

Resolutions of the Commons, That all Persons, who had adhered to the King, be disabled from sitting as Members.] July 9. The commons

* Besides the general motives to this transaction of the Army (arising from its being at this time guided entirely by Cromwell and the Independent party, as the house of Commons, through the influence of these Members, was by the Presbyterian) there were not wanting private resentments among particulars: For lord Clarendon writes, "That Mr. Hollis had one day, upon a very hot debate in the house, and some rude expressions which fell from commissary Ireton, persuaded him to walk out of the house with him, and then told him, 'That he should presently go over the water and fight with him.' The commissary replying 'His conscience would not suffer him to fight a duel,' Mr. Hollis, in choler, pulled him by the nose; telling him, 'If his conscience would keep him from giving men satisfaction, it should keep him from provoking them.' His lordship adds, "This affront to the third person of the Army, and to a man of the most virulent, malicious, and revengeful nature of all the pack, so incensed the whole party, that they were resolved, one way or other, to be rid of him, who had that power in the house, and that reputation abroad, that when he could not absolutely controul their designs, he did so obstruct them that they could not advance to any conclusion." This anecdote is, in some measure, confirmed by the authority of the Commons Journals; wherein we find "That the house having been informed that some matters of difference had happened between Mr. Hollis and commissary Ireton, the Speaker, by command, laid an injunction upon them not to proceed any further thereupon." Commons Journal, April 2, 1647.

An anonymous Writer of these times † frequently quoted by lord Hollis in his Memoirs, informs us, "That Cromwell confessed he had nothing against sir John Maynard, another of the impeached Members, but that he was put up amongst the rest, because he was a busy man against the lieutenant-general and his faction."

† The Grand Design; or a Discovery of that Form of Slavery intended and in part brought upon the free People of England, by a powerful Party in the Parliament, and Lieut. Gen. Cromwell, Commissary-General Ireton, and others of that Faction in the Army, tending to the utter Ruin and Enslaving of the whole Nation. came to the following Resolutions, which had been debated in their house several days: 1. "That no person that hath been in actual war against the parliament, or hath acted by the commission of array, or voluntarily aided the king in this war against the parliament; or that, since the 20th of May, 1642, hath sued for, or voluntarily accepted, a pardon from the king; or has directed, advised, assisted, signed, or consented unto the Cessation of Ireland; or otherwise assisted the rebellion of Ireland; or as stand sequestered by authority of parliament, for delinquency, shall presume to sit in this house. 2. That the persons that shall be comprehended within this Order shall incur the penalty of being put into the second Branch of the fourth Qualification, in the Propositions concerning such members as deserted the parliament and sat in the unlawful assembly at Oxford."

The same day an Ordinance passed both houses for all Delinquents and Malignants to depart out of the lines of communication, and 20 miles distant, in five days; the earls of Lincoln, Suffolk, and Middlesex, with the lords North, Willoughby, and Hunsdon, dissenting. Also another Ordinance passed, commanding all Officers and Soldiers to depart from the cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent. The former lords, with the earl of Stamford, dissenting.

Letter from sir Tho. Fairfax, to desire the King may see his Children; and vindicating the Behaviour of the Army towards him.] A Letter from sir Thomas Fairfax, sent to both houses, was read: the copy thereof, as published by order of the general and his council of war, runs thus: *

"Mr. Speaker; I was sent unto by the king on Friday last, to desire the parliament to give way to him to see his Children; and that they might, for that purpose, be sent to him. If I may be bold humbly to offer my opinion, I think the allowance of such a thing may be without the least prejudice to the kingdom, and yet gain more upon his majesty than denying it; and if it be the prayer of every good man that his heart may be gained, the performance of such civilities to him is very suitable to those desires, and will bear well with all men; who if they can imagine it to be their own case, cannot but be sorry if his majesty's natural affection to his children, in so small a thing, should not be complied with; and if any question should be concerning the assurance of their return, I shall engage for that within what time the parliament shall limit.—Upon this occasion give me leave, I beseech you, to take notice of some reports spread abroad, as if myself and the officers of the Army were upon some under-hand contract or bargain with the king; and from thence occasion is taken to slander our integrities, and endeavour a misunderstanding betwixt the parliament and their army; the fidelity of which to the parliament and kingdom, and their affection to it, are the great objects of many men's envy, because they see nothing so likely to settle right and freedom, with truth and peace, to us and our posterity, and to hinder their designs against the same, as an harmony and good accord between the parliament and army; which is the joy of good men, and which shall be our study to preserve against all designs and designers to the contrary.—To prevent, therefore, all misunderstandings of that kind, I thought fit, with all clearness, to declare unto you, That we have done nothing, nor shall do any thing, which we desire to hide from you or the world, or shall not avow to the faces of our greatest adversaries.—Our Desires concerning a just consideration and settlement of the King's Rights, his majesty first giving his concurrence to settle and secure the Rights and Liberties of the kingdoms, we have already publicly declared in our Representation and Remonstrance. Since the first of those Papers sent to the parliament, there have been several officers of the army, upon several occasions, sent to his majesty; the first to present to him a copy of the Representation, and after that some others to tender him a copy of the Remonstrance: upon both which, the officers sent were appointed to clear the sense and intention of any thing in either paper, whereupon his majesty might make any question. Since then there have also been some officers, at several times, sent to his majesty about his remove from Hatfield; to dissuade, if possible, from Windsor or any place so near London, to some place of further distance, answerable to what we had desired of the parliament.—In all which addresses to his majesty we care not who knows what hath been said or done; for as we have nothing to bargain for or to ask either from his majesty or the parliament, for advantage to ourselves, or any particular party or interest of our own; so, in all those addresses to his majesty, we have utterly disclaimed and disavowed any such thing, or any overtures or thoughts tending that way; but the only intent and effect of those our addresses hath been, to desire and endeavour his majesty's free concurrence with the parliament, for establishing and securing the common rights and liberties, and settling the peace of the kingdom; and to assure him, that (the public being so provided for, with such his majesty's concurrence) it is fully agreeable to our principles, and should be our desires and endeavours, that (with and in such settling of the public) the rights of his majesty's royal family should be also provided for, so as a lasting peace and agreement might be settled in this nation; and that, as we had publicly declared for the same in general terms, so, if things come to a way of settlement, we should not be wanting in our spheres, to own that general desire, in any particulars of natural or civil right of his majesty's person or family, which might not prejudice or again indanger the public; and, in the mean time, that his majesty should find all personal civilities and respects from us, with all reasonable freedom that might stand with safety, and with the trust or charge lying upon us concerning his person.—You have here the utmost sum of what hath passed from us to his majesty; and we could wish all men did rightly understand, without misrepresentation, every particular; wherein (as we know nothing not agreeable to reason, justice, honesty, or conscience, so) we thought ourselves concerned the rather to say and do as we have towards his majesty, since he came within our quarters, because of those common prejudices suggested against us, as if we were utter enemies to monarchy, and all civil order or government.—And for that particular of the duke of Richmond and the two Chaplains lately permitted to attend his majesty; it was not done without much reluctancy, because therein we doubted we might be misunderstood by the kingdom's best friends; but upon his majesty's continued importunity for it, as a thing very nearly concerning his present inward and outward contentment; and conceiving those persons such, as we hoped, would not do ill offices to prejudice the peace of the kingdom, we did give way to it; and the persons, before they came, had notice of the permission: and as we then thought, so we still do think, that to allow him some such company of persons least dangerous, whom former acquaintance may make him take pleasure in, and the allowance of some such Chaplains of his own, are things both reasonable and just; and the debarring of that liberty in the latter, we doubt, will but make him more prejudiced against other ministers.—In general, we humbly conceive that, to avoid all harshness, and afford all kind usage to his majesty's person, in things consisting with the peace and safety of the kingdom, is the most christian, honourable, and prudent way; and in all things (as the Representation and Remonstrance of the Army do express) we think that tender, equitable, and moderate dealing towards his majesty, his royal family, and his late party, so far as may stand with safety to the kingdom, and security to our common rights and liberties, is the most hopeful course to take away the seeds of war or future feuds amongst us for posterity, and to procure a lasting peace and agreement in this now distracted nation; to the effecting and settling whereof (with a secure provision first to be made for the common rights and liberties of the kingdom, and a due care to preserve and propagate the Gospel of Truth and Peace amongst us) we shall hope that neither the parliament nor his majesty will be wanting: and if God shall see it good to make us any way instrumental thereunto, or that we may otherwise see the same accomplished, we shall then think ourselves indeed discharged from the public engagements we have been called out unto, more clearly and effectually than (before such things were settled) we could have thought ourselves to be; and, to demonstrate our clearness from seeking self-advantages in what we did, we shall thenceforth account it our greatest happiness and honour, if God see it good, to be disengaged and dismissed, not only from our military charges, but from all other matters of power or public employment whatsoever.—I have in these things spoke, not in my own name alone, but in the name (because I find it to be the clear sense of the generality, or at least of the most considerable part) of the Army; and I am confident you and the kingdom will never find it otherwise: I shall leave it to your favourable construction, and commit all to the goodness of God for an happy issue. I remain, Your, &c. T. FAIRFAX: Reading, July 8."

The King's Letter thereupon to the Duke of York, appointing an Interview.] July 12. The house of lords sent a Message to the commons, and therewith a Letter from the King to the duke of York, intimating his majesty's desires to see his Children; which their lordships agreed to, and sent to the commons for their concurrence. His majesty's Letter was read as follows:

"James, Caversham, July 4, 1647.

"I am in hopes that you may be permitted, with your brother and sister, to come to some place betwixt this and London, where I may see you; to this end therefore I command you to ask leave of the two houses to make a journey, if it may be, for a night or two; but rather than not to see you, I will be content to come to some convenient place to dine, and go back at night: and foreseeing the fear of your being within the power of the Army, as I am, may be objected to hinder this my desire, I have full assurance from sir Thomas Fairfax and the chief officers, that there will be no interruption or impediment made by them for your return, how and when you please. So God bless you. Your loving Father, CHARLES R. P. S. Send me word, as soon as you can, of the time and place where I shall have the contentment of seeing you, your brother and sister."

The commons having debated upon this Letter, and what was proposed by the General in his last concerning the same, it was at length agreed upon by both houses, that his highness the duke of York, and the rest of the King's Children, shall have leave to go to his majesty; to continue with him two days, and then return; and the earl of Northumberland to go with them and take care of them.

This day the commons after long debate, voted the Impeachment against the eleven Members to be a Charge, and ordered them counsel and a week's time to bring in their Answer.

Petition from the young Men and Apprentices of London, for the Safety of the King, Settlement of Church Government, &c.] July 14. A Petition was presented to both houses, the title of which runs thus: "To the Honourable the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, the humble Petition of those well af-affected to the Government, both young Men and Apprentices of the City of London, subscribed by above 10,000 hands.—Six of the petitioners being assembled at the door of the house of peers, were all immediately called up to the bar, where one of them, in the name of the subscribers, spake as followeth:

“My lords; If it may please this honourable house, we are commanded, by the young Men and Apprentices of the city of London, to present your honours with this their humble Petition; being in pursuance of their Covenant with God which is upon them, humbly craving your charitable construction; their ends being single, for the glory of God, the peace of the kingdom, and vindication of the parliament.”

The Humble PETITION of divers well affected Young Men and Apprentices of the City of London, &c.

“Humbly sheweth; That your petitioners have, with the forwardest, been ever ready in this common cause of religion, laws, and liberties, to adventure their lives for the preservation thereof; which we hoped, after so much expence of blood, and (by God’s providence) such happy success of your armies, would have been settled to us and our posterities in a lasting Peace; yet, to the grief of our hearts, your petitioners cannot but take notice how, in these unhappy times of distraction, divers discontented persons labour to sow new seeds of discords and divisions amongst us; whereby incendiaries and malignants are encouraged, your faithfulest friends discountenanced, the privileges of parliament violated, magistracy opposed, the publick worship of God slighted, and the liberties and properties of the subject much endangered: all which your petitioners laying sadly to heart, and having more before their eyes the glory of God and the happiness of his majesty’s kingdoms, than their own private interest, (which we shall readily sacrifice for the public) do, in all humility, most humbly pray, 1. That, according to our Solemn League and Covenant, his majesty’s royal person may be defended; and that his just power and greatness (in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms) may be established. 2. That the Rights and Privileges of parliament may be vindicated, and the lawful liberties and property of the subject preserved and maintained. 3. That the government of the Church may be speedily settled, Conventicles (the seminaries of separation) suppressed, and a toleration of licentious liberty effectually declared against. 4. That all Incendiaries, Malignants, and evil instruments which hinder the reformation of religion, dividing the king from his people, or one of his kingdoms from another, or making any faction or parties among the people, contrary to the Solemn League and Covenant, may be brought to public trial, and receive condign punishment. 5. That all obstructions to the ordinary course of justice may be removed, and the insufferable abuses of committees and their officers considered. 6. That the Arrears of the Soldiery of this kingdom may be satisfied, and security granted for their further indemnity, for all acts done by them, tempore & loco belli. 7. That the Army now on foot may be disbanded or otherwise disposed of, that so this almost exhausted kingdom may be freed from those many grievous taxes and oppressions it now groans under. 8. And whereas there have been and still are great abuses and insufferable injuries done to your petitioners, by the Sale of Freedoms, and Foreigners intruding into the suburbs and places near adjacent to this city, whereby your petitioners are much discouraged in their service, the freemen of this city prejudiced, and the franchises and liberties thereof infringed: we therefore humbly beseech this honourable assembly to resolve on some course, (as you in your wisdom shall think fit) as well for the expulsion of such as have so unduly crept in among us, as for the future prevention of the like insufferable injuries that may redound to your petitioners hereafter. And your petitioners, being always ready to adventure their lives and fortunes for your defence and preservation, shall ever pray, &c.”

The ANSWER of the House of Peers, delivered in Form, by the earl of Manchester.

“Gentlemen; The lords have commanded me to return you hearty thanks for your good affections and pious care for the public peace of the kingdom, which you have expressed by your Petition. Their lordships will take the particulars thereof into their speedy consideration.”

But the foregoing Petition having been presented to the commons, they only ordered two of their members to acquaint the petitioners, “That that house had divers matters of the Petition already before them, and would take the rest into consideration in due time.”

Protest against an Order concerning Stage Plays. July 16. An Order for suppressing of Stage-Plays was read twice in the house of lords; and it being put to the question, Whether to limit the time to the 1st of January next? it was carried in the affirmative, the following lords entering this their Protest against it: “We conceiving Stage-players and Stage-plays to be unlawful, and the parliaments of England and Scotland, by their Propositions, having desired that they might be forbidden for ever; the question being put for the Limitation of Time to the 1 of January next, we do here enter our Protestation against that limitation. Manchester, Kent, Mulgrave.”

The Order was directed by both houses to the lord mayor, to take care to suppress all public Plays and Play-houses, all Dancing on Ropes and Bear-baitings, &c.

Answer of the 11 Members impeached by the Army. July 19. This day the eleven Members, impeached by the Army, delivered to the house of commons their Answer to the Charge against them, which was read the first time in their presence; and then, they having of themselves withdrawn, the said Answer was read a second time; as follows:

A full VINDICATION and ANSWER of the Eleven accused Members to a late printed Pamphlet, intituled, 'A particular Charge or Impeachment, in the name of sir Thomas Fairfax and the Army under his command, by his appointment and the Council of War.'

"Although we be not ignorant of the illegality and insufficiency of that which is printed and published for our Charge, seeming unto us, for the greatest part thereof, rather an arraignment of the proceedings of the house of commons, as supposing them to be acted and carried on in a design, by the interest and prevalency of the persons charged; and that all the particulars mentioned in this Charge should be, by them, committed and done in pursuance of that design; a thing so contrary to the nature, and derogatory to the honour, of a free parliament, and of a dangerous consequence, to render all suspected and invalid which this parliament hath done or shall do: And that this Charge is brought in the name of an Army, and so is an accusation enforced by power, contrary to the statute of 31 Hen. 6. c. 1. and no accuser appearing liable to satisfy the parties grieved for their damages and expences, if the accusation prove false and untrue, (as this most certainly is) against the tenor of several statutes made in that behalf.* Nor is it unknown that many indirect and unjustifiable ways have been practiced in providing the materials of this Charge, by tampering with persons to become our accusers; setting general inquisitions upon some of us, who have faithfully served our country, (most of us for the space of near 7 years in that house, and the rest of us the time of our being members) to the wasting of our estates, prejudice of our healths, and many inconveniencies to our persons by much travel and labour, without those advantages by way of gift or otherwise, which some of our accusers, and divers others, have had, for which we bear them no envy at all; yet books have been searched, proceedings at committees viewed, the king's and Digby's cabinets and private papers (of which our accusers had the maidenhead) searched for intelligence, yet not one syllable found against us in them; servants and attendants examined to rake up matter against us (an absolute breach of privilege of parliament, and not well consisting with the liberty of the subject): All this notwithstanding, which we might very well take exceptions at, and besides that we now lie under that great disadvantage which the philosopher did, who disputed with the Emperor who commanded thirty legions, so that all his arguments were too weak, nor could he make use of that strength of reason and truth which his cause

did afford; yet we, presuming upon our innocency and the justice of those who must judge us, but principally upon the goodness of the great God, who is the support and avenger of the oppressed, and hath protected, for several years, some of us, when we have been the object of malice and power, and marks set up to be shot at for destruction; to which purpose our actions, speeches, and our privatest conversations have been, as narrowly as could be, observed and inquired into; prisoners, discontented persons, friends and foes, examined upon us; all manner of persons dealt with, that could be imagined willing to betray, and able to say any thing against us, yet God having preserved us, as he did David from the bear and lion, which encouraged him likewise to promise himself deliverance from the uncircumcised Philistine, though so much more mighty than he; in like manner we trust for his assistance and protection at this time, and shall apply ourselves to the particulars insisted upon, and not formerly cleared and discharged upon a strict examination and debate in parliament; and shall give, we doubt not, a satisfactory account of our integrity and innocency in them all, in order as they lie.—

The first Article of the Charge, which concerns Mr. Hollis singly, is partly of 'Passages at Oxford about 3 years since.' With these he cannot undertake to charge his memory at this time, to give particular and positive Answers thereunto; but he saith, There is no new matter at all in this Charge, and that the whole business received a full and perfect disquisition in the house of commons, in July, 1645, now two years past; when, as near as he could remember, of all done and said by him concerning the particulars, then and now laid to his charge, he gave an account, together with another gentleman, a very worthy member of the house, and his fellow-commissioner at Oxford*, who was then accused by the lord Saville to have joined with Mr. Hollis in all the parts of this Charge; and the house was so fully satisfied of their good intentions in their transaction of that business, that, after a very long debate of several days, they ordered it, upon the question, the 19th day of that July, 'That the matter of the report' (which was this whole business now endeavoured to be revived in this Charge) 'should be totally and finally laid aside.'—As for the particular Answers which he gave in the vindication of his innocency, asserting the truth, and discovering the malice and falshood of his then accuser, the lord Saville, he refers himself to the public Examinations, Proceedings, and Resolutions in the house, and what was then and there delivered, both by him and the other gentleman together with him, at that time most falsely accused by the lord

* 13 Edw. 1. c. 13. 25 Edw. 3. c. 4. 27 Edw. 3. c. 2. 38 Edw. 3. c. 9. 17 Rich. 2. c. 6. 15 Henry 6. c. 4. Notes in the Original.

* Mr. Whitlocke, in whose Memorials, p. 148, et ultra, as also in lord Hollis's Memoirs, p. 38, the reader will find an ample account of this business.

Saville; who hath since so far bethought himself, and testified a remorse for the injury he then did unto these two gentlemen, that it is not very long since he sent a person of honour, a peer of the realm, unto Mr. Hollis, assuring him, 'That when his composition was once made and perfected,' (for this was at the time that the lord Saville was upon compounding for his delinquency) 'he would then discover unto him,' meaning Mr. Hollis, 'how that whole business was laid against him, and who they were that laid it; which when he knew, he would see he had no cause to be so angry with him; and therefore desired him not to be against him in setting the fine for his composition.' Adding withal, 'He durst not discover it till he was out of their danger,' meaning those who had laid that design against Mr. Hollis; 'for if they had the least inckling of it, they would certainly ruin him.' This was the substance, and, as near as can be remembered, the very words, which were delivered unto Mr. Hollis by that lord, in the name of the lord Saville, and from him. But Mr. Hollis was so far from being vindictive against those who had expressed so much malice against him, and endeavoured his ruin, as he wholly put it out of his thoughts, never so much as sending to the lord Saville after his composition was past; in the making whereof he did him no disservice at all, as in truth scorning it.—Another clause in the first Article is concerning a 'Letter sent from the earl of Lindsey unto Mr. Hollis, containing,' as is laid in the Charge, 'some secret Design.' This was likewise examined in the house, and by Mr. Hollis himself first discovered unto the house, contrary to what is in the printed Paper most falsely suggested, and this done by him as soon as it came into his mind; for when he received it, which was very late one evening by a servant of lord Saville's, he immediately after fell sick, which made him clean forget it; nor doth he know what became of the Paper, whether or no he burnt it; The contents of it were only one line, a recommendation of the bearer from the lord Saville, the very words whereof were then fresh in his memory, and by him repeated in the house; when such satisfaction was given, as that there passed a Vote the 19th of July 1645, 'That the receiving of that Note in the manner Mr. Hollis did, was no holding intelligence with the enemy.'—There is another part of this first Article, 'of the earl of Lindsey's moving for a Pass for Mr. Hollis to go to Oxford;' and the king's saying, 'He did him better service in the parliament than he could do there,' which was likewise, by the lord Saville, informed to the committee appointed for the examination of that business, and so reported to the house; at which time Mr. Hollis said, and still doth, That he knew nothing of it, and was, and is, most confident that it is most false; for that he never signified any such desire to the earl of Lindsey, or to any body else, nor ever had it in his thoughts.

To the second Article, which charges Mr.

Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, jointly, with 'sending several messages to the earl of Dorset and lord Digby,' and sir P. Stapylton singly 'to have sent one to the earl of Dorset;' and then both Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton to have 'joined in drawing Propositions, and sending them privately to his majesty; they both of them say, for what concerns both, and sir P. Stapylton, for what concerns himself, (this being the only thing in all the Charge that is singly objected against him) That the whole Article is false and untrue in all and every part of it.

The third Article lays a Charge on the 11 Members jointly, 'for meeting together at lady Carlisle's lodgings, in Whitehall, and other places, with other disaffected persons; for holding correspondence with the Queen, to put conditions upon the parliament, to bring in the king upon their own terms; and do such other things, in prosecution of their evil designs,' as are in that article mentioned. To all and every branch whereof they do all jointly, and each of them severally, give a full, positive, and absolute denial; and affirm, That the whole Charge in that Article is scandalous and false in matter and form. Most of them declare, That within the time there limited for those meetings to have been, and at no time before or since, they have at all been at her ladyship's lodgings; only Mr. Hollis, sir Wm. Lewis, and sir P. Stapylton do acknowledge that, by her ladyship's favour, they have many times waited upon her, both at her own lodgings in Whitehall, and elsewhere, yet never to any such intent and purpose, as is in the Article most falsely suggested; but only to pay unto her ladyship that respect which is due unto her (a person of so great honour and desert) from them, and in truth from all others who are well-wishers to the welfare of this kingdom.—And whereas it is said, 'That they had a great power upon the treasure of this kingdom, and thereby maintained the Queen's Party; assured her a pension, and undertook to do more for the king than the Army would do,' who it seems are now ambitious in out-stripping all others in acting for his majesty: it is very well known that these persons have not all meddled in money businesses; have had least to do with disposing of the public treasure, and therefore could not pleasure others with it; and least of all have they received any part of it for their private uses, some of them having declared themselves in the house, when the house was pleased to vote them considerable sums in recompence for their very great sufferings for the commonwealth, That they would receive nothing till the public debts were paid; and none of them are the men that have grown great in these calamitous times, and been enriched upon the ruin of others, nor preferred themselves and their friends to higher fortunes than otherwise they could ever have aspired unto; therefore there is neither truth, nor semblance of truth, that they should be guilty of engaging the public treasure and stock, as the Article charges; nor would any have believed them if they had been so false and foolish as to have offered it. In conclusion they say, The whole Charge in this Article is utterly false.

The fourth Article, which chargeth Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and major-gen. Massey, to have, 'within the space of 3 months last past, invited the Scots, and other foreign forces to enter this kingdom,' is by them averred to be utterly false; as likewise that part of it which charges Mr. Hollis to have 'sent unto the Queen, to advise her to send the Prince into Scotland, to come into this kingdom at the head of an army,' is by him declared to be most untrue, and a meer invention of malice against him. And, in the last place, where it chargeth the 11 Members, 'to have listed, or caused to be listed, divers commanders and soldiers without authority of parliament, and to have encouraged Reformed officers and soldiers to gather together tumultuously at Westminster, to affright and assault the members of parliament,' there is nothing of truth in it, and reflects more upon their accusers than on them.

To the fifth Article, which charges Mr. Hollis, sir Philip Stapylton, and Mr. Glynn, to have 'been obstructers of Petitions to the parliament for Redress of public Grievances,' they say, That what hath been done by them, or any of them, in matters of petitions, was done in the house of commons, and only there; where they have, upon occasion, delivered their opinions concerning some seditious petitions, which they suppose to be the petitions intended by the Article. And for what is said of Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton's 'affronting some Petitioners attending a committee, as major Tuleday, and committing Nicholas Tew, without authority,' they do say, That Tuleday and Tew affronted the committee; that Tew endeavoured to raise a tumult in the Court of Requests, to the disturbance and danger of the committee; whereupon the committee thought fit to restrain him until the next morning, when they would acquaint the house with it: that all, both concerning him and Tuleday, was reported unto the house, and both of them were, by the house, committed upon just reasons, and afterwards both of them discharged or bailed; the one upon the motion of Mr. Hollis, and the other of sir P. Stapylton.—And whereas it is said, 'That they were not permitted to speak for themselves,' it is notoriously untrue, for Tuleday was heard at the bar of the house of commons, and Tew was heard at the committee as long as he would speak, until he refused to answer any more questions, saying, He was not bound to accuse himself.—In the last place, where Mr. Glynn is charged 'to have committed Tew to Newgate, for no other cause but for having a Petition about him, which was to be presented to the house,'

Mr. Glynn doth answer, That being Recorder of London, and in the commission of the peace, he knows it not to be a crime to send such persons to the goal, as be brought before him for misdemeanors, and may have committed Tew, as he hath done many others; but he doth believe it to be a mistake in the accusers, not remembering any such thing, and doth boldly affirm, That if he did commit him, it was not for the cause laid down in the Article, but upon just grounds of law.

To the sixth Article, touching 'the Imprisonment of ensign Nichols by sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and major-gen. Massey,' they answer, That they, being, by Instructions of the 9th of April, 1647, from the committee at Derby-House, for the affairs of Ireland, authorized to draw off from the rest of the army such as should accept of the service of Ireland, and quarter them in such places as they should think fit, upon the engagements of divers officers of col. Lilburne's regiment to go for Ireland, they gave orders to lieut. col. Kempson to march with such soldiers of that regiment as should engage for Ireland, to Evesham; and the soldiers so engaging separated from the army; and, on their march towards Evesham, they, on the 24th of April 1647, at Saffron-Walden, after the general's departure towards London, having received several informations that ensign Nichols (ensign to capt. Dormer, one of the captains of the said regiment) repaired into the quarters of those forces drawn off from the army, in order to the service of Ireland, there dissuading the soldiers to go for Ireland; encouraging them mutinously to demand their pay of the said capt. Dormer, and then, by falsehoods and cunning practices, endeavouring to entice them back to the army; undervaluing those that went for Ireland, and incensing them against the Propositions of parliament for that service; and also reading to the said soldiers the Petition of the Army, after the same was then lately prohibited by both houses of parliament; and being certified that, for those miscarriages, the said capt. Dormer had secured his person till further order, the lords and commons, who were commissioners, did thereupon, on the said 24th of April, give directions to lieut. col. Kempson to take order that the said ensign Nichols should be sent up to London, with the first opportunity, to be disposed of by the committee of lords and commons for the affairs of Ireland at Derby-House, which was accordingly done; and, upon the report of the business, the said ensign was committed by order of the house of commons, and the persons that brought him rewarded for their service therein: in all which proceedings they know of nothing done, but what their duty and instructions, in relation to the service of Ireland, required at their hands, being contrary neither to the laws of the land nor articles of war; but conceive, upon these informations, (ready to be produced and testified upon oath) that the said ensign, according to the martial law, for his said offences deserved death for endeavouring a mutiny as abovesaid: and therefore there is no cause for the army to complain, in that the house was so merciful to him as to remit that punishment. Whereas it is charged, 'That the pockets of ensign Nichols were searched, and divers Papers taken from him; and that he was sent a prisoner to London from the head-quarters, without the authority or privity of the general,' they say, That no order was given by them for searching his pockets, or taking away his papers; and believe no such thing was done: that he was secured by capt. Dormer, being found in the quarters of those forces that were drawn off for Ireland, actually endeavouring to put the soldiers into a distemper, and so to withdraw them from that service; and was sent from those quarters (not the head-quarters, as is falsely suggested) to London. And for the privity or authority of the General, if he had been then present, they conceive their authority from the parliament, on that behalf, was sufficient without the general's; and, as the case stood, they thought it not reasonable to consult the army in the matter of disturbing the Irish service, when they had there found so little encouragement before.

To the seventh Article, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and col. Harley, say, They are very sensible the particulars charged in the seventh Article do specially relate to things said or done in the house of commons; and so not liable to any censure, having passed the approbation of that house, which hath already acquitted them, by their Votes of the 25th of June, from all things done and spoken by them in the house, contained in this and the three ensuing Articles; and so ought not to have been recited in this Charge; yet, to vindicate themselves from the scandal of design and combination against the Army, they shall give this true account of what induced them to endeavour the suppressing of that Petition:—Sir Wm. Waller and sir J. Clotworthy, being commissioners of parliament with the army for the service of Ireland, and col. Harley being there to attend the same service, March 22, 1646, at a convention of officers for the service of Ireland at Walden, the Petition was produced, as the Petition of the Soldiers, to be approved by the officers there; and was pressed with such eagerness, that an officer of quality offering some reasons against it, was told, He deserved not to live in an army; they taking notice of the subtle and violent managing of that Petition, pretended to be the petition of the soldiers, but in truth framed then, as they can prove, by some officers at Walden, at a time when the parliament only proposed the service of Ireland, and the soldiery had neither disposition nor cause to petition; the army being well paid for several months then past, especially the foot, consisting much of recruits, had little cause to complain for pay; thereupon they represented this information to the general, as that which required his care to suppress timely. But after they returned to London, they received several informations, of which they have good proof, that the Petition was agitated in several regiments, and proposed by the officers to their soldiers: that some officers threatened that those who did refuse to subscribe it should be cashiered; and directions were given to return the subscriptions to some principal officers at the head-quarters. What passed in the house of commons, they presume not to relate without the leave of the house; but by these particulars, which are ready to be attested by persons of worth, the design of raising jealousies between the parliament and army, will really be fixed upon those who have falsely imposed it on the accused Members, to carry on their own designs, which are since more visible.

To the eighth Article, whereas col. Harley is charged, 'That, by combination, he produced to this house a Letter which could not be made good,' he affirms, He did acquaint the house with a Letter received as he was coming to the house, and sent to him from an officer of worth in the Army, who was and is ready to justify the substance of the Letter to be most true, That lieut. col. Pride^a drew col. Harley's regiment to a rendezvous, read the Petition in the head of his company, and that the petition was then subscribed by most of the regiment; and that lieut. col. Pride said, 'Such as would not subscribe the Petition should be cashiered:†' That in this col. Harley did nothing but his duty, and what the house of commons approved by their public thanks to him and another worthy member, an officer of the army, who produced another letter concerning the same business.—For that which is laid to Mr. Hollis's charge in this Article, concerning the drawing of that Declaration, he answers, That it was done in the house; and the house did allow of, pass it, and afterwards sent it up to the house of peers, where it was likewise past; and that any should question it, being become and made the act of both houses, and so a Charge rather against them than himself, seems strange unto him, whose part in it was only to draw up that Declaration according to the sense of the house, in obedience to a general call upon him for it, being exceedingly pressed and urged to do it, when himself was very unwilling to take that task upon him.

To the ninth Article, wherein it is said, 'That col. Harley, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and the said other persons, did procure divers eminent and faithful officers of the army, viz. lieut. gen. Hammond, colonel Lilburne, lieut. col. Pride, and others, to be sent for to appear at the bar of the house, against whom they could charge nothing at all; insomuch that the house thought fit immediately to discharge them,' it is answered, ^a Afterwards made a colonel. † 'This is Liberty of Conscience so much professed and contested for by the Army.' Notes in the original.

That the said col. Harley, sir J. Clotworthy, and sir Wm. Waller, having been informed that those who stile themselves such eminent and faithful persons of the army, with some others, being very active in promoting the Petition mentioned in the former Articles, did, in discharge of their duty, faithfully represent to the house what they had heard; and whilst the house was in consideration thereof, divers letters were brought to several members of the house, from several parts of the kingdom, declaring the apprehension which many faithful officers of the army had taken up, if such a Petition should be permitted to go on; as, particularly, a Letter of the 28th of March last, directed to colonel Rossiter, an eminent member of the army; wherein it is desired, by such as promoted this petition, that the names of such officers and soldiers as subscribed the Petition should be sent to colonel Hammond, lieutenant-gen. Hammond, commissary-gen. Ireton, col. Lilburne, lieutenant-col. Grimes, or any three of them. On the consideration of what was mentioned in this and other letters, in confirmation of what was formerly presented by the gentlemen articulated against, the house of commons did send for several of the persons before-mentioned; and, as is conceived, had very good reason so to do.—And whereas it is said, 'That a committee was appointed to examine the truth or falsehood of them.' If by the truth or falsehood of them is meant, the truth or falsehood of the persons stiled divers eminent and faithful Officers of the Army, then how could they be said to be immediately discharged as such, against whom nothing could be charged or proved at all?—The gentlemen articulated against do further say, That it is a very ill use that is made of the parliament's indulgence, not to proceed with such severity against those persons convented before them, as aforesaid, as to affirm, That, therefore, nothing can be said against them: the like ill use was formerly made of the parliament's so far condescending to the desires of another paper, said to come from the Army, concerning the obliterating of the Declaration relating to the Petition; both which expressions might well, in modesty and duty, have been spared.—And whereas this Article is stuffed with great swelling words of vanity, as though the gentlemen charged by this Article were pressed to produce their proofs and evidence, if they had any, before the committee; it is answered, That the persons brought up to the bar were, by their own confession in this Article, immediately discharged. What need then was there, or to what purpose was it, to bring any such proofs against them, when as the clemency of the house discharged them?—In a word: It is most demonstrable it was the parliament's indulgence, not the innocency of several, if not all, of those who were questioned, which brought them off from punishment; and it were to be wished, in regard of these and their subsequent proceedings, that some proportion of meekness and ingenuity towards the houses, did accompany so much professed integrity, as is vaunted of by the framers of this Article and Pamphlet.

To the tenth Article, which charges Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, Sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and major-general Massey, 'to have been instruments in obstructing the Relief of Ireland;' and then relates some passages of theirs in the house, (which could not be discovered to the army by any but members, contrary to their oath and duty, an high violation of the houses privileges) they say, That they have faithfully, cordially, and industriously, at all times, and upon all occasions, to the best of their understandings, promoted the service of that poor bleeding kingdom; that they did desire supplies might have gone in an intire body out of the army, and that as speedily as possibly could be; so as some of them took the boldness to move, That sir Thomas Fairfax might have been sent thither; which not succeeding, yet the house resolving 8 regiments of foot, 4 of horse, and 1 of dragoons should be sent out of the Army, they, as zealously as they could, endeavoured the putting of it in execution, and attended the committee to which it was referred, constantly and diligently: and they doubt not but the great God, who will not be mocked, will judge them according to their deserts who have obstructed it, by discountenancing and affronting them who offered to embrace that service at the Convention of Officers, March 22, 1646,* by cashiering, assaulting, and turning out of their quarters such as declared their readiness for that service, under the ignominious notion of Deserters of the Army, and as men untrue to the common interest of the soldiers; and by a positive Declaration, 'That whatsoever faithful commander should be appointed for the service of Ireland, they must shew themselves averse to that service,' as is expressed in a Letter of the Agitators to lieutenant-gen. Cromwell, dated April 30, 1647. And, in truth, col. Robert Hammond's high and unreasonable Propositions concerning the present service of Ireland, viz. 'That the time of his employment, and those of this army going with him in this service, exceed not 2 or 3 months at the furthest; that the forces going over with him be not obliged to any other service whatsoever, more than the possessing or defending of Dublin; that col. Hammond himself may have the command of the garrison of Dublin, and all the forces in it, during the said term; that shipping be ready in the harbour of Dublin, victualled at the parliament's charge, with sufficient convoy, 14 days before the expiration of the said term, to transport the said forces back again for England, &c. and that upon other terms than these he doubts the number would not be considerable that would go over

* See a Vindication of 167 Officers that are come off from the Army, and the printed Petition of the Officers to sir Thomas Fairfax, Notes in the Original.

‘for that space,’ clearly demonstrates his and the army’s strange averseness to Ireland’s relief; and that all they aimed at was but to possess themselves of Dublin for the present, for what ends, themselves and their proceedings since can best discover.—The informations which they gave into the house, concerning the engagement of divers officers both of horse and foot for the relief of Ireland, they avow to be true; but are extremely misrepresented in this Article: For whereas it is falsely suggested, ‘That they informed the house that, by their procurement, there were 50 companies of foot and 10 troops of horse of the army engaged for that service upon the terms proposed by the parliament; the truth is, That divers officers of horse, relating to so many troops, and some of the officers of about 60 companies of foot were, by subscription, personal promise, or assurance from others, really and truly engaged, as may appear by the report made unto the house, unto which they refer themselves; but afterwards many were drawn off again by the artifice of those, who, though they pretended Ireland’s relief, have their ends rather upon the confusion of England than the relief of Ireland, as their proceedings do manifest.—Concerning the Subscriptions of col. Butler, lieut. col. Jackson, major Gooday, and others, for that service, supposed to be procured in delusion of the parliament, to mislead it into a vain imagination of a strength out of the army, which had nothing of reality in it, in regard those officers did then declare their unwillingness to go into Ireland upon any terms whatsoever; truly we conceive that Declaration from the Officers, bearing date the 22nd of March, will sufficiently clear both from any dishonourable combination; wherein it will appear that they obliged themselves no further, than either to engage in their own persons, or to improve their interests in their respective commands, for that service; which last obligation they have made good like men of honour.—As for those Officers of col. Butler’s and sir Hardress Waller’s regiments; their names might be given in by those who knew, or might justly suppose, that their inclinations led them to embrace that service; if their friends were mistaken in them, or their minds since altered, we know not what crime can be imputed to any. Lieut. col. Farrington was never presented by them to the house as a lieut. col. of the Army, and engaging for himself and his regiment for Ireland; but only as a gentleman that had formerly held the quality of lieut. col. and yet did retain a very great and deserved interest in that regiment, and with whom they conceived the regiment would be very willing to engage.

To the eleventh Article, which charges sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Lewis, major gen. Massey, sir Wm. Waller, and Mr. Glynn, ‘with commanding part of 3 regiments, advanced for Ireland from Bromsgrove in Worcestershire, back to Reading, with an evil intent to draw forces together

‘for a new war, and this being done upon the Sabbath-Day;’ they answer, That, out of their zeal to promote the service for Ireland, they met at all times when they were summoned at Derby-House, where the council sat early and late; and some times on the Sabbath-Day, being in truth a work of the greatest piety and mercy; which certainly was not for their ease, and they hope rather a merit, than to be reputed a crime; That that business was transacted at a full committee, whether upon the Sabbath-Day or no they know not; but they know, and affirm, that the reason why those regiments were ordered to come to Reading, was only that money might be sent to them for their pay; the officers representing to the committee the great necessities of the soldiers, and that where they were then quartered in Worcestershire, they did not know how to convey it thither with safety, in regard it must pass through the quarters of the army, who had expressed great displeasure to those forces which were drawn off for Ireland; and the committee was the rather induced to it, because they knew the money which was sent to Oxford, for disbanding a regiment there quartered, when, upon their refusal to disband, it was ordered to be brought back, was violently taken away by the soldiers from those intrusted with that service; and the committee feared some such attempt for the intercepting of this money, which occasioned that calling back to Reading; and not any such design as is, most falsely and maliciously, in the Article suggested.

To the twelfth Article, wherein sir J. Clotworthy is said to ‘to have converted several great sums of Money to his own particular use in the years 1642, 1643, 1644, and since; which, by several orders of parliament, and of the Irish committee, were designed for the Relief of Ireland;’ first, he answereth, That he never received any money from the beginning of the war until this day for the Relief of Ireland in general; but only for the particular charge he hath in that kingdom, wherewith he was honoured in the beginning of the war by a special order of parliament.—And for the particular sums in that Article suggested to be received by him in money, he saith, That he never received any such money, and was so far from making any particular use of such, either money or provisions, as were designed for supporting the soldiers under his care, to their prejudice in the least degree, that he hath disbursed above 3000*l.* out of his own purse, and by his credit, for their support and relief, more than was received.—He further saith, That for the sum of 280*l.* in the Article mentioned, by an account delivered to the committee of Accounts in June 1644, he was so far from intending the least prejudice, either to the state here, or that kingdom of Ireland, that, amongst other sums, he charged himself with the said 280*l.* for 20 butts of sack, which he should have received from one Whitscot; who failing therein, the said sir John converted the credit of the ordinance for the said 280*l.* into cloaths for his soldiers, as, upon full examination and debate several years since had thereof, before the committee of accounts, may appear.—And by the said Account he is likewise charged with 300*l.* in the Article mentioned for 120 pair of pistols, the most whereof he exchanged, by order, out of the stores of this kingdom for firelocks, which he sent over to the soldiers of his regiment, and the remainder of the said pistols were delivered to his troop; and he never converted any of the said pistols to his own use, though he conceives he might have done, having given allowance for them on his account: and for the money for the said pistols, as no part thereof ever came to his hands, so he conceives the same is yet due and unpaid to one Abraham Vandenbeind, who provided the said pistols on the credit of the state.—For the sum of 700*l.* for 2000 swords; he knoweth nothing thereof, nor ever received any such sum; but acknowledgeth that he is charged by his said account with 175*l.* for his part of 2000 swords; which, as the former sum of 280*l.* hath been laid out, with much more of his own, for the service of the state; so as the said sir J. Clotworthy having prevented the informers by his account long since given in, and there remaining so great a sum disbursed by him, over and above what he hath received; had he detained any part towards his own disbursements, which he conceives he might justly have done, yet could it not have been charged against him for so heinous a crime, and that in prosecution of the design in the general charge mentioned, as is impertinently laid down in the said Article.—And for the other divers sums of money, suggested in general to have been received, from time to time, by the said sir John for the use of Ireland, which are alledged not to be employed as by the several orders was directed and intended; when he knows the particulars, he hopes to give a satisfactory Answer therein; and wishes that some few of his many accusers may be able to give as just an account for the many sums they have received, in relation to their employments, as he hath done, and is ready to do, for those few sums directed for his and his soldiers support in that hard war of Ireland.—And whereas, by this Article, it is suggested, ‘That the said sir J. Clotworthy hath, within two years last past, received several sums of Money, arms, and other provisions, for a troop of horse, which he pretended he had raised in Ireland;’ he saith, ‘That he never pretended to have raised any such troop, though he may, with some confidence, affirm, he hath, to his great charge, these 5 years past, maintained a troop of horse which was formerly under the command of capt. Upton, deceased, and after his death conferred on him; which troop he hath often recruited since his command thereof, being about 5 years space, during which time there was never received from the state, in money, above 7 weeks pay, with some little provisions of cloaths and arms, which he duly returned to the said troop, with some addition of his own, for their better support in service; judging it a most abominable act to detain any thing at all, especially of so little, designed for such necessitous soldiers.—And whereas, by the latter part of the Article, it is most scandalously suggested, ‘That the said sir J. Clotworthy, for Money and other rewards, hath preferred John Davis and Wm. Sommers, and others, to be intrusted with the Irish affairs, who have kept correspondence with the enemy, and defrauded the state of other great sums of Money; and that he hath been privy to, and a sharer in such their actions,’ he saith, ‘That the said Charge is most false and untrue in all the parts thereof wherein he is concerned; and for the said Wm. Sommers, he saith, He never preferred him to be intrusted with any of the Irish affairs, nor knoweth of any employment he ever had in that way; it being notoriously known he never had such employment since the rebellion of Ireland began; so as he was not in any capacity to defraud the state.—The said sir John further saith, That John Davis hath been contracted withal for great proportions of victuals, arms, and cloaths for Ireland, as a merchant; wherein the committee of both kingdoms, and the committee for the affairs of Ireland, the consent of the houses first had, have dealt with him after others refused such contracts, as he then accepted, and since performed; to most of which the said sir John was not privy, and no participant at all with the said John Davis in any of the particulars contracted for, as is now, and hath been formerly, in printed pamphlets falsely suggested; but that the said John Davis was ever trusted with the Affairs of Ireland other than as a merchant, (whereby he had the opportunity, in performance of his contracts with the state, to lay out his own money by great sums, and get it again as he can, whereof there may be now some doubt) the said sir John is totally ignorant.

To the thirteenth Article, wherein, among other things, ‘secret intelligence to have been held with the lord of Ormond, by cyphers, is laid to the Charge of the said sir J. Clotworthy,’ his Answer is, ‘That he, together with sir Tho. Wharton, sir Rob. King, sir Rob. Meredith, and Rd. Salway, esq. or any three of them, being appointed commissioners, but not jointly as is pretended, to treat with the lord of Ormond, for the delivery of the sword, &c. of the city of Dublin; after four days treaty, according to their Instructions, the treaty not taking effect, the commissioners resolved, That three of them should go for Belfast, and two of them come to London: and whilst the commissioners were in preparation for their departure, upon several just and warrantable occasions, they repaired jointly and severally to the lord of Ormond, who seemed to be much troubled that the treaty took no effect; professing the only cause thereof to be the want of the king’s assent, which he said he hoped to gain; desiring to have it so presented to the parliament, and that he might acquaint the parliament, and the commissioners then going for Belfast, with the king's Answer; and, lest letters should be intercepted by the rebels, there was a cypher agreed on, which was known to several of the commissioners when it was delivered, and of which the said sir John minded the other commissioners at Belfast after their arrival there, and before any thing was written by the same from the lord of Ormond; and, about a fortnight afterwards, the lord of Ormond, by the means of one capt. Ward, conveyed a little open Paper in cypher, directed to the said sir J. Clotworthy; who, as soon as he received it, did communicate the same to the rest of the commissioners; which being decyphered, there was thereby intimated, That he was more than hopeful they should shortly hear from him to their content; to which the commissioners returned an answer, That they should be glad to hear of the content he was hopeful to give: with all which, and the other transactions of that affair, the committee of Derby-House were made acquainted, and reported the same to both houses before sir John Clotworthy came out of Ireland; and the houses, having approved of the carriage and endeavours of the commissioners upon the whole transaction of the business, have long since so far owned them therein, that they have given thanks unto them for the same.—This being the only particular wherein the said sir John is, by this Article, charged to have held intelligence with the lord of Ormond; and that being by the advice of the rest of the commissioners, in manner as aforesaid, and for so good an end, as the giving his lordship an opportunity of new application to the parliament for rendering to them the city of Dublin and the other garrisons under his command; which hath, since that time, taken effect accordingly, to the exceeding great advantage and strengthening of this kingdom's interest in Ireland; the said sir John leaves it to the judgment of all equal minded men, whether or no there be any just cause to exhibit such a Charge against him for the same, especially by an Army pretending such good affections to Ireland's welfare.—For the other part of the said Article, 'concerning the said sir J. Clotworthy's holding intelligence with the lord Digby;' he directly denieth any such thing, as being utterly false and untrue; for he never saw the said lord Digby these many years, but one night accidentally, when being last at Dublin with the other commissioners aforesaid, he was sent to the Castle of Dublin, by the said commissioners, concerning an officer of col. Moore's, that had received an injury by some persons that related to the lord of Ormond; at which time the said lord Digby came into the room where he was, but he had no discourse with him in private, nor at all, other than common talk, several persons being present: neither hath the said sir John, since the said lord Digby deserted the parliament, ever exchanged letter, message, or word with him, directly or indirectly, otherwise, or at any other time, than is hereby declared.—And whereas, by this Article, it is charged, 'That, in order to such secret intelligence,' (of which he admires a whole Army residing in England should have such certain and public notice, as to make it a positive Charge, and undertake to prove it upon oath, were it so secret as they charge it, as the Article alledgeth to have been held by the said sir John with the said lord Digby,) 'the lord of Ormond and the said lord Digby lately employed one Slingsby, who,' as the Article saith, 'pretends a design about the Prince, to come into this kingdom;' the said sir John utterly denieth to have had any thought of any such design, or any knowledge of the said Slingsby, or of his coming into the kingdom, until he heard that one Slingsby, whom he yet knoweth not, had been examined before the committee at Derby-House. And the said sir John presumeth he hath, to the said committee, confessed who employed him, and to whom he was employed here.

To the fourteenth Article, which charges sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, 'with obstructing Articles exhibited against the lord Inchiquin; calling back the lord Lisle from the government of Ireland; causing the command of the forces in that kingdom to be committed to the lord Inchiquin, he writing a Letter to his lordship, upon the receipt whereof he should express he had direction to put out all those who favoured Independents;' they do say they were so far from keeping off any proceedings upon those Articles, that they furthered it all they could, and several times moved it in the house; being desirous to have all cleared concerning the lord Inchiquin, whom, as they believed to be a man of honour and fidelity, so it, upon examination of his actions, he appeared to be other, they were resolved to declare their sense of him accordingly.—As for what concerns the lord Lisle, they say, His lordship's time expiring, which was but for one year, either for himself or any one else to continue in that command, the parliament was pleased to dispose of the affairs of Ireland in another way; in the agitation whereof in the house they went according to their judgments and consciences, without respecting any person living.—For the Command of the Forces of that kingdom which, as to the lord Inchiquin, can only be understood of Munster, they do not know that ever any thing was here done in it at all, there having been no occasion for it, as to their knowledge: and as for the Letter mentioned to have been written by them, or any of them, or from some other person by their, or all of their, direction, they say, As it is altogether uncertain and illegal, so it is a mere fiction, (for they never did any such thing) and tends to draw the odium of Independents upon them; to worse advancement, both in Ireland and elsewhere, they fear they may prove obstructive, as this article clearly insinuates.

To the fifteenth Article, sir W. Lewis and Mr. Glynn say, That the Order of the 30th of April, in the Article mentioned, (if there were any such) relates to them only as members of the committee, for whom they intend not to answer: But in truth there was no such order; it was only a report, not an order, and intended only for the county of Caermarthen, however it came to pass the words were general; and that was done in order to be reported to the house, and accordingly was reported, and after repealed by the committee, as they were informed. And as for the publishing and sending thereof unto every committee in Wales, they know nothing thereof; neither was it done by their, or either of their, directions or consents.

To the sixteenth Article, sir W. Lewis denieth his protecting any Delinquents in South-Wales, as is untruly alledged. And as for the earl of Carbery; he did no more than move in the house of commons to make good what major-general Laugharn had promised and pressed for on his behalf, by his Letters to the Speaker and committee of both kingdoms; representing the advantages that came to the parliament by his conformity, and how it would further their service to oblige him.—For Mr. Carew of Glamorgan and Mr. Herbert of Brecknockshire; after their long imprisonment, they being upon their compositions at Goldsmiths-Hall, he did but move the ascertaining of their fines according to the rules prescribed to the committee there; having observed that delays brought a prejudice both to the parliament and the parties sequestered, by abusing the one in their authority, the other in their estates. And for Mr. Herbert; after his sight of some high Articles drawn up against him by Mr. Rumsey, he never spake in his behalf, and he yet continues a prisoner in Ely-house. For Mr. Morgan of Brecknockshire; he is one the said sir William hath ever used with no more than a civility suitable to their being countrymen, and of many years acquaintance; which he believes no good man can look on as an offence. For Mr. Gwyn and Mr. Lewis of Radnorshire, two of the committee in that county, and those that, by major-gen. Laugharn's certificate and col. Birch's public testimony, had furthered the reducing of that county; he did but publicly move in the house that some disputes concerning them, and some differences between them and others of the committee for that county, might be referred to the committee for Gloucester, sitting in Channel-Row; which he did out of his desire to serve the parliament, by keeping peace in those remote parts, and for no ends at all of his own.—And further saith, He was never so much as present at any debate concerning the Sequestration of any other person whatever in either of the fore-mentioned counties, save those above-named; nor ever so much as motioned to any member of either house, committee-man or other, either the remitting or favourable compounding with any, upon any terms not warrantable by the rules prescribed, or their compounding with any that were incapable thereof; nor ever did animate or encourage any, since this unhappy difference, to continue their fidelity to the king's cause, by promising them, that if they would engage their friends with the king for him, he and his would be their friends in the parliament, as untruly suggested: looking upon that kind of conditioning as a thing below the thoughts of a gentleman.—What the Delinquents in those parts say of him, or how they look upon him, or how they or any others look upon those that charge him, or what shall be his or their lot at his majesty's coming to London, he is ignorant of; but hopes that a little time will discover both him and them in their true colours; and wisheth every man's return may be according to the singleness and integrity of his affections to the public peace and welfare of the kingdom.—And farther he saith, That there being an Order for the nomination of Justices of the Peace for the county of Brecknock, he humbly named Mr. Roger Vaughan, now high sheriff of that county, to be added to the committee formerly named by the house; also Mr. Meredith Lewis, Mr. George Parrey, and Mr. Edw. Williams, as the fittest persons he knew of to supply the necessity there was of justices in that county: and although he cannot say that when the king's forces had a power in those parts, but that many of them may have done that which is not justifiable; yet for his brother Mr. Tho. Lewis, who was formerly one of the committee, he is confident his innocency is equal with any man's in that county, and his sufferings as great as any of double his fortune inhabiting there; he having been carried prisoner, by sir Wm. Vaughan's command, to Ludlow-Castle, with one Mr. Hugh Williams, where they continued till he laid down eight score pounds for their enlargement; and he can confidently affirm that no man is left out of commission, that any honest man can pretend, either by his estate or affections to the parliament, to deserve to be therein employed; and he could heartily wish that he or they that gave information on this Article, would have advised who else should have been recommended for committee-men or justices. And for Mr. Edw. Williams being made solicitor; his commission was delivered upon certificate from three of the four gentlemen who are the only persons resident in the county of those that are named for the committee there; and he believes he hath been so careful in his duty, that neither corruption nor remissness can be justly charged or proved against him.—And the said sir William saith, That his son was chosen burgess for the borough of Brecknock by the unanimous assent of the burgesses, who adjudged him a fit person to serve for them; and his fitness for that place he desires may be determined of by those amongst whom he hath the honour to sit, who have seen his demeanor, and are the only proper judges thereof; but that he kept the writ 8 months in his custody, in order thereto, is most untrue; for at his being in Brecknockshire in July 1646, having carried the writ down with him; and finding, at Ragland, that Worcester was then but upon delivery to the parliament, and that the commissioners of peace for that county were those that continued in their authority by their old commission, he thought it then no fit time for a public meeting in that town upon such an occasion, lest some ill consequence might have followed thereon; and thereupon, at his return, acquainted Mr. Prideaux, one of the then commissioners for the great seal, therewith; and, with his approbation, returned the writ to Mr. Scobel, the register, in whose custody it continued till he called for it again some five weeks before the election.

To the seventeenth Article the said sir Wm. Lewis acknowledgeth that, by the ever-honourable the earl of Essex's commission, and the approbation of both houses of parliament, he was, in the beginning of these troubles, made governor of Portsmouth; though not only without his desire but against it, as it is well known to sir John Evelyn of Wilts, a member of the honourable house of commons: That during his service there he received much of the public treasure, for which he gave such an account, as that he had his discharge from the committee for accounts, bearing date the 15th of March, 1644: and the said committee, coming to the house of commons with their certificates of that Account and others, did there publickly attest it to be both just and frugal; whereupon the house was so favourable as to vote, on the 3rd of April, 1645, their approbation of his Account so presented unto them, and to order 'That the Committee of the Revenue should, with their soonest and best conveniency, pay unto him the sum of 415*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* part of what remained due unto him upon his said Account,' as appeared by the certificates above-mentioned; which evidently disproves that part of the Charge, which doth most unjustly accuse him for not accounting, of which he believes his greatest accusers are far more guilty than himself, since he never heard of any certificate made to the house of their accounts. And whereas he is likewise charged, while he was Governor there, 'frequently to have held correspondence and intelligence with the king's party, about the delivery up of the said garrison:' some such aspersions having been very undeservedly raised on him, during his command there, the committee of lords and commons for the safety of the kingdom were pleased to write to him to come up to London, by their letter dated the 8th of June, 1643; where the said sir William pressing, by his importunity, the said committee and earl of Essex that they would examine whatever could be alledged against him, to punish him if faulty, and right him if injured; upon the earl of Essex's Letter to the said committee, after a full examination of the business, the committee, by their letter, gave his lordship this Account following:

'Westminster, July 29, 1645.

'May it please your excellency; We have examined and debated the business concerning sir Wm. Lewis, as your lordship did desire; and out of all those jealousies and allegations which have been offered against him, there amounts nothing, as we can gather, which can derogate from his honour, or the public confidence reposed in him in his command at Portsmouth. This account we render to your excellency, as well to answer that which hath been referred to us by your excellency's Letter, as that which is required from us by sir Wm. Lewis's innocency. This being the state of this business, it is left in the hands of your excellency to repair this worthy gentleman in what manner you shall please; and so we take our leave, and rest, &c. Bedford, Pembroke and Montgomery, B. Denbigh, W. Say and Sele, Jo. Pym.'

The which Letter being carried to his excellency, after his perusal thereof, he wished the said sir Wm. Lewis to repair again to Portsmouth, and to take care thereof; but he having vindicated his innocency, and to manifest how little he regarded either places of honour or gain, (which others aspire to) desired to be excused, and quitted the employment.—Why, or upon what grounds, the said sir William, with divers other persons who faithfully served the parliament, was left out of the Proclamation mentioned, he knoweth not, being no ways privy to their councils, nor what his majesty was pleased to say of him; but this he knoweth, and 'tis generally known to that part of Hampshire where he lived, that, about October, 1643, there was plundered from him by the king's party to the value of between 2 and 3000*l.* by means whereof, his lands being unstocked, he made not 3 pence of them in 3 years. For his estate in Brecknockshire, which by the charge, is allowed to be worth about 600*l.* per annum, it was not held worth sequestering in those parts, in regard of the taxes laid upon it; and during the time of the troubles he made little profit of his estate there or elsewhere.—And as it is no argument that some malignants in arms against the parliament did hold correspondence with them, because their estates in some places have not been yet sequestered, through negligence of the officers, or want of evidence; so he presumes it can be no proof of his complying with the king or his party, in the judgment of any indifferent person, or of his accusers (who now profess their correspondence with his majesty without the houses privy, in their late printed Letter, of July 8, 1647, * to both houses) because he was not sequestered upon the same or any such like occasion; which, for ought he knows, may be the case of some other well-affected members.—As concerning col. Price's Estate; upon the sad complaint of Mrs. Price of her necessities, he wrote a Letter to the committee only to allow unto her the fifth part of her husband's estate, according to the ordinance of parliament in that behalf, and to restore her wearing apparel which had been taken from her, (an extremity he had not heard of before used to any other) which he hopes his accusers, who now desire justice for, and indulgence towards, delinquents, which they charge as a crime in others, cannot dislike: but for the letting of col. Price's estate, he did not intermeddle therein; but believes the tenant that rents it at 50*l.* per annum pays a full value for it to the state, considering it is charged with annuities of 120*l.* per annum issuing out of it, his wife's fifth part, and all taxes and contributions.

The said Mr. Glynn, as to the Charge in the sixteenth Article, whereby he is charged 'To procure several persons that have been commissioners of array in North Wales, to be named in commissions of peace, and other places of greater trust and command,' saith, The Article gives not any instance of any such person that he hath procured to be named a justice of peace, or any other place of trust or command, except colonel Glynn, his brother, made governor of the town and castle of Caernarvon. And for the said col. Glynn, he avers he was never any colonel in the king's army, but constantly declared his affection to the parliament; and for that cause he was, in the beginning of the troubles, besieged in his own house, with cannon planted against it; where he was taken prisoner, his arms seized upon, himself charged with treason, and intended to be proceeded against at Shrewsbury, had not some persons interposed and procured his enlargement, upon security that he should not bear arms for the parliament: and as he hath suffered for his affection to the parliament, so he hath advantageously acted for them, by inviting major-gen. Mitton to come into North Wales; joining his forces with the said major-general, and relieving the parliament's forces with money; by reason whereof the county and castle of Caernarvon was reduced to the parliament's obedience, of whose eminent services the house of commons took special notice, in a Letter written unto him; and, for recompence of his sufferings for the parliament, and the great service done for them, he was made governor of Caernarvon, for the safety of those parts, and encouragement of the well-affected there.

To the eighteenth Article, whereby Mr. Glynn is charged 'To have taken Rewards of several persons for service done them in the house; and, in particular, 100*l.* paid unto his wife by the drovers of Wales, for service done them,' he saith, That the same is a false and slanderous Charge: and for the 100*l.* supposed to be given to his wife, who is dead and cannot answer for herself, the same is untrue; for Mr. Glynn lent those poor men 100*l.* out of his own money, to find them bread, which was afterwards repaid him, when they procured money upon the credit of the Excise, as will be justified by many persons of quality; besides which there was no other 100*l.* that came to his wife's hands.

To the nineteenth Article, Mr. Glynn answers, first, concerning Delinquents, That the Charge is general, and therefore he can make no particular Answer, but generally not guilty. Secondly, concerning the putting out of the Militia; That he was no way concerned in it; they were presented by the common-council, and chosen there when he was not present, and afterwards approved by both houses; and he cannot take upon him to give reasons to justify the acts of both houses or the common council, who are only impeached by this Charge, and must plead not guilty of intermeddling with putting in or putting out.

To the twentieth Article, where it is said, 'That sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, and sir Wm. Lewis, have, by their power and countenance, obstructed justice in the cause between aldreman Langham and capt. Limery, and that of J. Gunter;' they answer, That Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, being one afternoon in the court of Requests, heard that the house of peers were then to sit, which made them go to see what the occasion was; and, coming into the lobby, found there the earl of Rutland, who told them their house met about a great business betwixt Langham and Limery, and some discourse passed concerning it; when Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton said, They understood that the merits of the cause was not at all in question, only the entertaining of it upon an appeal, which they conceived was the common justice of the kingdom, and not to be denied to any; which having said, they went away; nor was it done in secret, but spoken publickly, and in the hearing of some of the counsel for Limery: and they do utterly deny the speaking of any such words as are alledged to be said by them; for they were so far from engaging their interest in it, as they do not to this day know what the lords did upon it. And sir Wm. Lewis doth absolutely deny his being there present at all, when any such conference was with the earl of Rutland; and cannot but observe there should be that significancy attributed to his presence and gesture, as thereby to discover his thoughts and inclinations, especially when he was not there in person. And as for the cause instanced concerning John Gunter, he conceives it to be a suit depending in chancery betwixt the father and son, both nearly related to him, but no further proceeded in than to bill and answer, that he knows of; and what influence his countenance could have, so early days in the beginning of a suit, let all the world judge.

To the twenty-first Article, which concerns Mr. Nicholl only, he saith, That although his election was voted to be void by the committee of privileges, whose meer votes exclude no members from sitting in the house, where no witnesses were heard on his behalf; yet he conceives his election good, and hopes it will be thought so by the house, when they hear a true state of the cause. And whereas they object, it hath lain four years unreported; Mr. Nicholl appeals unto the house, and that worthy gentleman in whose hand that report lay, being never prosecuted by his competitor, whether he hath not endeavoured to have that report made, and the business determined: and still continues his humble request to the house for the speedy determining of the same. To the second clause Mr. Nicholl answers, That he never used any threats, menaces, or indirect practices, for the bringing in of any members, either out of Cornwall or any other country in the West: And it is well known that those worthy gentlemen there elected, and now excepted against, were fairly and duly chosen by their own interest and public demerits; and their unbiassed integrity is such, that they detest the maintaining of a faction, or carrying on of any design other than the common good. To the third clause of that Article Mr. Nicholl saith, That he continues in an office of Master of the Armory in the Tower, wherein he hath faithfully served the state for their advantage; and that since the Self-denying Ordinance passed the houses, he never received one penny of his fee from the Committee of Revenue; but confesseth to have received a rent of 34*l.* a year, or thereabouts, and a fine for two houses, which he is to be accountable for to the parliament: And it is well known that Mr. Nicholl lost a far better office, both for profit and esteem, than this, (the Customers Place of Plymouth and of all the ports in the county of Cornwall) for his fidelity to the parliament; and hath received no reparation for the same, as divers others have had for their lost offices. Besides, he hath been employed in many long and chargeable journeys, and hath expended divers great sums of money in them, which he hath borrowed of his friends; and hath yet had no satisfaction from the parliament in consideration thereof, as some of his accusers have had for meaner services.

To the twenty-second Article, Mr. Nicholl saith, That neither himself, nor any other for him, ever took one penny, directly or indirectly, for any thing done in parliament, or in any of their committees; wherein he hath had the honour to serve in some of the greatest Trust. And whereas he is charged to bring sir W. Uvedale into the house upon his coming from York, for the sum of 150*l.* it is altogether false and scandalous. Upon sir W. Uvedale's return from York, he came into the house, and sat there without any question; some time after, he had leave to retire himself into the country; and at his return to London, near two years after, the dispute grew about his admittance into the house; and he was admitted into it upon a solemn and serious debate, without the motion or procurement of Mr. Nicholl; which admission, if undue, is a charge against the whole house, not Mr. Nicholl. True it is, that when sir W. Uvedale was at York, and treasurer of the army there, Mr. Nicholl (having an assignment made him by his brother captain Humphry Nicholl, to receive an arrear due to him for his service in the north,) wrote to sir W. Uvedale to send him that money: whereupon sir W. Uvedale, when he came to London, sent him a sum of money as an arrear due to his brother; but whether so much as is specified in the Article, he knows not, by reason his papers and accounts of that business are not in town. As for Mr. Nicholl's receiving of Rewards; he challenges all his accusers, (many of them having had occasion to use his poor service) and all others, to prove him guilty of receiving the least reward for any thing done by him in discharging of his public Trust.—And whereas it is charged, That he discovered a Design for the searching of Greenwich-House; he saith, That about midnight, in August, as he takes it, 1642, there came an officer, with some soldiers, to his lodging, and brought with them a warrant for him to sign for the searching of Greenwich-House; which warrant he signed, and by the same officer, he sent three lines, written on an open paper, to a noble lady who lodged in the house, that she should not be frightened with the coming of soldiers in such an unseasonable hour; which lady was no servant of the Queen's, but one who had given a clear demonstration of her affection to the public, by a large voluntary contribution upon the Propositions of Money and Plate: So that he hopes this will not be thought a fault to send an open paper to a person of that quality, for such purpose, by the same officer that was to put the design in execution.

As to the 23d, 24th, and 25th Articles, which waste themselves in a scandal touching Mr. Long alone; for to a printed imputation of Cowardice, Covetousness, and Treachery, where no particular person appears to avouch the truth, or give satisfaction for the falsehood, of such an assertion, no better name can be given; yet he, to give the world a taste of what truth they may expect in the rest, returns unto these three this Answer, That howbeit his education had not much acquainted him with military employments before the late unhappy wars, which he thinketh to be the case of many who now reckon well of their abilities in that profession; yet (through the invitation of his excellency the late lord general the earl of Essex, and the committee for the safety of the kingdom, who thought it of some importance at that time to interest persons of estate and relations, tho' not bred soldiers, in that employment) he did accept the command of a troop of horse under his excellency, the greatest part whereof were raised by himself and his friends; and, in the head of that troop, he charged at Edge-Hill, in the regiment then under the command of sir William Balfour, which was the first that brake into the enemy; in which charge he lost his horse, and, being left dismounted, did yet, with his single pistol in his hand, give quarter to several of the enemy; and was then, by capt. Harcourt, quarter master of his troop, remounted; continued out the service of that day and the next, and was one of the last troops that brought away the ammunition; a thing haply not known to them who gave the information for this article, seeing it was the ill-hap of some commanders that day to make an over-hasty retreat: and of some others, of no little eminency now, never to come there; much less to charge, though they quartered very near the field.—When the unexpected skirmish at Brentford happened, his troop, as the greatest part of the army besides, was dispersed: but so soon as he could get it together, he went thither and stayed there till the business was at an end: shortly after, his troop being to march towards Bristol, where some of his fellow captains, whose experience he thought as little as his own, received sudden and great commands, he declined that service under them, and intended to return to his other in the house of commons; but some disaffections and backwardness to contribute to the public service appearing in some persons of quality in the county of Essex, he was, by commission from his excellency the earl of Essex, commanded thither, and authorized, with other gentlemen of that and the counties of Hertford and Bedford, to raise horse, arms, &c. upon such as had not contributed; touching which employment, without drawing the particulars into a long discourse, he saith, That he acted nothing without the concurrence of two gentlemen, at least, of his fellow-commissioners; and thereof, and of what had been raised by them for the public service under that authority, he, long before any committee of accounts was settled, did publish the particulars in print; and thereof did, immediately after that committee was settled, give and pass an account upon oath; which course had others taken, who have greater accounts than these, there would haply have been less room for this accusation: The plundering and oppression in the article mentioned, he reckons as odious as it is an untrue suggestion.—As for Mr. Thomas Manwood in the article mentioned; he much doubteth whether there be any such man residing in the county of Essex; sure he is that no protection from the then lord general's excellency was disrespected by him; and upon the best enquiry Mr. Long can make, the person intended by Mr. Thomas Manwood is no way eminent for his good affection: and what was done towards him was well warranted by the commission under which Mr. Long and those other gentlemen of that country were employed; and nothing, by countenance of that authority, was converted to Mr. Long's private advantage; And so little hath the humour of covetousness, with which the printed articles charge him, prevailed, that there will be nothing found in his accounts to be demanded for his colonel's pay;

an omission of which he dares undertake to excuse them that are most willing to accuse him.—The Damages sustained by Mr. Long, (not pretended, but real) mentioned in the 24th article, to be the inducement of that favour conferred upon him by the chancery-office, were under-considerations; and, together with his four years imprisonment and sufferance for his public service in former parliaments, weighed by the wisdom of that house, and his capability to execute that place, (usually discharged by able deputies, as now it is) determined by that judgment which he dares not, and thinks no men or company without these walls ought, to dispute: And therefore to that quarrel, more against both houses than himself, he thinks himself not bound to give, and believes no wise honest Englishman will expect, or well receive, any other answer. This only he saith, That neither the eminency nor profit of the office can surely be the cause, that it only, of all the offices and benefits accepted from the parliament by other members, should be now subject to observation, and made a matter of charge.

In Answer to the twenty-fifth, and, perhaps, for the weight of it, the last Article in that printed Paper; he saith, That if any man hath, which is not known to him, seriously, or in scorn, used that scurrilous phrase of 'Parliament-Driver,' towards him, (by reason of his more than ordinary diligence in persuading and pressing his fellow members of the honourable house of commons, according to their trust and duty, to remain in that house or return to it, when any thing hath been in debate; which, in his apprehension and conscience, required their judgment, wisdom, and suffrage there) he is contented to own the fact, and leave the abuse to the author: Any unlawful carriage, in that particular, without the house, he doth deny; his demeanor within those walls, in that or aught else, no man without them ought to question or control, or he to give account of. And, for a close, he saith, That these his accusers, who have, against reason and justice, driven so many members out of the house at once, deserve the name of Parliament-Drivers, or Parliament-Riders, much more than he who desired only to continue the members within the house, according to his own and their duty.—To conclude: Upon the whole matter we do say, That it is our misfortune, not our misdoings, that we stand in this matter accused. Power may seize upon us and destroy us; but not justice, we mean the justice of man, for and in respect of these pretended crimes; not the justice of God, which we tremble at, and submit unto; and see it reach unto us, for our sins, this cup of persecution and affliction by the hands of men, the men of the world; who are themselves but the hand of God to correct his children for their good; their good in the end, though for the present it be grievous unto them; and befalls them many times occasionally, and in the eye of men, where they think themselves to be least deserving it, to make them examine themselves, and enquire where man cannot come, into their own hearts, to find out the true cause which hath provoked their God to afflict them; and so come to the knowledge of those evils and repent of them, which, otherwise, would have lain undiscovered, and, like a sleeping serpent, awaken afterwards to do them a greater mischief; which is at present our case, and we trust God will give us the grace to make this use of it: For certainly, upon the strictest scrutiny of our consciences, and enquiry into our past actions and intentions, we cannot find we have deserved this return from any that can pretend themselves to be well-wishers to the parliament and to the peace of the kingdom. We can speak it for a truth, we are of those who are peaceable and faithful in Israel: We never sought great things for ourselves: We have mourned for the desolations of this kingdom, of three kingdoms: We have endeavoured our utmost, according to our several talents, as it hath pleased God to enable us in our several places and callings, as members of the parliament, as members of the commonwealth, to do all we could, to procure a settlement in church and state; We have desired a peace; we have laboured for peace, and, willingly, have never done the least thing to keep it off: We have all of us taken the covenant; we dare not say that we have kept it to God-ward so well as we should: but we will say, no man can lay the breach of any part of it, as to the king, parliament, or kingdom, to our charge; nor, we hope, ever shall. Nothing in this world have we more heartily desired, than to see a happy and firm reconciliation between the king and his people; him on his throne, them in their liberties; both of them encompassed with righteousness and peace, and glorying in the parliament, as the foundation of both their happiness.—Yet how we are aspersed and misrepresented, by several pamphlets and papers concerning us, and by this printed charge, let the world judge. We dare appeal even to the consciences of our accusers, if they would speak out; perhaps with some it is in truth our crime, that they know us to be such as we are; perhaps we stand in the way, and prevent some destructive designs, therefore we must be removed; and that we may so be, we must be represented to be hinderers of peace, obstructors of justice, invaders of the liberty and freedom of the subject, abusers and misleaders of the parliament: In sum, whatsoever is amiss in the kingdom, we are made the cause, and must bear the blame of it.—Christianos ad ignem: What public calamity soever befell in the time of the primitive persecutions, the poor Christians were said to be the cause, and must be the expiatory sacrifice: But let men say what they will, Eliab was never the more the troubler of Israel, because he was so called.—We will say with Job, ‘Our Witness is in Heaven, and our reward is on High.’ This is our comfort and our confidence; we shall be acquitted before the tribunal of heaven: and we trust in the Divine Protection to have our deliverance and justification, even here upon earth, by the judgment of man; that is, by the justice of the parliament, notwithstanding the malice of all our enemies. DENZIL HOLLIS, PHILIP STAPYLTON, W. LEWIS, JOHN CLOTWORTHY, W. WALLER, JOHN MAYNARD, EDWARD MASSEY, JOHN GLYNN, WALTER LONG, EDWARD HARLEY, ANTHONY NICHOLL, Members of the Honourable House of Commons.”

July 20. The commons having passed a Vote, on a division of 76 against 39, for putting all the Land Forces in England, Wales, and the Isles, under the immediate command of sir Tho. Fairfax, the lords this day agreed to it.

The Commons give Leave to the 11 impeached Members to be absent 6 Months.] This day the commons gave leave to each of the 11 Members, accused by the Army, to follow his own occasions; to as many as desired to go beyond the seas the Speaker was ordered to give passes; the time of the said leave not to exceed six months.—The motives to these Resolutions of the commons we find thus set down by Lord Hollis himself, one of the impeached Members: “These gentlemen thought it best, rather than a breach should be made upon their occasion, that through their sides the parliament should be stuck to the very heart, and die for ever, to make it their own act of forbearing the house: and therefore they told the house, they saw they were in that condition they could neither protect them nor themselves; that if they would not do as Achish did to David, who bid him begone because the princes of the Philistines loved him not; yet that they would, at their humble suit and desire, be pleased to give them leave to withdraw; and to such as desired it, passes to go beyond the sea; which at last they did agree to, tho’ truly I must say, unwillingly; but which, all said, they looked upon as a good service done to the house for preventing greater inconveniencies.”

July 23. An Ordinance passed both houses for the London Militia to return into the old commissioners hands, according to the desire of the Army. This was strongly debated in the lower house, but, on the question, passed by 77 against 46.

Petition of the Trained Bands, Apprentices, Mariners, and Soldiers, for the King’s coming to London.] July 24. A Message was brought from the commons to acquaint the lords with a printed Paper which was delivered to them in form of a Petition; but in the nature of it, is a Covenant made by some persons, who endeavour to effect things prejudicial to the parliament: that the commons had drawn up their sense of this business, and desired their lordships concurrence. The petition was read.

To the right hon. the Lord Mayor, the right worshipful the Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London, in the Common or Guildhall of the City of London assembled: The Humble PETITION of the Citizens, Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers of the Trained Bands and Auxiliaries; the young Men and Apprentices of the cities of London and Westminster; Sea-Commanders, Seamen and Watermen; together with divers other Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers within the Line of Communication and Parishes mentioned in the weekly Bills of Mortality.

“Sheweth; That your petitioners taking into serious consideration how Religion, his majesty’s honour and safety, the privileges of parliament, and liberties of the subject, are at present greatly endangered, and likely to be destroyed; and also sadly weighing with ourselves what means might likely prove the most effectual to procure a firm and lasting Peace, without further effusion of Christian English blood; have therefore entered into a solemn Engagement, which is hereunto annexed; and do humbly and earnestly desire that this whole city may join together, by all lawful possible means, as one man, in hearty endeavours for his majesty’s present coming up to his two houses of parliament with honour, safety, and freedom, and that without the nearer approach of the Army; there to confirm such things as he hath granted in his message of the 12th of May last, in Answer to the Propositions of both kingdoms: And that by a Personal Treaty with his two houses of parliament, and the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, such things as yet are in difference may be speedily settled, and a firm and lasting Peace established: All which we desire may be presented to both houses of parliament from this honourable assembly. And we shall pray, &c.”

Their Solemn Engagement for that Purpose.] The Paper annexed to the foregoing petition stands thus in the Commons Journals:

A SOLEMN ENGAGEMENT of the Citizens, Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers of the Trained Bands and Auxiliaries; the young Men and Apprentices of the Cities of London and Westminster; Sea-Commanders, Seamen and Watermen; together with divers other Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers within the Lines of Communication, and Parishes mentioned in the weekly Bills of Mortality.

“Whereas we have entered into a Solemn League and Covenant, for reformation and defence of religion, the honour and happiness of the king, and the peace and safety of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; all which we do evidently perceive not only to be endangered, but ready to be destroyed: We do therefore, in pursuance of our said Covenant, oath of allegiance, oath of every freeman of the cities of London and Westminster, and protestation, solemnly engage ourselves, and vow unto Almighty God, that we will, to the utmost of our power, cordially endeavour that his majesty may speedily come to his two houses of parliament with honour, safety, and freedom, and that without the nearer approach of the army; there to confirm such things as he hath granted in his Message of the 12th of May last, in Answer to the Propositions of both kingdoms; and that, by a Personal Treaty with his two houses of parliament, and the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, such things as are yet in difference may be speedily settled, and a firm and lasting Peace established.—For effecting whereof, we do protest and reoblige ourselves, as in the presence of God, the Searcher of all Hearts, with our lives and fortunes, to endeavour what in us lies, to preserve and defend his majesty’s royal person and authority, the privileges of parliament, and liberties of the subject, in their full and constant freedom; the cities of London and Westminster, lines of communication, and parishes mentioned in the weekly bills of mortality, and all others that shall adhere with us to the said covenant, oath of allegiance, oath of every freeman of London and Westminster, and protestation: nor shall we, by any means, admit, suffer or endure, any kind of neutrality in this common cause of God, the king, and kingdoms, as we do expect the blessing of Almighty God, whose help we crave, and wholly devolve ourselves upon, in this our undertaking.”

The Parliament declare all such Persons as shall join therein, to be Traitors.] A Deposition or two were then taken by the lords, which testified that many Officers and young Men were seen going into Skinners-Hall to sign this Petition: That very many copies were sent abroad, whereby it was supposed they might get many thousands to under-write it in a very short time: On which the commons had sent up the following Declaration, which was read and agreed to by the lords; and sent with an Order to the lord mayor and sheriffs, to be forthwith read and published, by beat of drum and sound of trumpet, in the cities of London and Westminster, and within the lines of communication; and afterwards to be sent all over the kingdom:

“The lords and commons having seen a printed Paper, intituled, ‘A petition to the right hon. the Lord Mayor, the right worshipful the Aldermen, and Commons of the city of London, in the Common or Guildhall of the City of London, assembled,’ under the Name of divers citizens, commanders, officers, and soldiers of the Trained Bands, Auxiliaries and others, young Men and Apprentices; Sea-commanders, Seamen and Watermen; together with a dangerous Engagement of the same persons, by Oath and Vow, concerning the king’s present coming to the parliament, upon terms far different from those which both houses, after mature deliberation, have declared to be necessary for the good and safety of this kingdom; casting reflections upon the proceedings both of the parliament and army, and tending to the embroiling the kingdom in a new war: And the said lords and commons taking notice of great endeavours used, by divers ill-affected persons, to procure subscriptions thereunto, whereby well-meaning people may be misled; do therefore declare, That whosoever, after publication or notice hereof, shall proceed in, or promote, or set his name to, or give consent that his name be set unto, or any way join in the said Engagement, shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of high treason, and shall forfeit life and estate as in cases of high treason is accustomed."

The commons ordered a company of foot and a troop of horse to attend their house the next day as a guard.

Letter from the Commissioners in the Army, with several Papers relating to the foregoing Engagement.] The same day a Letter from the Commissioners in the Army, with divers Papers inclosed, was read in the house of lords.

For the right hon. the earl of MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore.

"May it please your lordship; Yesterday the head quarters were removed unto this place, and are to-morrow to be at Bedford. Since our last dispatch unto you, we have observed that the Army hath been in very frequent consultations about the expediting the particulars which they have to propound in reference to a general Settlement; and therein, as we hear, have made some progress; but since their coming to this town, they have received information, which they give good credit unto, of some dangerous contrivance set on foot in the city of London, under pretence of 'a Petition and Solemn Engagement of the citizens, commanders, officers and soldiers of the Trained Bands; the Auxiliaries; the young Men and Apprentices of the cities of London and Westminster; Sea-Commanders, Seamen, and Watermen; together with divers other commanders, officers, and soldiers within the lines of communication;' tending very much, as is conceived by the army, to the kindling of a new war; and thereupon they have thought fit to deliver in one Paper unto us, and another unto the committee of common council residing here; the copies of both which, together with the Petition and Engagement itself, and the information they have received of the same, we held it our duty immediately to send unto your lordship, being very apprehensive of the ill effects that things of this nature may produce in the minds of the Army, if not timely prevented and remedied by the wisdom of parliament; of this the committee of the common council residing here are so sensible, that they are gone up with all speed to London to give the city a clear representation of these affairs, and what operation it is like to have here. Your, &c. C. Nottingham. P. Wharton. Aylesbury, July 23."

Next follows:

The PAPER delivered to the Commissioners of Parliament from the General and his Council of War.

"My lords and gentlemen; We received this inclosed Paper the last night, from the hands of a very well-affected citizen: it was delivered him by an officer of the city militia, who, being invited to meet some citizens at Skinners-Hall, upon Wednesday last, with divers others, to sign the same, and offering to dispute against the matter of it, and to shew how dangerous and illegal it was, was silenced; and told that it was not to be disputed, but to be signed and joined in, there being divers citizens and others, at the same place for that purpose; which, when he understood, he took this printed copy away with him.—By the contents of which, when you read it, you will easily perceive what it tends to, and how desperate and dangerous it is, to the hazard of the whole kingdom, and to frustrate all those endeavours of the parliament, the army, and kingdom, for an happy Settlement; and likewise to precipitate all into a new and bloody war. We cannot therefore but acquaint you that we look on this as a business set on foot by the malice of some desperately-minded men; this being their last engine for the putting all into confusion when they could not accomplish their wicked ends by other means.—To this end have all secret Listings tended; and we wish that needless and superfluous listing of Auxiliaries, and connivance at the continuance of the Reformadoes about the cities of London and Westminster, have not all had the same aim. And by this we hope it will appear, that our jealousies and fears of some such desperate design to be hatched in and about the city, considering the temper of men there, have not been groundless; nor our desires to draw near the city of London with the Army, to disappoint and break all such plots, and to free the parliament from the violence of them, have not been without just cause: and we desire all indifferent men to judge, whether our withdrawing from the city, in obedience to the parliament's commands, was for theirs and the kingdom's security or not. We wonder that divers men did calumniate at our marching so near the city, and put so bad representations upon it, as that it tended to force the parliament, or to plunder the city; seeing our doing so was to break that black design which now begins to shew itself in its own colours: whereas indeed our consciences witness with us that our aims were clear and honest, tending to restore the parliament unto its just liberty, which was much abated in the eyes of all the kingdom; and no doubt by the authors and contrivers of this new Covenant and Engagement, some whereof have been so far from assisting to put the Reformadoes and other dangerous persons out of the lines, that now they are called in to join in this conspiracy.—We intreat you to give the parliament a full representation of these things; which that you may do, we have sent you the Papers, together with such informations as may give them an opportunity to discover the bottom of this business. We were marching from London, when we received this information, in obedience to the parliament, to give the city more content, and to stop the mouths of slanderers. But if such designs, so destructive to the parliament and the work in hand, be suffered to go on; or that the parliament be interrupted in the freedom of their debates and proceedings, (as we hear within these few days they were, by those that are invited to partake of this confederacy) what must be the consequence?—We beg it of the parliament, as they tender their own safety, the peace of the kingdom, and preventing of a second war; as they would not have the kingdom lose the fruit and benefit of all the blood that hath been spilt, and treasure that hath been spent in this cause; that they would not suffer their freedom and liberty to be endangered by such designs as these; they having an Army, which, by the blessing of God, in spite of all that their and the kingdom's enemies can do, will stand and fall with them; be firm, faithful, and obedient to them in all things; and as ready to relieve Ireland when the Peace and Rights of this kingdom are settled.—We write not this to desire the parliament to invite us to march up to them; we care not how great a distance we are from London, if it be the parliament's pleasure and consists with their security, and the breaking off those combinations which are hatched in the bowels of that city.—We are hastening our Proposals which are for the general Settlement, and which we are confident will satisfy all that love peace and truth: but we see plainly we need more to intend our own security, than have cause to expect to bring things to a happy issue, by treaty, while such designs are on foot. We pray you, therefore, that the parliament would speedily and thoroughly enquire into, and break these designs; wherein, as in all things else, we shall be ready to serve them, as they shall judge it needful, and when they shall command us. By the appointment of his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax and the Council of War, Jo. Rushworth, Sec. Aylesbury, July 23."

Great Numbers of Apprentices assemble about the House of Commons in a riotous Manner.

July 26. This day the commons seem, by their Journals, to have been in great agitation: First, an Order was made that no Member should go out of the house without leave. Then sir Robert Pye was appointed to go to the lords and desire them to sit a while. Next, the house being informed that divers young Men and Apprentices were at the door to present a Petition, two members were ordered to go out and receive it from them. But they, returning, acquainted the house that the young Men desired that some of themselves might be admitted to present it: upon which they were called in, and presented a Petition, styled, 'The humble Desires of the Citizens, Commanders, Officers and Soldiers of the Trained Bands and Auxiliaries; the young Men and Apprentices of the Cities of London and Westminster; Sea-Commanders, Seamen and

'Watermen; together with other Commanders, Officers and Soldiers, within the lines of Communication and Bills of Mortality.' The Petitioners being withdrawn, the Petition was read, but no further notice was taken of it: however, we may suppose they staid for an Answer; for, shortly after, the house wanting to divide on a Question, they could not do it, 'by reason,' as the Journal expresses it, 'the multitude and tumult was so great at the door of the house, which by no persuasion they would quit, that the Lobby could not be cleared for the purpose.'*

* Mr. Whitlocke says, "That the Apprentices, and many other rude Boys and mean Fellows amongst them, came into the house of commons with their hats on; kept the door open, and called out as they stood, 'vote,' 'vote;' and adds, that in this arrogant manner they stood till the Votes had passed for repealing the Ordinance for changing the Militia, and the Declaration of both Houses of the 24th. Memorials, p. 263.

Ludlow (who was present in the house at the time) after giving a very particular account of what had passed at several fruitless private interviews between the king and some principal officers in the Army) writes thus: "The king having bid defiance to the proposals from the army, thought it necessary to bend all his force against them, and especially to strengthen their enemies in the parliament. To this end a Petition was contrived to press them to a speedy agreement with the king, and presented in a most tumultuous manner by great numbers of Apprentices and Rabble, backed and encouraged by many dismissed and disaffected officers who joined with them. Whilst the two houses were in debate what Answer to give to this insolent multitude, some of them getting to the windows of the house of lords, threw stones in upon them; and threatened them with worse usage, unless they gave them an Answer to their liking: others knocked at the door of the house of commons, requiring to be admitted; but some of us with our swords forced them to retire for the present; and the house resolved to rise without giving any Answer, judging it below them to do any thing by compulsion. Whereupon the Speaker went out of the house, but, being in the lobby, was forced back into the chair by the violence of the insolent rabble; whereof above a thousand attended without doors, and about forty or fifty were got into the house, so that it was thought convenient to give way to their rage; and the Speaker demanding, What question they desired to be put? They answered, That the King should be desired to come to London forthwith; which question being put, they were asked again, What further they would have? They said, 'That he should be invited to come with honour, freedom, and safety;' to both which I gave a loud negative, and some of the members as loud an affirmative, rather out of a prudential compliance than an affec-

Petitions for revoking the late Ordinance for changing the Commissioners of the London Militia; and also the late Declaration against procuring Petitions.] Before the above Petition was presented, another had been delivered to both houses from the lord mayor, aldermen, &c. of the city of London; to which were annexed two more which that court had received from the Citizens. These, with the 'Humble Desires of the Young Men, &c.' as before-mentioned, we here give altogether for the sake of connection.

To the Hon. the House of COMMONS assembled in the High Court of Parliament: The Humble PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London in Common Council assembled,*

"Humbly sheweth; That the petitioners have, by an Ordinance of parliament, dated the 23d present, taken notice of the pleasure of both houses, for constituting a new Committee for the Militia of the city of London and the liberties thereof, and of all other places within the lines of communication and the weekly bills of mortality, and for determining a former Ordinance for the militia of this city, &c. dated the 4th day of May last; which being taken into serious consideration, the petitioners could not but first call to mind, how far both houses of parliament had formerly honoured the city, when they first established the Committee for the Militia, and since enlarged or altered the same, to take the sense of this court before they finally resolved thereupon; which confidence the petitioners are not conscious to themselves to have forfeited. And next, being sensible, by two Petitions presented to this Court, (the copies whereof are annexed) what a general distemper this sudden change hath already made, and may further raise in this city; besides that hereby the city is for the present put out of all regular posture of defence: The petitioners could not but return unto this honourable house, and humbly and earnestly pray, That the Militia, which was established by Ordinance of the 4th of May last as aforesaid, and then ordered to continue for one whole year, may be re-established, that so the present fears and distempers in the city may be dispersed and appeased; whereunto as the petitioners humbly conceive this to be the only present safe means, next under the mighty hand of God, so they will not doubt but that the said Militia, as hitherto they have done, will, in all things, perform their duties according to their trust. And the Petitioners shall pray, &c."

tion to the design on foot. By these Votes, and the coming down of divers well-affected citizens to appease them, the tumult was somewhat allayed; and the members of parliament, with their Speaker, passed through the multitude safely. Memoirs, v. 1. p. 191.

To the right hon. the Lord Mayor, the right worshipful the Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled: The Humble PETITION of divers well-affected Citizens of the City of London,

"Sheweth; That whereas we have lifted up our hands to the High God, for the reformation and defence of religion, his majesty's just power and authority, the liberties of the subject and the privileges of parliament; and seriously considering the late transactions to violate all these, and to weaken the zeal and forwardness of this city and this honourable court, in maintenance of the same, by endeavouring to remove the present Militia, confirmed by authority of a free parliament for a year, and made choice of by this honourable court: In this strait and exigency we are bold, in all humility, yet with all earnestness, to pray, That this honourable court would sadly weigh the present dangers: and as in former times it hath been your honour to be instrumental for the preservation of this miserable and dying kingdom, by the interposition of your courage, power, and wisdom in a time of need; so you would not suffer it to be buried in perpetual oblivion and reproach, by yielding up that militia, which by the good providence of God and the authority of a free parliament, hath been invested in your hands; the only visible means, under God, we have now left for the security of our religion, lives, and liberties. And we shall pray, &c."

To the right hon. the Lord Mayor, the right worshipful the Aldermen, and the worshipful the Commons, in Common Council assembled: The Humble PETITION of divers young Men, Citizens and others, Apprentices of this Honourable City,

"Humbly sheweth; That your petitioners being sadly affected with the distractions of these times, wherein divers discontented persons, for the advancement of their own interests, labour to sow new seeds of division and discord amongst us, whereby incendiaries are encouraged; the well affected discountenanced; the privileges of parliament violated; the public worship of God slighted; the liberties and properties of the faithful subjects of this kingdom, and especially of this city, much endangered; and the long-desired end of these troubles (by his majesty's gracious compliance with, and his safe and honourable return to his parliament) which we hoped was almost obtained, now retarded, and for present altogether frustrated; have presented their humble Petition to both houses of parliament, a Copy whereof is hereunto annexed, the which they have thought it their duty likewise to tender unto this honourable court; being confident that, as their desires, in these their humble addresses, arise from no other ends whatsoever, but the glory of God and the discharge of their consciences, in pursuance of that Solemn League and Covenant which lies upon them, 'to endeavour to their utmost, in their places and callings, to use all lawful ways and means, for the maintenance of the just Rights and Privileges of parliament,' lately so much violated; 'the preservation and defence of his majesty's royal person and authority, together with the true Religion and Liberties of this kingdom, and for the discovery and bringing to condign punishment all evil instruments whatsoever,' which labour, by fomenting groundless fears and jealousies, to divide and make parties amongst the people, thereby to retard the Settlement of Church and State; so we doubt not but this honourable court (who have been instrumental to invite us, both by example and persuasion, according to several Ordinances and Declarations of Parliament*, to engage ourselves to the prosecution of the said ends, wherein you have already done very much, to your everlasting praise and commendation) will still, with all reality, constancy, and undaunted magnanimity, pursue the same; and likewise encourage all those that shall, according to their duty, labour to promote the same ends: wherefore we humbly pray, That this honourable court would be pleased to use their utmost endeavours, by their addresses to the parliament, and otherwise as they in their wisdoms shall think fit, for the furthering of your petitioners desires, contained in the above-mentioned Petition.—We cannot likewise but, with all thankfulness, take notice of what this honourable city hath done for the putting in execution of several Ordinances of parliament, † That none be put into any place of trust, either in church or commonwealth, but such as have taken, and now stand well-affected to the Covenant, to which we are confident that you will still adhere.—And whereas there have been and still are several factious persons, who stile themselves the Well-affected of this city, (though unworthy of that name) who labour to traduce the actions thereof, thereby to bring an odium upon it, and to lay it open to their malice: A fresh instance whereof we have in a late Petition presented to the parliament, pretended to be the Petition of the young Men and Apprentices of this city; as likewise by a Petition pretended to be presented to sir Thomas Fairfax, the which we are ready to produce, and refer the consideration of them to this honourable court. And further pray, that as both the Militia of this city hath been legally chosen by this honourable court, according to Ordinance of Parliament, and the common council legally chosen by the several wards according to the antient custom of this city, you would be pleased to retain the same power both civil and military in your own hands.—And that you would be pleased (for the prevention of the many imminent dangers, to which this city may be liable, by reason of these distractions) to take such effectual and speedy course for the safeguard and defence thereof; that the fear, either of any mutiny within, or of any unwarrantable power from abroad, may, in some measure, be taken away; whereby trade, the main support of this city, now mightily impaired, may be again revived; and the franchises and liberties of this honourable city, to which we are the apparent heirs, maintained and defended.—And as your petitioners are in duty bound, both by that relation which they stand in to this honourable city, as also by that solemn Engagement whereinto they have entered; so they will be always ready to hazard their lives for the defence thereof, and not suffer themselves directly or indirectly, by any terror or persuasion, to be drawn from their duty herein."

The Humble DESIRES of the Citizens, young Men, and Apprentices of the City of London, presented to both the Honourable Houses of Parliament, July 26, 1647.

1. "It is our humble Desire, in regard religion, our lives, liberties, and estates are so much endangered, and the peace and safety of this city and kingdom, that the pretended Ordinance for the Change of the Militia of the city of London may be presently repealed before the rising of the houses; and that former Ordinance that was conferred for a year, by a free parliament, upon the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council, and by them legally chosen, may be established: In which regard we do conceive that no justice, though it run in never so free a channel, can lawfully dispos-ess them of it, unless it shall appear to be abused, contrary to the trust reposed in them. 2. It is likewise desired that the city of London may immediately be vindicated against a late pretended Declaration of both houses, which declares all those Traitors, and so to forfeit life and estate, who shall, after publication thereof, act thereupon to get subscriptions; and that the said Declaration be now presently reversed and cancelled. 3. That both houses of parliament do presently make an Order, upon some special penalty, for the calling in of all their members of either house to discharge the trust the kingdom has reposed in them, especially the 11 late accused members, against whom there has been nothing proved of their accusation to this day; that yet again we may be so happy as to enjoy the healing influence of a full and free parliament in these distracted times. These particulars we cannot but insist upon, since the distractions amongst us begin to grow so high; and the honour and privileges of parliament, the peace and safety of the city and kingdom, are so greatly violated."

Both which the Mob of London Apprentices, &c. force the Parliament to repeal.] Both houses were so terrified at being thus insulted and menaced, within their own walls, that they instantly passed an Ordinance for revoking and making void their Declaration of July 24, whereby all persons who should endeavour to get subscriptions to any Petition were declared Traitors; and another for annulling the Declaration of the 23d concerning the Militia; whereby the Ordinance of the 4th of May last was restored to its former force and effect. And both these revocations were also ordered to be forthwith printed and published.

Upon the great and momentous turn of affairs this day, the lords ordered, that all their Members should have Notice to attend the house peremptorily, on Friday the 30th, in the morning, at ten o'clock; notwithstanding any former leave granted to be absent: But that the Commissioners appointed to attend the King's Person might have leave to follow their own occasions; so as any three of them, one to be a peer, do take their turns in that service, as they shall agree amongst themselves.

Both the Speakers having left the Houses on account of the late Tumults, two others are chosen.] July 27. Both houses met, but did no business, and only adjourned to the 30th. On which day the members assembled, but neither of their Speakers attended. After much time spent in expectation of them, the lords proceeded to chuse the lord Willoughby of Parham in the room of the earl of Manchester. The commons chose Henry Pelham, esq; a counsellor of Lincoln's Inn, to be their speaker; and we find, by the Lords Journals, that he was presented to that house for their approbation; on which he made a short speech to this effect: "That the knights, citizens and burgesses, being in present want of a Speaker, had made choice of so bad a one as himself, and had commanded him to acquaint their Lordships with such their bad choice." To which the Speaker of the house of lords returned this Answer. "That their house very well approved the choice which the commons had made; he being a person of such abilities, integrity, and faithfulness to the parliament." After which the commons returned, with their Speaker, to their own house: but their proceedings, in this extraordinary Affair, will best appear by the following extract from their Journals:

"Die Veneris, July 30, 1647.

"According to the former Order of adjournment on Tuesday last, divers members of the house met, the Speaker being absent: after long expectations, that day, about noon, the members present desired sir Walter Erle, sir Robert Pye, Mr. Gawen, and Mr. Knightly, to repair to the Speaker's house; to give him notice of the meeting of the house, and of the time of the day, and to desire his attendance. Return was made about an hour after, by these gentlemen, That Mr. Speaker was not to be heard of: that he had not lodged at his own house that night; but was gone out of town yesterday morning. Thereupon a debate fell out, of the continuance of the house, and the power of the house to elect their Speaker, and the necessity of making a choice without delay. Two ministers were sent for to the Assembly; and after prayers, Mr. H. Pelham was nominated Speaker, and called to the chair, by a general approbation. Mr. Pelham first, in his place, excused himself for his inabilities for so great a charge, which would not be admitted. Sir Anthony Irby and Mr. Richard Lee went to the place where Mr. Pelham sat; and, according to custom, took him by each arm and conducted him and placed him in the chair. Here again he made his earnest excuses, which not being admitted, he submitted to the commands of the house."

Gen. Fairfax resolves to march with his Army to London, on account of the late Force put upon the Members.] This day the following Letter from General Fairfax to the Commissioners of the Parliament was read in the house of lords:

"My lords and gentlemen; Having resolved upon this inclosed Dispatch for the city of London, I thought it my part to send you an account of it, and to give you all assurance that my heart is deeply affected with the late carriages towards the parliament; and however others have neglected their duty towards them for their security and defence, yet, as God shall enable me, it shall be my business to improve all the power that is in my hand for the preserving of them; and, in them, the interest of this nation: and what construction soever some formerly may have put upon the proceedings of this Army, I trust the Lord shall, by his good hand, lead us into such actions as shall witness our end answerable to all our professions, to wit, the good of the kingdom; and therein to be an effectual saving of the great and just authority of the kingdom in the parliament. Your most assured Friend, T. Fairfax. Bedford, July 29."

The General's LETTER to the City of London, upon his Advance thither, with his Demands.

"My lord and gentlemen; You may please to remember the forward compliance of this Army with your desires to remove to this distance, and that upon the assurance you gave them of your concurrence with their declared Desires for the settling the liberty and peace of this kingdom, (against which you never yet offered us one exception, or any ground of dissent) as also of your great tenderness and resolution to secure the parliament and their privileges from any violence or attempt; the chief reason given us of your late listing of new forces, and wherein we did most acquiesce: That, upon this confidence, we had disposed of the Army into several parts of the kingdom, for the ease of the whole, some of them to above 100 miles distance; we had given up ourselves to the effecting such proposals as might tend to the comfortable Settlement of this poor kingdom; and we were in a hopeful way for a speedy relief of Ireland.—We cannot then but be deeply sensible of the unparalleled violation acted upon the parliament on Monday last, by a multitude from your city; because therein the guard sent from the city did not only neglect their duty for the security of the parliament from such violence, and the whole city to yield any relief to the houses in that extremity, but I am assured, from eye and ear witnesses, that divers of the common council gave great encouragement to it; which doth not only gainsay your former professions, but does violence to those many obligations that, by your charter, protestation, and sundry other ways, laid upon you to protect the parliament: For my part, I cannot but look on you, who are in authority, as accountable to the kingdom, for your present interruption of that hopeful way of peace and settlement things were in for this nation, and for relieving Ireland; occasioned by a late destructive engagement, especially by the latter prodigious and horrid force done upon the parliament, tending to dissolve all government; upon which score we and the whole kingdom shall have cause to put every thing of the like nature, that may happen to the parliament or to any who are friends to them and this Army; except, by your wisdom, care, and industry, the chief actors in the premisses may be detected, secured, and given up; to the procuring of justice for the same, and the best endeavours used to prevent the like for the future. And so I rest, Your most assured Friend to serve you, T. Fairfax. Bedford, July 29."

The City of London petition the Parliament for Orders to stop his March.] July 30. Another Petition from the city of London was this day presented to the house of lords by the two sheriffs, and was read as follows:

To the Right Hon. the Lords assembled in the High Court of Parliament; The Humble PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled.

"After humbly acknowledging the great favour of this honourable house in re-establishing the Militia of the city, according to their late Petition (whereby the petitioners are confident the distempers which they then feared are well allayed, and will be wholly appeased, if the rumours of the Army's advance towards the city do not again stir up the people); the petitioners are not conscious to themselves of any thing which hath proceeded from them, which may justly provoke the Army; and therefore will least of all believe that their late insisting on the Militia of this city can be any reason thereof; especially now that the parliament hath declared themselves therein. But whatever the cause be, or whether the Army march this way or not, yet that the city may have some assurance, the petitioners humbly pray this honourable house speedily to dispatch their pleasure to the army, requiring it not to advance nearer the city than 30 miles; whereby, as many great dangers will be avoided, and all jealousies removed, so the petitioners do, in the name of the city, hereby promise that there shall be no endeavour omitted on their part for the timely and safe guarding of the parliament at all times, and for the effectual suppressing of all violences and tumults which shall be raised under any pretence whatsoever. And the Petitioners shall pray, &c. Michell."

Next, the following Order, made by the Committee of the Militia, was read:

"Ordered, That the sheriffs of the city of London be desired, in case the parliament sit, to acquaint the houses with the care of this committee to defend and preserve the parliament and this city in safety; and that they, seeing danger approaching, intend to stop and secure all horses within the lines of communication and weekly bills of mortality, except the horses of market-folks, carriers, and others that bring trade and provisions to the city; and further to do what shall be necessary for their and the city's safety; and to desire the advice and encouragement of both houses in their proceedings, and to confer such further addition of power upon this committee as they shall think fit."

The lords, after debate, gave the citizens the following Answer: "That they returned them hearty thanks for their continual care of the safety of the parliament, and did very well approve of the Order that the Militia of the city had lately taken; that the lords will take the rest of their particulars into speedy consideration, and nothing shall be wanting, that in them lies, to give all furtherance for the preservation of the parliament and city."

Both Houses send the General a Letter for that purpose.] The Commons having prepared a draught of a Letter to be sent to sir Tho. Fairfax with an Order inclosed, the same were read and agreed to by the lords. The Letter runs thus:

"Sir; The houses have this day received from their Commissioners a copy of your Letter to them, dated at Bedford, July 29, with a copy of another Letter of the same date, written to the city of London; in both which, though there be no account at all of the motion of your Army, yet the houses understand by the letter from their commissioners, in which the said copies were inclosed, and otherwise, that you have given orders for the marching of the Army towards London, upon pretence of defending the houses from the danger of the tumults. Upon consideration hereof the houses have commanded us to let you know, that as they cannot but have a deep sense of the undue liberty which some Apprentices of the city of London, and others, from whom they might have expected more obedience, have taken to themselves to violate the just authority, privileges and freedom of parliament, in which the safety of the whole kingdom is concerned; so they doubt not but the sense of so great an offence will, at last, strike the breasts of those that have been accessory thereunto with a detestation of any practices of the like nature for the future: and as the houses cannot imagine that the disorders committed by some Apprentices, and those that mingled with them,* had the allowance of the city of London; so they have since received full satisfaction, by the strict orders given out by the lord mayor and common-council of the city, to all masters to have care of their servants; and by their Declarations proclaimed in several parts of the city, for the preventing and suppressing of Tumults, that they shall sit with much freedom and security from any disturbance for the future.—Therefore the houses, seeing no cause to command that Army, or any part thereof, to march up for their defence; but rather judging, by the distractions raised at the news thereof, that the motions of the Army near the city is like to precipitate the city and army into a desperate and bloody engagement, not only to the disturbance of the parliament's sitting, but also to the destruction thereof, and of all authority, by casting the whole kingdom into confusion: for prevention thereof have sent you this inclosed Order, requiring you, as you tender the freedom of parliament, the safety of the city and whole kingdom, to give exact obedience thereunto. This being all we have in command, we rest, &c."

The ORDER inclosed in the foregoing Letter.

"Ordered by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, That the General be required not to advance with his Army, or any part thereof, within 30 miles of London; and in case the Army, or any part thereof, be within 30 miles, that they go back."

The Lords require the Attendance of their absent Members.] Notice being taken in the house of lords, that the earls of Northumberland, Kent, Rutland, Sarum, Warwick, Denbigh, Manchester, Mulgrave, and Stamford; the viscounts Hereford, and Say and Sele; the lords De la War, Dacres, North, Grey, Roberts, Maynard, Howard, Herbert, and Bruce, had not attended according to the Order of the 26th instant, it was ordered, That they should have further notice to attend the house peremptorily without excuse, on the 31st, at ten in the morning, notwithstanding any former leave granted to them, or any of them, to be absent; and that the house expected a ready obedience to be given herein.

Several Members of both Houses, with their late Speakers, withdraw to the Army.] The absence of these peers, and the members of the house of commons, who had at this time withdrawn themselves, with their respective Speakers, is thus accounted for by Mr. Ludlow: †—"The next morning after the tumult, I advised with sir Arthur Haslerig and others what was fittest to be done in this conjuncture; and it was concluded that we could not sit in parliament without apparent hazard of our lives, till we had a guard for our defence, it being manifestly the design of the other party either to drive us away, or to destroy us: therefore we resolved to betake ourselves to the Army for protection, sir Arthur Haslerig undertaking to persuade the Speaker to go thither, to which he consented with some difficulty; and having caused 1000*l.* to be thrown into his coach, went down to the Army, which lay then at Windsor, Maidenhead, Colebrook, and the adjacent places. Having acquainted as many of our friends as I could, with our resolution to repair to the Army, I went down; and the next day, being the same to which the parliament had adjourned themselves, the Army rendezvoused upon Hounslow-Heath; where those members of parliament, as well lords as commons, who could not with safety stay at Westminster, appeared in the head of them; at which the Army expressed great joy, declaring themselves resolved to live and die with them. At night the earl of Northumberland, the lord Say, the lord Wharton, and other lords; the Speaker and members of the house of commons aforesaid, with sir Tho. Fairfax, and many principal officers of the Army, met at Sion-House to consult what was most adviseable to do in that juncture; which whilst they were doing, an account was brought of the proceedings of those at Westminster that day, by the serjeant of the house, who came with his mace, to the no little satisfaction of the Speaker."

Proceedings of both Houses, during their Absence.] But notwithstanding the great joy expressed by the Army at the presence of so many Members of both houses amongst them, who, by imploring as it were, their protection and defence, must add greatly to their reputation; those at Westminster, being supported by the city of London and the whole force of the Presbyterian interest, seemed to set their absent brethren and the Army at defiance: for, first, they voted, That the Order of the 20th of this month for putting all the Land-Forces in the pay of the parliament under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, did not extend to give him any power over the Trained Bands or Garrisons: that this Declaration should be published, by the Militia of the city of London, by sound of trumpet; and the same by the sheriffs in their several respective counties in England. The commons recalled their 11 Members, impeached by the Army, to sit and vote in the house. The Committee of Safety were ordered to grant commissions to all such commanders of horse, foot, and dragoons, as they shall think fit, for the service of the king, kingdom, parliament, city, and safety thereof, according to the power given them by an Ordinance of parliament. The master, wardens, and assistants of the Trinity-House were ordered to arm all the mariners and seamen they could get. Accordingly these and numbers of Reformed officers and soldiers, &c. with the city Militia, mustered in St. James's-Fields;

the command of all which was given to major-general Massey, and the horse to sir Wm. Waller. Besides all this,

July 31. The house of lords sent down to the commons a Declaration concerning the King's coming to his parliament, in which they desired their concurrence, in hæc verba:

"Whereas the King hath been seized upon, and carried away from Holdenby, without his consent, by a party into the Army, where his majesty yet remaineth; the lords and commons in parliament assembled do desire that his majesty would be pleased immediately to come to his parliament: and they do declare, that he shall be there with honour, freedom, and safety; and that they, with the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, will make their addresses unto his majesty for a safe and well-grounded Peace." This Declaration being twice read by the commons, was altered thus: after the word 'consent,' they added, 'or the consent of the houses of parliament;' and, instead of 'to his parliament,' to 'such place as both houses of parliament should appoint;' and then passed it, on the question, 55 against 22.

The late Speaker, Lenthall's, Reasons for leaving the House.] This day information being given to the house of commons, that there was a Declaration of their late Speaker, (shewing the Grounds and Reasons which moved him to absent himself from attending the service of that house on Friday) then printing at one Symonds's house in Aldersgate-street, which, as the informer heard, would be very dangerous to the parliament and city, the same was read; but we do not find any thing further done upon it. As this Declaration sets forth, in a most particular manner, what happened in the Tumult of the 26th, and is not printed in Rushworth's Collections, or any of the other contemporaries, we shall give it from the original edition *

"Although it may haply be contrary to the expectation of some, that I attend not the service of the house of commons at this time, as I have constantly done for almost 7 years last past; and yet can it not be reasonably expected by any that well considers the violence offered to both the houses of parliament, and to myself in particular, on Monday; in so much that I can safely take it upon my conscience, and so I doubt not may all the members of both houses also, that they sat in continual fear of their lives; and, by terror thereof, were compelled to pass such Votes as it pleased an unruly multitude to force upon them; which, as I did then openly declare in the house, so I cannot but believe that they are void and null, being extorted by force and violence, and in that manner that they were; and I cannot any longer dispense with myself to be an instrument in passing such Votes, or to give any colour or shadow of parliamentary authority unto them, which are not the Votes of the representative body of the kingdom, but of a tumultuous multitude; as those must needs be accounted that seemed to pass the house on Monday last; and which shall pass hereafter, until better provision be made for the safe and free sitting of the houses of parliament; there being no effectual course taken by the city since the last adjournment of the houses to prevent the like tumult for the future; no nor so much as a Declaration from them to shew their dislike thereof: but, on the contrary, it is generally voiced in the town that there will be a far greater confluence of Apprentices, Reformadoes, and others on Friday, at the parliament doors; and, particularly, notice was given to me, That after they had made the house vote what they pleased, they would destroy me. I had likewise information given me, that there would be a great number of Apprentices, of a contrary opinion and affections to the other, about the parliament doors on Friday morning, which I foresaw must of necessity cause a great combustion, and, in all probability, occasion much bloodshed; the preventing of which mischiefs, together with the consideration aforesaid, have weighed more with me than any thing which may concern my own particular; and especially, having served the house faithfully and diligently for the space of very near 7 years, in a free and parliamentary way of proceedings, that I might not now be made a servant to such a multitude to transfer upon them the colour of parliamentary authority, therewithal to abuse and deceive the minds, and to destroy the lives, liberties, and estates of the people of this kingdom; and having taken a solemn Protestation and Covenant in my place and calling to maintain the privileges of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the subjects, I could not now satisfy myself but by absenting myself at this time; rather than, by my presence, to give any shadow or countenance of the authority of parliament to such apparent violations thereof: neither can the omission of a circumstance or some formality, in the adjournment of the house (when, through force and violence, it cannot meet and sit in any sort as a parliament) be any prejudice to the future meeting and proceedings thereof, when it may meet and sit again as a free parliament; it being well known that nothing can dissolve this parliament but an act of parliament.—When a company of Apprentices, Reformadoes and others, shall call the Ordinances of Parliament 'pretended Ordinances;' shall lock the doors of the houses upon them; shall swear not to let them out till they had passed what they pleased concerning the Militia of London and other things, though the houses had immediately before voted otherwise; shall threaten the houses, in case they did not instantly satisfy their demands; shall knock without, and hollow continually at the parliament doors, that the members could not be heard speak or debate; and after that the house of commons had passed a Vote concerning the Militia of London, and that the Speaker, by the voice, had judged the major part to be for the negative, shall not suffer the house to be divided; but, in a threatening way, require those that would have given their votes against them to consent to them; if when after the house was adjourned, they shall, by main force, thrust back the Speaker again into the house, and force the members, in their presence and sight, (divers of them thrusting into the house) to vote what they demanded; when they shall jostle, pull, and hale the Speaker all the way he went down to his coach, and force him, to avoid their violence, to betake himself to the next coach he could get into for refuge; when they shall breathe forth such bloody threats against the members as they come forth of the house, and, since, against me in particular, at the next meeting of the house, as I am credibly informed; and when there is no appearance but that they will continue to do as formerly they have done, or far worse, on Friday, I could not, in discharge of my trust, protestation, and covenant, sit in the chair of the house of commons, whilst it shall be in such a condition: but so soon as it may sit again in freedom and safety, I shall be ready to attend the service thereof; but till then, as I have, upon the forementioned grounds, fully satisfied my own conscience, so I doubt not but I shall give the whole kingdom, whose interest is most concerned in it, ample satisfaction in the necessity of my absence. WILL. LENTHALL, Speaker.*

* We are informed by an historian of these times, and a member of this parliament, Mr. Clement Walker,† “That the day after the commons had adjourned, being Wednesday the 28th, and the monthly Fast, the Speaker and members met in Westminster Church; where the Speaker complained, in some passion, to sir Ralph Ashton, and other members, of a scandalous report raised on him in the city, as if he intended to desert the house, and fly to the Army, saying, ‘He scorned to do such a base, unjust, dishonourable act; but would rather die in his house and chair.’ Which being spoken in a time and place of so much reverence and devotion, made many think his secret retreat to the Army, the very next day, proceeded not so much from his own judgment, as from some strong threats from Cromwell and Ireton, (who were the chief contrivers of this desperate plot to divide the city and houses, and bring up the Army to enthrall them both) ‘That if he did not comply with their desires, they would cause the Army to impeach him for cousening the state of many vast sums of money.’ And truly I remember I have seen an intercepted letter, sent about the time of

The Scots Commissioners complain of an Insult offered to the earl of Lauderdale, &c. by the Army.] August 2. A Letter from the Scots Commissioners was read in the house of lords:

“Right Honourable; The Committee of estates of the kingdom of Scotland having sent us frequent directions since these late commotions, to give them a true account, from time to time, of his majesty’s condition; in pursuance thereof we desired the earl of Lauderdale to repair to his majesty at Wobourn, where we expected that he should have been used with that respect which is due to a commissioner of the parliament of Scotland: but we are herein extremely disappointed; for on Saturday morning early, before his lordship was out of his bed, a great many soldiers rushed into his chamber, and coming to his bed-side, desired him speedily to be gone without delay. He represented to them his employment: That he was there in the capacity of a Commissioner of Scotland, to attend his majesty: that he had resolved to go away that morning: and intreated he might have the liberty first to speak with his majesty, which they would not grant; but violently insisted, that what they demanded might forthwith be put in execution, and would not hearken to any reason he offered unto them: telling him it was past dispute; it was resolved upon; what they did herein would be owned by the Army, and they would maintain it; with other expressions of this kind. We do acknowledge the civility of the commissioners of both houses, who acted their parts in dissuading them from so unwarrantable an action: and one of the commissioners, in particular, represented unto them the danger thereof; acquainting them, that he had been an ambassador abroad, and did very well understand that this injury done by them to a commissioner of the parliament of Scotland, was of a very high nature; intreating, that if they apprehended any thing from Scotland, the breach might not be made upon the kingdom of England’s part; and that they would not give just cause, by this action, to the kingdom of Scotland, to make war against England: but no argument did prevail; so at length the earl of Lauderdale was forced to depart, having publicly protested, before the commissioners of both houses, That he was debarred access to the king of Scotland, and his liberty taken from him, contrary to the law of nations, and a particular agreement betwixt the kingdoms.—We have formerly represented unto the honourable houses, how his majesty was carried his flight, from the Army to William Lenthall, Speaker, without any name subscribed to it, only the two last lines were of John Rushworth’s hand; earnestly importuning him to retire to the Army with his friends.”—This last circumstance of the intercepted letter is confirmed by lord Hollis, who stiles the Speaker’s withdrawing himself a conspiracy with the army, designed and laid principally by Mr. Oliver St. John, the Solicitor.

away from Holdenby, by a party of sir Tho. Fairfax's army; which the soldiers before-mentioned did, on Saturday last, before the earl of Lauderdale and some of the commissioners of both houses, own to be the act of the whole soldiery of the Army. We did likewise acquaint the houses, how our letters to Scotland were intercepted by some of that Army.—And now, to complete these injuries, they offered violence to a commissioner of the parliament of Scotland, debarred him of access to his majesty, deprived him of his liberty, and drove him away: so that there remains no hope that there can be application made hereafter to his majesty from the kingdom of Scotland: nor can we be able to give that account of his majesty's condition to that kingdom which is expected from us, so long as he is in the power of that Army. Wherefore we desire that the houses of parliament will, in their wisdom, take such course herein, as reparation may be made to the kingdom of Scotland of these multiplied injuries; and especially of the last done against the person of a public minister of the kingdom of Scotland, in so violent a manner. And to the end there may be a free and unrestrained application to his majesty from the parliaments of both kingdoms, we do earnestly desire the honourable houses to invite his majesty to come to London; and to declare that he shall be here in safety, honour, and freedom; than which we see no other probable means, for the present, to obtain a safe and well-grounded Peace; and so we rest, Your, &c. Lauderdale, Cha. Erskine, Hugh Kennedy, Robert Barclay. August 1."

The Parliament order the King's Children to the Care of the Lord Mayor, and desire his Majesty to come to London.] Upon reading this Letter the lords ordered that the King's Children at St. James's be removed into the city, and that the lord mayor and sheriffs be desired to take care of them; and that examination should be made what practices had been used to convey them away; to which the commons agreed. The earl of Northumberland also was summoned, by letter, to repair to his charge of the children, and to give his attendance in parliament. The lords also passed a Vote to be added to their former of July 31, viz. That the place the King be desired to come to should be London; and that both these Votes be sent to the king, and published in London, &c. by the lord mayor and sheriffs, by sound of trumpet. This last vote was agreed to by the house of commons, on a division of 73 against 32.

The Assembly of Divines mediate for Peace.] Several ministers from the Assembly of Divines presented the following Paper to both houses:

To the Right Hon. the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament.

"The Assembly of Divines being, by their profession, ministers of the Gospel of Peace, under Christ the prince of peace, hearing of preparations tending to a sudden war between the Army and the city, do, in the name of Jesus Christ, humbly crave leave, in these few words, to mediate for Peace at the hands of all that have any interest in the managing thereof, as that wherein Christians are most deeply concerned; the glory of God, which all parties profess to regard and advance; the safety of the king, parliament, and kingdom, which being lately in a hopeful way to be established in a happy peace, is now in danger to be overwhelmed with a sea of blood; (the end and sad consequences whereof no man is able to foresee) and the welfare of all the people of God in the land, who are likely to be engaged one against another: wherefore we humbly pray, in the bowels of Jesus Christ, that all possible means may be used, by treaty or otherwise, that the effusion of Christian blood may be prevented; Ireland relieved; and all God's people enjoy the fruit of their prayers in the flourishing of the true religion, and settlement of the peace and prosperity of the three kingdoms."

The Answer returned by both houses was to this effect, "That they gave the Assembly thanks for their care and good affections to the good and peace of the kingdom, and should not be wanting in any thing to effect it."

The King disavows having any Concern in the late Tumult.] August 3. The lord Montague sent word that the King intended to go, as the day before, to Stoke, a house of the lord Purbeck's, near Windsor, where the commissioners thought it their duty to attend him. From thence his majesty issued the following Declaration, disavowing any preparations in him to levy war against his two houses of parliament; and also sent a Letter to sir Thomas Fairfax.

"C. R. There having been many rumours spread, and informations given, which may have induced many to believe that we intend to make war against our parliament: We profess before God and declare to all the world, That we always have and do abhor all such designs; and desire all our nobility and commons, who are here upon the place, to declare whether they have not been witnesses of our frequent and earnest declarations and professions to this purpose; whether they see any colour of preparations or councils, that might reasonably beget a belief of any such design; and whether they be not fully persuaded that we have no such intentions; but that all our endeavours (according to our many professions) tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant religion, the just privileges of parliament, the liberty of the subject, the law, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom. Stoke, Aug. 4."

The King's Letter to sir Tho. Fairfax delivered by sir John Berkeley, and Mr. John Ashburnham.

"C. R. His majesty being advertised of many false rumours raised of him to comply with a party to raise forces against you and your army: His majesty doth hereby acquit himself of the great scandal cast upon him therein; and for the proceedings of some in London and elsewhere, who have of late raised tumults in the city, and other places, his majesty doth utterly disclaim the same, testifying a great dislike thereof. His majesty doth account it too dishonourable an action to have thoughts of being brought to London in such a tumultuous manner. Stoke, Aug. 4.

A Letter from the new Speakers to sir Tho. Fairfax, requiring an Answer to their Letter forbidding his march towards London.] A Letter, signed by both the new Speakers, was ordered to be sent to the Commissioners residing with the Army, inclosing one to sir Tho. Fairfax as follows:

“Sir; We are commanded by both houses of parliament to acquaint you, that, by reason of the late Speakers having withdrawn themselves, the houses made choice of us to be their respective Speakers; and that, on Friday last, a Letter was sent to you from both houses, to let you know the parliament was in safety by the care of the lord mayor, aldermen, common-council, and militia of the city of London, and free from danger of any tumults; and that, to prevent such mischiefs as might attend the nearer approach of the Army, you should not suffer the army to come nearer this city than 30 miles, according to the Order of both houses then sent unto you; to which Letter no answer hath been as yet returned: We are therefore commanded to let you know that, as your obedience and answer thereunto hath been hitherto expected, so the houses, being informed that, notwithstanding the said Letter and Order, the body of the army are drawn up much nearer this city than 30 miles, contrary to the expectation of the parliament, and tending to the terror and astonishment of the city; whence, besides the straightening of the city of provisions, sundry other mischiefs may follow; both houses, therefore, have thought fit to require you, that you cause such of the Army as are already marched nearer than 30 miles, forthwith to draw back to that distance, and that no part of it come nearer than 30 miles of this city, according to the said Order.—We are also commanded to signify unto you, that as to the disorderly carriage of some Apprentices and others at Westminster, the 26th of July last, the same is already put into a way of examination: and the houses are resolved that such further course shall be taken thereupon as shall be agreeable to justice.—The houses have also received information that, on the last Lord’s day in the morning, and within 3 or 4 miles of this place, a party of horse of that Army under the command of major Desborough, in a hostile manner, fell upon divers persons that were in a peaceable condition, and quartered there by authority of parliament, until they should get their arrears paid, and be disbanded, as was formerly ordered: some of them were murdered, others of them were wounded, and divers of them were stripped and carried away, pinioned as prisoners; and divers horse and arms forcibly taken away without any provocation given: that another part of the forces under your command have surprized and seized upon Tilbury Block-house, in Essex, upon the river of Thames: that the houses have seen copies of several Warrants, alledged to be signed by yourself and the officers under your command, for the raising of the Trained Bands and forces of the country as you pass, to join with you, for which you never had any authority of parliament: that the houses are also informed that you have given orders for the levying of monies or provisions on the country, contrary to the laws of the land, and in violation of the rights and freedom of the subject: that the house of commons have also received advertisement from sir Samuel Luke, knight a member of that house, that a party of dragoons of the Army, by your warrant, and a warrant of one major Tuleday, did, on the last Lord’s day, assault his person; and did, by force, carry him away prisoner from his own house, to what place we know not; and we cannot hear that he is yet released, which the houses require you to see presently done.—As they hold it strange that such acts of violence, touching not only on the liberty, but on the lives, of the subjects, and the privileges of parliament, should be done, especially if it be by any direction of yours; so they cannot but resent them, and the more, not only for the blood therein spilt, but also for that those actions, at this time, are so far from conducing to the happy peace that both houses have so earnestly endeavoured, and do still labour to procure, and to ease the kingdom of charge, that they can be understood to be no other than acts of hostility and the beginning of a new war, and the increasing of charge upon the country, by force of arms, without any manner of cause or authority.—Lastly, we are commanded to acquaint you with a complaint of a high nature, made by the Commissioners of the parliament of Scotland against some of your Army, for violation of the law of nations, and the Treaty concluded between both kingdoms, as may appear unto you by a copy of their Letter we send you here inclosed: and considering that the proceedings that they complain of may prove of dangerous consequence to both kingdoms, and tend to the embroiling of both nations in a new war, if a course be not taken to prevent it, the houses therefore have thought fit to require you to inform yourself fully therein, and to give them a speedy and full account of the business; to the end that they may return such an Answer as may become them to the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland. We rest, your, &c. HUNSDON, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore. H. PELHAM, Speaker of the House of Commons.”

The late Speakers, &c. restored to their Seats by the Army.] Aug. 6. After an entire stop of business till this day, (during which interval, though both houses met, they did nothing but adjourn, de die in diem) sir Henry Vane, jun. reported, from the Commissioners of parliament appointed to reside with the Army, an account of the proceedings of the Army and Commissioners for these few days last past; and the Grounds and Reasons that were given unto them for the removal and march of the Army to this town, in regard of the force and violence offered to the parliament; and that, when notice came to the Army of this violence, the Army, in pursuance of the Orders of both houses, was 40 miles distant from the city, and their quarters scattered near 200 miles; had almost finished their Proposals for settling the public Peace; and were come to a Resolution of sending speedily 8000 foot and 2000 horse into Ireland: but, upon the notice of this violence, they contracted their quarters. He further acquainted the house, That the General himself was come to London, to sir Abraham Williams's house; and that the Army was advanced to the town, in order to the safe and free sitting of the parliament: That, at Colebrooke, the commissioners of the Army delivered unto the commissioners of parliament, Heads of Proposals to be treated upon by the Commissioners; of which he read the title, and, by command of the house, delivered them in accordingly.

Declaration from General Fairfax and his Council of War concerning the late Tumult.] These were inclosed in the following Declaration from sir Tho. Fairfax and his Council of War:

“ Colebrooke, Aug. 2, 1647.

“ Since our drawing back to Reading, we have applied ourselves, with all diligence, to frame and hasten an intire body of all the particular Proposals, which we would tender to the Commissioners of Parliament residing with the Army, to be treated on in pursuance of those general Desires expressed in our former Declarations and Papers, for the securing of the common Rights and Liberties, and a present settling of the Peace of the kingdom. In which business, (notwithstanding the many interruptions and disturbances, which daily advertisements of the indirect and treacherous practices and preparations of the Committee of Militia, and others in and about the city of London and elsewhere, tending to a new war, have occasioned, to the diverting or retarding of our proceeding therein) we have made a progress as speedy as the nature and weight of such a work would admit; and, having finished the same, we have delivered in an Abstract of the Heads thereof unto the said Commissioners of Parliament to be treated upon.—But the late pernicious Engagement set on foot in the city, and, much more, that prodigious violence done to both houses of parliament on Monday last, having wholly taken us off for the present; and rendered all proceeding in the way of treaty thereupon merely vain and hopeless, until it shall please God the parliament be righted and vindicated against that violation done to it, and restored into a condition of freedom, so as the unquestioned members of it may repair together with safety, and proceed according to their just freedom: We have thought good, in the mean time, to make this public tender of the Heads of the Proposals to the consideration of the whole kingdom; wherein, though all circumstances requisite to be determined in an actual Settlement be not so fully and perfectly expressed as upon the Treaty intended, (if not interrupted as before) they might speedily have been; yet all men may see and understand, in these, the effect and bottom of our Desires; whereupon we have sincerely studied, that a present Peace might be settled; which same thing (with and after such vindication of the parliament as may again render it into a capacity to establish the same) we shall still faithfully endeavour to the utmost of our powers; and accordingly shall expect the chearful and hearty concurrence of all those who are, or shall be, satisfied concerning the integrity of our intentions to the peace and welfare of the kingdom in these Proposals; or who shall, for the main, desire or approve of the same things with us, in order to a settlement.—And to these Proposals which we here first tender as necessary to a Peace, and upon which we desire the seal of peace, (in the restitution of his majesty and others to their rights, and in an act of oblivion to be passed) we cannot but add the further expression of our desires in some other particulars; which, though not so essential to peace as necessarily to precede the settling of it, yet being matters of a public nature, and most of them of general grievance to the kingdom, which we every where find the outcries of; and being contained in, or in pursuance of, the same things expressed in our former Representations and Papers, we shall desire, That, the parliament being set free, no time may be lost for a speedy consideration of them, so as the former things for the present settling of Peace be not delayed thereby.—By the appointment of his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax and the Council of War, J. RUSHWORTH, Secretary.”

The HEADS of the PROPOSALS agreed upon by his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax and his Council of War, referred to in the foregoing Declaration.

“ August 1, 1647.

I. “ That the things hereafter proposed being provided for by this parliament, a certain period may, by act of parliament, be set for the ending of this parliament; such period to be within a year at most: And, in the same act, provision to be made for the succession and constitution of parliaments in future, as followeth: 1. That Parliaments may biennially be called, and meet at a certain day, with such provision for the certainty thereof, as in the late act was made for Triennial parliaments, and what further or other provision shall be found needful by the parliament to reduce it to more certainty: and, upon the passing of this, the said act for Triennial Parliaments to be repealed. 2. Each Biennial Parliament to sit 120 days certain, unless adjourned, or dissolved sooner by their own consent; afterwards to be adjournable or dissolvable by the king: And no parliament to sit past 240 days from their first meeting, or some other limited number of days now to be agreed on: Upon the expiration whereof each parliament to dissolve of course, if not otherwise dissolved sooner. 3. The king, upon advice of the council of state, in the intervals betwixt Biennial Parliaments, to call a parliament extraordinary, provided it meet above 70 days before the next Biennial day; and be dissolved at least 60 days before the same, so as the course of biennial elections may never be interrupted. 4. That this parliament, and each succeeding Biennial parliament, at or before adjournment or dissolution thereof, may appoint committees to continue during the interval, for such purposes as are, in any of these proposals, referred to such committees. 5. That the elections of the commons for succeeding parliaments may be distributed to all counties, or other parts or divisions of the kingdom according to some rule of equality or proportion; so as all counties may have a number of parliament members allowed to their choice, proportionable to the respective rates they bear in the common charges and burthens of the kingdom; or, according to some other rule of equality or proportion, to render the house of commons, as near as may be, an equal representative of the whole; and in order thereunto, that a present consideration be had to take off the elections of burgesses for poor, decayed, or inconsiderable towns; and to give some present addition to the number of parliament members for great counties that have now less than their due proportion; to bring all at present, as near as may be, to such a rule of proportion as aforesaid. 6. That effectual provision be made for future freedom of elections, and certainty of due returns. 7. That the house of commons alone have the power, from time to time, to set down further Orders and Rules for the ends expressed in the two last preceding Articles; so as to reduce the election of members of that house to more and more perfection of equality in the distribution, freedom in the election, order in the proceeding thereto, and certainty in the returns; which orders and rules, in that case, to be as laws. 8. That there be a liberty for entertaining dissents in the house of commons, with a provision that no member be censurable for ought said or voted in the house, further than to exclusion from that trust, and that only by the judgment of the house itself. 9. That the judicial power, or power of final judgment in the lords and commons, and their power of exposition and application of law, without further appeal, may be cleared: And that no officer of justice, minister of state, or other person adjudged by them, may be capable of protection or pardon from the king, without their advice and consent. 10. That the Right and Liberty of the commons of England may be cleared and vindicated as to a due exemption from any judgment, trial, or other proceeding against them by the house of peers, without the concurring judgment of the house of commons: as also from any other judgment, sentence, or proceeding against them, other than by their equals, or according to the law of the land. 11. The same act to provide, that Grand-Jurymen may be chosen by and for several parts or divisions of each county respectively, in some equal way; and not remain, as now, at the discretion of an under-sheriff, to be put on or off: and that such Grand-Jurymen for their respective counties may, at each assize, present the names of persons to be made justices of peace, from time to time, as the country hath need for any to be added to the commission; and at the summer assize to present the names of three persons, out of whom the king may prick one to be sheriff for the next year.—II. For the future security to parliaments and the militia in general, in order thereunto that it be provided, by act of parliament, 1. That the power of the militia, by sea and land, during the space of ten years next ensuing, shall be ordered and disposed by the lords and commons assembled, and to be assembled in the parliament or parliaments of England; or by such persons as they shall nominate and appoint for that purpose, from time to time, during the said space. 2. That the said power shall not be ordered, disposed, or exercised by the king's majesty that now is, or by any person or persons by any authority derived from him, during the said space, or at any time hereafter by his said majesty, without the advice and consent of the said lords and commons, or of such committees or council, in the intervals of parliament, as they shall appoint. 3. That, during the space of ten years, the said lords and commons may, by Bill or Ordinance, raise and dispose of what monies, and for what forces they shall, from time to time, find necessary; as also for payment of the public debts and damages: and for all other the public uses of the kingdom. 4. And to the end the temporary security, intended by the three particulars last precedent, may be the better assured, it may therefore be provided, That no subjects that have been in hostility against the parliament in the late war shall be capable of bearing any office of power or public trust in the common-wealth, during the space of five years, without consent of parliament, or of the council of state; or to sit as members, or assistants, of either house of parliament, until the second Biennial Parliament be past.—III. For the present form of disposing the Militia, in order to the peace and safety of this kingdom, and the service of Ireland, 1. That there be commissioners for the Admiralty, with a vice-admiral and rear-admiral, now to be agreed upon, with power for the forming, regulating, appointing of officers, and providing for the Navy, and for ordering the same to and in the ordinary service of the kingdom; and that there be a sufficient provision and establishment for pay and maintenance thereof. 2. That there be a general for command of the Land Forces that are to be in pay, in England, Ireland, and Wales, both for field and garrison. 3. That there be commissioners in the several counties, for the standing Militia of the respective counties, consisting of Trained Bands and Auxiliaries not in pay; with power for the proportioning, forming, regulating, training and disciplining of them. 4. That there be a Council of State, with power to superintend and direct the several and particular powers of the Militia last mentioned, for the peace and safety of this kingdom, and of Ireland. 5. That the same council may have power as the king's privy-council, for and in all foreign negotiations; provided that the making of war or peace with any other kingdom or state, shall not be without advice and consent of parliament. 6. That the said power of the council of state be put into the hands of trusty and able persons, now to be agreed on; and the same persons to continue in that power, si bene se gesserint, for a certain term not exceeding 7 years. 7. That there be a sufficient establishment now provided for the salary of forces both in England and Ireland; the establishment to continue until two months after the meeting of the first biennial parliament.—IV. That an act be passed for disposing the great offices, for ten years, by the lords and commons in parliament, or by such committees as they shall appoint for that purpose in the intervals, with submission to the approbation of the next parliament; and, after ten years, they to nominate three, and the king out of that number to appoint one for the succession upon any vacancy.—V. That an act be passed for restraining any peers, made since the 21st of May, 1642, or to be hereafter made, from having any power to sit or vote in parliament, without consent of both houses.—VI. That an act be passed for recalling and making void all Declarations and other Proceedings against the Parliament, or against any that have acted by, or under, their authority in the late war, or in relation to it: and that the Ordinances for Indemnity may be confirmed.—VII. That an act be passed for making void all Grants, &c. under the great seal, that was conveyed away from the parliament, since the time it was so conveyed away, except as in the Parliament's Propositions; and for making those valid that have been, or shall be, passed under the Great Seal made by the authority of both houses of parliament.—VIII. That an act be passed for confirmation of the Treaties between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and for appointing Conservators of the Peace betwixt them.—IX. That the Ordinance for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries be confirmed by act of parliament; provided his majesty's revenue be not damaged therein, nor those that last held offices in the same left without reparation some other way.—X. An act to declare void the Cessation of Ireland, &c. and to leave the prosecution of that War to the lords and commons in the parliament of England.—XI. An act to be passed to take away all coercive power, authority, and jurisdiction of Bishops, and all other ecclesiastical officers whatsoever, extending to any civil penalties upon any; and to repeal all laws, whereby the civil magistracy hath been, or is bound, upon any ecclesiastical censure, to proceed, ex officio, unto any Civil Penalties against any persons so censured.—XII. That there be a repeal of all acts, or clauses in any act, enjoining the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and imposing any penalties for neglect thereof; as also of all acts, or clauses in any act, imposing any penalty for not coming to church, or for meetings elsewhere for prayer or other religious duties, exercises or Ordinances; and some other provision to be made for discovering of papists and popish recusants, and for disabling of them, and of all jesuits or priests, from disturbing the state.—XIII. That the taking of the Covenant be not enforced upon any, nor any penalties imposed upon the refusers, whereby men might be constrained to take it against their judgments or consciences; but all Orders or Ordinances tending to that purpose to be repealed.—XIV. That (the things here before proposed being provided for settling and securing the Rights, Liberties, Peace, and Safety of the kingdom) his majesty's person, his queen, and royal issue, may be restored to a condition of safety, honour and freedom in this nation; without diminution to their personal Rights, or further limitation to the exercise of the regal power, than according to the particulars aforegoing.—XV. For the matter of Compositions: 1. That a less number out of the persons excepted in the two first Qualifications, (not exceeding five for the English) being nominated particularly by the parliament, who, together with the persons in the Irish rebellion, included in the third Qualification, may be reserved to the further judgment of the parliament, as they shall find cause; all other excepted persons may be remitted from the exception, and admitted to composition. 2. That the Rates for all future Compositions may be lessened and limited, not to exceed the several proportions hereafter expressed respectively: that is to say, For all Persons formerly excepted, not above a third part. For the late members of parliament, under the first branch of the fourth Qualification in the Propositions, a fourth part. For other members of parliament, in the second and third branches of the same Qualification, a sixth part. For the persons nominated in the said fourth Qualification, and those included in the tenth Qualification, an eighth part. For all others included in the sixth Qualification, a tenth part. And that all real debts, either upon record or proved by witnesses, be considered, and abated in the valuation of their estates in all the cases aforesaid. 3. That those who shall hereafter come to compound, may not have the Covenant put upon them as a condition without which they may not compound; but in case they shall not willingly take it, they may pass their compositions without it. 4. That the Persons and Estates of all English, not worth 200*l.* in lands or goods, be at liberty and discharged; and that the king's menial servants, that never took up arms, but only attended his person according to their offices, may be freed from composition, or pay at most but the proportion of one year's revenue, or a twentieth part. 5. That, in order to the making and perfecting of compositions at the rates aforesaid, the rents, revenues, and other dues and profits of all sequestered Estates whatsoever, except the Estates of such persons who shall be continued under exception as before, be from henceforth suspended and detained in the hands of the respective tenants, occupants, and others from whom they are due, for the space of six months following. 6. That the faith of the army, or other forces of the parliament, given in Articles upon surrenders to any of the king's party, may be fully made good; and where any breach thereof shall appear to have been made, full reparation and satisfaction may be given to the parties injured, and the persons offending, being found out, may be compelled thereto.—XVI. That there be a general Act of Oblivion to extend unto all, (except the persons to be continued in exception as before) to absolve from all Trespasses, Misdemeanors, &c. done in prosecution of the war, and from all trouble or prejudice for or concerning the same, after their compositions past; and to restore them to all privileges, &c. belonging to other subjects, provided, as in the fourth particular under the second general head aforesaid concerning security. And whereas there have been, of late, strong endeavours and practices of a factious and desperate party, to embroil this kingdom in a new war; and for that purpose to induce the king, queen, and prince to declare for the said party; and also to excite and stir up all those of the king's late party to appear and engage for the same; which attempts and designs, many of the king's party, out of their desires to avoid further misery to the kingdom, have contributed their endeavours to prevent, as for divers of them we have had particular assurance: We do therefore desire, that such of the king's party who shall appear to have expressed, and shall hereafter express that way, their good affections to the peace and welfare of the kingdom, and to hinder the embroiling of the same in a new war, may be freed and exempted from compositions, or to pay but one year's revenue, or a twentieth part.—These particulars aforesaid are the Heads of such Proposals as we have agreed on to tender, in order to the settling of the Peace of this kingdom; leaving the terms of Peace for the kingdom of Scotland to stand as in the late Propositions of both kingdoms, until that kingdom shall agree to any alteration.

time may be lost by the parliament for dispatch of other things tending to the welfare, ease, and just satisfaction of the kingdom; and in special manner, 1. That the just and necessary Liberty of the people to represent their Grievances and Desires, by way of Petition, may be cleared and vindicated, according to the sixth Head in the late Representation or Declaration of the Army sent from St. Alban's.* 2. That in pursuance of the same Head in the said Declaration, the common Grievances of the people may be speedily considered of, and effectually redressed; and in particular, That the Excise may be taken off from such commodities whereon the poor people of the land do ordinarily live, and a certain time to be limited for taking off the whole.—That the oppressions and encroachments of Forest-Laws may be prevented for the future.—All Monopolies, old or new, and Restraints to the Freedom of Trade to be taken off.—That a course may be taken, and commissioners appointed, to remedy and rectify the inequality of rates being upon several counties, and several parts of each county, in respect of others, and to settle the proportions for land rates to more equality throughout the kingdom; in order to which we shall offer some further particulars, which we hope may be useful.—The present unequal, troublesome, and contentious way of ministers maintenance by tythes, to be considered of, and some remedy applied.—That the rules and course of law, and the officers of it, may be so reduced and reformed, as that all suits and questions of Right may be more clear and certain in the issues, and not so tedious nor chargeable in the proceeding as now; in order to which we shall offer some further particulars hereafter.—That Prisoners for Debt, or other creditors who have estates to discharge them, may not, by embracing imprisonment, or any other ways, have advantage to defraud their creditors; but that the estates of all men may be some way made liable to their Debts, (as well as tradesmen are by commissions of bankrupt) whether they be imprisoned for it or not. And that such prisoners for Debt, who have not wherewith to pay, or at least do yield up what they have to their creditors, may be freed from imprisonment, or some way provided for, so as neither they nor their families may perish by their Imprisonments.—Some provisions to be made, that none may be compelled, by penalties or otherwise, to answer unto questions tending to the accusing of themselves or their nearest relations, in criminal causes, and no man's life to be taken away under two witnesses.—That Consideration may be had of all Statutes, and the laws or customs of Corporations, imposing any Oaths; either to repeal, or else to qualify and provide against the same, so far as they may extend or be construed to the molestation, or ensnaring of religious and peaceable people, merely for nonconformity in religion. 3. That, according to the seventh head in the Declaration of the Army, the large powers given to committees or deputy lieutenants, during the late times of war and distraction, may be speedily taken into consideration, to be recalled and made void; and that such powers of that nature as shall appear necessary to be continued, may be put into a regulated way, and left to as little arbitrariness as the nature and necessity of the things wherein they are conversant will bear. 4. That, according to the eighth Head in the said Declaration, an effectual course may be taken that the kingdom may be righted and satisfied, in point of Accounts, for the vast sums that have been levied. 5. That provision may be made for payment of Arrears to the Army, and the rest of the Soldiers of the kingdom, who have concurred with the Army in the late Desires and proceedings thereof; and, in the next place, for payment of the public Debts and Damages of the kingdom; and that to be performed, first, to such persons whose debts or damages, upon the public account, are great, and their estates small, so as they are thereby reduced to a difficulty of subsistence; in order to all which, and to the fourth particular last preceding, we shall speedily offer some further particulars, in the nature of rules, which we hope will be of good use towards public satisfaction.—By the Appointment of his excellency sir Tho. Fairfax, and the Council of War, Jo. Rushworth, Secretary.”

A Thanksgiving appointed for the Army's bringing back the Members that had left the Houses.] Aug. 6. The first thing the lords ordered this day, was to appoint a Thanksgiving for God's great mercy, in bringing the Members of both houses of parliament back again to their seats, in safety, and preserving them from tumults without blood-shed. Mr. Marshal and Mr. Nye were ordered to preach before the Members of both houses that day, in the Abbey Church at Westminster.

The Commissioners of Parliament, (those that attended the person of the King and those for the Army) declared, that the reason they had not given the lords any late intelligence, was, in regard of the violence and force that had been lately used to both houses in the Tumult. On which their lordships voted, That they approved of what the commissioners had done, in omitting any returns to them of their employment, in respect of the late great disturbances.

The Lords declare all Proceedings during that Interval to be void.] Next the following Vote was agreed to: Resolved, &c. “That the Ordinance of the 26th of July last, for revoking and making void the Ordinance of the 23d of the same month, for settling the Militia of the city of London, being gained from the houses by force and violence; and all Votes, Orders, and Ordinances, and other acts made, or pretended to be made, since the said Ordinance, by any persons in either of the houses, by colour of parliament, before the return of Edward earl of Manchester, Speaker of the house of peers, and William Lenthall, esq. Speaker of the house of commons, are null and void, and are hereby declared so to be.” Ordered, That these Votes, &c. should be sent to the commons for their concurrence.

Declaration of the Army's Reasons for advancing towards London.] Then a Letter from sir Thomas Fairfax, with a Declaration inclosed, were both read:

To the right. hon. the earl of MANCHESTER, Speaker of the house of peers, and W. LENTHALL, esq. Speaker of the house of commons, or either of them.

“Right Honourable; Having resolved on this inclosed, as the sense of this Army, upon occasion of the late violence offered to yourselves and to both houses of parliament, I think fit to tender the same unto you; and desire that you would be pleased to communicate it to the members of both houses now in the army. I remain, Your, &c. T. Fairfax. Colebrooke, Aug. 3.”

A DECLARATION of his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax and his Council of War, on behalf of themselves and the whole Army, shewing the Grounds of their present Advance towards the city of London.*

“Colebrooke, August 3, 1647.

“When this Army was formerly led by the manifold dispensations of God's providence, and the Grounds then declared, to advance towards the city of London, we held it our duty to yield the kingdom the sum of those Desires, which we had to propose on behalf of it and ourselves, wherein we should acquiesce: And having received from the parliament some hopes of due satisfaction therein, and some assurance from the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London, of their ready concurrence with us in those things; and also great resolution, professed by them, of their care and tenderness to preserve all the Rights and Privileges of parliament safe, free, and inviolate from attempts of all kinds; we do appeal to God, to the city, and to all men, what a speedy compliance their desires for our removal to a further distance found in this Army; for preventing all fears, jealousies, and other inconveniences to the city, and to give clear testimony that we had nothing in our breast but thoughts of peace, and the good and welfare both of the parliament, city, and kingdom; notwithstanding many false and scandalous reports raised that we sought ourselves, that we had vile and wicked ends, and that nothing would satisfy the soldiers but the plunder of the city; the contrary whereof did manifestly appear, when they so readily marched back upon hopes of satisfaction in their desires of public concernment.—Having then, upon the aforesaid confidence, so withdrawn; and, out of a just sense of the country's suffering by quartering, removed the head-quarters of the Army above 40 miles from London, and dispersed the rest well nigh 200 miles, for the more ease of all parts, and that we might give the better satisfaction to the kingdom; and being in this secure way, and labouring after the sudden settlement of the kingdom, we had even brought to perfection the particular Proposals (included in the Generals of our first Representation) to be sent to the parliament for a final conclusion of all our troubles; and also had made good progress towards the present Relief of distressed Ireland, by assigning a competent force both of horse and foot forthwith to have advanced for that service.—But the kingdom's and our enemies being most vigilant and active to prevent and frustrate those good intentions and endeavours of ours, (that they might carry on their former evil designs, and under-hand practices, and also preserve themselves from the hands of justice) have endeavoured to cast the kingdom into a new and bloody war; and for that end have procured the under-hand listing of several reformadoes and others; have contrived, promoted, and caused to be entered into by several persons, a wicked and treasonable combination, as is sufficiently manifested by a Declaration passed thereupon by both houses of parliament the 23d of July last, for prevention of the disturbances that were like to ensue thereupon: From which kind of disorders the city hath been well preserved during the space of almost 4 years, whilst the militia was in the hands of the old commissioners; whereby it appears there was cause for the Army to intreat the parliament that the militia might be returned into the hands it was in before, as also for divers other good Reasons.—First, The old Commissioners of the Militia, that have been since left out, were not only persons without all exception, having been formerly chosen and approved by the parliament and city, but also men of whom the city, parliament, and kingdom, have had above 4 years experience in the faithful discharge of their trust: men that ever from the beginning, in the worst of times, and in the occasions of greatest difficulty, had faithfully and constantly engaged for and with the parliament in this cause: men that were always most desirous of a Peace, but of a safe and well-grounded one, and that had always testified a great care to prevent all occasions of embroiling the kingdom in a new war. Now that, on a sudden, this trust, which they had faithfully discharged so long, should be taken out of their hands, and put into the hands of others, some whereof, at the best, have been very cool in the service of the parliament at the beginning of this war: That this should be pressed, and in a manner forced upon the parliament, with such importunity from the common council, that some out of every ward should be appointed to solicit the members of the house of commons, every day as they went in and out of the house, with professions, That they would never leave the door of the house till they were satisfied in their desires: That they would not be contented with the Militia of the city of London only, unless they might have power over that of the suburbs and out-parts; and all this before the Peace of the kingdom was settled, or the Propositions sent to the king for that purpose. These things ministered great cause of suspicion that this alteration of the Militia was in order to a design, and to make the terms of the Peace and Agreement with the king (on which the security of the whole kingdom and their posterity is to be bottomed) more suitable to the private bargainings and undertakings of some men, than to the public welfare of the whole kingdom in its security and prosperity, for the present and in future times. But this design discovered itself more clearly by such things as accompanied the pursuit of this Alteration of the Militia, and ensued upon the obtaining thereof: At the same time that the Alteration of the Militia was set on foot, the same persons, with as much earnestness, pressed for the Disbanding of this Army, before any thing was settled for the security and liberties of the kingdom. At the same time the Common Council was new modelled, and a lord mayor chosen that might suit with the present design in hand: at the same time (under colour of differences in some circumstances of Church-Government) it was earnestly endeavoured that such as had been constantly true and most faithful to the interest of this kingdom, should be disabled to have any employment in Church or Commonwealth either in England or Ireland: and, without any colour or pretence, divers persons were left out of the Common Council and Militia, of eminent deserts and fidelity, and others brought into their room that had either testified an ill affection, or little affection, to the parliament and their cause; and such as seemed to withdraw themselves from all employment in the beginning of this war, now, at the winding up thereof, are ambitious to thrust themselves into employments; with a design, as may justly be suspected, to frustrate and overthrow, in the close of all, the fruit and effect of all the cost and blood that hath been spent and spilt in this cause: and after that with difficulty, and not without reluctancy in the houses of parliament, they had obtained the power of the Militia of London, and also in the out-parts, for the space of one year, many chief officers and under-officers in the Trained Bands, of known trust and fidelity, were displaced, and others of more doubtful affections placed in their room; little care was taken of the honour of the parliament, which was continually trampled under foot, and their authority affronted, by every rabble of women, apprentices, reformadoes, and soldiers; which latter sort of persons were thereby so encouraged to rise higher and higher in their tumultuous carriages against the houses, till at length it is risen to the height of barbarous and monstrous violence against the parliament, that they might set themselves on work and the kingdom on fire again: and now at length the design appears open faced; and though the Militia be made as the principal ground of the quarrel, yet, by the late Vow and Engagement, set on foot before any Alteration of the Militia, and the pressing so much the Message of the 12th of May, and the King's coming to London to confirm the same, they shew that the Militia is desired but in order to that design, and to force the parliament, being wholly in their power, to such terms of peace as they pleased.—In the next place, when the interest of the common council, in their change of the Militia, shall be claimed as the birthright of the city of London (which they never had any colour to pretend to, saving by the indulgency of the parliament unto them since this parliament, in respect of the great use they have had of them, and the many good services they have received from them) it is time for all the kingdom to look to their birthrights, if such a claim shall be held up against both houses of parliament, That upon no occasion whatsoever, nor in no time of danger and distraction whatsoever, they may appoint those that shall have the power of the Militia of London without the consent of the Common Council, especially when as the houses shall sit under their power: The late example may evidence to all the world who shall be masters of the parliament's freedom and resolutions; and common reason will teach every man who shall be masters of the birthrights of the whole kingdom, when there shall be no army on foot, when they have the confidence to dispute for the mastery, notwithstanding such an army as this to check and balance them in behalf of the kingdom and parliament.—Lastly, The Army discerning how intimate some of the Militia were with some of the 11 accused Members; how forward they were to comply and act with them in their endeavours to raise a new war; how they made 18 or 19 Votes thereunto, together with them, in one night, all which the common-council and parliament disliked and revoked; how notwithstanding they afterwards secretly promoted their designs by private listings, which now appear to have been still working under ground:—The Army, we say, observing this, and having no more in their thoughts and desires than to settle a speedy, safe, and well-grounded Peace, and to prevent a new war, found it necessary to desire, That the Militia might be put into the hands wherein it was formerly, who had approved themselves both to the army, parliament, and kingdom, to be sober-minded men, and not given to any practices whereby a new war might be kindled; to the intent that the Army, being secured by that means from that danger, might with the more confidence retire farther from the city, enlarge their quarters for the greater ease of the kingdom, and intend wholly the settling of a sure Peace in this kingdom, and a speedy and effectual Relief of Ireland; which was almost brought to a period, and nothing in the sight of man could have hindered, but the cursed violence upon the parliament under pretence of the Militia: which, according to our desire, being restored again into the hands of the old commissioners, by an Ordinance of both houses, dated July 23: In pursuance of the aforesaid treasonable combination, several Petitions were presented to the common-council of the city of London, in the name of Apprentices and others, importing their Desires that the Militia of the city might continue in the hands of the former commissioners, according to the Ordinance of the 4th of May last: whereupon, Monday, July 26, the common-council of the city present their Petitions to both houses for changing the Militia; wherein the house of lords refuse to alter their Resolutions. The house of commons answered, They would take it into consideration next morning: notwithstanding which, the city and kingdom cannot be ignorant with what rage and insolency the tumult of Apprentices, the same day, forced both houses: They blocked up their doors, swearing they would keep them in till they had passed what Votes they pleased: They threatened the houses if they granted not their Desires; knocking, hooting, and hollowing so at the parliament-doors, that many times the members could not be heard to speak or debate; not suffering the house of commons to divide for determining such questions as were put; crying out, 'That those that gave "their Votes against them should be sent out " to them; very often and loudly crying, Agree, " agree; dispatch, we'll wait no longer;' and in this outrageous manner they continued at the house above 8 hours together, neither the city guards there present, nor the city, relieving them; by reason whereof the house was forced to vote what that rude multitude would demand, and then adjourning themselves till next morning; after which the house rising, (the Speaker and many of the members going out of the house) they forced them back again into the house, many of the Apprentices pressing in with them; where they stood with their hats on their heads, and compelled the Speaker to take the chair, and the house to vote, in their presence, what they pleased; committing many other insolences, as is published by the Speaker of the house of commons in his Declaration *, and is too well known by all then present: And during the time of this execrable violence done by the said Apprentices, Westminster-Hall and the Palace-Yard were filled with Reformadoes and other ill-affected persons designed to back them.—After this, the houses being adjourned until Friday following, upon the Thursday the Apprentices printed and posted a Paper in several places of the city, requiring all their fellows to be early at the parliament the next morning, for that they intended to adjourn by seven of the clock, and that for a month.—Thus the

Speakers, with many of the members of both houses, were driven away from the parliament. This being the true state of things as they have broke forth within these few days, (which are so contrary to all those pretences of Peace, and detestation of a new war, of late so frequently held forth on all sides) all men may observe to what maturity the long-projected design of some men (of whom are those that are impeached by us) is now brought, and may be traced in the several steps thereof, as it hath tended to the enslaving this kingdom, and the destruction of all such well-affected people who would not comply with them therein; so as, by what is now come to light, the justness of that cause this Army had engaged themselves in, and the great and wonderful mercy of God in continuing them together, we assure ourselves, doth now clearly appear to all men's eyes and apprehensions; and will every day more and more be acknowledged, even by those that have heretofore made a question of it.—And if when this kingdom hath spent so much of its blood and treasure, hath passed through such unheard-of dangers, and overcome such difficulties so many years together, all that they must now hope for, and rest in, must only be what the king grants in his Message of the 12th of May last: and if this must be imposed upon men's judgments and consciences by an oath and vow, entered into in a tumultuous and unlawful way, and by outrage maintained, in despite and contempt of the parliament: if rather than this should not be accomplished, the parliament itself must be violated and forced into the hands of such of the members thereof as have secretly fomented and abetted these practices, to the end that these hidden councils and works of darkness might, when they come to their full birth, have the image of highest authority in the face of them, the better to gain credit thereunto, and secure the authors of them from punishment: for the evidence of all which we refer ourselves to the particulars in our Charge against the 11 Members, compared with those Passages of late broke forth, before rehearsed: Unto which we shall now only add, and leave it to the consideration of all wise and good men, with what artifice and boldness these Members have served themselves of those horrid tumults and violences of their own creating, instead of shewing their detestation of them, again to intrude themselves into the public managing of affairs, and inevitably to embroil the kingdom in a new war; which their own revenge and the compassing of their former plots and designs, makes them so greedily thirst after. If these things, we say, must be the end and upshot of all, what then remains to this poor kingdom and all true-hearted Englishmen, but to join together, as one man, with their counsels, estates, and lives, in this way, as our last refuge under God; which he, by his wise and gracious providence, hath provided and reserved, by keeping up this Army even to a miracle, so to prevent the aforesaid evils, and to procure to this dying kingdom yet a settled peace and happiness, if it be his blessed will?—These things being seriously considered by us, we have thought fit, in the name of the Army, to declare, That all such Members of either house of parliament as are already with the Army, or, for the securing of their persons, and for the ends aforesaid, are forced to absent themselves from Westminster, that we shall hold and esteem them as persons in whom the public trust of the kingdom is still remaining, though they cannot for the present sit as a parliament, with freedom and safety, at Westminster; and by whose advice and councils we desire to govern ourselves in the managing these weighty affairs: and to that end we invite them to make repair to this Army, to join with us in this great cause, we being resolved, and do hereby faithfully oblige ourselves, to stand by them therein, and to live and die with them against all opposition whatsoever; and, in particular, we do hold ourselves bound to own that honourable act of the Speaker of the house of commons, who, upon the grounds he himself expressed in his Declaration sent unto us, hath actually withdrawn himself: and hereupon we do further engage to use our utmost and speedy endeavours, that he and those members of either house that are thus inforced away from their attendance at Westminster may, with freedom and security, sit there, and again discharge their trust as a free and legal parliament; and, in the mean time, we do declare against that late Choice of a new Speaker by some gentlemen at Westminster, as contrary to all right, reason, law, and custom: and we profess ourselves to be most clearly satisfied in all our judgments, and are also confident the kingdom will herein concur with us, that, as things now stand, there is no free nor legal parliament sitting, being through the aforesaid violence, at present, suspended. And that the Orders, Votes, or Resolutions forced from the houses on Monday the 26th of July last, as also all such as shall pass in this assembly of some few lords and gentlemen at Westminster, under what pretence and colour soever, are void and null, and ought not to be submitted to by the free-born subjects of England. And that we may prevent that slavery designed upon us and the nation, and that the kingdom may be restored to the happy state of a visible government now eclipsed and darkened, we hold ourselves bound, by our duty to God and the kingdom, to bring to condign punishment the authors and promoters of that unparalleled violence done to the parliament, and, in that, to all free-born subjects of England that are, or hereafter shall be; and therefore we are resolved to march up towards London, where we do expect that the well-affected people of that city will deliver up unto us (or otherwise put into safe custody, so as they may be reserved to a legal trial) the 11 impeached Members that have again thrust themselves into the management of public affairs, by this wicked design; and that all others will give us such assistance therein, that the members of both houses may receive due encouragement to return to Westminster, there to sit with all freedom, and so to perform their trust as shall conduce to the settlement of this distracted kingdom; and to inflict such punishments upon those late offenders, as shall deter any for the future to make the like attempt.—We appeal to all the kingdom if we have not had a very tender care of the city of London; their commissioners will witness it; our lives have not been dear unto us for the public good; and being now resolved, by the assistance of God, to bring these delinquents to their deserved punishment, as that than which there cannot be any thing of more public concernment to the kingdom, we trust, if it shall come to that, our blood shall not be accounted too dear a price for the accomplishment of it; and if any in the city will engage themselves, against us, to protect those persons, and so put the kingdom again into a new and miserable war, the blood must be laid to the account of such persons as are the authors thereof.—And, lastly, because it is the main engine of our and the kingdom's enemies to render us odious, by possessing the minds of men that we gape only after the plunder of this great and wealthy city; as the experience of the contrary carriage in all towns that we have taken yieldeth unto us a testimony beyond the example of any Army, so we do from our hearts declare, that we abhor the thought thereof: And we doubt not but the world shall see our actions answerable to our professions, and that we shall not cause any man to suffer but by his own default; and that God will manifest we have only in our eyes that justice may have a free course, the parliament a free sitting and voting, and a full vindication of the late violence done to them.—And as for the city of Westminster, the borough of Southwark, the Hamlets, and the rest of the suburbs and out-parts, as we are informed that they are not so ready to engage themselves in a new war as some would have them, so we are sensible of the hard condition they are brought into, even by them that claim a right against both houses of parliament, (a strange claim against a parliament, though more reasonable against others) not to be subjected to a Militia without their own consent; and yet will not be contented unless they may have others subjected unto them, and lay what burthens they please upon them, without allowing them any part of vote or consent with them; in which points of common right and equity we shall not be wanting, in a due way, to assist them for the obtaining of their just desires and immunities; it being our chief aim to settle Peace, with truth and righteousness, throughout the kingdom, and that none may be oppressed in his just freedom and liberties, much less the parliament itself: which being duly settled, we shall be as ready also to assure unto the king his just rights and authority, as any that pretend it never so much for the better upholding of an ill cause, and the countenance of tumultuous violence against the parliament. The which our honest, just, and necessary undertakings, as we are resolved to pursue with the utmost hazard of our lives and fortunes, so we doubt not but we shall find God's accustomed goodness and assistance with us therein, till we have brought them to a good and happy conclusion for this poor, distracted, and languishing kingdom.—By the Appointment of his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax and his Council of War, J. RUSHWORTH, Secretary."

Sir Thomas Fairfax marches into London without Opposition; and the Citizens reverse all their late Proceedings against the Army. The same Declaration, from the General, was sent to the city; which being backed by the whole power of the Army's encampment on Hounslow-Heath, and a party of col. Rainsborough's horse entering Southwark, and planting Ordnance against the Gate on the Bridge, the citizens were soon brought to submission; they consented to the General's Proposals, and admitted him into the city; they revoked a long Declaration published by order of the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled, a few days before, wherein all the present confusions were charged to the Army's account; they sent letters to the General, by a committee of aldermen and commons, to congratulate his excellency on his arrival in London; they gave orders to prepare for him a present of a bason and ewer of gold to the value of above 1000*l.* and also invited him and his officers to a splendid entertainment at the Guildhall. But the General, well knowing all this to be a forced compliment, declined accepting of these peace-offerings; giving the citizens for a reason, That the Settlement of the nation demanded his whole time and attention.*

* Mr. Ludlow makes this shrewd remark upon the behaviour of the citizens at this crisis: "The face of affairs in the City was at this time very various, according to the different advices they received; for upon the report of the advance of the Army, and the taking of some of their scouts, they cried out, 'Treat! Treat!' And at another time, being informed that men listed in great numbers, the word was, 'Live and die! Live and die!' but when Southwark had let in part of the Army, and joined with them, they returned to the former cry of 'Treat! Treat!' to which the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council consenting, were ready to admit the Army as friends, being not able to oppose them as enemies." To this Lord Hollis adds, "That, some few days after, sir Thomas Fairfax and the whole Army marched in triumph, with laurel in their hats as conquerors, through the subdued city of London, to shew it was at his mercy; which was an airy vanity, I confess above my understanding, and might have raised a spirit of indignation, not so easily to have been laid. But a higher insolency of an army composed of so

General Fairfax receives the thanks of both Houses.] The lords, having read the foregoing Declaration from the General and his Council of War, to shew their gratitude for his signal services, voted, That they approved of it, and of all his proceedings in bringing up the Army in pursuance of those ends: that he should have the Thanks of their house for the same; and that he be desired to take care, for the future, that the parliament sit in safety and freedom, to discharge the great affairs of the kingdom, and be protected from tumults and disorders. Ordered also, That a Chair be set for him within the bar of the house, when he is called in to receive their Thanks. Accordingly the earl of Mulgrave and the lord Wharton, being appointed to go to the General and bring him to the house, he came, and was placed in a chair; when the Speaker acquainted him with the Order, and gave him Thanks in the name of the house of lords. The same was done to him also by the commons.

Ordered, "That a committee of lords may be named to meet with one from the commons, to examine into the Matter of Force and Violence done to the two houses of parliament, and to find out the persons that have been actors, abettors, contrivers, promoters, or encouragers of it; to state the matter of fact, and to report the same to the house with their opinions on it, what they think fit to be done for the vindication of the two houses, and for their future security." Agreed to by the commons.

An Ordinance was passed for making sir Tho. Fairfax constable of the Tower of London, with power to make a lieutenant under him for one year, unless both houses, in the mean time, should otherwise order.

Aug. 6. p. m. The parliament, to shew their gratitude to the Army still further, ordered a Month's Pay to be provided and freely bestowed on the non-commission officers and private soldiers of horse, foot, and dragoons of the Army.—Power was also given by the houses, to their committee, for finding out the persons concerned in the late Tumults, that they should also enquire for and find out the promoters, framers, or contrivers of the Engagement and Association, declared against by the houses the 24th of July last, or that have been engaged by it. Also to examine who have raised or acted, or endeavoured to raise, any force in maintenance of the said Engagement and Association, declared against by the houses.

All Reformado Officers and Soldiers were ordered to depart from London, and not to come within twenty miles of it.

Aug. 10. The commons sent up to the lords, an Order, That until their house had mean people, and a more patient humble submission and bearing of a great and populous city, but a little before so full of honour and greatness, was, I think, never heard of." Memoirs, p. 168.

received reparation for the Force and Violence offered to both houses, they would not meddle with any particular business; which the lords also agreed to.—The commons also debated in a committee of the whole house, an Ordinance sent down from the lords, for the making void all Acts, Orders, and Ordinances, from the violence offered to the parliament till the return of both Speakers, viz. those concerning the Militia of the city of London, and the Declaration against the Engagement, with that for the King's coming: these were to be declared void for that time, a Declaration to be drawn accordingly, and these Votes to be part thereof. The house being resumed, and this report made, the question was put, Whether to agree as aforesaid? the house being divided, the numbers were 95 yeas, and 94 noes; but three members, who were present at putting the question, and yet withdrew into the committee-chamber, and affirmed they were not told, being required to vote, declaring in the negative, the Speaker gave it accordingly.—This was a remarkably full house, for the time, and shews how nearly the two parties of Presbyterian and Independent were then balanced.

The Engagement of the Members that left the Houses, and went to the Army.] Aug. 13. An Engagement of the Members of both houses that absented themselves and went to the Army, was read in the house of lords, in hæc verba:

Die Mercurii, 4to Augusti, 1647.

"We the Members of both houses of parliament, who absent ourselves from the service of the parliament, by reason of the Force and Violence thereunto offered by a tumultuous multitude, having received from his excellency sir Tho. Fairfax, a Declaration, intitled, 'A Declaration of his Excellency and his Council of War, on the behalf of themselves and the whole Army, shewing the Grounds of their present Advance towards the City of London:' and having perused the same, we look upon it as a Declaration full of truth; the matter of fact being well known unto most of us, who have been eye and ear-witnesses thereof; full of Christian, noble, and public affection to the good, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom; full of integrity and faithfulness to the true interest of the English Nation; and full of undaunted and generous resolution to assert the honour and freedom of the parliament; and effectually to vindicate it from the force and violence whereby it hath been of late trampled under the feet of a rabble of people, unto which force it is still exposed, so as it may be exercised upon them at pleasure. And whilst the parliament remaineth in such a condition, although it be not dissolvable but by act of parliament, yet it is suspended from acting as a parliament: in all these things, and generally throughout, our sense so fully agreeth with what is expressed in that Declaration of the Army, that we cannot but receive it with much approbation, and also with great thankfulness to God in the first place; and next, under him, to this ever-faithful army, for that tender sense expressed therein of our honour and security, who absent ourselves from the parliament, in regard of that force; and for that high Engagement of the Army to live and die with us in this cause: whereupon we cannot but mutually engage ourselves, as hereby we do, to live and die with sir Thomas Fairfax and the Army, in vindication of the honour and freedom of parliament: and we cannot but observe the special providence of God in holding up so extraordinarily this Army, and reserving it to take off the reproach and scorn of this nation, and to raise up again, from the depth of contempt, that once so-much honoured and high-esteemed name of a parliament.— And whereas in the said Declaration it is desired, That we, as persons upon whom the public trust still remaineth, though, for the present, we cannot exercise the same in a parliamentary way, would advise his excellency and his council of war in such things as may be for the good of the kingdom, and for attaining the ends aforesaid; we do declare that we shall be ever ready to do it, upon all occasions, in such a capacity as we may, till we shall be enabled again to discharge our trust in a free parliament; which we conceive we can never do, until the houses of parliament may be absolute judges and masters of their own securities: and that such traitorous and audacious offenders as have endeavoured, with so high an hand, to destroy the highest authority, (as by the particulars, so fully and clearly expressed in the Declaration of the Army, may appear) shall receive condign punishment; or, at least, the parliament put in such a condition as that we may be able to bring them thereunto: and we trust in God, through his accustomed blessing upon this Army, and his assistance in their honest and just undertakings, the parliament shall speedily be put again into a condition to sit like a parliament of England: and we hope that every true hearted Englishman will put his helping hand to so necessary, so publick, and so honourable a work as is the vindicating of the freedom and honour of the parliament, and wherein the freedom and honour of all the freeborn people of this nation are involved. Remonstrance from sir Tho. Fairfax and the Army, in Vindication of all their Proceedings. Aug. 20. A Letter from sir Thomas Fairfax, with a Remonstrance or Declaration of the Army inclosed, was read in both houses; in hæc verba:

For the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Manchester, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore.

"My lord; The tender and deep sense which myself and the Army have of the difficulties and dangers under which your lordship, with the right honourable lords, and faithful and worthy members of the house of commons, lately driven away to the Army (as also ourselves and all others that love the peace of the kingdom and freedom of parliaments, notwithstanding the said just and honourable resolutions, proceedings, and endeavours of the right honourable house of peers) do still lie under, hath produced this Remonstrance from us; whereof I have here inclosed sent your lordship a copy, and those considerations and resolutions therein expressed; which as they are, in the present case, most necessary for your lordships, ours, and the kingdom's safety, quiet, and welfare, so we hope they will appear just and honest, and accordingly be accepted and approved by your lordships, as proceeding from the hearty affections and sincere intentions of your lordship's and the kingdom's servants here, and especially of Your, &c. THO. FAIRFAX. Kingston, Aug. 19."

A REMONSTRANCE from his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Army under his Command, concerning their just and clear Proceedings hitherto in the Behalf of the Parliament, Kingdom, and themselves.

"At the Head-quarters at Kingston, August 18, 1647.

"When, by the blessing of God upon the endeavours of this Army and other forces of the parliament, the adverse forces and garrisons within this kingdom were dissipated and reduced, a present quiet and freedom of trade and all commerce and business restored to all parts of the kingdom, and an hopeful way made for settling of a sound and lasting Peace, on good terms, for the interest of the kingdom: Instead of the hoped fruit of our labours and hazards, and of the kingdom's vast expence, (in the dispensing of justice and righteousness, and the settling and upholding of common right and freedom to the subjects of this nation) we found immediately the cross workings of a strong and prevalent party in the parliament and kingdom, who (walking under the mask of the parliament's friends, but being, in truth, men of corrupt and private ends and interests, different from, and destructive to, the real and common interest of the kingdom) made use of their power to obstruct and pervert Justice, to injure, oppress, and crush the peaceable and well affected people of the kingdom; to abridge and overthrow all just freedom and liberty, and drive on designs to set up a party and faction in the parliament and kingdom, and (by the advantage of a perpetual parliament) to domineer over, and enslave the kingdom to posterity: And, for that end, to make such a peace with the king, if any, as without any just provision for the common and true interest of the people, and security thereof for the future, would serve only to make up and establish their own greatness, and the affected domination of themselves and their party over all others.—To all which ends, as, before this parliament, the ignominious names of Puritan and Nonconformist, and the specious pretences for settling of order, decency, and uniformity in Religion, were made use of, to the prejudice, trouble, and suppressing of all that appeared, either for the truth and power of Religion, or for the rights and liberties of the kingdom, and against advancing, at once, both of an ecclesiastical and civil tyranny; so this generation of men, in the application of the parliament's power, (succeeding the former in the exercise of the king's) have made use of the odious names of Brownists, Anabaptists, Independents, Hereticks, Schismatics, or sectaries of one sort or other, to blast such men, in whom the truth and power of Religion, or a just sense of the common interest of the kingdom hath appeared; and have held forth the pretences of reformation and uniformity, to colour and countenance their designs of setting up their own irreligious or pharisaical and domineering faction, to the oppression of all other people: And herein they have had a great advantage to further their aforesaid designs, by reason of the jealousies which many conscientious men of the Presbyterian judgment have entertained concerning this Army, concerning divers other eminent and worthy instruments of the kingdom's good (being in places of public trust and power) who were supposed to be of the independent way.—In pursuance of their aforesaid designs, they endeavoured, and by their power and influence upon the parliament, and the advantage of such pretences as aforesaid, very much prevailed, to put out of all places of power or public trust, the most sober and conscientious men, and such as had approved themselves faithful to the public interest throughout all the late troubles, and to put in debauched and dissolute men, or such as would, for advantage, serve their private interests; and for that end (in cases where they could not otherwise prevail) procured such garrisons to be slighted, such powers to be recalled, though more necessary to have been continued, which they found in the hands of persons of the former sorts; and such to be continued, though less necessary, as they found in the hands of the latter. And, the better to strengthen themselves in their designs, closing with a very powerful party in the city of London, they first, with much activity, endeavoured, and prevailed, to new-model the Common Council, and form the same to their own party; and then stirred them up to petition, amongst other things concurrent to their ends, for the alteration of the city Militia, who by their continual, violent, and pressing importunity at the parliament's doors, wrung from the parliament an Ordinance for that purpose; whereby they procured the Power of that Militia (the special influence whereof upon the city and kingdom, and upon the Parliament itself, being the only guard they had for their safe sitting, is evident to all men) to be taken out of those hands in which it had been continued without prejudice, and with great and known security and advantage both to the parliament, city, and kingdom, throughout the late troubles, and this without any exception, either then or since made against them; and to be put into the hands of such others as were, at best, of doubtful affections to the interest of the parliament and kingdom; or, indeed, to men given up and engaged to the private interests and designs of the said factious party; as hath since too evidently appeared, and as in the late Declaration of the Army, concerning the Grounds of our Advance towards London, is more fully demonstrated. And finding this army not for their turns, they made it their main work to disband or break it in pieces, even before the Relief of Ireland was provided for, or the Peace of this kingdom settled.—And though all this went under the pretence of easing the present burthens of the kingdom, yet at the same time they designed and went about to put the kingdom to the expence and trouble of raising and forming a new force, under pretence as for the service of Ireland, but evidently designed, and so framed, as to serve their own ends and purposes aforesaid in England: and many of them being filled and acted with personal envy, and others with malignity of principles and interest against this Army, and the work of God by it, it would not serve their turns to break or disband it, but it must be done with all possible dishonour, injury, oppression and provocation that they could put upon it. And it was too evident that their endeavour was not only to put it off without the honour or satisfaction due to it for the service it had done, but to disband it on such terms as to subject and expose all, and even the most faithful, servants of the parliament and kingdom, both in the army and elsewhere, unto oppression or undoing, or to the mercy of their own and such other men's malicious and invenomed spirits which could promise no better. For the more full and particular demonstration of all which, we refer all knowing men unto the practices and proceedings against this Army, unto the times, by their procurement, appointed for the Disbanding of it in several parts, without just and equal satisfaction; which have been in part remonstrated in Papers sent from this Army, and published before our coming up to St. Alban's.—Upon consideration of all this, and upon the Resolutions (which their own abuses and provocations, put upon the Army, had raised in the whole body of it) not to disband without further satisfaction and security from the like abuses in future, we did, in our Representation or Declaration sent from St. Alban's, express in general what things we desired, besides our concernments as soldiers, to see done or provided for before our Disbanding, for settling the Peace of the kingdom, and securing the common Rights and Liberties thereof, which we were called out to defend and vindicate, and had so long fought for; and having therewithal, impeached several Members of the house of commons for their unjust practices and designs, to such purposes as are before expressed, and for endeavouring, in prosecution thereof, to engage this kingdom in a new war, we added some further Desires, for prevention of that mischief of a new war to the kingdom, and for our own present security from immediate ruin, while those other things might be treated on or considered; and upon the granting of some of them in part, and hopes given of some others, though we could not obtain the rest, and especially not that which we hold most just, equal, and necessary, viz. The positive Suspension of those impeached Members from sitting in the house, as judges in their own cause, and from their power in committees, whereby they have had the advantage to raise war against us, and to make new disturbances in the kingdom; yet the said impeached Members, pretending to withdraw themselves from the parliament until their causes should be heard and tried, and the house giving consent thereunto, we, out of our tenderness to parliament privileges, and our earnest desires to yield all observance to the parliament, and satisfaction to the city, (who pretended a full concurrence with us in our declared Desires for settling the Peace and Liberties of the kingdom) did, at the parliament's command and the city's request, withdraw the Army to the desired distance from London, and dispersed it further to several parts of the kingdom for the ease of the country; and proceeded, in a peaceable and regular way, to prepare and present more particular Charges against the said impeached Members, which within a few days after, we accordingly sent up to the house: and the said impeached

Members (having put in a dilatory Answer thereto, with a plea and demurrer to divers particulars therein) pretended that (to avoid any disturbance or interruption to the present proceedings for settling the public affairs by the interposal of their private cause) they desired leave and passes to travel for some months; which accordingly the Speaker of the house of commons was ordered, or authorized, to give them, and we (presuming on the house's caution for their forthcoming to be tried when the affairs of the kingdom were settled, which upon their first motion of withdrawing we had insisted on) did not gainsay; and thereupon we proceeded in a quiet and hopeful way to prepare more particular Proposals, in pursuance of our former general Desires, for the present settling of the Peace of the kingdom, to be tendered to the Commissioners of Parliament residing with the Army for that purpose; but finding that, while we were thus peaceably proceeding, the said impeached Members, notwithstanding their pretended Desires to travel, did continue in and about London, very active and busy to raise war, or make disturbances in the kingdom; and that the committee of Militia there did comply with them therein, by daily listing of men, and other preparations towards war, and sheltering to that end, yea, and entertaining into service those same Reformadoes who, by Ordinance of parliament, were by them to have been put out of the lines of communication; and finding continual jealousies and disturbances to our said proceedings bred in the Army, by the daily reports and alarms thereof from the city, we made a particular Address to the parliament for the restoring of the City Militia into those hands in which it was before the Ordinance of the 4th of May last; for the reasonableness of our Desires wherein (supposing that we had such a cause to insist on some removal of that power out of the hands into which it was then put, as here before is partly expressed, and in our late Declaration is more fully set forth) we dare confidently appeal to all men, not engaged against us, whether, for the present safety and quiet of the city upon such a change, and to prevent those dangers or disturbances to or in the city, which the want of a Militia during the interval (betwixt the ceasing of one and new forming of another) might give occasion and advantage unto, especially in such a juncture of affairs, there could be any other way so expedient as to render that change but an immediate reverting into those hands in which it was so lately before, who would make up a Militia ready formed to succeed immediately in the place of the other, without any considerable intermission or delay; and whether, at a time when jealousies and distrusts were both so rife and hurtful, as they might occasion no less distraction or interruption to any quiet settlement or proceedings thereunto, than real attempts of mischief would, there could be any proposal more reasonable or hopeful to beget a confidence and acquiescence, as to that point, in the parliament, the city, and the army, than to have that power restored, for the present, into those hands, of whose fidelity to the common interest we had all found so ample and unquestioned proof throughout the most dangerous times?—Upon our Address, therefore, to the parliament for that purpose, the Army being at such distance as aforesaid, both houses were pleased on the 23d of July last, to pass an Ordinance for the returning of the Militia into those hands, and repealing the Ordinance of the 4th of May, by which it had been changed as before.—Hereupon, hoping that all would quietly succeed to a settlement in this kingdom, we went on securely to finish our Proposals for that purpose, the Heads whereof have been since published; withdrew the head-quarters to a farther distance; dispersed the Army to larger quarters, for more ease to the country; and, upon a recommendation of the business of Ireland from the parliament, we had, in less than a week's space, prepared and ordered a considerable force, no less than 4000 horse and foot, as sir John Temple, employed from the parliament about that business to us, can testify, for a present relief thereunto: But the restless and treacherous malice of the enemies to our and the kingdom's peace, taking the supposed advantage of our distance and dispersed posture, which their fair pretences of peaceable intentions had induced us into, first they did, without all colour of authority, contrive and set on foot in the city, and many of them entered into a mischievous and desperate Vow and Engagement, tending to the subversion of the Freedom of parliament, and the liberties of this nation; to the frustrating of those just and public ends, for which so much blood and treasure hath been spilt and spent in the late war, and to the raising of a new war against the parliament and their army; which said Engagement both houses of parliament did, by their Declaration of the 23d of July, adjudge and declare to be high treason in all that should promote or abet the same; and, within a few days after, to wit, on Monday July 26, there was a Petition brought to the parliament by the sheriffs, and some aldermen and common-council men, in the name of the city of London, for the recalling of the said Ordinance of the 23d of July concerning the Militia, and the returning of the Militia into those hands in which it was put by the Ordinance of the 4th of May; which Petition was immediately followed and backed with a tumultuous confluence of Apprentices, and other dissolute and desperate persons, who committed most horrid and unheard-of violence upon both houses, enforcing them to recall both the said Declaration of July 23, concerning the said Engagement, and also the said Ordinance of the same date, concerning the Militia; and compelling the Speaker of the house of commons to resume the chair after the house was adjourned, and the house to pass such farther Votes concerning the king's present coming to

London, &c. as they the said rioters did please; neither the guard from the city that then attended the houses, nor the lord mayor, sheriffs, or any authority in the city, though sent to for that purpose, taking any course to suppress the said Tumult, or relieve the parliament against that violence, though it was continued for the space of 8 hours: And the houses having next day adjourned till Friday July 30, there were printed Tickets fixed upon posts in and about the city the day before, inviting the same persons to the like confluence at Westminster against the houses next meeting; all which hath been more fully, or more assuredly, made known by the Declaration of the Speaker of the house of commons concerning the same.—By this means the Speakers of both houses, together with most of the lords, and a very great number of the most faithful and unquestionable members of the house of commons, were driven away, so as they could not with safety attend their service in parliament, nor with freedom discharge their trust to the kingdom therein; but were forced to fly to their Army for safety; so as there was not, nor could then be, any free meeting or legal proceeding of parliament: Notwithstanding which, divers members of both houses (who, by the carriage and sequel of the business, will appear to be of the same party and confederacy with the aforesaid enemies to our and the kingdom's peace, and with the authors and actors both of the said treasonable Engagement and the tumultuous force upon the parliament) taking this opportunity of time to carry on their designs, when very few were left, but of their own party, did continue to meet in the usual places at Westminster: And having, under pretence of a necessity for continuing the parliament by adjournment, drawn in some few well-minded members to sit with them, out of a scruple least the parliament should fall for want of adjournment, took upon them the name of both houses of parliament: And having, on Friday, July 30, chosen a new Speaker, did proceed to vote and act as a parliament, and adjourned from time to time; but of what party and confederacy the most of them were, and to what ends and interests they acted, will appear by what they did; whereof we shall, for the present, give a taste in some particulars, hoping that shortly the whole Journal of their proceedings may be made public.—First, The said Members of the house of commons, convened as aforesaid, immediately voted and called in, as to the service of the house, the 11 impeached Members: and also those who, upon former Votes of the house, were suspended, or under question to be put out for delinquency, and had put in their cases. With this pretended house of commons, thus composed, and four or five lords of the same model, for a house of peers, they proceed to set up a Committee for Safety, whereof all or most of the said impeached Members were a part. This committee they appointed to join with that same pretended committee of the city

Militia, whose power was obtained only by the tumultuous force and violence aforesaid. To these committees, the most or main of their proceedings refer; and, by divers pretended Votes, Orders, and Ordinances, procured in the name of one or both houses of parliament, larger powers were given to these two committees, for raising of forces, appointing chief commanders, and other officers; and other vast, unlimited, or unusual powers were given them; all tending to the raising and levying of a new war within this kingdom; upon which many forces, both of horse and foot, were actually levied, and other preparations of war made; All which were intended and designed in justification, prosecution, and maintenance of the aforesaid treasonable Engagement, and of the said force and violence done to the parliament, or of the very same ends and interests, and to oppose and hinder the restitution of the houses of parliament to their honour and freedom, and the advance of this their Army for that purpose, being then upon a march to conduct to London the Speakers and members of both houses, who, by that violence, were driven away as aforesaid: Besides the consideration of the persons into whose hands these powers were committed, this is abundantly evident many other ways; and especially by that Declaration of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, which was first, by that pretended committee of safety, ordered, and then, by the pretended houses, without reading a word of it, approved, to be published in the parish churches, with an Exhortation to the people to take up arms in maintenance of the ends therein expressed; which, though the pretences were for the defence of the king, parliament, and city, then alledged to be in great danger; (when as indeed none were in danger but only the authors, actors, and abettors of the traitorous practices aforesaid) yet the true ends thereof appeared clearly to be the same with the said treasonable Engagement and Tumult against the parliament; all of them concentrating, as in other things, so especially in this, viz. To have the King brought up to London, without delay, or any nearer approach of the Army. And to all these the succeeding Votes of the pretended houses, for the same thing, did speedily echo the same note. —Concerning which matters (not to examine what alteration of the case, since both houses, and both kingdoms also, of England and Scotland, resolved, That it was not safe the King should come to London, until he had given satisfaction and security to his people, in relation to those public ends for which so much blood and treasure had been spent) we shall only say thus much to these men's intentions and designs in the business, That had the king come up to London, as they have so often desired and attempted, it is apparent they intended, and would have made use of it, rather to lay the stronger foundations of a new war, (upon the ruins of that public interest contended for in the former, and of all those that had with most candor, clearness, and simplicity of heart appeared and acted for the same) than any way to settle thereby a safe and well-grounded Peace. And since they could not rationally expect so easy an obtaining of the king's person to London, upon such a pretended Vote or Declaration of their desire thereof, it is as evident that they could intend nothing thereby but a more plausible pretence and foundation of quarrel against this Army; thereby to engage or incline to their assistance the king's party, and such others as might be caught with the apprehension thereof as a speedy way to peace, the thing so generally longed for; and by such assistance gained, the better to ruin this army, and those faithful members of parliament who were retired to it.—For our parts, we shall rejoice as much as any to see the king brought back to his parliament; and that not so much in place, as in affection and agreement, on such sound terms and grounds as may render both him and the kingdom safe, quiet, and happy; and shall be as ready as any to bring his majesty to London, when his being there may be likely to produce (not greater disturbances or distractions, but) a peace indeed; and that such as may not, with the shipwreck of the public interest, be shaped and moulded only to the private advantages of a particular party or faction; but bottomed chiefly on grounds of common and public welfare and security: and if, without regard to these considerations, we would have brought his majesty with us to London, in our late advance thither, which our enemies could not hinder or prejudice us in, we had no cause to doubt, but, as to men, we might have had all the advantages which our adversaries promised to themselves thereby, added to the strength and interest of the Army; and have inverted the disadvantages upon them that they intended against us thereby, so as his majesty's so-much-desired coming to London might have been much to their prejudice, and our advantage and security, if we had regarded only our own particulars: But (as at present our consciences bear clear witness to ourselves, so) we hope God will, in the issue, make it clear to others, that we have not minded, nor been acting, our own work or interests, but the kingdom's and every honest man's in it. —Mean while, to return to our purpose, we think it sufficiently cleared, That the proceedings of those members, or the major part of them, that continued to sit at Westminster during the absence of the Speakers, the powers by them given, the forces by them levied, and other preparations of war thereupon made, were all designed and driven on in prosecution and maintenance of the said treasonable Engagement, and of the force done upon the parliament, or for the same ends and interests with them, and to oppose the advance of this Army towards London, for restitution of the parliament to honour and freedom, and indeed to raise a new war in the kingdom, against the parliament and their army, for the destruction thereof. And the same may yet further appear by this, that those very Apprentices, Reformadoes, and others about the city, who were the chief actors in the said Engagement and Tumult, were afterwards most trusted and employed, and most active in those preparations for war.—By what we have here said, and what hath been declared and published from us, and from the Speakers and aforesaid Members of both houses, and by the whole series of our own and our enemies actions and carriages, compared together, it may appear how tender we have been, not only of the authority and just privileges of parliament, and of the safety, peace, and welfare, both of the kingdom and the city, but even towards those our enemies themselves, seeking only things necessary for the common good of the whole, and that, if possible, without ruin or hurt to any; and yet how maliciously, treacherously, and unworthily we have that while been dealt withal by those our enemies, and by a factious and powerful party, especially in the parliament and city, combining with them; and what clear cause we have had, both for all that we have formerly desired or done, in prevention of our own ruin and the kingdom's disturbance; and also what just grounds for our late advance to London; the good service whereof, especially in restoring the parliament to a condition of safety, honour, and freedom thereby, hath been, without any seeking of ours, acknowledged by both houses, with thanks to us, and public thanksgiving to Almighty God for it; and a further trust hath been thereupon committed to the General, for taking care with his Army to safeguard the parliament.—The houses being thus restored to a condition of present safety, honour, and freedom, two things seem clearly remaining to be done, which our own, and most men's expectations are most set upon, viz. First, To vindicate the honour, freedom, and safety of parliament from the like affronts and violence in future, and the army and kingdom from danger of the like disturbances, whilst things shall be in a debate or treaty for a Settlement; and then to proceed unto a speedy settlement of the peace of the kingdom.—The latter of these is first in our intentions, being nearest to the ultimate end; and we shall earnestly desire that, in order thereunto, the Proposals of the Army, whereof the Heads are published, may be speedily considered and brought to a resolution. But considering that the debates of them may take up some time e'er they be agreed on all hands, and the framing of them into Bills, and perfecting of the same, will require much more; something must first be done in the former, for a present security to the parliament from like affronts or violence, and to the army and kingdom from the like disturbances to the peace thereof, by any farther advantage which the time like to be spent in the settling of peace may afford to our watchful, restless, and, we doubt, implacable enemies.—First, therefore, to these ends, (unless it should be thought fit to secure the parliament, by keeping the whole body of the Army, or so great a part thereof to remain continually in and about London, as might be sure to over-power any future tumults or force that may arise out of the city, which neither the welfare of the city and ease of the parts adjacent, nor the safety of the kingdom, in respect of the present posture of affairs, will admit) it is absolutely necessary that there be speedy and exemplary justice done upon, at least, the chief authors and abettors of the said treasonable Engagement, and of the said force done to the parliament, and upon the chief actors in maintenance and prosecution thereof, whereby men may be deterred from the like in the future: and this is also as necessary to the security of the army and peace of the kingdom, since it is apparent by all that hath been said, and by infinite other evidences, too many to recount, that both the said Engagement, and the force done to the parliament, and the power of the city Militia thereby gained, and the succeeding Votes and Orders of the pretended houses (but indeed of that faction that are our professed enemies) in maintenance and prosecution thereof, and the forces thereupon levied, put under the command of major-general Massey, and others our professed adversaries, were all designed and directed to the ruin and destruction of this Army, and the raising of a new war against us in this kingdom; and having had such experience of their restless malice and cruel intentions towards us, notwithstanding our tenderness and lenity towards them, and of their treacherous dealings so soon as they thought they had the advantage, notwithstanding all their semblances of compliance to a composure, what reason is there to expect but that, if, by our patience and delays, they apprehend in future the like or other advantage, they will break out again into the like or worse attempts of violence and war, if all escape with impunity for these?—But as to this point of Security by exemplary Justice in an ordinary way, we see our hopes almost frustrated; for though our Desires and Resolutions to that purpose, expressed in our late Declaration of the Grounds of our Advance towards London, were then seconded with the declared approbation and concurrent Resolutions of the Speakers and members of both houses that were driven away to the Army, and with their Engagement to live and die with us therein; and though in pursuance thereof, the right honourable the house of peers have, since their restitution, begun and proceeded to declare null and void all that was done in the name of both houses while they lay under the power of that tumultuous violence, and to give their more authentic approbation to our said Declaration made in behalf of the said Speakers and members while they were with the Army, and in behalf of the honour and freedom of the Parliament; and to give their like approbation to the concurrent Declaration and Engagement of the said Speakers and members made to us while they were with us; yet the house of commons hath not only not concurred with the lords in any of those things, but rather seem to have cast them aside; and upon the question concerning those very Votes of the said 26th of July, to which the houses were by the said violence enforced, whether they should be declared null and void, it was carried in the negative, that the question should not be put: by the consequences whereof, which are many ways very sad to this poor kingdom, and more than we can recount; and by all subsequent proceedings in that house in relation to the whole business, we clearly find that the members of that house, who, after the violence done to it, and during the absence of the Speaker and the other members thereby driven away, proceeding in the name of that house as aforesaid, procured the pretended powers, and did make the pretended Votes, Orders, and Ordinances aforementioned; and many of them were chief actors thereupon for the levying of war in prosecution and maintenance of the aforesaid treasonable Engagement and force done to the parliament, and for the opposing, resisting, and destroying of this the parliament's army in its advance to London, for the restitution of the parliament to its honour and freedom, being conscious of their own guilt and danger thereby; yet, presuming on their interest in the house, and the patience and lenity of this Army, do continue to intrude themselves and to sit and vote there; and, by their present interest in the house, do use their utmost endeavours, and very much prevail, to obstruct and avoid the bringing of any to justice who have acted under their pretended authority; knowing it to be their own case and concernment in point of impunity, as well as conducing to their faction and interest; and for that cause they labour, as for life, to uphold the things past and done, and the authorities given by them and their faction, in their and the Apprentices pretended parliament, yea even those very Votes and Authorities wrested from the parliament by that palpable force of July 26, to be good and valid until they be repealed, as if past in a free and legal parliament.—In which point, and all questions touching upon it, we find they presume upon, and are strengthened by, the concurrence of divers other Members, who having, perhaps with harmless intentions, continued to sit with them during the Speaker's absence as aforesaid, though they consented not to any of their mischievous Votes and Orders, or treasonable proceedings aforementioned, may yet fear themselves to be involved in the same case and danger, by having sat with them: and thus, by the concurrence of these two parties in the house as to that point, and the interest which both these parties have with others in the house, especially upon a matter of saving one another; and by the partial respects of some others in the house, for the saving of their friends out of the house, who have acted under the authority, and for the evil ends aforementioned, we find an absolute obstruction to the bringing to justice or questioning of any who have acted in the late levying of war against us, and against the vindication of the parliament's freedom, or in the said treasonable Engagements; yea, or in abetment of the tumultuous violence upon the parliament itself; neither can we find or hear of any one person hitherto brought to justice or question for any of those things; but all seem to be either justified, or at least protected from justice, by the power and prevalence of those members in parliament, who are, many of them, as we can make appear, equally guilty of, and, others, in some kind obnoxious for, the same thing: and thus not only our just expectations of vindication to the parliament, and security to ourselves and the kingdom from the like treasonable and turbulent practices in future, by exemplary justice for what hath been so done, are frustrated; but even the safety and immunity of the Speakers, and those faithful members of both houses that were driven away by the violence aforesaid, and the immunity of the Army in advancing to London, to bring them back and restore the parliament to its honour and freedom, which hath been acknowledged by public Thanksgiving to God for it, as aforesaid, is subjected and exposed to question; wherein theirs, and ours, and the kingdom's enemies obtrude themselves to be the judges: for if those pretended Votes, Orders, and Ordinances, whereby war was levied against them and us, were then good and valid; though they should now be repealed; yet we, with the Speakers, and those members aforesaid, in opposing of them while they were in force, must needs remain transgressors still; and yet God and we are thanked for it. What a mock is this to God and man?—But to return to the more serious consideration of our case, in relation to the Security of the Parliament, Kingdom, and ourselves, against the like turbulent and treasonable practice in future; since, by the means aforesaid, no security by exemplary justice can at present be had to deter any from the like, we wish all men to consider what straits we are in this case put upon.—That which is the main work of the kingdom, and which we most earnestly thirst for and attend upon, viz. The settling of a Peace, and consideration of our Proposals in order thereunto, will ask time to bring it to an issue; and that done, the relieving or remedying of the pressing Grievances of the kingdom will take up and require the sitting of the parliament for some further time, though, upon the settling of a peace, a period be set for the certain ending of it. Now, for the body of this Army, or so great a part of it as may serve to over-power any future tumults or force that may arise in or from the city, to continue hereabouts so long, the condition of the country round about, and the necessities of the city, in point of provision, cannot well bear it; and, we doubt, foreign forces, that are already upon the wing, and turbulent spirits, that in several parts of the kingdom are beginning insurrections if we continue fixed here, will have such opportunity, and take such encouragement therefrom, as that they may, e'er long, necessarily call us off. Should we now or hereafter, while the parliament sits, draw off the Army from about the city, without exemplary justice upon some, would not the same, or more dangerous, tumults and violences probably return upon the parliament; and the like, or worse, practices of raising a new war be revived, with more advantage to our enemies, more danger to us and the kingdom, and less hopes of appeasing it so easily and happily as the former, while the same violent and factious spirits, both in the parliament and elsewhere, shall continue in the same power and opportunities as formerly; and both they and all others shall have before their eyes the encouragement of that impunity and protection, yea rather that justification, which they have hitherto found from within the parliament itself in the past practices aforementioned, though as grossly treasonable as any they can hereafter run into? Should we or any others, for the obtaining of exemplary justice upon some, proceed to impeach any for their past treasonable practices, what hopes of justice or of a timely dispatch therein can we have, while such a prevailing party of men, interested and concerned in the same things, shall, in the house of commons, continue to be judges thereof; or at least be ready to avow and justify the offenders therein, as having acted under their pretended authority? In this strait therefore, though we ever have been and shall be most tender of all just privileges of parliament, yet finding the root of these and other difficulties to the parliament, kingdom, and ourselves, to lie in this, viz. That those Members of the house of commons who, during the forced absence of the Speakers of both houses, continuing to sit and act as a parliament, did procure and consent to the pretended Votes, Orders, and Ordinances aforementioned for levying of War; and that, as is before demonstrated, in direct prosecution or maintenance of the aforesaid treasonable Engagement, and the violence done to the parliament; and for the opposing, resisting, and destroying of this the parliament's army in its advance towards London, only to restore the Speakers and Members of both houses that were driven away, and the houses themselves, to their honour and freedom; and who are thereby, and by their late owning and avowing of the same, and many of them, as we can prove by acting personally in the said treasonable practices, become parties to the same, do yet take the boldness to sit and vote in parliament, especially in the house of commons. We say, finding the main root of our difficulties and dangers to lie in this,—First, we appeal to all men, Whether it be just or tolerable, that any privilege of parliament should, contrary to the law of nature, make a man judge in his own case and concernment? And we wish those men themselves to consider, if we had come to an engagement with the forces raised by virtue of their pretended Votes and Ordinances, and that thousands had been slain, and that we had made our way by the sword, Whether they would then have expected to have sat as judges on us therein? and we are sure it is no thanks to them that it hath been otherwise; and had we found those members in arms against us, and subdued and taken them, Whether had they not been in the condition of prisoners of war? And if so then, having put arms into the hands of others against us, and still maintaining it, Whether can they, in strict justice, challenge any better condition from us? But that, contrariwise, we should suffer either that those whom, by the course of war which they had chose to engage in against us, we might justly make our prisoners, should, in a course of law, become our masters and commanders; or that those who the other day did, in an hostile manner, endeavour to have been our executioners, should, now we have by force broke their preparations against us, become our judges; we suppose no reasonable man, nor themselves, when they w^eld consider it, can expect from us.—Upon all these considerations of the justness of the cause, and the necessity of the thing, for the safety of the Parliament, Kingdom, and this Army, (having no other way left timely to remedy the difficulties we are put upon, or prevent the growing dangers of future violence unto the parliament, and disturbances to the kingdom, or to secure the parliament in a quiet proceeding to settle the Peace of the kingdom; and, in such case, the safety of the people being the supreme law) we do protest and declare, That if any of those Members, who, during the absence of the Speakers and the rest of the members of both houses, forced away by the tumultuous violence aforesaid, did sit and vote in the pretended houses then continuing at Westminster, shall hereafter intrude themselves to sit in parliament, before they shall have given satisfaction to the respective houses, concerning the grounds of their said sitting at Westminster, during the absence of the said Speakers; and shall have acquitted themselves by sufficient evidence, that they did not procure or give their consent unto any of those pretended Votes, Orders, or Ordinances, tending to the raising and levying of a war, as is before declared, or for the king's coming forthwith to London, we cannot any longer suffer the same; but shall do that right to the Speakers and Members of both houses who were driven away to us, and to ourselves with them, all whom the said other members have endeavoured, in an hostile manner, most unjustly to destroy; and also to the kingdom, which they endeavoured to embroil in a new war, as to take some speedy and effectual course whereby to restrain them from being their own, ours, and the kingdom's judges in those things wherein they have made themselves parties; by this means to make way that both they and others that are guilty of, and parties to, the aforesaid treasonable and destructive practices and proceedings against the freedom of the parliament and peace of the kingdom, may be brought to condign punishment; and that at the judgment of a free parliament, consisting, duly and properly, of such Members of both houses respectively, who stand clear from such apparent and treasonable breach of their trust, as is before expressed.—By the Appointment of his Excellency and the General Council of his Army. JO. RUSHWORTH, Secretary."

The Ordinance for making void all Proceedings during the Absence of the Speakers, passes both Houses.] This day, the commons sent up another draught of an Ordinance for making void all Votes, Orders, and Ordinances, in the time of the absence of the Speakers; which, after some debate, the lords agreed to. It was in every respect answerable to that which had been brought into the house of lords before, and passed there, except in the following proviso: "Provided always, That no person shall be impeached or punished for their actings, by, or upon, or according to, the aforesaid Votes, Orders, and Ordinances, unless he or they shall be found guilty of contriving, acting, or abetting the visible and actual force aforesaid; or being present at, or knowing of, the said force, did afterwards act upon the Votes so forced; or were guilty of entering into or promoting the late Engagement for bringing the King to the city, upon the terms and conditions expressed in his majesty's Letter of the 12th of May last."—The commons had warmly debated every clause of this Ordinance: for no less than three divisions, on the Question, appear in their Journals of the 19th instant, all so equal in number, as 96 against 93, 85 against 83, and 87 against 84, before the General's Letter and Remonstrance were delivered to that house; which, after reading, silenced all their debates; and, the next day, the Ordinance was passed, as above, and sent to the lords.*

August 24. This day the house of commons were somewhat alarmed with an information that Mr. Anthony Nicholl, one of the 11 Members accused by the Army, had escaped out of the serjeant's custody. All the ports in England and Wales were ordered to be stopped, and all officers belonging to them were required not to suffer him to pass through them. Mr.

* "They back this Remonstrance," says lord Hollis, "with a party of 1000 horse drawn up in Hyde-Park; Cromwell and Ireton making menacing speeches in the house, and Guards out of the Army besetting the doors and avenues. By all which means, and the terror of their surly impeaching looks, many of the Members were driven away, and the poor house forced, the 20th of August, to pass the Ordinance for declaring all Votes, Orders and Ordinances, made in one or both houses, from July 26 to August 6, null and void. And now they are a free parliament, or as Haslerig told them the next day, after the 11 Members were withdrawn, a glorious parliament, in truth, no parliament, but they are what Mr. Cromwell will have them to be." Memoirs, p. 172.

Whitlocke writes, "That Mr. Hollis, sir Philip Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir Wm. Waller, sir John Clotworthy, and Mr. Long, went in one ship for France; where, soon after, that gallant gentleman, sir Philip Stapylton, died of the plague at Calais: and that some of them went into other parts, or retired to their own countries and lived privately, till they were restored to their seats in June 1648: But upon their being afterwards secluded by the Army, Mr. Hollis went to St. Mere Eglide, in Normandy, where he resided several years, and wrote his Memoirs." Thus the Army got rid of the most able managers against them; which, as Mr. Ludlow observes, "was their principal aim in their prosecution of the 11 Members."

The King removes to Hampton-Court.] Aug. 26. A Letter was read from Lord Montague, dated at Oatlands, Aug. 24, informing the lords, That, the night before, the King was pleased to tell them he intended to go this day to Hampton-Court, whither they were to attend him.

The Propositions of Peace ordered to be sent to the King.] Aug. 27. The lords and commons agreed to the Propositions for Peace, with the Addition of a proviso, after a conference, in which the latter gave the following Reasons for their insisting, tenaciously, to the Propositions as they came from them, without any further alteration: "Because it was the Resolution of both houses, with the consent of the kingdom of Scotland, to send the same Propositions now as were sent to the King at Newcastle: That great prejudice would ensue, if they were not speeded; for so much time will be elapsed, if there be any alterations in them, because they must then be sent to Scotland also, which will very much retard the settling the Peace of the kingdom." The lords debated this matter some time; but at last agreed to it, and ordered the Propositions, after having the consent of the Scots Commissioners to them, to be sent to the King.

Sept. 1. A Letter from the Scots Commissioners was read, requiring a free Passage for their Commissioners, Messengers, &c. The lords ordered this Letter to be communicated to the commons, and to desire their concurrence that the consideration of the matter of fact be referred to the members of both houses that are of the committee of both kingdoms, to consider what is fit to be done thereupon, and to make report thereof to the houses: also that the Propositions of both kingdoms, for a safe and well-grounded Peace, shall be presented to the King on Tuesday next; that the Scots Commissioners be acquainted therewith, and that they be desired to go along with such a committee of lords and commons as shall be appointed by both houses to present the same, and the concurrence of the commons to be desired herein.

A new Militia constituted in London.] The same day the sub-committee of lords and commons, appointed to examine into the Force used to the parliament, &c. made some report of it to this effect: "That it is the opinion of the said committee, That a new Militia be constituted, in the city of London, by Ordinance, and only fitting persons employed in it: that the Trained Bands and Auxiliaries of the Tower-Hamlets shall be under the immediate command and power of the Constable of the Tower and his lieutenants, &c. That it be referred to the General and his officers to consider what constant and ordinary guard will be fit for the safety of the Tower; and, admitting the Army be removed from the city, what shall be done with the line of communication and the forts about London? That it is the opinion of the committee, in order to the safety of the parliament and city, that they should take such principal persons of the city into custody, as have had a hand in the late tumult, and have endeavoured to raise a new war: That they report the state of their misdemeanors to the houses, to be brought to speedy justice; to the end that such as are faulty may be removed, and fit persons put into such places of trust as they now enjoy. Lastly, That the houses may be moved to consider of their power, concerning the adjournment of the parliament unto some other place; for until that be declared, it is very difficult to offer what may be for their future security, otherwise than by the body of the army."

At the same time was presented to the lords the Answer of the General and his Officers to the points referred to them by this sub-committee, viz. "That as to the point concerning the Line of Communication, and forts about the cities of London and Westminster, and borough of Southwark, wherein you have asked our opinion, we answer, That we conceive it necessary that the whole line of communication, as also the forts upon and about the same, be effectually slighted, before the Army draws off from their present quarters about the city. That as to the other part, concerning the Guards at the Tower, they would send their opinion in 3 or 4 days."

Sept. 2. Pursuant to part of this advice, both houses passed an Ordinance for resetting the Militia of London, &c. in the old hands, and also to another, for effectually slighting all the works and forts about the city.

Instructions for the Commissioners of both Houses appointed to attend the King with the Propositions of Peace. Sept. 6. A Message was brought from the commons by sir John Evelyn, desiring the lords concurrence in certain particulars: the first of these were

INSTRUCTIONS for Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Basil earl of Denbigh, Edward lord Montague, sir John Holland, bart. sir Walter Erle, sir John Cook, and sir James Harrington, knights, John Crew and Rd. Browne, esquires, or any three or more of them, appointed Committees of both houses of the parliament of England, to join with the Commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, to present Propositions to the King's Majesty for a safe and well-grounded Peace, and to receive his majesty's Answer thereupon.

I. "You, or any three or more of you, shall present to the king at Hampton-Court, or elsewhere that the king's residence shall be, on Tuesday, being the 7th day of this instant Sept. from the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, the Propositions herewith sent unto you for a safe and well-grounded Peace.—II. You, or any three or more of you, are to desire from the King his positive Answer and consent to the said Propositions.—III. Any three, or more of you, are to repair to the parliament at Westminster with all speed and diligence, as soon as you, or any three or more of you, shall have received the said Answer from his majesty; in expectation of the said Answer you are not to make stay above the space of six days next after you shall receive these Instructions.—IV. But the said time of six days being expired, any three of you are forthwith, without any delay, to repair to the parliament of England, to give them an account of your proceedings.—V. And in case the Scots Commissioners be not present at Hampton-Court, or at such place where the king's residence shall be, on Tuesday the said 7th of this instant Sept. to join with you when you shall present the said Propositions to his majesty; then you, or any three or more of you are to present the said Propositions to his majesty alone, and to receive his majesty's Answer thereunto according to the preceding Instructions."

The second particular of the Message sent by sir John Evelyn, was an Order that the members of both houses, who are of the committee of both kingdoms, do meet this afternoon, and send to the Scots Commissioners to desire them to meet and give them their positive Answer concerning their joining to present the Propositions to his majesty on Tuesday the 7th of this present Sept.; the houses not intending thereby any way to prevent or delay the presenting the said Propositions, tomorrow, to his majesty. The Answer returned by the lords was, That their house agreed both to this Order and to the foregoing Instructions.

Proceedings against sir John Maynard and Mr. Glynn, two of the impeached Members. Sept. 7. The commons ordered, that the 11 Members impeached by the Army, should each of them appear to answer such things as should be objected against them, at or before the 16th of Oct. next. Accordingly the next day, John Glynn, esq. Recorder of London, and sir John Maynard, appeared in the house of commons, when the Speaker informed them, That there had been a report made, in which were some things that highly concerned them, this being read, Mr. Glynn instantly gave a general Answer to many of the matters objected against him, and a particular one to others. After which, the question being put, Whether John Glynn, esq. Recorder of London, be discharged from being a member of this house? it passed in the affirmative, 58 against 52, and he was discharged accordingly. Sir John Maynard refused to answer to any of the Informations that were read against him, but prayed that he might have counsel assigned him, and withdrew. On which it was resolved, without division, "That sir John Maynard be expelled the house and committed prisoner to the Tower." Resolved also, "That an Impeachment of High Treason be prepared and brought in against him."

The King's Answer to the Propositions of Peace.] Sept. 14. The earl of Pembroke reported to the lords that, according to the commands of both houses, he had delivered the Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace to his majesty, and had brought the King's Answer to them; and his lordship presented a Paper, containing a Discourse between the King and the Commissioners, both which were read as follows:

"After we had presented, and desired the King's positive Answer and consent to the Propositions, the king asked, Whether these Propositions were the same which were formerly presented to him at Newcastle? The earl of Pembroke told him, That these were the same Propositions, only that there was an Addition for the Sale of Bishops Lands, and some Alterations touching Delinquents. The king then asked, Whether the commissioners of Scotland did agree to those Propositions as they were now presented? The earl of Lauderdale answered, That those Propositions were the same that were formerly agreed on by both kingdoms; there was only an Addition for an Ordinance to be passed for the abolishing of Archbishops and Bishops, and Sale of their Lands, which, by their Instructions, they were warranted to agree to; and that they were likewise commanded to expunge such Delinquents of the Scots nation as the parliament of Scotland had taken off; particularly some persons, whose names had been given in to both houses. He said likewise, He found a proviso added; but that they had that day received a Declaration from both houses, by which it was declared, That there was nothing therein contained disagreeable to the former Propositions, saving only in the matter of Fines and Compositions of Delinquents. Upon which his lordship said, They did concur in presenting those Propositions. The king then replied, That he was somewhat surprised with them, not looking now for them; but he would give an Answer to them as soon as he could. Upon Thursday about ten of the clock, his majesty sent us word, that he would be ready to give his answer to the Propositions about 4 in the afternoon, and commanded us then to attend him, which we did accordingly; when his majesty told us, That if this were a time for complaint, he might well complain that he had sent many Messages to the houses, to which he had received no Answer at all:

But it now being a time, said he, for every one to endeavour to do all the good he can; therefore he had, in as short a time as he could, prepared his Answer to the Propositions; which, he took God to witness, was such as, in his opinion, led to the best way for settling of an happy and speedy Peace in these nations: if it were not so in every man's opinion, his majesty wished we might all be charitable to one another; and so delivered the Answer to us; which, after we had read amongst ourselves, the earl of Pembroke, with the rest of the Commissioners, repairing to the king, desired his majesty's positive Answer and consent to the Propositions: to which the king replied, That what he had delivered to us was his Answer; and that he could give no other, which he conceived was a positive Answer:

"C. R. Hampton-Court, Sept. 9.

"His majesty cannot chuse but be passionately sensible, as he believes all his good subjects are, of the late great distractions, and still languishing and unsettled state of this kingdom; and he calls God to witness, and is willing to give testimony to all the world, of his readiness to contribute his utmost endeavours for restoring it to a happy and flourishing condition. His majesty having perused the Propositions now brought to him, finds them the same in effect, which were offered to him at Newcastle: to some of which as he could not then consent, without violation of his conscience and honour, so neither can he agree to others now; conceiving them, in many respects, more disagreeable to the present condition of affairs than when they were formerly presented unto him, as being destructive to the main principal interests of the Army, and of all those whose affections concur with them. And his majesty having seen the Proposals of the Army to the commissioners from his two houses residing with them, and with them to be treated on, in order to the clearing and securing of the Rights and Liberties of the kingdom, and the settling of a just and lasting Peace: to which Proposals, as he conceives his two houses not to be strangers, so he believes they will think with him, that they much more conduce to the satisfaction of all interests, and may be a fitter foundation for a lasting Peace, than the Propositions which at this time are tendered unto him.—He therefore propounds, as the best way in his judgment, in order to a Peace, that his two houses would instantly take into consideration those Proposals upon which there may be a Personal Treaty with his majesty, and upon such other Propositions as his majesty shall make; hoping that the said Propositions may be so moderated in the said Treaty as to render them the more capable of his majesty's full concession; wherein he resolves to give full satisfaction to his people for whatsoever shall concern the settling of the Protestant Profession, with liberty to tender consciences, and the securing of the laws, liberties, and properties of all his subjects, and the just privileges of parliaments for the future: and likewise by his present deportment in this Treaty, he will make the world clearly judge of his intentions in matters of future government: in which Treaty his majesty will be well pleased, if it be thought fit, that commissioners from the Army (whose the Proposals are) may likewise be admitted.—His majesty therefore conjures his two houses of parliament, by the duty they owe to God and his majesty their king, and by the howels of compassion they have to their fellow-subjects, both for the relief of their present sufferings, and to prevent future miseries, that they will forthwith accept of this his majesty's offer, whereby the joyful news of Peace may be restored to this distressed kingdom. And for what concerns the kingdom of Scotland, mentioned in the Propositions, his majesty will very willingly treat upon those particulars with the Scots Commissioners, and doubts not but to give reasonable satisfaction to that his kingdom."

Letter from sir T. Fairfax, desiring a Restraint of the Press.] Sept. 21. A Letter from sir T. Fairfax was read, addressed to the Speaker of the house of lords:

"My lord; I have inclosed some printed Pamphlets, which are not only very scandalous and abusive to this Army in particular, but indeed to the whole kingdom in general; my desire is that these, and all of the like nature, may be suppressed for the future; and yet (that the kingdom's expectation may be satisfied, in relation to intelligence, till a firm Peace be settled, considering the mischiefs that will happen by the poisonous writings of evil men sent abroad daily, to abuse and deceive the people) that, if the house shall see it fit, some two or three sheets may be permitted to come forth weekly, which may be licensed, and have some stamp of authority with them: And in respect the former licenser, Mr. Mabbot, hath approved himself faithful in that service of licensing, and likewise in the service of the houses and of this army, I humbly desire that he may be restored and continued in the same place of licenser, &c. Your's, Tho. Fairfax. Putney, Sept. 20.

Pursuant to this Letter an Ordinance was ordered to be drawn up for restraining the Liberty of the Press, which we shall meet with in the sequel.

Sept. 22. The parliament had another great alarm given them on the side of Ireland: they had intelligence sent them that the lord Inchiquin, their general, and col. Jones, who had gained the last victory over the rebels, had a design to join with the Scots Army there; and, altogether, to declare for the king, parliament, and Covenant, and resist the English Army.

Sir John Gaire, Lord Mayor of London, impeached of High Treason.] Sept. 27. A message was brought up from the commons, by sir Peter Wentworth and others, "That he was commanded by the knights, citizens, and burghesses of that house, to impeach sir John Gaire, knt. now lord mayor of London, of High Treason; and he did, in their names and of all the commons of England, impeach sir John Gaire, knt. of the same: That the house had already secured him in the Tower of London; and they desired their lordships would appoint a speedy day, and they would be ready to bring up their Articles, Proofs and Evidences against him." An Order from both houses was sent to the city, to elect another Lord Mayor in the room of sir John Gaire. Accordingly, alderman John Warner was elected into that office.

Ordinance for restraining the Liberty of the Press.] Sept. 30. Both houses passed an Ordinance against unlicensed and scandalous Pamphlets, and for the better regulating of Printing; of which the following is an abstract:

"The lords and commons in parliament assembled, taking notice of the many seditious, false and scandalous Pamphlets daily printed and published in and about London and Westminster, and thence dispersed into all parts of this realm, and other parts beyond the seas; to the great abuse and prejudice of the people, and unsufferable reproach of the proceedings of the parliament and their army: For the better Suppression thereof and Prevention of the like inconveniences for the time to come, do order and ordain. -I. That what person soever shall make, write, print, publish, sell, or utter, any Book, Pamphlet, Treatise, Ballad, Libel, or Sheet of News, whatsoever, or cause so to be done, except the same be licensed by both or either house of parliament, or by such persons as shall be thereunto authorized by one or both houses of parliament, with the name of the author, printer and licenser thereunto prefixed, shall, for every such offence, suffer, pay, and incur the punishment, fine, and penalty hereafter mentioned, viz. The maker, writer, or composer of any such unlicensed Book, &c. shall forfeit and pay 40s. or be imprisoned in the common goal for the county or liberty where the offence is committed, or the offender shall be found, until he shall pay the sum, so that the said imprisonment exceed not 40 days. The printer to pay 20s. and suffer the like imprisonment till he pay the same; the said imprisonment not to exceed 20 days; and likewise to have his press and implements of imprinting seized and broken in pieces. The bookseller or stationer to forfeit and pay 10s. or to be imprisoned in like manner till he pay the same, the imprisonment not exceeding 10 days: and the hawker, pedlar, or ballad-singer to forfeit and lose all his books, pamphlets, or printed papers exposed to sale; and also to be whipped as a common rogue in the liberty or parish where the said offender shall be apprehended, or the offence committed. II. The several and respective commissioners for the Militia, in London, Middlesex, and Surrey, and all mayors and other head-officers of corporations, and all justices of the peace of the several counties, cities, and liberties in England and Wales, and every of them, in their respective liberties and jurisdictions, are hereby authorized and required to put this Ordinance in execution; and all constables, headboroughs, and other officers, are hereby authorized and required to put this Ordinance in execution; and, together with such assistance as they shall call unto them, to enter into any shop or house where they shall be informed, or have good cause to suspect, any such unlicensed pamphlets or papers are printed or sold, and to seize the same, and likewise all presses and implements of printing, and to bring them, together with the offenders, before the said commissioners, mayors, &c. or any one of them; so that the fines, pains and penalties before-mentioned may be inflicted upon the offenders, according to the intent and meaning of this Ordinance. III. The view of any one justice of the peace, head-officer, or commissioner aforesaid, or the oath of one credible witness, (which oath, in such case, they are hereby authorized to administer) shall be a sufficient conviction of any offender in the cases before recited; and the same justices of the peace, mayors, &c. have hereby authority to dispose of one moiety of the fines paid by virtue of this Ordinance, to the collectors of the poor for the liberty or parish where the offence is committed, and the other moiety to the person who shall discover and prosecute the said offenders. IV. All persons acting any thing by virtue of this Ordinance shall be indemnified by authority of both houses of parliament. Provided always, That the penalties in this Ordinance expressed, shall not extend to acquit any person that shall make, write, print, publish, or sell, or cause to be so done, any Books, &c. that shall contain any seditious, treasonable, or blasphemous matter; but the offenders in that kind shall be liable to such further penalties as, by the laws of this land, are provided, or by authority of parliament shall be adjudged, according to the penalty of such offences."

In pursuance of this Ordinance, Mr. Gilbert Mabbot was appointed Licensor of the Press, upon the recommendation of sir Thomas Fairfax, in his letter of the 20th of this month.

The Parliament resolve to make another Application to the King.] The commons sent up a Vote they had made, That the parliament should, once again, make Application to the King for those things which the houses judge necessary for the welfare and safety of the kingdom. Agreed to by the lords. But this Vote was first strongly debated in the commons, though, upon the question, it was carried by a large majority of 70 against 23.

Oct. 1. Pursuant to this Vote, an order was made to acquaint the Scots Commissioners with it; and that, in order to perfect it, both houses had taken into consideration what things to propound and insist upon for the interest of the kingdom of England, which they hoped to have finished in 20 days; and that then the houses would impart the particulars of them to those Commissioners. In like manner the parliament would join with the Scots in insisting on the same things for the good of their kingdom, which were in the last Propositions, unless the Estates there had agreed, or shall agree, to any alterations: and if any such be made, the houses desired to hear of them within the time limited, that no more time may be lost in sending of them all together to the king.

The parliament also, at this time, passed an Ordinance for disabling Delinquents from bearing any office, or having any voice or vote in the election of any mayor, recorder, sheriffs, aldermen, &c. in any city, borough, or town corporate, universities, or other place in the kingdom of England or dominion of Wales.

Oct. 8. Information was given to the lords, That whereas divers Ordinances had passed both houses of parliament for the regulating the university of Oxford, and they had granted a commission, under the great seal of England, for that purpose; yet Dr. Fell took the boldness upon him to execute the vice-chancellor's place, disobeying all Ordinances and powers of the parliament; speaking insolent words against them; wondering what great seal it is the commission was sealed with, and questioning how the parliament came by a great seal. Whereupon the lords declared the said Dr. Fell to be no vice-chancellor of that University, and ordered that he should be sent for as a delinquent, to answer the same at the bar of that house.

A Day appointed for the Trial of the seven Peers impeached by the Commons.] Oct. 14. All this while the Impeachment of the house of commons against the seven Lords had laid dormant in that house, and no farther notice is taken of it in their Journals, than what is before given; till this day we find that a Message from the commons was sent up, declaring, "That having long since brought up an Impeachment of High Treason, against James earl of Suffolk, Theophilus earl of Lincoln, James earl of Middlesex, George lord Berkely, Francis lord Willoughby, John lord Hunsdon, and William lord Maynard, they desire their lordships would please to appoint a time when the house of commons should bring up their Proofs against them." The Answer was, That the lords appoint that day fortnight for the purpose.

A Call of both Houses.] Oct. 15. The lords ordered, That such of their Members as were within 20 miles of London, should be summoned to attend the house the 19th instant; and those lords, which were further off, to attend on that day fortnight; their Answers to be returned to the house; and all such lords as were then in town not to be absent without sufficient excuse be made for them. The commons had a Call of their house some days before this; when it appearing that about 240 of their members were absent*, a fine of 20l.

a-piece was set upon those whose excuses were not allowed: a second Call was ordered, and the members to be summoned.

Oct. 15. The lords having, for several days, debated the new Propositions to be sent to the King; this day they were perfected, and all the separate Articles of them agreed to by that house. The commons had several divisions on different points in these Propositions; particularly, Oct. 13, no less than three on the single Article of limiting the time of the Settlement of Presbyterian church-government in England. The latter of which, on the question, Whether it should be for 7 years? was carried in the negative, by 41 against 33. It was then resolved, That the time should be to the end of the next session of parliament after the end of this. They sent this day also to let the commons know it was their opinion a committee of both houses should be appointed, to join with the Commissioners of Scotland, to carry the Propositions to the king; to enforce, by reasons and arguments, the justness and necessity of his majesty's giving his consent unto them; and, humbly, to desire and insist upon his positive Answer and consent, and to return to the houses within ten days.

Nov. 3. The commons, according to order, had a second Call of their house; but, before it, the question was put, Whether such members as did not appear at the Call, and were not excused, should forfeit 20*l*. it passed in the negative, 152 against 112, in all 264, the largest number we have noted for some years; though on a division the very next day, the numbers were only 43 against 41.

A Letter to the Parliament from the Scots Commissioners, pressing for a Personal Treaty with the King.] Nov. 6. A Letter from the Scots Commissioners, to the Speaker of the house of commons, was read:*

"Sir; As upon the removal of his majesty from Holdenby, against his will, by a party of the army under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, we expressed our sense, and the resentment of the kingdom of Scotland, of that violent action: so the Committee of Estates of the parliament of Scotland, finding that his majesty is still kept within the power of that Army, thought themselves bound to endeavour to know the certainty of his condition. In obedience to their commands we applied ourselves to his majesty, that from himself we might know the truth thereof; who was pleased to shew us his usage ever since he came from Newcastle; but for his present condition, he really professeth he cannot but refer us to know it from the two houses of parliament and the army.—Both houses, by many professions and engagements, have declared to the kingdom of Scotland that they would take care of the preservation of his person, his just power and greatness, which both kingdoms have sworn not to diminish; and the parliament of Scotland, upon the king's going to Holdenby, did declare against all harm, prejudice, injury, or violence to be done to his royal person. Therefore in pursuance of the trust committed to us, we make this address to the honourable houses; conceiving it needless to apply ourselves to the army, who, we suppose, are or ought to be under their command; desiring to know from them the certainty of his majesty's condition; and the rather, for that we are informed there are intentions in the army for removing him from Hampton-Court.—The kingdom of Scotland finding that their stability and happiness doth so much depend upon the safety and preservation of his majesty's royal person: and being resolved that no alteration of affairs shall ever separate them from the duty and allegiance they owe unto his majesty, nor from their constant resolution to live in all loyalty and obedience under his government, have often shewn their earnest desires, and contributed their utmost endeavours, towards the composure of these unhappy differences: and the houses of parliament having, by their Votes of the 28th Oct. last, intimated unto us their resolution to apply themselves to his majesty, and that they are preparing Propositions to be tendered to him; we desire that they may be expedited and communicated to us, that, according to our many engagements and relations, there may still be a conjunction of councils in those things that are for the common peace and joint interest of both kingdoms.—And for the better asserting them, for clearing of his majesty's doubts, and for giving and receiving mutual satisfaction, we do desire, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, that there may be a Personal Treaty with his majesty, as the best and readiest means to obtain the joint desires of both kingdoms; and, for that effect, that the king might be invited to come to London, with the honour, freedom,

* "No men," observes lord Clarendon, "were fuller of professions of duty, and a resolution to run all hazards, then the Scottish Commissioners, who, from the time they had delivered up the King, resided at London with their usual confidence, and loudly complained of the presumption of the Army in seizing upon the person of the King; insinuated themselves to all those who were thought to be most constant, and inseparable from the interest of the crown, with passionate undertaking that their whole nation would be united, to a man, in any enterprise for his service. And now, from the time his majesty came to Hampton-Court, they came to him with as much presumption as if they had carried him to Edinburgh; which was the more notorious, and was thought to signify the more, because their persons were known to be most odious to all the great officers in the Army, and to those who now governed in the Parliament." Vol. 5. p. 71.

and respect due to his majesty; or at least remain at Hampton-Court, and not to be under the power and restraint of the soldiers, where both kingdoms may make their free applications to him without any danger of such stop or affront as hath been already committed against a commissioner of Scotland, for which no reparation hath been yet made, and that his majesty be no more carried about with the army at their pleasure. These we conceive to be the most probable and effectual means for attaining a happy Peace, and settling of Religion, restoring his majesty to his just Rights, and continuing and strengthening a good understanding betwixt these kingdoms, which are most earnestly desired by the kingdom of Scotland; and shall be constantly and faithfully endeavoured by Your, &c. Loudon, Lauderdale, Cha. Erskine, H. Kennedy, Rob. Barclay. Worcester House, Nov. 5."

The lords ordered that this Letter should be referred to a committee of their house, to consider of an Answer to it; and to send to the commons to desire they would appoint a proportionable number of their members to join with them therein.

Nov. 9. According to former Order, the house of lords was called over; and the gentleman-usher gave an account that all the lords, then absent, had notice given to attend the house according to order: on which it was agreed to set a Fine of 100*l.* on each of them that had been summoned and did not appear, unless some affidavit was made that they were not able to attend by reason of ill health. The aforesaid Fine to be estreated in the Exchequer, unless cause be shewn to the contrary, within a week. But, amongst all the peers, there was only the lord Herbert of Cherbury fined; and he making his excuse next day, that his ill state of health would not permit him to attend the service of the house, the Fine was remitted, and he had longer time given him; as there was to the rest of the absentees, which were no more than four lords, some to a longer and others to a shorter date.

Nov. 10. On this day it was that the commons sent up the Preamble to the Propositions finally concluded, which was read in these words: "The lords and commons assembled in parliament do declare, That the king of England, for the time being, is bound in justice, and by the duty of his office, to give his assent to all such laws as, by the lords and commons in parliament, shall be adjudged to be for the good of the kingdom, and by them tendered unto him for his assent; and, in pursuance thereof, do offer the ensuing Propositions to his majesty, to be made laws, for a present settling of a well-grounded Peace."

The King escapes from Hampton-Court.]

Nov. 12. This day both houses were alarmed with intelligence from the lord Montague, That the King had escaped the night before from Hampton-court; and that the following Papers, all of his own hand-writing, were found upon the table in his chamber. And first, was read his majesty's Letter to the lord Montague, one of the parliament's commissioners appointed to attend him.

"Hampton-Court, Nov. 11, 1647.

"Montague; First I do hereby give you, and the rest of your fellows, thanks for the civilities and good conversation that I have had from you. Next I command you to send this my Message, which you will find upon my table, to the two houses of parliament; and likewise to give a copy of it to col. Whaley, to be sent to the general. Likewise I desire you to send all my saddle-horses to my son the duke of York; as for what concerns the resolution I have taken, my declaratory Message says so much that I refer you to it; and so I rest, your assured friend, CHARLES R."

The King's Message to the Parliament, on that Occasion.] Next the King's Message was read:

For the SPEAKER of the House of Lords, pro tempore, to be communicated to the Lords and Commons in the Parliament of England, at Westminster, and to the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, and to all my other Subjects, of what degree, condition or calling, soever.

"C. R. Hampton-Court, Nov. 11.

"Liberty being that which in all times hath been, but especially now is, the common theme and desire of all men, common reason shews that kings, less than any, should endure captivity; yet I call God to witness with what patience I have endured a tedious restraint; which, so long as I had any hopes that this sort of my suffering might conduce to the Peace of my kingdoms, or the hindering of more effusion of blood, I did willingly undergo; but now finding, by too certain proofs, that this my continued patience would not only turn to my personal ruin, but likewise be of much more prejudice than furtherance to the public good, I thought I was bound, as well by natural as political obligations, to seek my safety, by retiring myself, for some time, from the public view both of my friends and enemies. And I appeal to all indifferent men to judge, if I have not just cause to free myself from the hands of those who change their principles with their condition, and who are not ashamed openly to intend the destruction of the nobility, by taking away their negative voice, and with whom the Levellers doctrine is rather countenanced than punished: and as for their intentions to my person, their changing and putting more strict guards upon me, with the discharging most of all those servants of mine who formerly they willingly admitted to wait upon me, do sufficiently declare. Nor would I have this my retirement misinterpreted; for I shall earnestly and incessantly endeavour the settling of a safe and well-grounded Peace wherever I am, or shall be; and that, as much as may be, without the effusion of more Christian blood; for which how many times have I desired, pressed to be heard, and yet no ear given to me? And can any reasonable man think that, according to the ordinary course of affairs, there can be a settled Peace without it, or that God will bless those who refuse to hear their own king? Surely no. Nay, I must farther add, that, besides what concerns myself, unless all other chief interests have not only a hearing, but likewise just satisfaction given unto them, (to wit the Presbyterian, Independants, Army, those who have adhered to me, and even the Scots) I say there cannot (I speak not of miracles, it being, in my opinion, a sinful presumption, in such cases, to expect or trust to them) be a safe or lasting peace. Now as I cannot deny but that my personal security is the urgent cause of this my retirement, so I take God to witness, that the public peace is no less before my eyes; and I can find no better way to express this my profession, (I know not what a wiser man may do) than by desiring and urging, that all chief interests may be heard, to the end each may have just satisfaction. As for example; the Army (for the rest though necessary, yet, I suppose, are not difficult to content) ought, in my judgment, to enjoy the liberty of their consciences, and have an act of oblivion or indemnity, which should extend to the rest of my subjects; and that all their arrears should be speedily and duly paid, which I will undertake to do, so I may be heard, and that I be not hindered from using such lawful and honest means as I shall chuse. To conclude: let me be heard with freedom, honour, and safety, and I shall instantly break through this cloud of retirement, and shall shew myself really to be Pater Patriæ."

Then a Letter of the King's to colonel Whaley was read.

"Hampton-Court, Nov. 11, 1647.

"Colonel Whaley; I have been so civilly used by you and major Huntingdon, that I cannot but, by this parting farewell, acknowledge it under my hand; as also to desire the continuance of your courtesy, by your protecting my household stuff and movables of all sorts, which I leave behind me in this house, that they be neither spoiled nor embezzled; only there are three pictures here, which are not mine, which I desire you to restore; to wit, my wife's picture in blue, sitting in a chair, you must send to Mrs. Kirk; my eldest daughter's picture, copied by Belcam, to the countess of Anglesea; and my lady Stanhope's picture to Carew Rawleigh. There is a fourth picture, which I had almost forgot; it is the original of my eldest daughter, (it hangs in the chamber over the board next to the chimney) which you must send to my lady Aubigny. So, being confident that you wish my preservation and restitution, I rest Your Friend, CHARLES R.—P. S. I assure you that it was not the Letter you shewed me to-day that made me take this resolution, nor any advertisement of that kind; but I confess that I am loath to be made a close prisoner, under pretence of securing my life. I had almost forgot to desire you to send the black-grey bitch to the duke of Richmond."

Anonymous Letter to the King advising his Escape.] The Letter to the King above referred to, was read, subscribed only with E. R.

"May it please your majesty; In discharge of my duty, I cannot omit to acquaint you, that my brother was at a meeting last night, with eight or nine of the Agitators; who, in debate of the obstacles which did most hinder the speedy effecting of their designs, did conclude it was your majesty, and so long as your majesty doth live you would be so; and therefore resolved, for the good of the kingdom, to take your life away; and that to that action they were well assured that Mr. Dell and Mr. Peters, two of their preachers, would willingly bear them company; for they had often said to these Agitators, your majesty is but as a dead dog. My prayers are for your majesty's safety, but do too much fear it cannot be whilst you are in those hands. I wish with all my soul that your majesty were at my house in Broad-Street, where I am confident I could keep you private till this storm was over; but beg your majesty's pardon, and shall not presume to offer it as advice; it is only my constant zeal to your service, who am Your majesty's dutiful Subject, E. R."

The Speaker acquainted the house with a Letter he had received from lieutenant-general Cromwell, that the King went last night, with nine horses, over Kingston Bridge.

Ordered, That the King's Letter to the lord Montague, and his majesty's Message, be communicated to the house of commons. The lords also declared that they were fully satisfied that the lord Montague had, with all fidelity and diligence, performed the trust wherein he was employed by both houses, in attending on the king at Hampton-Court; and that this accident of the king's going from Hampton-Court did no way reflect upon his integrity, neither his lordship nor the rest of the commissioners having the command of the guards there.

Nov. 13. Col. Whaley made a Narrative to the lords, concerning his guarding of the King, and the manner of his majesty's Escape from Hampton-Court. Afterwards the Speaker, in the name of the house, gave the colonel this Answer, "That the lords were fully satisfied with his free and ingenuous Relation, and also with his former faithful service, especially with his carriage in this business, for which the house did give him thanks."

"This morning we have heard a report that his majesty is gone from Hampton-Court; therefore we have thought it incumbent on us to desire that both houses would make known to us the certainty thereof, to the end we may be the better enabled to give an account to the kingdom of Scotland; and so we rest, Your, &c."

Another Letter, directed as before, from sir Thomas Fairfax, was read:

“ My lord; This morning col. Whaley hath been with me, and given me an account, as far as yet he understandeth, of all circumstances appearing about the King's going away: all which the commissioners of both houses, as he saith, do know as fully as he; and therefore they being, as he foretelleth me, gone to acquaint the houses therewith, I forbear, for this day, to command his attendance on the houses; especially in regard that there is yet some need of the continuance of his guard and care at Hampton-Court, for the safe keeping of those whom he hath secured, to be examined concerning the King's Escape; about whom I desire the houses would take some Order what should be done with them, for the examination of them or otherwise. I shall to-morrow go to Ware, according to former resolution, to rendezvous the Army, and shall be there until Monday towards night, to receive your commands. Your, &c. T. FAIRFAX. Putney, Nov. 13”

The Commons declare it High Treason to conceal the King's Person.] On the day the first news of the King's Escape came to the house of commons, a question was proposed, That what person soever should harbour or conceal the King's Person, or know of any that did, and shall not reveal it immediately to the Speakers of both houses, should be proceeded against as a traitor to the commonwealth, forfeit his whole estate, and die without mercy. There were two divisions on this question; the first, Whether it should be now put? which was carried by 58 against 48; then the main question being put, it passed in the affirmative, 61 against 50.

Col. Hammond sends Advice of the King's Arrival in the Isle of Wight.] Nov. 15. But the houses were not long in suspense, for this morning, a Letter from col. Hammond, governor of the Isle of Wight, was received by the Speaker, and read in these words:

“ My lord; I hold it my duty to give your lordship an Account of the King's unexpected coming into this Island, and of the manner of it; which was thus: This morning, as I was on the way passing from Carisbrook-Castle to Newport, Mr. Ashburnham and sir John Berkley overtook me; and, after a short discourse, told me, That the King was near, and that he would be with me that night; that he was come from Hampton-Court upon information that there were some intended to destroy his person, and that he could not with safety continue any longer there; and that finding his case thus, he chose rather to put himself in my hands (being a member of the Army, whom, he saith, he would not have left could he have had security to his person) than to go to any other place. Being herewith exceedingly surprized at present, I knew not what course to take; but, upon serious consideration, weighing the great concernment that the person of the king is of, in this juncture of affairs, to the settlement of the Peace of the kingdom, I resolved it my duty to the king, to the parliament, and kingdom, to use the utmost of my endeavours to preserve his person from any such horrid attempt, and to bring him to a place of safety; where he may also be in a capacity of answering the expectation of parliament and kingdom, in agreeing to such things as may extend to the settlement of those great divisions and distractions abounding in every corner thereof. Hereupon I went immediately with them over the water, taking capt. Basket, the captain of Cowes-Castle, with me, and found the king near the water side: and conceiving myself no way able to secure him there, I chose, he desiring it, to bring him over into this Island, where he now is.—My lord, my endeavours, as for my life, shall be to preserve and secure his person. And I humbly desire I may receive the pleasure of the parliament in this great and weighty matter; and that the Lord will direct your councils to his glory and the kingdom's good and peace, shall be my prayer; and my endeavour shall ever be to express myself, in all things in my power, Your, &c. Robert Hammond. Cowes, Nov. 13.”

A committee of both houses was appointed to meet that afternoon, and consider what was fit to be done with the Person of the King, and report the same, that orders might be sent down to col. Hammond accordingly.*

* The following succinct account of the King's Escape from Hampton-Court is given by Mr. Hume: “ Intelligence being daily brought to the King, of menaces thrown out by the Agitators, he began to think of retiring from Hampton-Court, and of putting himself in some place of safety. The guards were doubled upon him: the promiscuous concourse of people restrained: a more jealous care exerted in attending his person: all, under colour of protecting him from danger; but really with a view of making him uneasy in his present situation. Their artifices soon produced the intended effect. Charles, who was naturally apt to be swayed by counsel, and who had not access to any good counsel, took suddenly a resolution of withdrawing himself, tho' without any concerted, at least any rational, scheme for the future disposal of his person. Attended only by sir John Berkeley, Ashburnham, and Leg, (11th Nov.) he privately left Hampton-Court; and his escape was not discovered till near an hour after; when those who entered his chamber found on the table some letters directed to the Parliament, to the General, and to the Officer who had attended him. All night he travelled through the Forest, and arrived next day at Titchfield, a seat of the earl of Southampton's, where the countess dowager resided, a woman of honour, to whom the King knew he might safely intrust his person. Before he arrived at this place, he had gone to the sea-coast; and expressed great anxiety, that a ship which he seemed to look for, had not arrived; and thence Berkeley and Leg, who were not in the secret, conjectured,

General Fairfax's Letter concerning a Mutiny in the Army.] Nov. 16. A Letter from sir Tho. Fairfax was read in the house of lords, addressed to their Speaker:

"My lord; I rendezvoused this day 3 regiments of foot and 4 of horse, viz. of horse, my own regiment, col. Rich's, col. Fleetwood's, and col. Twisleton's; and of foot, my own regiment, col. Pride's, and col. Hammond's. When they appeared all at the place of rendezvous, I tendered to them, and had read at the head of every regiment, this inclosed Paper, which was very acceptable to them, and to which they have given very full and ready concurrence, professing readiness to serve you and the kingdom; which I hope will be constantly and honestly by them performed; and I cannot but attribute great acknowledgment to Almighty God, in making these poor men so unanimous, in such things as I think do, and will, conduce to an happy settlement of this poor kingdom.—They profess likewise an absolute submission and conformity to the antient discipline of the Army, by which I hope to order it to your satisfaction; there came thither also two regiments without orders, viz. col. Harrison's, of horse; and col. Lilburne's, of foot. These two had been very much abused and deluded by the agents who had their intercourses at London, and were so far prevailed withal that, when they came into the field, that his intention was to transport himself beyond sea.—The King could not hope to remain long concealed at Titchfield: what measure should next be embraced was the question. In the neighbourhood lay the Isle of Wight, of which Hammond was Governor. This man was intirely dependent on Cromwell. At his recommendation he had married a daughter of the famous Hampden, who, during his life-time, had been an intimate friend of Cromwell's, and whose memory was ever respected by him. These circumstances were very unfavourable; yet, because the Governor was nephew to Dr. Hammond, the king's favourite Chaplain, and had acquired a good character in the Army, it was thought proper to have recourse to him, in the present exigence, when no other rational expedient could be thought of. Ashburnham and Berkeley were dispatched to the island. They had orders not to inform Hammond of the place where the king was concealed, till they had at first obtained a promise from him not to deliver up his majesty, though the parliament and army should require him; but to restore him to his liberty, if he could not protect him. This promise, it is evident, would have been a very slender security: yet even without executing it, Ashburnham, imprudently, if not treacherously, brought Hammond to Titchfield; and the king was obliged to put himself in his hands, and to attend him to Carisbroke-Castle in the Isle of Wight, where, though received with great demonstrations of respect and duty, he was in reality a prisoner."

they brought with them, in their hats, a Paper commonly called 'The Agreement of the People,' being very much inflamed towards Mutiny and Disobedience; but truly I perceived the men were merely cozened and abused with fair pretences of those men which acted in the London councils; for col. Harrison's regiment was no sooner informed of their error, but, with a great deal of readiness and chearfulness, they submitted to me, expressing the same affection and resolution of obedience with other regiments; and I believe you will have a very good account of them for time to come. As for col. Lilburne's, they were put into those extremities of discontent, that they had drawn away almost all their officers; and came in marching up near to the rendezvous, contrary to the orders, the chiefest officer with them being a capt. lieut. whom I have secured on purpose to try him at a council of war; and, for example sake, drew out divers of the Mutincers, three whereof were presently tried and condemned to death; and, by lot, one of them was shot to death at the head of the regiment, and there are more in hold to be tried. I do find the same regiment likewise very sensible of their error, and testifying much seeming conformity to commands; so that I doubt not but I shall be able to give you a good account of that regiment also. And indeed I do see that the London agents have been the great authors of these irregularities, and wish some of better quality have not been their abettors.—Major Scot came to the rendezvous, and did carry himself very factiously; not only testifying his own discontent, but stirring up others also to the same; whereupon I desired him to withdraw out of the field, and repair to the parliament; and commanded an officer to attend him to the house of commons.—I thought it my duty to give your lordships this further account, that colonel Rainsborough, with some others, tendered this inclosed Petition, together with the 'People's Agreement' annexed therunto. And, by what hands I yet know not fully, very many copies of the same Agreement were dispersed among the soldiers, thereby to engage them; but, blessed be God, all proved ineffectual; and, I may repeat it once again, I never yet, upon any rendezvous, found men better composed and better satisfied at parting than these 9 regiments were; and I trust in God, if a just care be taken to answer their reasonable desires, they will still so continue: but give me leave to say, that, I hope, out of a good affection to you and this poor Kingdom, it will be your lordships glory and honour to make such use of this mercy, as that all the world may see that which I know you intend, to wit, a speedy Settlement of those things that I was bold to present to the house of commons in my late addresses, and the easing of this poor kingdom of free Quarter; by providing future Pay, that so no free Quarter be taken, nor the soldiers put to shifts, nor I be unable to uphold the discipline of the Army; that they may be satisfied in their arrears, according to the former Desires, and the Act of Indemnity made full, and those other things concerning the soldiers in this Paper performed.—I shall very much rejoice in the next place, that you will please to anticipate all our Desires in those things which concern the Settlement of the Kingdom; which, though they do not move so properly from us as soldiers, yet, as Englishmen, who have engaged ourselves by our several Declarations to the kingdom, we cannot but continue our humble and earnest desires that they may be settled to satisfaction; and we hope it will not be any regret to you that we become your remembrancers therein; and, my lord, believe me, you will find expedition will be the life of all the things which concern the soldiers and the kingdom.—We shall have our other rendezvous with what convenience may be, of the issue of which you shall receive a speedy account. Having troubled you thus much, I rest, Your, &c. T. FAIRFAX. Hertford, Nov. 15."

To his Excellency Sir THO. FAIRFAX, our noble General; The Humble PETITION of many Officers and Soldiers under his Command,

"Sheweth; That, in judgment and conscience, we engaged in war against the King under your excellency's command, to preserve and vindicate the freedom of our native countries, and of the parliament in order thereunto: That by the blessing of God, all those our enemies are fallen or fled before us; that, for the same ends, for our rights, and for our services, we were forced to hazard ourselves in disputing the parliament's commands; and those our opposers have likewise been subdued: That the countries have petitioned your excellency to procure the long expected Settlement of their Freedoms: That we have waited many months for the securing to us, and all the freeborn people, their native Rights, and for our Indemnity and Arrears as soldiers; and our hearts bleed to see our country consume under continued distractions and heavy oppressions: That we see no hope of Indemnity for us and our assistants, nor of settling the foundations of Freedom, but by entering into this Agreement * which we herewith offer unto your excellency, desiring your concurrences therein: That we have seen and felt the sad consequences of being divided and scattered, before our native Freedoms were settled, and our Arrears secured, and such a way established for constant Pay that we may know where to receive it monthly without fail: That we are bound in conscience, from the sense of our duty to our native country, and in mercy to ourselves, to keep together with our swords in our hands, to maintain these our Freedoms, for which the parliament first invited us to take arms; to see our Arrears and Pay secured, and our dear country freed from these intolerable burdens. May it therefore please your excellency to go on, in owning and leading us in maintenance of this our cause, to the righteousness whereof God hath born such clear witness; and in the prosecution of these things, we humbly desire to live and die under your excellency's conduct."

After reading all these Papers, the lords resolved to have a present conference with the commons thereupon. A committee being appointed accordingly, the earl of Northumberland reported the Heads to be offered at the conference; which, being read and considered, were approved of as follows, viz. 1. "That a Letter of thanks be written to the General from both houses, desiring the continuance of his care to see exemplary justice done upon those who shall have raised or shall endeavour to raise Mutinies, and factiously to subvert the order and good government of the Army; and a committee of both houses to prepare the same. 2. That a speedy course may be taken to give some present satisfaction to the Army in their Pay, and such a Settlement of Pay to them for the future, that the kingdom may not continue under the burden of free Quarter, nor the soldiers be put to shifts. 3. That some real satisfaction may be given to the Army in respect of their Arrears; and the Act of Indemnity to be made full. 4. That there may be a committee of both houses appointed to examine the proceedings of those London agents, mentioned in the General's letter, and all others who are known, or shall justly be suspected, to have been the authors and abettors of these seditious irregularities, whereupon some exemplary justice may be done: and because col. Rainsborough and major Scot, members of the house of commons, are named in the General's letter to have acted in this business, to desire that house to take it into their care so to proceed with them, as may conduce to the safety of this kingdom, and the preservation of this present government. 5. That col. Rainsborough, who is named in the general's letter to have been active, with others, at this rendezvous, may not be suffered to go to sea till this business be fully examined. 6. That for the satisfaction of the kingdom and army, and to discharge ourselves of the duty and trust that lies upon both houses, a speedy course may be taken and prosecuted to quiet the present distractions, and to settle the Peace of the kingdoms."

Resolutions of both Houses relating to the Safety of the King's Person.] A message was brought up from the commons with the following Resolutions, to all which the lords gave their concurrence. 1. "That the securest place for the king's residence, during the time the houses shall think fit to continue him in the Isle of Wight, is Carisbrook Castle. 2. That no person who hath been in arms or assisted in this unnatural war against the parliament, be permitted to come or remain in the said isle during the King's residence there, unless they be inhabitants of the isle, and have compounded with the parliament. 3. That no person who hath been in arms, or assisted in this unnatural war against the parliament, shall be permitted to come into the king's presence, or into any fort or castle in the said isle, during the king's residence there, although he be an inhabitant, and hath compounded with the parliament. 4. That no stranger, or person of a foreign nation, shall be permitted to come into the king's presence without directions of both houses of parliament, except such as have warrant from the parliament of Scotland, or from the committee of that parliament thereunto authorised, and are not disabled by the Propositions agreed on by both kingdoms. 5. That a sufficient guard be appointed by col. Hammond, governor of the said isle, for securing the King's Person from any violence, and preventing his departing the said isle without the directions of both houses. 6. That the King's household at Hampton-Court be forthwith dissolved."

* In the margin of the Lords Journals is this Entry, "The People's Engagement was annexed to this Petition, with these words printed on the back side, in Capital Letters, viz. "ENGLAND'S FREEDOM, SOLDIER'S RIGHTS." But we find no copy of it there, nor in any of the Collections.

Remonstrance from General Fairfax touching the late Mutiny in the Army.] Nov. 17. The following Remonstrance from the General was read:

A REMONSTRANCE from his Excellency Sir THO. FAIRFAX and his Council of War, concerning the late Discontent and Distraction in the Army; with his Excellency's Declaration of himself, and Expectation from the Army thereupon, for the future uniting of the Army.

"That ever since the Engagement of the Army at Newmarket-Heath, his excellency, with the General Officers and General Council of the Army, (to which that Engagement refers) have been doing their duty and best endeavour for the good of the Army and kingdom, according to the ends of that Engagement, and the Declarations and other Papers that have since passed from the Army.—And in this, according to their consciences and the best of their understandings, they have done the utmost they could, without present destruction to the parliament; which, in their opinions, would inevitably have put the kingdom into blood and confusion, and so both the Army and kingdom into an incapacity, or past all rational hopes, of obtaining or enjoying that satisfaction or security for which the Engagement was entered into; and if they have neglected any thing wherein they might have done better, they have been ready, as still they are, to be convinced thereof, and to amend the default, and to hearken to what any man would soberly offer for that purpose, or to lead them to any thing better.—That while they have been thus doing their duty, (besides many other interruptions or diversions by the designs and workings of enemies) they have of late found the greatest interruption to their proceedings by a few men, members of the Army; who, without any authority or just call thereunto that we know of, assuming the name of Agents for several regiments, have, for what ends we know not, taken upon them to act as a divided party from the said Council and Army; and associating themselves with, or rather (as we have just cause to believe) given themselves up to be acted or guided by divers private persons that are not of the Army, have endeavoured, by various falsehoods and scandals, raised and divulged in print and otherwise, against the General, the General Officers, and Council of the Army, to possess the army and kingdom with jealousies of them, and prejudices against them; as if they had fallen from their principles, had broke all their Engagements and Declarations, and thereby forfeited their trust, and were in their whole proceedings false and treacherous, both to the army and kingdoms: and, by these and other practices, the said agents and their associates have laboured to make parties and factions in the Army, to raise discontents, mutinies, and disorders therein, to divide the soldiers from the officers, and both officers and soldiers among themselves, and to withdraw several parts of the Army from their duty and obedience to the General's orders, and that in things most necessary for the safety of the army and kingdom.—And thus, while they causelessly cry out against breach of Engagements, and dividing the Army, they themselves have made, or endeavoured to make, the greatest breaches of their Engagements, and greatest dividing of the army that can be; a dividing most truly contrary to the Engagement; a dividing which is as bad and destructive as disbanding; even the dissolution of all that order, combination, and government which is the essence of an Army; and, under false and delusive pretences that the Engagements have been broken, they have endeavoured really to loosen and draw the Army off from its former engagements, and to draw it into new engagements, different from, and, in some things, destructive to, the former; and have thus endangered the greatest forfeiture of the faith and honour of the Army that ever it incurred.—And whilst they cry out there is nothing done, they themselves have made the greatest obstructions to the doing of any good to the army or kingdom, both in the hinderance and delays to our proceedings, and the expence of time which their workings have occasioned, either to have satisfied them if it had been possible, or else to salve and quiet these discontents and distractions which they have raised in the Army; and also by the occasions which the parliament and kingdom, yea even our best friends in both, have thus received, to discourage them from compliance with, or confidence in, an army so uncertain, so unsettled, so divided.—For these causes the General hath thought fit to rendezvous the Army, or such parts of it as are not fixed upon necessary duty elsewhere; and having, with the advice of his general Council, sent to the parliament more importunately than before, for speedy satisfaction to the Army in their just desires, especially in points of provision, for constant Pay to avoid free Quarter, and of security for Arrears, thought it best, with the same advice, to dismiss most of the officers and Agitators from the head quarters for a fortnight unto their respective regiments, to satisfy and compose those discontents and divisions which have been thus raised in them; and for ease to the country and accommodation to the soldiery, with respect to the season of the year, have thought fit to contract the Quarters of the Army in 3 brigades, and to draw them to 3 several rendezvouses, not far from each other, and this in order to one general rendezvous, if there should be any occasion; and in this the several regiments of horse and foot have been appointed to constant quarters in order to those several rendezvouses, taking them directly in order as their several quarters lay before, without any other respect or consideration; but even these things the pretended agents and their associates have laboured to pervert, and make advantage of to the aforesaid ends of discontent and distraction, and to represent the same to the several regiments, as done in pursuance of the same treacherous councils and designs which they had before suggested; and what good they could not deny to be in the things, they assume to themselves as gained by their procurement, and so greedily catch at the sole credit of it, as if the General and his Council (but for them) had not done it; and, by Letters or Messages contradicting the General's Orders, they have, under such scandalous pretences, laboured to draw divers regiments from the quarters and rendezvous to which they were ordered unto the first rendezvous near Ware, in a disorderly and confused manner, to the oppression of the country and disaccommodation (if not quarrelling and distraction of the soldiery) in quartering.—That, without redress of these Abuses and Disorders, his excellency cannot, nor will, any longer undergo or undertake further to discharge his present trust to the parliament, the army and kingdom: and though he is far above any such low thoughts as to court or woo the Army to continue him their general; yet, to discharge himself to the utmost, and to bring the business to a certain and clear issue, his excellency doth now declare, That he is yet willing to adhere to, and to conduct, and live and die with, the Army, in the lawful prosecution of these things following, First for the Soldiery: 1. To obtain present provision for constant Pay, while continued, to enable them to discharge Quarters. 2. The present stating of Accounts, and Security for Arrears; with an effectual and speedy course to raise moneys thereupon. 3.

Sufficient Indemnity, and commissioners in every county for that purpose. 4. Provision for maimed soldiers, and the widows and orphans of men slain in the service; and that in a certain and more honourable way, with commissioners in every county for that purpose. 5. Provision for Freedom from pressing, according to the first Petition of the Army. 6. Provision for Freedom of Apprentices that have served in this war, with the penalty upon masters refusing to give it.—Secondly, For the Kingdom: A period to be set for this present Parliament, to end so soon as may be with safety; and provision thereunto to be made for future parliaments, for the certainty of their meeting, sitting, and ending, and for the freedom and equality of elections thereto; to render the house of commons, as near as may be, an equal Representative of the People that are to elect. And, according to the Representation of the Army of June 14th, to leave other things to, and acquiesce in, the determinations of the parliament; but to remind the parliament of, and mediate with them for, redress of the common Grievances of the people, and all other things that the Army have declared their Desires for. That upon his excellency's continued conjunction in these things, he expects that, for the particular circumstances of them, the Army shall, according to their aforesaid first Engagement, acquiesce in what shall be agreed unto by the General Council of the Army, to which that Engagement refers; and for the matter of ordering, conduct, and government of the Army, that every member of it shall be observant of, and subject to, his excellency, his Council of War, and every one to his superior officers, according to the discipline of war; for assurance whereof he expects that as many as are satisfied herewith, and agree hereunto, do severally subscribe to what is here under-written for that purpose:

‘We the Officers and Soldiers of regiment of , whose names are hereunto subscribed, do hereby declare that we are satisfied in his excellency the General's continued conjunction with the Army, in the lawful prosecution of the things heretofore declared to be prosecuted for the Soldiery and Kingdom respectively; and, for the particular circumstances of them, we shall, according to the general Engagement of the Army above-mentioned, acquiesce in what shall be agreed unto by the General Council of the Army, to which that Engagement refers; and for the matter of Ordering, Conduct, and Government of the Army, we shall be observant of, and subject to, his excellency and his Council of War, and every one of us to our superior officers in this regiment and the Army, according to the discipline of war.”—Signed by the appointment of his excellency sir Thomas Fairfax and his Council of War, Jo. Rushworth, Secretary. Hertford, Nov. 14.”

This Remonstrance was ordered to be sent down to the commons.

The King's Message from the Isle of Wight.]

This day the following Message was received, from the King, but the consideration of it was deferred to the next day. And it was then only ordered to be sent down to the commons, and afterwards, by a committee, to be communicated to the Scots commissioners according to the direction of it. This Message from the King is not entered in the Journals; a slight put upon his majesty of which we have not hitherto found an instance. It is however printed in Royston's edition of the King's Works, and also in Mr. Rushworth's Collections. But we find nothing done upon it in either house.

To the SPEAKER of the House of PEERS pro tempore, to be communicated to the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and to the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland. From the Isle of Wight, Nov. 1647.

"C. R. His majesty is confident that, before this time, his two houses of parliament have received the Message which he left behind him at Hampton-Court the 11th of this month; by which they will have understood the Reasons which enforced him to go from thence, as likewise his constant endeavours for the settling of a safe and well-grounded Peace wheresoever he should be; and being now in a place where he conceives himself to be at much more freedom and security than formerly, he thinks it necessary (not only for making good of his own professions, but also for the speedy procuring of a Peace in these languishing and distressed kingdoms) at this time to offer such grounds to his two houses for that effect, which, upon due examination of all interests, may best conduce thereunto.—And because Religion is the best and chiefest foundation of Peace, his majesty will begin with that particular. That for the abolishing Archbishops, Bishops, &c. his majesty clearly professeth that he cannot give his consent thereunto, both in relation as he is a Christian and a King: for the first, he avows that he is satisfied in his judgment that this order was placed in the Church by the Apostles themselves; and, ever since their time, hath continued in all Christian churches throughout the world until this last century of years; and in this church, in all times of change and reformation, it hath been upheld by the wisdom of his ancestors, as the great preserver of doctrine, discipline, and order in the service of God. As a King, at his coronation, he hath not only taken a solemn Oath to maintain this Order, but his majesty and his predecessors, in their confirmations of the Great Charter, have inseparably woven the Rights of the Church into the Liberties of the rest of the subjects; and yet he is willing it be provided that the particular Bishops perform the several duties of their callings, both by their personal residence and frequent preaching in their dioceses, as also that they exercise no Act of Jurisdiction or Ordination, without the consent of their

presbyters; and will consent that their powers in all things be so limited, that they be not grievous to tender consciences: wherefore since his majesty is willing to give ease to the consciences of others, he sees no reason why he alone, and those of his judgment, should be pressed to a violation of theirs. Nor can his majesty consent to the Alienation of Church Lands, because it cannot be denied to be a sin of the highest sacrilege; as also, that it subverts the intentions of so many pious donors, who have laid a heavy curse upon all such prophane violations, which his majesty is very unwilling to undergo; and besides the matter of conscience, his majesty believes it to be a prejudice to the public good, many of his subjects having the benefit of renewing leases at much easier rates, than if those possessions were in the hands of private men; not omitting the discouragement which it will be to all learning and industry, when such eminent rewards shall be taken away, which now lie open to the children of the meanest persons.—Yet his majesty, considering the great present distempers concerning Church Discipline, and that the Presbyterian government is now in practice; his majesty, to eschew confusion as much as may be, and for the satisfaction of his two houses, is content that the same government be legally permitted to stand, in the same condition it now is, for 3 years: provided, that his majesty and those of his judgment (or any other who cannot in conscience submit thereunto) be not obliged to comply with the Presbyterian government; but have free practice of their own profession, without receiving any prejudice thereby; and that a free consultation and debate be had with the Divines at Westminster, (20 of his majesty's nomination being added unto them) whereby it may be determined by his majesty and the two houses, how the Church-Government after the said time shall be settled, (or sooner, if differences may be agreed) as is most agreeable to the Word of God; with full liberty to all those who shall differ, upon conscientious grounds, from that Settlement; always provided, that nothing aforesaid be understood to tolerate those of the Popish profession, nor the exempting of any Popish Recusant from the penalties of the laws, or to tolerate the public profession of Atheism or Blasphemy, contrary to the doctrine of the Apostles, Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds; they having been received by, and had in reverence of, all the Christian Churches, and more particularly by this of England, ever since the Reformation.—Next, the Militia being that right, which is inseparably and undoubtedly inherent in the crown, by the laws of this nation, and that which former parliaments, as likewise this, have acknowledged so to be; his majesty cannot so much wrong that trust which the laws of God and this land hath annexed to the crown, for the protection and security of his people, as to divest himself and successors of the Power of the Sword; yet, to give an infallible evidence of his desire to secure the performance of such agreements as shall be made in order to a Peace, his majesty will consent to an act of parliament, that the whole power of the Militia, both by sea and land, for and during his whole reign, shall be ordered and disposed by his two houses of parliament, or by such persons as they shall appoint, with powers limited for suppressing of forces within this kingdom, to the disturbance of the public peace, and against foreign invasion; and that they shall have power, during his said reign, to raise money for the purposes aforesaid; and that neither his majesty that now is, or any other (by any authority derived only from him) shall execute any of the said powers during his majesty's said reign, but such as shall act by the consent and approbation of the two houses of parliament; nevertheless his majesty intends that all Patents, Commissions, and other acts concerning the Militia, be made and acted as formerly; and that after his majesty's reign, all the power of the Militia shall return entirely to the crown, as it was in the times of queen Elizabeth and king James of blessed memory.—After this head of the Militia, the consideration of the Arrears due to the Army is not improper to follow; for the payment whereof, and the ease of his people, his majesty is willing to concur in any thing that can be done without the violation of his conscience and honour: wherefore, if his two houses shall consent to remit unto him such Benefit out of Sequestrations from Michaelmas last, and out of Compositions that shall be made before the concluding of the Peace, and the Arrears of such as have been already made, the Assistance of the Clergy, and the Arrears of such rents of his own revenue as his two houses shall not have received before the concluding of the Peace, his majesty will undertake, within the space of 18 months, the payment of 400,000*l.* for the satisfaction of the Army: and if those means shall not be sufficient, his majesty intends to give way to the Sale of Forest Lands for that purpose, this being the public Debt, which, in his majesty's judgment, is first to be satisfied; and for other public debts already contracted upon Church-Lands, or any other Engagements, his majesty will give his consent to such act or acts for raising of Monies for payment thereof as both houses shall hereafter agree upon, so as they be equally laid, whereby his people (already too heavily burdened by these late distempers) may have no more pressures upon them than this absolute necessity requires: and for the further securing all fears, his majesty will consent, that an act of parliament be passed for the disposing of the great Offices of State, and naming of Privy Counsellors, for the whole term of his reign, by the two houses of parliament, their patents and commissions being taken from his majesty, and after to return to the crown, as is expressed in the Articles of the Militia. For the Court of Wards and Liveries; his majesty very well knows the consequence of taking that away, by turning of all tenures into common soccage, as well in point of revenue to the crown, as in the protection of many of his subjects, being infants: nevertheless, if the continuance thereof seem grievous to his subjects, rather than he will fail on his part in giving satisfaction, he will consent to an act for taking of it away, so as a full recompence be settled upon his majesty and his successors in perpetuity, and that the Arrears now due be reserved unto him towards the payment of the Arrears of the Army.—And that the memory of these late distractions may be wholly wiped away, his majesty will consent to an act of parliament for the suppressing of and making null all Oaths, Declarations, and Proclamations against both or either house of parliament, and of all indictments and other proceedings against any persons for adhering unto them; and his majesty proposeth (as the best expedient to take away all seeds of future differences) that there be an Act of Oblivion to extend to all his subjects.—As for Ireland; the Cessation there is long since determined; but for the future, all other things being fully agreed, his majesty will give full satisfaction to his houses concerning that kingdom.—And although his majesty cannot consent, in honour and justice, to void all his own Grants and Acts passed under his Great Seal since the 22d of May, 1642, or to the confirming of all Acts and Grants passed under that made by the two houses; yet his majesty is confident that, upon perusal of particulars, he shall give full satisfaction to his two houses, to what may be reasonably desired in that particular.—And now his majesty conceives that, by these his Offers, (which he is ready to make good upon the Settlement of a Peace) he hath clearly manifested his intentions to give full security and satisfaction to all interests, for what can justly be desired in order to the future happiness of his people. And for the perfecting of these concessions, as also for such other things as may be proposed by the two houses, and for such just and reasonable demands as his majesty shall find necessary to propose on his part, he earnestly desires a Personal Treaty at London with his two houses, in honour, freedom, and safety; it being, in his judgment, the most proper, and indeed only, means to a firm and settled Peace, and impossible without it to reconcile former, or avoid future, misunderstandings.—All these things being by treaty perfected, his majesty believes his two houses will think it reasonable that the Proposals of the Army concerning the Succession of Parliaments and their due Elections, should be taken into consideration.—As for what concerns the kingdom of Scotland, his majesty will very readily apply himself to give all reasonable satisfaction, when the desires of the two houses of parliament on their behalf, or of the Commissioners of that kingdom, or of both joined together, shall be made known unto him."

The Scots Commissioners refuse their Assent to the Propositions of Peace.] Nov. 22. The Scots Commissioners had not yet given their Assent to the Propositions to be sent to the King, on account of the houses not giving them any satisfaction, in regard of the indignities and affronts they had complained of. The lords, therefore, this day, took their letter of the 17th into consideration; and, after debate, appointed a committee to draw up an Answer to it, according to the sense of that house. Soon after this Answer was read and approved of, and was ordered to be sent down to the commons for their approbation.

Nov. 25. The Scots still refusing to give their Assent to the Propositions, a committee of lords and commons were sent to press them to it. This day it was reported to the lords, from that committee, that they had been with the Scots Commissioners, and had received, for Answer, the following Paper:

"We are commanded by the Committee of Estates of the parliament of Scotland, to press an Answer to our former Papers, which we have daily expected; and do again, with all earnestness, desire a Personal Treaty with his majesty, it being, in our judgments, a readier way to compose all differences, than the sending of these Propositions, wherein there are such great and essential differences from what was formerly agreed on by both kingdoms. And, to the end there may be no retardment on our part, for pursuance of all good means which may procure a happy Peace, we desire that we may have a free conference with a full committee of both houses, where we shall endeavour to give satisfaction of the expediency of our desires: and shall also shew the difference of our judgments from these Propositions, that, according to the Treaty, there may be, with advice and consent of both nations, a speedy agreement in that which is the foundation of settling religion, with the peace and safety of both kingdoms."

The lords did not then give any Answer to this Remonstrance, but appointed a committee to consider of such Propositions to be sent to the king as they conceived to be absolutely necessary for their present security.

The Lords resolve upon 4 Propositions, for present Security, to be offered to the King; and a Personal Treaty for the rest.] This day the lords sent the following Message to the commons: "That they, having seriously considered the dangers and mischiefs that may be brought upon the kingdom by the endeavours of those Agents that have formerly and still do continue to use their interest for the subverting of the present established government of the kingdom, do desire that the Committee formerly appointed for the examination of that business, may have power to frame a Declaration, setting forth the dangerous consequences that may come to the whole kingdom, if not prevented: and likewise to put them into a way for a present punishment and suppression of such persons, or writing of books, or procuring subscriptions to Petitions, or be any other way active in promoting so destructive a design."—The report from the committee on what Propositions were now absolutely necessary for present Security, was, That they think the Propositions for the Militia, with those for the King's Declarations, as also that Proposition concerning Titles and Honours, with another about Power to adjourn this Parliament as both houses should agree, may be most necessary to insist upon. These being approved on by the house, the lords thought fit to have a conference, the next day, with the commons, to acquaint them with these matters, and give them Reasons for so doing.

Nov. 26. A conference was held between the two houses, at which the lords offered the following Reasons: "That the King having so often desired to be heard, and the commissioners of Scotland so often pressing for a Personal Treaty, the kingdom also long expecting to be freed of their great pressures and burthens, by some speedy settlement of the government; they desired that the two houses might do that which should discharge their duty, in respect of the safety of both kingdom and parliament, and yet not refuse to hear the king in such things as might be subjected unto debate. The lords therefore proposed four Propositions, which they then offered, as most immediately concerning the safety and security of the kingdom and parliament, which being put into Bills, the king might be desired to give his royal assent to; and this being done accordingly, they did next conceive it to be the most satisfactory way, and what was most likely to produce a speedy Settlement of the present Distractions, for the houses to admit of a Personal Treaty upon the rest of the Propositions."

Nov. 27. There was no report made of the result of this conference, nor are the four Propositions yet entered in the Lords Journals; but in those of the commons they are, viz. That concerning the Militia: for recalling the King's Oaths and Declarations: concerning the Peers made since the Seal was surreptitiously carried away by the then lord-keeper Littleton; and that the houses should have power to adjourn to what place they shall think fit. Which being put to the question, Whether to agree with the lords in their desires concerning these four Propositions? it was carried in the affirmative by 115 against 106. They were afterwards ordered to be put into Bills accordingly.

Order for suppressing of Riots.] Dec. 2. A complaint being made to the lords of a great Disorder committed last night in the Strand, several soldiers making a stop of all coaches, and suffering none to pass unless they would drink the King's Health; an Order was made for the Militia of London and Westminster to take care to suppress such riots, and to apprehend the authors of them; also that the lord mayor, and officers of Westminster should suffer no company in any tavern or alehouse after 9 o'clock at night.

The house of commons had several Petitions presented to them, as the 'Supreme Authority of England,' which they had hitherto discouraged; and this day another coming with the same direction, stiled, 'The humble Petition of many free-born People,' &c. they resolved to give this Answer thereto, without any addition or alteration: "That this house doth declare, That it is the Right of the Subject to petition: and that it is the Right of the parliament to judge of such Petitions when they are presented: That all persons are bound to acquiesce in the judgment of the parliament, upon Petitions presented; and that this house doth expect the same from the petitioners."

Petitions against Free Quarter.] Dec. 7. Several Petitions were presented to both houses, complaining grievously of the heavy burden they endured from free Quarter, and other depredations of the soldiers: which, with great taxes and assessments, made the inhabitants almost ready to sink under them. Both houses put them off with fair speeches and promises; knowing very well it was not in their power to ease them of their burden.*

A Remonstrance presented from General Fairfax and the Council of War, requiring present Pay, &c. for the Army.] This day colonel sir Hardress Waller, and col. Whaley, presented to the house of lords, and after to the commons, the following Remonstrance from the General and Council of War; and in regard, they said, that the business of it was concerning Money to supply the Army, and the constant settling of their Pay, they did expect an Answer.

An Humble REPRESENTATION from his Excellency sir THO. FAIRFAX and the Council of the Army, concerning their past Endeavours, and now final Desires, for putting the Soldiery into constant Pay; for immediately disburdening the Kingdom of free Quarter; the Prevention of any further Increase of Arrears: and in order to the disbanding of Supernumeraries, and other Things concerning the Soldiery.†

* "In these passages," says Whitlocke, "notice might be taken of the strange workings of God, and of the perplexed condition the parliament was then in. The Army, whom they had raised, paid, and commissioned, now mutinying against them; and, with their swords in their hands, controuling and opposing their principals and masters. The city, their old friends, joint actors and constant assistants of the parliament with their lives and fortunes, becoming full of sedition and averseness towards them; questioning their integrity, reproaching and seeking to cast them off."

ers and members of both houses (that had been driven away) were, without blood, restored, and have been ever since secured to sit and attend their duty in parliament; with what patience God hath given us to wait for the resolutions of those things we have insisted on or offered, tending to the future Security of the parliament, the just Satisfaction of the Soldiery, and the ease and Settlement of the Kingdom, we need not use many words to set forth; the expence of above 4 months time in quiet expectation thereof, with so little satisfaction, does sufficiently speak.—As to what fruit we have found in any thing done to any of these ends, we are sorry we can say so little thereof: or that we have occasion to say so much of the delay and neglect of observation thereof, as we are now constrained to do: But whatever these neglects or delays have been, or wherever the fault hath been, we are sure the blame thereof hath been laid upon us almost on all hands; and this is the fruit we have found, from the hands of men, of all our patient waiting hitherto.—It is not unknown what reproaches and scandals of this kind have been cast upon us, and what use and advantage have been made of those delays, thereby to work upon the impatience of the soldiers and country, to incense the country against the Army, and both the army and country against us, as if it had been our fault alone that no more was done; and to what an height of scandal and discontent against us the pretence hereof was driven, or what desperate endeavours have been thereupon made to withdraw the soldiers from the officers, (as having betrayed, or failed and neglected both theirs and the kingdom's interest) to divide and distemper the Army, and to engage both the soldiery, and many other well-affected people, under the same notion and pretence, in ways of distraction and confusion: And as we accounted these of most eminent danger both to the parliament, city, and kingdom, we need not spend much time to express; for we believe all that wished well to the public were so deeply sensible thereof as they cannot so suddenly forget it; and others, who had any thing to lose or hazard, though, perhaps so far as they had hopes the Army might that way have destroyed itself, they might have some secret rejoicing at it, and may now be sorry the business is so well over without that offer; yea, so far as they considered the bottomless depth and endless danger of it, they could not but be affected with it, so far as we need not mention it, save to mind men of what danger and mischief God hath therein delivered them from; and whence the greatest advantage to the rise and growth of it was, even from delays and slow proceedings in those things, which the long expectation of the soldiery and kingdom have been set upon; and to observe how apt both the Soldiery and people, through tedious delays in such cases, are to hearken to any part, and try any new way proposed under the notion of more speed-

dy and effectual, though perhaps so far from real remedy, as that indeed it endangers the utter loss of their end, with ruin and destruction to both.—To prevent the progress of this growing danger to all, we have lately exposed ourselves to the utmost hazard; and being acted therein from some clearness in our conscience that the fault of these delays lay not upon us, as was scandalously suggested, and a confidence in God that he would appear to vindicate that measure of truth and integrity he had given us in the thing, though with many failings and miscarriages on our parts, we were led forth by him, without any artifice whereby to vindicate or excuse ourselves, nakedly to cast ourselves and the business upon him; and, to his praise we must speak it, he hath appeared in an answerable issue, whereof the parliament and kingdom have had an account; and wherein they may see, and we wish they may with us take notice and be mindful of, the mercy and goodness of God in our deliverance, which were added to all the rest; and therein the army, which, in casting off all bands of order and government, was like to have been let loose to have been a plague and bane both to the kingdom and itself, once more reduced under that temper and discipline which may render it, through and under God, a further security and stay to the kingdom; and, in due time, bring it to a quiet disbanding, when just satisfaction, with settlement and safety, shall admit: but, as hath been in part done already, we must again mind the parliament upon what terms this hath been wrought: The General (as we all with and under him) stands engaged to the Army for the lawful prosecution of the soldiers concerns, and some general fundamental things for the kingdom; and, in confidence of the parliament's good acceptance of the service thereby done, and of their real intention, and promised effectual resolution, to give satisfaction in those things, hath, in a manner, undertaken for the parliament therein.—We wish we may see cause to acknowledge their just sense of his excellency's good affection and service in that business, or at least of their own Engagement, or the kingdom's concerns therein; and that we had not cause either to apprehend a strange neglect thereof growing upon many, or rather, in some, the sad symptoms of an evil eye at the service itself, as if they did regret the happy composure of those distractions begun in the Army, or the re-uniting of it; or did grudge the good hand of God towards it and the kingdom therein, that, in mercy would not suffer it to run on in these distractions to its own ruin and the kingdom's: For though it be most evident that had God given up the Army to cast off the reins of government and order, and to go on in those distracting and confounding ways, which it was endeavoured to be drawn into, both it and other forces of the kingdom were like, e'er this time, to have been engaged in blood one against another; or else united only in some desperate course of rending and tearing out the bowels and vitals of the kingdom, and of plucking up or endangering all foundations of order, peace, and government therein; yea, and of all right and property too; yet the envy and malignity of some men's spirits against this Army, and against the interest of good men therein, seems to be such as if they had rather have seen it so, than that this Army should again be an united piece; and we clearly apprehend the same principles, that swayed heretofore, now again prevailing, as if there were no good so serviceable, or evil so formidable, which the breaking of this Army, with as much ignominy and confusion as may be, would not, in their account, countervail; and if such an envious and evil spirit be indeed lodged and working in the hearts of any, we desire God in mercy to convince them of it, lest he confound them for it.—For our parts, having the Witness of God in our consciences, that though we are not without weak and frail workings of our fleshly hearts in all our ways; yet, for the main, we have, in all our engagements from the beginning of the war, had the work of God and the kingdom in our eye, and not our own: And that, since the Army by the oppressive provoking and spiteful proceedings of men, acted by the aforesaid envious principles against it) was raised to such resolutions, and driven into such a posture as put it past the power of the officers to bring it to a quiet disbanding, without further satisfaction and security, it hath been our main end in continuing with it, and almost our whole work, to keep it within compass and moderation; to withhold it from extremities of all sorts, and from that mischief to the kingdom or itself, which our withdrawing and taking off our hands from the government of it would have let it loose unto; and to make use of it, and of the providence that brought it to that pass, if possible, to some good issue for the just liberty, safety, and settlement of the kingdom; and bring the Army to some bottom of reasonable satisfaction wherein it might acquiesce, and at last come to a quiet disbanding; and, in transaction of all this, with all tenderness and patience, to preserve, if possible, the authority and peace of the kingdom, and prevent new broils which several parties and interests have been so apt unto. Having, we say, the witness of these things within us, when, on the other side, we consider what unworthy requitals we meet with for all this from the hands of men; how we are loaded with reproaches for it, and accused of being the only disturbers of the kingdom, and the authors of its burdens, as if, for private ends and designs, we kept up the Army; and how generally most men, even of the parliament party, for whose preservation, and for prevention of whose ruin, we have exposed ourselves to all hazards therein, do, either from disaffection or design to divide and break the Army, withhold or obstruct all supplies and satisfaction which might keep it in order, union, or repute: we confess, when we consider these things, we are ready to apprehend that God doth herein seem most justly to upbraid our care and solicitousness to preserve a people given up, as we begin to fear, to their own destruction, and which seem to chuse it rather than not to have their own factious interests or envy fulfilled; rather than to own their preservation, in the least degree, to those whom God hath appeared willing to use for their preservation and deliverance.—And, rather than we would further increase the odium and scandal of being the only public Disturbers and Oppressors, so unworthily cast upon us, merely for our good-will and endeavours to prevent greater mischiefs, we are apt to chuse rather to withdraw from our private station, though with hazard of our personal safety, and the loss not only of any imagined benefit of future employment, but even our Arrears for what service we have done; and so leaving all to whatever confusion God in his righteous judgment may seem good to bring upon the nation, to cast ourselves wholly upon him to preserve and provide for us in the midst thereof; or, if God in mercy intend better things to the kingdom, or hath found ought in us, which we confess he may, rendering us unworthy to be any longer instruments thereof, we should desire, with meekness and rejoicing, to see any other whom he finds, or the kingdom judgeth, more worthy to take up our present charge: but finding not yet any such clear discharge as would, to our apprehension, fully quit us before God or man, to leave the Army or kingdom in this present condition, we shall, in discharge of our duty to the utmost, add this one essay more to bring both into a better, if God in mercy see it good; we shall therefore once more beg the parliament timely to consider and provide effectually for those things expressed in the late Remonstrance published at the several rendezvouses of the Army, upon his excellency's continued conjunction, whereby the discontents in the Army were quieted, the distractions composed, and the due order and discipline of it recovered and submitted to: And, amongst these things, since the greatest and most immediate and pressing evil to the soldiery is the Want of Pay; and, to the country, the Disorders, Exactions, and Abuses, of the soldiers, with the burden and annoyance of free Quarter thereby enforced: and which, if once provided for, gives time of consideration for other things: we shall first apply to that, either to obtain a present Remedy, or at least to acquit and discharge ourselves, in that point, of the many evils thereof, both to the soldiery and country.—We have long been sadly sensible, and many ways and often expressed our sense thereof; but we have been most troubled at it, since that necessity which heretofore enforced it, viz. the straitness of the Quarters the parliament had to raise Money in, was taken away, and all parts of the kingdom have been cleared from any enemy, and free for the equal levying of money to supply the necessities of the whole: and it seems a matter of wonder to us, or an argument of great improvidence at best, that since that time the Soldiery, though much lessened in number, should be no better paid and provided for than before.—From the sense of these things, we have made frequent Addresses to the parliament for a sufficient establishment and provision of Pay for the Army and other forces of the kingdom, until they might, with safety to the kingdom, and just satisfaction and security to themselves, in point of Arrears, Indemnity, &c. be disbanded, or otherwise employed out of the kingdom. We have long waited with impatience as aforesaid, for some fruit of our addresses, at least in this point; but what through the difficulty or delay of getting things passed in parliament to this purpose, or of putting in execution those ordinances that have been passed, and the neglect or slowness of country committees, assessors, or collectors, to do their duty therein: what through the malignity of some, who, in design to break or distract the Army as aforesaid for want of Pay, and to disaffect the country thereto by necessitated free Quarter, do industriously retard all supplies of money; and what through the general backwardness of all, especially in the city of London, to part with it, we have yet found little fruit of all our Addresses and Endeavours in this kind; there being not as yet any establishment of contribution for Pay of the soldiery, any whit near proportionably to the numbers that we yet keep up, or any effectual execution of the powers already given for raising of the Taxes already charged upon the kingdom: so as we remain yet as far as ever from that Supply of Pay to the Army or other forces, whereby either the burdens and grievances of free Quarter can be taken off, or the necessity of the soldiery competently supplied, or their discontents in any measure removed, or disorder prevented, or good discipline preserved; and, which is most sad, in the Garrisons of the kingdom, and those of most importance, where the soldiery have not, nor well can have, the benefit of Quarter for their subsistence, (as the Army and field-officers have) yet they have very long been without any supply of Pay at all; so as divers poor soldiers in some of them have actually starved and died for want, in attendance upon their duties; others forced by extremity of want to quit their service: and the rest ready to starve or quit their garrisons to any that will possess them; and as it is most apparent that the present proportion of Tax, if duly levied, could not competently supply them, and others too, in an equal distribution thereof, considering the number that are yet in being; so the committees in many countries where such garrisons are, that have engaged with the Army, do refuse to levy those small proportions of Money that have been assigned for the present relief of such garrisons; but are content to see the aforesaid miseries of the Soldiery, and danger to the Garrisons, rather than do their parts to give the least remedy to either; divers of them telling the soldiers plainly, as we are informed, that if they had declared against the Army they should not have wanted; but having engaged with it they must expect neither Quarter nor Pay but what they get from the Army.—If we, or this poor Army, have deserved such hatred or despite, especially from pretended friends to the parliament and the kingdom's interest, we would fain be plainly told and convinced wherein; otherwise we cannot account it but most unchristian and inhuman dealing, and such as can have no better root than envious faction, void of all regard to public interest; and we would have all such know that, if we had been in the same mind, or would have allowed ourselves, by power, to pursue the ruin of adverse parties, by indirect or unchristian ways, or otherwise to set up a party of our own and suppress all others; or if we had not still, according to our first principles, loved much more the ways of common right and freedom, and the proceedings in all such things by parliament in order thereunto; or if we had not, in the way of ordering our affairs since the Army's Engagement, consulted more the preserving of Peace in the kingdom, and to prevent the rise of any new war, than our own advantage or security, we could (to speak as men, with the power and advantages God hath put into our hands) long ere this time, as yet also we might, have put the Army, and all other forces engaged with it, into such a posture as to have assured themselves of Pay while continued; and probably to have made our opposers in the kingdom, and city too, willing to have followed us with offers of Satisfaction as to the Arrears and other dues that concern the soldiery; or we could have told how to prosecute those advantages we have had to the suppression, if not destruction of adverse parties and interests, so as they should not, probably, have had those foundations or possibilities to grow up again to our further trouble or danger, as now they seem to have; and all this with reason and justice enough too: but that we have studied the preservation and good of all, without ruin or destruction to any, as far as we could; and have, through God, been acted therein in some measure with that mildness and moderation, patience, and love in the name of Christ; and we are yet confident we shall at last lose nothing by it.—But to return to our purpose: As to the Inconveniencies and Dangers of a new provision for the Soldiers, in point of Pay, the parliament hath had sufficient cautions and warnings, especially in the late distractions; and while the danger thereof continued visible, it was largely professed, if that danger could be removed, and the Army reduced into order and discipline, we should have what provision we could, with reason, desire in that point; and the same, with much more, upon the first hopes of overcoming that danger, was as largely promised: yet now the danger is over, we see little better care of performance than before; but after many days

since elapsed, and some spent in professed consideration of it, the whole care of that business seems to be wrapt up in one bare Vote, viz. 'That all supernumerary Forces shall be disbanded.'—As to which matter of Disbanding Supernumeraries, so it be with reasonable satisfaction in point of Arrears, we are so far from opposing or obstructing it, that, for the speedy easing of the kingdom's burdens by it, we shall readily give all furtherance and assistance to it; and shall, by-and-by, offer that encouragement thereunto as will demonstrate the same; and on such terms we shall ourselves most gladly be of those supernumeraries that should come first to disbanding; but as to the thought of the present disbanding of all supernumeraries, according to the Vote, first, we cannot but wish it be considered, whether, with any respect at all to the service and relief of Ireland, the parliament can well disband them all; unto which service, (as these might have been of great advancement of assistance long since, but for the prevalence of faction and design to break that force that might have afforded it, as we have formerly demonstrated) so we have more lately contributed our parts in the offer and designation of a very considerable force thereunto; and there hath wanted nothing but resolution and money, with expedition to send them over, which was not in our power.—But if (with respect to that service and the safety of this kingdom) the parliament can but lessen their forces so much, as to bring them near 60,000*l.* per mensem pay; yet we wish it be withal considered how many these supernumeraries are, that must so come to be presently disbanded; which, to bring the residue within that compass, would be little less than 20,000 of one sort or other; and, if so, how great a sum it would require to give any reasonable satisfaction to so many, in point of arrears in hand; and by the hardness of getting so much money as to piece up the month's Pay to the Army, we have much reason to doubt how long the parliament will be in raising such a sum together, or where they will suddenly find money to give competent satisfaction to the proportion but of a regiment or two upon a present disbanding; and unless they be provided with present money to give reasonable satisfaction to so many at once as would to that end come to be disbanded, the parliament must either turn them off presently with extreme dissatisfaction and disobligation; (which will render them apt to rise again with any party against the parliament, who would give them hope of better dealing, or but revenge) or else must continue them until better provided.—And though there were Money ready for a competent part of Arrears in hand, yet it will be necessary, however, that they be continued for some time for the stating of their Accounts, and giving Debentures for the remainder; for (besides the injustice and dissatisfaction of turning the soldiers off without that) we presume the parliament hath had too much experience already of the bottomless ill consequences of not ascertaining their Accounts and Arrears before disbanding, and not keeping the same registered together, by the endless clamours and outcries of particular persons for Arrears, and the vast sums expended thereupon, without end or satisfaction; the persons or their state of Arrears (through neglect of taking such Accounts before disbanding) having never been certainly known, nor any end either of their number or claims; and the dispatch of such Accounts for those that remain before disbanding will certainly take up some time; we doubt, some months.—Now, if thus any part of the Supernumeraries, above what the 60,000*l.* a-month will pay, shall, either for the time of stating their Accounts, or longer for want of present money, not be disbanded, the Army must so long remain without constant Pay; and consequently go upon free Quarter the while, unless the tax for their Pay be for the mean time proportionally increased; for the 60,000*l.* a-month not affording any assignment for such supernumeraries pay, those must of necessity go unpaid the while, and consequently upon free Quarter; and their going any where upon free Quarter will hinder the coming in of the contribution of those parts which should be to pay some others; and so these must likewise go upon free Quarter the while, which will, in like manner, hinder the pay and necessitate the like free quartering of others; so as all will, that while, be equally hindered from constant Pay, and forced to take free Quarter still. But besides these aforementioned certain and visible occasions of delays to the present effect of the Vote for disbanding all Supernumeraries, we doubt it will find many other difficulties and obstructions to the speedy and effectual dispatch thereof, and prove not so easy, or so well executed as voted; so that though we wish that business of disbanding Supernumeraries put into as speedy a way of execution as may be, yet, upon all these considerations, we cannot imagine that Vote to be absolute and sovereign; nor so speedy and timely a cure of the Soldiers Wants and Discontents, and the country's Grievance in their free Quarter, as the nature of the malady and temper of the patient requires: we shall therefore offer our final Advice for some other, first setting down the Particulars, and then shewing the Efficacy and Benefit thereof: the Particulars, which we have in part heretofore propounded to the parliament, are these:—I. That the parliament do forthwith enlarge their monthly Contribution, for 5 or 6 months, to the full proportion of the Pay of all the Forces now in being within this kingdom, or at least so many of them as they are not provided with ready money to disband, and to a considerable proportion, viz. about 10,000*l.* a month over; which, by a near estimate, we conceive would well be by the addition of 40,000*l.* per mensem to the present 60,000*l.* per mensem, and with less we believe it cannot be; and the same committees to be appointed, and to have the same powers for the levying this as for the former 60,000*l.* and the same penalties for neglects or defaults therein as for the Arrears of former Taxes to the Army: and for the more speedy passing of this, unless some visible inequality in the rates of counties be readily rectified, without delay to the passing of it, we wish it might (being but for that short space) pass according to the same rates as the 60,000*l.* And for the kingdom's better satisfaction herein, it may be resolved and declared, 1. That upon this Enlargement, and the effectual levying of it in the respective counties, no free Quarter at all shall, from within a month at most after passing the Ordinance, be taken in any county or place where it shall be duly levied and paid. 2. That it is intended this Enlargement of Tax shall not be continued beyond the space of the months limited; and that in the mean time, as the parliament can find money and safety to disband and lessen their forces, so, if that lessening be considerable, they will, by degrees, lessen the said tax proportionably.—II. We desire that, for the more sure and effectual levying of the whole tax, the General and Committee of the Army, or one of them, may have power, in case of any country committee's neglect or fail therein, to add new men to any of the respective committees, who are thereupon to have the same power as the committees named in the Ordinance have.—III. That for the more sure and ready Payment of the Soldiery out of this, the Forces which are not or cannot be provided for to be forthwith disbanded, may be immediately assigned to several counties, or associations of counties, out of whose taxes they shall be paid; and that the General may have power accordingly to make such distribution and assignment, giving notice and account thereof to the committee of the Army, and they thereupon to take order for the payment of the Forces so assigned, immediately out of the counties or associations to which they are assigned; and that the payments be made according to due musters, and according to the last establishment, as to the rate of each officer's Pay; and the surplusage of any county's Taxes, above the due pay their forces so assigned to be paid out of them, to be at the care and oversight of the same Committee for the Army, called for and paid into the common treasury, for such general uses as shall be found necessary relating to the forces and service within this kingdom, by warrant from the General or Committee of the Army, according to the usual course of limitations heretofore; and the remainder and surplusage of the said taxes of the whole kingdom, above the uses aforesaid, to be for the supply and relief of the forces already in Ireland, or other public uses as the parliament shall think fit; and the same committee likewise, with the treasurers, to take care for the methodizing and balancing of the whole Accounts, and to have power for the employing of Officers needful for the dispatch and accommodation of this service, and to make allowance of salaries to them, within some reasonable limitation; particularly that there be allowances for so many deputy-commissaries of musters, as upon the practice of this distribution the General and Committee shall find needful; and the treasurers-general out of their salary, in regard of this accession to it, to maintain so many deputy treasurers, as the General and the Committee of the Army shall find needful to be employed, and to reside in such several parts of the kingdom as the General shall find convenient for that service.—IV. That, the Security for Arrears being settled as hath been already, and is again hereafter propounded, the parliament would speedily send down commissioners to the Army, and appoint the like for the other forces of the kingdom, to state Accounts and give Debentures; whereby the soldier may, before his disbanding, have his Arrears ascertained to him as a clear debt, to be paid him out of that security; and that one office or registry may be appointed into which all Accounts so taken may be returned, and all Arrears registered to be paid, in order as is hereafter expressed: And for this office we offer, that 2 registers, with 4 clerks, may be allowed to have reasonable salaries out of the revenue, issuing out of the said security; and this we desire may be hastened for the speedier preparation to the work of Disbanding, that such as are to be disbanded may be ready for it by that time the parliament can provide money wherewith to disband any of them; and so, by disbanding the Supernumeraries as fast as may be, way may be made for the speedier lessening and taking off the taxes by degrees.—Now for the Advantage and Benefit of the things here propounded, they will appear as follow, viz. Whereas, upon the former supposition, that the putting of the soldiery, that are to be continued, into a way of constant pay, to depend only upon the disbanding of Supernumeraries, whom the present tax will not extend to pay; it is most evident, as before demonstrated, that none can be put into present pay, but all such go on upon free Quarter so long as until every one of the said Supernumeraries be disbanded; which, whatever may be imagined, though no other difficulties or obstructions should happen than what are now visible, as before mentioned, would not be effected, nor, we doubt, provided for, in 3 or 4 months time; we wish it proved so soon, but we much fear interruptions or delays will happen to make it much longer; and all that while, free Quarter continuing as before, the burden thereof, besides the annoyances, tho' it may fall more lightly upon some parts, and heavier upon others, yet, in the whole, it dam-nifies the kingdom as much as the said increased contributions come to: the soldier also must have, besides his Quarters, some pay in hand in the mean while, otherwise he can neither subsist nor be kept in order; yet still he accounts, at least, half of his pay for the remaining time in arrear to him; so as that further debts do also grow upon the kingdom's score.—Now, contrariwise, the things we have propounded being granted, that bare contribution answers all; for we dare undertake, within a fortnight after the granting of them, all the forces of the kingdom shall be assigned where and how to receive their Pay constantly till disbanded, and so no more free Quarter shall henceforth be taken; no part of the kingdom any more unequally oppressed thereby; nor any further debt of arrears henceforth incurred upon the kingdom; and the work of disbanding Supernumeraries not at all hindered, but much facilitated thereby; and, as the parliament finds money and safety to disband any of them, they may, by the same degrees, either lessen the tax proportionably, or will have so much more surplusage from thence towards Relief of Ireland, or towards disbanding of others, or any other public uses.—And now, for furtherance and encouragement in the matter of Disbanding, these things aforementioned being granted, we shall, for the Army and the other forces engaged with it, offer and agree to these Rules following: 1. That such of the said forces as shall come to be disbanded as Supernumeraries, shall, out of the monies to be raised upon the security of Arrears, have the full moiety of their arrears first made good to them, as monies come in hereupon, before those which fall out to be continued shall receive any part of theirs; and after that, when those that continue shall have received a like proportion of theirs, then those that shall be disbanded to receive the other moiety, or full remainder, of their Arrears, before these that continue have any more. 2. That those of them that shall disband, shall, as monies come in upon the said security, receive their proportions of Arrears in the same order and course as they disband; of which order and course a remembrance to be kept and registered in the aforesaid registry of these Accounts; the persons of the regiment, troop, or company first disbanding, and so the rest in course, to receive first what was due to them at disbanding, to make up their first moiety, by two equal portions; and likewise to receive their second moiety at twice, by equal portions, in the same course as they disband.—Now, for our Desire in the first proposition aforegoing, to have the Increase of Contribution extended to the proportion of 10,000*l.* a-month, by estimate, over and above what we think the just pay for the soldiery now in being in the kingdom, and not ready for present disbanding, will come to; the reason is partly, that there may be some present certain supply out of it for the forces in Ireland; and partly because, if the contribution should be scant of, or but just answerable to, the pay of the soldiery, the many contingencies and necessary charges, not to be foreseen, and the probable failings of fully levying the contribution in some parts, would necessitate the going of some upon free Quarter, which would disturb the order and constant pay of the whole; and it would also cost much time to proportion the forces to be assigned upon the several counties exactly to the contribution of them, which would make it long ere free Quarters could be taken off, since none could be assigned where to be paid, until the pay of each part of the soldiery were exactly computed, and all of them as exactly distributed according to each county's tax: whereas, the taxes being laid to a sufficient proportion above the just pay, we can immediately make distributions and assignments by estimate, so as to be sure the taxes of each county exceed the pay of the soldiers assigned to it: and though some one county have more, and another fewer, soldiers assigned to them than (upon an exact distribution according to the number and pay of the soldiery) their just proportion would come to, yet none having so many but that their taxes will do more than pay them, no part will bear above its due proportion of charge; and those counties which have least number of soldiers assigned upon them, yet will bear their due proportion of charge, either in pay to the soldiers, or in the surplusage of their tax above it; which being collected into the common treasury, will be for the Relief of Ireland, or other publick uses; so as the surplusage, either in particular counties above their particular assignments, or of the whole kingdom's taxes above the Pay of the whole soldiery in it, will be no loss; but (as to some certain and present relief for Ireland out of it, upon the supposition of the 100,000*l.* per month) we shall (besides the surplusage of every county's tax above the pay of the soldiers to be assigned to it) forecast, in the distributions and assignments, to levy the taxes of some counties, and that as many as may be, to come entirely into the common treasury for relief of Ireland, without assigning any of the forces of England to be paid out of them.—And for that power desired for making such Distributions and Assignments, the advantages and benefits of that way of reparation, as to the more sure and ready pay of the soldiers, are sufficiently known and tried; and it is most evident that, without it, (if no soldiers be paid before the monies be first collected in the several counties, and then sent into the common treasury for all the kingdom, and then sent to the head-quarters, or thence distributed to the several forces within the kingdom) it is in vain to think that the soldier can be supplied with money aforehand, or timely enough to make him pay for Quarters; and it is as bad almost not at all as not in time.—We have thus propounded a way, whereby all the Soldiery of the kingdom may be instantly in a condition of constant pay while continued, and thereby be kept in order and discipline; all free Quarter, with the abuses, exactions, annoyances, and unequal pressures that accompany it, immediately taken off; no further Debt of Arrears incurred upon the kingdom, and that which is already incurred, put in a way to be recovered and overcome in time; and whereby the supernumerary forces may shortly be disbanded by degrees, as the parliament can find money to do it, and will be satisfiable to disband with less money in hand, without danger of disobligation therein; and whereby also the additional charge, now propounded, with other burdens of the kingdom, may, by the same degrees, be lessened and eased with safety and satisfaction, until all can be taken off.—And as it is evident that, if such a course as this had been taken sooner, and the parliament, as they found the several parts of the kingdom cleared from the enemy, and eased from the oppressions they suffered under them, had, by degrees, extended an equal contribution over all parts, in proportion sufficient to have paid all their forces, while they continued them, the kingdom had been eased of free Quarter, and no further Debt of Arrears to the soldiery incurred upon it; for, at least, a year and an half ago, those that have been disbanded had not been put off with so much disobligation as some have been; nor had their claims and endless demands since brought such trouble upon, or drawn such vast arrears from, the parliament and kingdom; and those that remain now to be disbanded had been much easier satisfied, and much more readily disbanded; so if such a course, as is here propounded, be not speedily taken, but the putting of the soldiery into a way of pay be left to depend only upon the disbanding all Supernumeraries (and that so unprovided for, or so very uncertain and slowly provided for and proceeded in, as, without this course, it is like to be) it is most evident, (besides unforeseen dangers of discontent, both in the soldiery and country, of difficulties to disband, or interruptions or dissatisfactions in it) that the non-disbanding of some will so long occasion the non-payment of all, and continue free Quarter, with the inconveniences thereof, upon all; and the non-payment of all may hinder the disbanding of any; and so both debts and discontents grow upon the soldiery and kingdom, perhaps, till it passeth either the power of the General and officers to compose the one, or the parliament and kingdom to satisfy the other.—Having therefore sufficiently discharged ourselves in this point, so as we shall, we hope, stand acquitted before God and man, from whatever evils ensue upon any further neglect thereof, we must now declare, That we find the just expectations of the Army herein (especially since the General's late engagements or undertakings at the rendezvous) are so great and earnest; the clamours and outcries to us from other forces and garrisons of the kingdom engaged with the Army, for their extreme necessity, and our apprehended neglect of equal provision for them, are so sad and pressing; the discontents of the country, from the oppressions of free Quarter, are so full, and yet growing, and almost desperate; and the distempers, distractions, and dangers threatened by all these are so vast and imminent, as we can no longer stand under the burthen or blame of them. But if the things here before propounded be not granted and passed effectually, or a certain course settled according to the effect of them, by the end of this present week, we can no longer give account of the Army or other forces in a regular way; and unless we find satisfaction in our judgments to take some extraordinary ways of power, we must let the soldiery and the kingdom know that we cannot satisfy their just expectations, and thereupon desire that the charge of the soldiery may be transmitted to others. If the parliament shall approve, and pass what we have here propounded, we must, for the better prosecution and effecting thereof, add, That the superlative backwardness and obstinacy, or disaffection rather, of those within the city, who have thus long withheld their arrears of taxes, so long since due to the Army, may not escape, either with victory therein, or without exemplary suffering at least by strict and speedy levying, as well the penalties as the arrears themselves; and, for that purpose, that the parliament would reassume the consideration of the General's late Letters about that business to the Committee of the Army, and also review that to the lord mayor and common council; wherein the ill consequences, both of the wilful neglect of the thing, and of the Army's withdrawing to a further distance before it be done, or of its continuing longer hereabouts in the dilatory, perhaps fruitless, expectation thereof, from the city's own actings therein, may sufficiently appear.—To which we add, that till it be done effectually, and sharply to some, the distribution of the forces to several committees to be paid according to what is before propounded, can neither be effectual nor safe; and we must therefore desire that, (unless it be thought fit that the whole kingdom should groan still under the oppression of free Quarter, and these adjacent counties be undone chiefly, while those of the city, that occasion all, sit free from any taste of it) there may be no longer stop to the drawing in of the Army, or a considerable part of it, to quarter upon them in the city, who had not paid before the said Letters, until they shall have paid both the arrears and full penalties; and though our tenderness of that city's safeguard and welfare, and our clearness from the least thought of evil towards it, or base design to make the least advantage to ourselves or the Army by it, hath sufficiently appeared in all our former demeanments, and in our carriage of the business upon our late advance towards it, notwithstanding the just occasions and great provocations there so newly given, as also in our innocent march towards it, and the quiet and patient waiting about it for those long due Arrears, without quartering any soldiers in it; yet now, in justice, we cannot but desire that, besides the levying of the Arrears at last, for which we have been put to a stay so long, there may now likewise some reparation be thought on from the city to the parts adjacent, for above 100,000*l.* damages sustained through the Army's attendance here on the city's defaults and delays; which reparation we, if necessitated thereto, or called upon by the country, must in their behalf, demand from the city to the full; and now also the rather, in order to that, we must earnestly desire that the Proceedings against those citizens, and others lately impeached, may be hastened; and, out of their fines or confiscations, some part of reparation may be made to the counties adjacent for the aforesaid damages, which the crimes of those persons, and others in the city, did first bring upon them: and, indeed, without something done against these persons, for examples to others, before the Army's withdrawing, we do not see, when it shall withdraw, with what safety or freedom the parliament can sit longer at Westminster; especially when we find the common-council, through the parliament's and Army's lenity, do take the boldness already, in the face of both, to intercede for the release and acquittal, or rather justification, of those impeached persons who indeed are but fellow-delinquents we doubt, to most of that council; as if that so active, immediate, and horrid a force upon both the houses of parliament, and upon levying a war in abetment and prosecution thereof, and of that concurrent treasonable Engagement, were already forgotten by them to have been any crime; the consideration whereof, and of the renewed confidence of Mr. Gawen, and some other members of parliament, known to have been partakers, if not principals, in the same things, (who yet presume, and are suffered, to appear again in the house, as if in those things there had not been so much a fault as to render them less worthy of continuing in that highest trust) makes us begin to fear that while so much of the same leaven (this lenity and moderation) is left behind, it may shortly spread till even the worst of the Eleven (notwithstanding their doubled crimes) be again called for in; unless the house, by some exclusive Resolutions and Proceedings, do timely prevent the same. We hope therefore, the parliament will weigh these things; and speedily, ere it be too late, consult at least their own safety and the kingdom's, if not ours and the Army's, their poor servants, and something concerned with them, especially in this affair.—Next, we again more importunately desire, that those other so near concerns of the Soldiery, expressed in the General's late Remonstrance at the rendezvous, may be speedily considered, and fully and effectually provided for; in order to which we shall here more particularly propound as follows: 1. As to Security for Arrears: Whereas in the late Votes, or Proposition intended for that purpose, the two thirds of the lands or compositions of certain delinquents, assigned towards the said security, is only of the delinquents within the three first Qualifications of the 12th Proposition; we desire that they may be altered so as to be two thirds of the lands or compositions of all the delinquents that have not yet compounded. And next we must desire, that dean and chapter-lands may be added, with a proviso for reasonable satisfaction or maintenance to such persons as, having a present lawful interest in any of the revenue thereunto belonging, have not forfeited the same by delinquency. These Additions are desired, because the security as yet voted is justly estimated not to be sufficient; and since all that is propounded is but for security, if the security prove to exceed the Arrears really due, the surplusage will be free for any other public use, so as the state will not be damaged by any of these additions to the security. Lastly, as to this business, we desire that the matter of Security, being resolved on as desired, may be passed into an Ordinance, and thereby be put into a speedy and effectual way of raising monies thereupon. 2. For matter of Indemnity: That, if no Indemnity more absolute can be provided to free the soldiery from all question for things done in the war, but that they must, in case of question at law, fly to some committee or commissioners for relief, it may be provided for the ease of all, that either under the grand Committee of Indemnity, or otherwise by the immediate appointment of parliament, there may be commissioners in each county, empowered to give relief in such cases as the grand committees now are; and those commissioners to be such as ordinarily reside in the respective counties, and mixt of such as have been military officers to the parliament, together with such inhabitants as have appeared and been faithful to the parliament in the late war; for which purpose we shall, if admitted, offer names; and that there may be a severe penalty laid upon judges and other officers of justice, in case they shall proceed against any, contrary to the Ordinance for Indemnity. 3. That a sufficient provision be made in a certain and no dishonourable way, for the relief and support of maimed Soldiers, and the Widows and Orphans of men that died in the service, to continue during the lives of the maimed soldiers and widows, and during the minority of their orphans; and that the same commissioners, to be appointed in each county for Indemnity as aforesaid, or others in like manner mixt, may be empowered for this purpose also, And in case of the death of any such commissioners, or their departure out of their respective counties, those that survive and remain may chuse new ones to fill up the number. 4. That for the just Freedom of Apprentices who have served the parliament, there may be a sufficient penalty laid upon the masters refusing or delaying to give the same when their times are out, accounting the time that they served in the war as part; and that the Apprentice may have his action at law for that penalty. 5. For Freedom from impressing: That (as no freeman of England may be impressed for any foreign service, or other than for the immediate defence of it, so) no soldier that hath voluntarily served the parliament in the late wars for the liberty of the kingdom, may be liable to be pressed for any military service at all; and that it may be promised that a certificate of his said service, as a volunteer, under the hand and seal of his colonel, or other field-officer under whom he hath served, may be a sufficient protection and discharge to him from any such impressing.—Having thus discharged ourselves of these matters, which are our most proper and immediate concerns, the business of the Soldiery, we must now redouble our desires, that the two first (concerning putting them into constant Pay, while continued, and provision for their Arrears) may be first considered, and immediately settled, before any other business; and then that the rest of them may be also provided for as soon as may be.—Now, though the two first of these want not their equal concernments to the kingdom, in the present taking off the oppression of free Quarter, preventing the increase of Arrears, and providing or preparing for the more easy and satisfactory disbanding of Supernumeraries, and thereby the better easing of the kingdom's burdens by degrees; yet we cannot, by any of our addresses of this kind, so far forget those things we have formerly declared, concerning more nearly the public interest of the kingdom, and ourselves as members of it, but we must herewith renew our humble and earnest Desires that no time may be lost by the parliament for the just consideration and dispatch of those things, both for the redress of common grievances, relief of the oppressed, and for the liberty, security, quiet, and some safe settlement of the kingdom; and more especially that the things of this nature, expressed in the late Remonstrance at the rendezvous, may, in such settlement, be fully and effectually provided for, and that with all possible expedition. And it is our hearts desire and hope that therein the proceedings and resolutions of the parliament may be such, and so timeous, as that we need not any more to remind the parliament in any of those things; which (as far as with truth, or any safety to that most obliging interest of the public, and to those that have engaged for it, we may forbear) we are most unwilling, and take no pleasure, to meddle in.—By Appointment of his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax and the Council of the Army, Jo. Rushworth, Sec. Windsor, Dec. 5, 1647."

The lords took no notice of this long Remonstrance, further than in reading of it, and referring it all to the commons: That house appointed a committee to consider of it, who the next day reported, it was their opinion, That all the supernumerary Forces in the kingdom should be disbanded.

Another Message from the King, pressing for a personal Treaty.] Dec. 9. This day came a Message from the King to the parliament, which was read in the house of lords, and ordered to be sent presently down to the commons; and that committees of both houses do communicate this Message also to the Scots Commissioners:

To the Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore, to be communicated to the Lords and Commons in the Parliament of England at Westminster, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland: Carisbrook-Castle, Dec. 6, 1647.

"C. R. Had his majesty thought it possible that his two houses could be employed in things of greater concernment than the Peace of this miserable distracted kingdom, he would have expected, with more patience, their leisure in acknowledging the receipt of his Message of the 16th of Nov. last. But since there is not in nature any consideration preceding to that of Peace, his majesty's constant tenderness for the welfare of his subjects hath such a prevalence with him, that he cannot forbear the vehement prosecution of a Personal Treaty; which is only so much the more desired by his majesty, as it is superior to all other means of Peace. And truly when his majesty considers the several complaints he daily hears from all parts of this kingdom, that trade is so decayed, all commodities so dear, and taxes so insupportable, that even natural subsistence will suddenly fail; his majesty, to perform the trust reposed in him, must use his uttermost endeavours for Peace, though he were to have no share in the benefit of it. And hath not his majesty done his part for it, by divesting himself of so much power and authority, as by his last Message he hath promised to do, upon the concluding of the whole Peace? and hath he met with that acknowledgment from his two houses which this great grace and favour justly deserves? surely the blame of this great retarding of Peace must fall somewhere else than on his majesty.—To conclude: if you will but consider in how little time this necessary good work will be done, if you, the two houses, will wait on his majesty with the same resolutions for Peace as he will meet you, he no way doubts but that you will willingly agree to this his majesty's earnest desire of a Personal Treaty, and speedily desire his presence amongst you; where all things agreed on being digested into acts, (till when it is most unreasonable for his majesty or his two houses to desire each of other the least concession) this kingdom may, at last, enjoy the blessings of a long-wished-for Peace."

Four Bills to be presented to the King for the Royal Assent.] Dec. 11. A message was brought from the house of commons by Mr. Selden, desiring the lords concurrence to four Bills to be presented to his majesty for his royal assent; and in case the lords do agree to the said Bills, then the commons also desire their lordships concurrence to some Instructions as to the manner how they shall be sent to the king.

The Titles of the Bills were these:

1. An Act concerning the raising, settling, and maintaining Forces by Sea and Land within the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and Dominion of Wales, the Islands of Guernsey and Jersey, and the Town of Berwick upon Tweed.

2. An Act for justifying the Proceedings of Parliament in the late War; and for declaring all Oaths, Declarations, Proclamations, and other Proceedings against them, to be void.

3. An Act concerning Peers lately made, or hereafter to be made.

4. An Act concerning the Adjournment of both Houses of Parliament.

Instructions for Basil Earl of Denbigh, Edward Lord Montague, Mr. Bulkley, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Kemp, and Mr. Robert Goodwin, to go with the four Bills to the King.

"You, or any three of you, whereof one member of the house of peers, and two members of the house of commons to be present, are to repair to his majesty with these Bills, and pursue these Instructions: To attend his majesty for the space of ten days, and no longer, and to return back to the said houses respectively with his majesty's Answer."

The Lords read all the above mentioned Bills twice this day, with the Instructions to the Commissioners concerning the manner of presenting them to the King. On the 14th, they were all read a third time, and passed without any division. But it is remarkable that the Instructions only, not the Bills, were ordered to be communicated to the Scots Commissioners for their consent: a circumstance which proved a bone of great contention between the two kingdoms afterwards.—These four Bills, and the Propositions annexed, were formed upon the plan of those presented to his majesty at Newcastle in July 1646, which will be found at p. 499; but there are some very great and essential differences (both of addition and omission) from what was then agreed on by the commissioners of both kingdoms. These alterations, which chiefly affected the Rights of the Crown, the Solemn League and Covenant, Presbyterian Church-Government, Indulgence to tender Consciences, and Matters of joint Interest, gave so great Offence to the Commissioners of Scotland, that they presented several very warm Remonstrances against them to both houses of the English parliament; to which the latter paid little or no regard, the others publicly protested against the King's giving his consent to these four Bills and Propositions.*

* "The King," says Hume, "in order to remove those fears and jealousies, which were perpetually pleaded as reasons for every invasion of the constitution, had offered, by a message sent from Carisbroke Castle, to resign, during his own life, the power of the Militia, and the nomination to all the great offices; provided that, after his demise, these prerogatives should revert to the crown. But the parliament acted entirely as victors and enemies; and, in all their transactions with him, paid no longer any regard to equity or reason. At

Dec. 14. This being the day appointed for the commons to bring up their Articles of Impeachment against the Seven Lords; and they not appearing to support their Charge, a committee of lords was appointed to consider of precedents in this case, and to offer somewhat to the house to prevent the like for the future.

Dec. 15. A report was made to the lords, that the late Instructions were delivered to the Members that were appointed to go to the King, and also to the Scots Commissioners; the latter of whom desired to know what those Bills were that were to be sent: to which it was answered, That they had no authority to communicate them; whereupon the Scots Commissioners delivered in a Paper desiring to see the said Bills.

Dec. 16. A Message was brought from the commons by Mr. Selden, to acquaint their lordships that the members of their house, who are of the Committee of both Kingdoms, reported a Paper, dated the 14th instant, which they received from the Scots Commissioners, wherein it is desired that the Bills which the houses intend to send to the king, may be communicated to them; that the commons have passed the following Resolutions by way of Answer to that Paper, wherein they desired their lordships concurrence; and if their lordships do agree, that then they may be delivered to the Scots Commissioners this afternoon. 1. "That the privilege, right, and custom of the kingdom and parliament of England is, that Bills passed both houses, to be presented to the king for his royal assent, are not to be com-

the instigation of the Independents and Army, they neglected this offer, and framed four Proposals, which they sent him as preliminaries; and, before they would deign to treat, they demanded his positive assent to all of them. By one, he was required to invest the parliament with the military power for 20 years, together with an authority to levy whatever money should be necessary for exercising it: and even after the 20 years should be elapsed, they reserved a right of resuming the same authority, whenever they should declare the safety of the kingdom to require it. By the second, he was to recal all his Proclamations and Declarations against the Parliament, and acknowledge that assembly to have taken arms in their just and necessary defence. By the third he was to annul all the acts, and void all the Patents of Peerage, which had passed the great seal, since it had been carried from London by Lord Keeper Littleton; and, at the same time, renounce for the future the power of making peers without consent of parliament. By the fourth, he gave the two houses power to adjourn as they thought proper: a demand seemingly of no great importance; but contrived by the Independents, that they might be able to remove the parliament to places where it should remain in perpetual subjection to the Army."

municated to any other whatsoever, either in relation to matter or form, before his Answer thereunto given; and that there is nothing contained in any Article of Treaty between the two kingdoms to the contrary. 2. That the two houses having resolved to send their Commissioners to the King, in the Isle of Wight, on Monday next, with the Bills and Propositions in the Instructions mentioned, according to the same Instructions communicated to the Scots Commissioners; the houses desire that such Propositions as those commissioners shall judge fit and necessary for the kingdom of Scotland, may be prepared, to be sent within the time aforesaid." To these Resolutions the lords agreed.

Dec. 17. A long Remonstrance from the Scots Commissioners, against sending the four Bills to the king without their having first perused them, and given their consent to them, was presented to the house of lords. The Answer agreed on by both houses to the said Remonstrance, was only this: "That the present condition of the affairs of this kingdom will not admit of any long delay in sending commissioners of parliament to the King, according to their Instructions lately communicated unto your lordships; and therefore the houses are resolved the commissioners shall go on Monday next. That the Papers from your lordships to the houses are so long, that a present Answer to them cannot be expected from the houses: but the houses will take them into consideration with all convenient speed; and do not doubt but to clear it to your lordships, and all the world, that they have proceeded therein without any violation of the Treaties; and therefore, they are very sensible that such aspersions should be laid upon the houses; and desire they may be forborne for the future; and, in the mean time, they have now sent to offer it to your lordships, if your lordships have any thing to present to the King, in behalf of the kingdom of Scotland, that it may be ready to be sent at the same time, when the commissioners of both houses are appointed to go with those things which are to be presented to his majesty in the behalf of the kingdom of England."

Further Orders for abolishing the Observance of Christmas. Dec. 25. This being Christmas-Day both houses met, as they had usually done for some years past. The day before the commons had ordered a Declaration to be forthwith printed and published, "That whereas the house had been informed divers persons, within the city of London and lines of communication, for their obedience to the Ordinance of parliament for non-observance of such days as were usually called Holydays, and for opening their Shops on Christmas-Day and such other Festival Days, had suffered very many and great affronts, abuses, and prejudice," it was ordered, "That the several and respective committees of the Militia of London, Westminster, the Hamlets and Borough, do take care that no such like disturbance be made on Christmas-Day by any malignants or others." *

Dec. 27. A Letter was brought from the earl of Denbigh, one of the Commissioners sent to the King, dated from Newport, in the Isle of Wight, Dec. 24, importing only, That he, with the rest of the Commissioners, presented the four Bills and Propositions to his majesty, at two that afternoon: That the King was pleased to say, "He was assured they could not expect a present Answer; but he would take the same into consideration, and give his Answer in a few days."

The Scots Commissioners Protest, delivered to the King, against the Propositions of Peace.

Dec. 28. Another Letter from the earl of Denbigh was read, inclosing a copy of a Paper from the Scots Commissioners, presented to the King. This is all that is entered in the Journals, relative to this affair, on this day; but two days after, another Entry explains the meaning why these copies are wanting, viz. "Resolved, upon the Question, That the Letter of the earl of Denbigh, from the Isle of Wight, and the Paper inclosed, shall be put out of the Journal entered on Tuesday." We may conclude, therefore, that the inclosed Paper was some Protestation of the Scots Commissioners against the four Bills now sent to the King, and which the lords would not honour so much as to give it a place in their Journals. However, this Declaration is preserved in Rushworth's Collections, and Royston's Edition of the King's Works, from which authorities we give it.

"May it please your majesty; There is nothing which we have more constantly endeavoured, and do more earnestly desire, than a good agreement and happy Peace between your majesty and your parliaments of both kingdoms; neither have we left any means unessayed, that, by united councils with the houses of the parliament of England, and by making joint applications to your majesty, there might be a composure of all differences: but the new Propositions communicated to us by the houses, and the Bills therewith presented to your majesty, are so prejudicial to religion, the crown, and the union and interest of the kingdoms, and so far different from the former proceedings and engagements betwixt the kingdoms, as we cannot concur therein: therefore we do, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, dissent from these Propositions and Bills now tendered to your majesty. Loudon, Lauderdale, Cha. Erskine, Hen. Kennedy, Robert Barclay."

* Instead of the usual Feastings at this season, Mr. Whitlocke informs us, "That some officers kept a Fast; where Cromwell, Ireton, col. Tichburne, and other officers, prayed and exhorted, from Scripture, to unity and obedience to command." This he adds, they did to be re-admitted into the favour of the General and his Council, whom they had slighted.

Dec. 31. A third Letter from the earl of Denbigh came to the lords, and was read; intimating only, That he, with the rest of the Commissioners, were on their return from the King, to attend the two houses; and that if their lordships and the house of commons would sit that afternoon, he might have opportunity to give an Account of the employment they were pleased to intrust him with. Dated at Bagshot, Dec. 31, five in the morning.

The King's Answer to the four Bills and Propositions presented to him in the Isle of Wight. Dec. 31. p. m. The earl of Denbigh gave the lords an Account, That he and the rest of the Commissioners had presented the four Bills and the Propositions to his majesty, and that he had given them this Answer in writing, which his lordship delivered to the house, and was read, in hæc verba: *

For the SPEAKER of the Lords House, pro tempore, to be communicated to the Lords and Commons in the Parliament of England at Westminster, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

"C. R. The necessity of complying with all engaged interests in these great distempers, for a perfect settlement of Peace, his majesty finds to be none of the least difficulties he hath met with since the time of his afflictions; which is too visible, when at the same time that the two houses of the English parliament do present to his majesty several Bills and Propositions for his consent, the Commissioners for Scotland do openly protest against them: so that were there nothing in the case but the consideration of that difference, his majesty cannot imagine how to give such an Answer to what is now proposed, as thereby to promise himself his great end, a perfect Peace.—And when his majesty farther considers how impossible it is, in the condition he now stands, to fulfil the desires of his two houses; since the only antient and known ways of passing laws are either by his majesty's personal assent in the house of peers, or by commission under his Great Seal of England, he cannot but wonder at such failings in the manner of address, which is now made unto him; unless his two houses intend that his majesty shall allow of a Great Seal made without his authority, before there be any consideration had thereupon in a Treaty: which as it may hereafter hazard the security itself, so, for the present, it seems very unreasonable to his majesty. And though his majesty is willing to believe that the intention of very many in both houses, in sending these Bills before a Treaty, was only to obtain a trust from him, and not to take any advantage, by passing them, to force other things from him, which are either against his conscience or honour; yet his majesty believes it clear to all understandings, that these bills contain as they are now penned, not only the divesting himself of all sovereignty, and that without possibility of recovering it, either to him or his successors, except by repeal of those Bills, but also the making his concessions guilty of the greatest pressures that can be made upon the subject; as in other particulars, so by giving an arbitrary and unlimited power to the two houses for ever, to raise and levy forces, for land or sea service, on what persons, without distinction or quality, and to what numbers, they please: and likewise, for the payment of them, to levy what monies, in such sort and by such ways and means, and consequently upon the estates of whatsoever persons, they shall think fit and appoint; which is utterly inconsistent with the liberty and property of the subject, and his majesty's trust in protecting them. So that, if the major part of both houses shall think it necessary to put the rest of the Propositions into Bills, his majesty leaves all the world to judge how unsafe it would be for him to consent thereunto: and if not, what a strange condition, after the passing of these four Bills, his majesty and all his subjects would be cast into?—And here his majesty thinks it not unfit to wish his two houses to consider well the manner of their proceeding; that when his majesty desires a Personal Treaty with them for the settling of a Peace, they, in Answer, propose the very subject matter of the most essential parts thereof to be first granted: a thing which will be hardly credible to posterity. Wherefore his majesty declares, That neither the desire of being freed from this tedious and irksome condition of life his majesty hath so long suffered, nor the apprehension of what may befall him, in case his two houses shall not afford him a Personal Treaty, shall make him change his resolution of not consenting to any act till the whole Peace be concluded. Yet then he intends not only to give just and reasonable satisfaction in the particulars presented to him, but also to make good all other concessions mentioned in his Message of the 17th Nov. last; which he thought would have produced better effects than what he finds in the Bills and Propositions now presented unto him. And yet his majesty cannot give over, but now again earnestly presseth for, a Personal Treaty, (so passionately is he affected with the advantages which Peace will bring to his majesty and all his subjects) of which he will not at all despair, there being no other visible way to obtain a well-grounded Peace; however, his majesty is very much at ease within himself, for having fulfilled the offices both of a Christian and of a King; and will patiently wait the good pleasure of Almighty God, to incline the hearts of his two houses to consider their king, and to compassionate their fellow-subjects miseries. Given at Carisbrook-Castle in the Isle of Wight, Dec. 23, 1647."

The lords, after reading this message, ordered that the earl of Denbigh should have thanks given him for his prudence and faithfulness in the carriage of this business; and desired that his lordship would put down the particulars he mentioned in writing. Ordered also that the King's Message should be taken into consideration the next morning.

A strict Guard ordered to be kept over the King.] January 1. The lords passed a Vote of Approbation of sir Tho. Fairfax's conduct in relation to the King; and that he be desired to take special care, by his orders, for securing the person of his majesty. They likewise ordered a Letter to be sent to col. Hammond, authorizing and requiring him to keep a strict Guard over the King, and that he do obey such orders and directions therein as he shall receive from the General or both houses of parliament.

Order of the Commons for laying down their Privileges.] Jan. 4. The commons having voted and passed a very great business in regard to the King, which immediately follows, applied themselves to make some salutary Orders and Ordinances, in respect to the public, and the general good of the nation. They first appointed a very great Committee of their house, to consider of such Grievances as had been promised to the people to be redressed; and to give such ease to their burdens, their freedoms and liberties, as was fitting. They were also to consider of reforming the Courts of Justice and Proceedings at Law, Matters of Trade, and all other things of public concernment, which they might hold fit to be done for the good and weal of the people. This Committee were ordered to prepare Bills or Ordinances on these matters, and present them to the house; and, in order to begin this good work well and at the right end, they first made a reformation in their own house, by passing the following Order concerning the Members of it laying down their Privileges:

"The commons, in this present parliament assembled, having a tender regard to the general good of this kingdom, and considering the many weighty affairs which have prolonged this present session of parliament; during which time by reason of the Privileges of parliament, the prosecution of just suits may be too much delayed; for the present remedy thereof, the said commons, being willing to forbear, for some time, their own interest and privilege, for the public good; do order, and be it ordered by the commons in this present parliament assembled, That no person or persons, under the authority of the said house, except the members thereof, shall, from the 20th of this instant Jan. 1647, during this present session of parliament, have any protection or immunity, by reason of any privilege of the said house of parliament, or derived from the Members thereof, or any of them, in any action or suit for debt, or any action or suit grounded upon any right or title to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments; or upon any contract upon borrowing or lending, or buying or selling; or grounded upon any security given, or to be given, by lease, mortgage, or otherwise, for any sum or sums of money. And it is hereby further ordered, during this present session of parliament, in the cases aforesaid, That the Members of the said house of parliament, and every of them, their lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, shall be subject to any action, suit, process, execution, decree, or other demand whatsoever, in law or equity, (so that the same extend not to the imprisonment or arrest of the person) or to prosecution upon any penal law. And be it further ordered, That every member of this house, having process delivered him for appearance in the cases aforesaid, do accordingly make his appearance; or, in default, this house, on complaint thereof, will take such course therein, as to justice shall appertain."

Votes passed by both Houses against any further Addresses to the King.] On the same day, the lords received a Message from the commons, by Mr. Lisle and others, along with some Votes that had passed their house, against any farther Address or Application to the King, which were read; but as these Votes were of the utmost importance, their lordships appointed the 8th instant to take them into consideration; and all the lords, in and about the town, were ordered to attend the service of the house that day, without any excuse or delay.

Jan. 7. The lords ordered that Mr. Marshall and Mr. Calamy do attend that house the next morning at 9 o'clock, to seek God by Prayer, before their lordships begin with the great business of the day: but there not then being such an appearance of lords as was expected, the affair was again put off to the 13th; and an Order was made for summoning the absent peers to attend on that day, and not to depart without leave. Accordingly,

Jan. 13. The last Votes of the commons were again taken into consideration, and they were first read in gross, and then each Vote distinctly. The house being adjourned into a committee during pleasure, so long a debate ensued thereon that the lords could not conclude the matter on this day, but ordered it to be renewed the first business the next morning.

Jan. 14. The lords went again upon this affair; and the first Vote being read, the house adjourned into a committee; when another debate arose upon it, which continued so long that all the lords could determine upon this day also, was to appoint a Committee to consider of, and offer something to the house upon, these debates.

Jan. 15. The lords being met, and some other business done, the earl of Denbigh reported a Paper from the Committee appointed the day before, containing this Preamble to the Votes brought up from the house of commons:—"The lords and commons assembled in parliament, after many Addresses to his majesty for the preventing and ending of this unnatural war raised by him against his parliament and kingdom, having lately sent four Bills to his majesty, which did contain only matter of safety and security to the parliament and kingdom, referring the composition of all other differences to a Personal Treaty with his majesty; and having received an absolute negative, do hold themselves obliged to use their utmost endeavours speedily to settle the present government in such a way as may bring the greatest security to this kingdom in the enjoyment of the laws and liberties thereof; and in order thereunto, and that the houses may receive no delays nor interruptions in so great and necessary a work, they have taken these Resolutions, and passed these Votes, viz. 1. That the lords and commons do declare that they will make no further Addresses or Application to the King. 2. That no Application or Addresses be made to the King, by any person whatsoever, without the leave of both houses. 3. That the person or persons that shall make breach of this Order, shall incur the penalties of high treason. 4. That the two houses declare they will receive no more any Message from the King; and do enjoin that no person whatsoever do presume to receive or bring any Message from the King to both or either of the houses of parliament, or to any other person."

It is remarkable that there were but two lords, the earls of Warwick and Manchester, that entered their Protest against concurring with the house of commons in these Votes: and this they did without assigning any reasons for their dissent; but only, as the custom then and more antiently was, to ask leave of the house, before the putting of the question, to enter their Dissent if the question was carried against them.

The same day the commons agreed to the foregoing Preamble, and sent to the lords two Orders in consequence of the former Votes, which their lordships read and agreed to. 1. "That this Declaration and these Resolutions shall be forthwith printed and published, and that the several knights of shires, and burgesses that serve for the several towns and places, do send copies of the same to their several counties and places. 2. That whatsoever person shall act contrary to this Declaration and Resolutions of parliament, or shall incite or encourage other persons so to do, shall, upon due proof thereof be imprisoned, and his estate sequestered; and the offenders in the premises, after publication hereof, shall be within the several Ordinances for Sequestrations; and all commissioners and committees of sequestrations are hereby authorized and required to take notice hereof, and proceed to sequestration accordingly."

Debate on the foregoing Votes in the House of Commons.] Notwithstanding the several days debate in the house of lords, upon the Votes against any further Addresses or Application to the King, we do not meet with any account of the arguments urged in that house, pro or con, upon this most important question: but a contemporary writer, and a member of the house of commons at this time, informs us,* That when the King's Answer to the four Bills and Propositions of Peace was debated in that house on the third instant,

Sir Thomas Wroth spoke to this purpose: 'That Bedlam was appointed for mad-men, and Tophet for Kings: that our kings of late had carried themselves as if they were fit for no place but Bedlam: that his humble motion should consist of 3 parts: 1. To secure the King, and keep him close in some inland castle with sure guards. 2. To draw up Articles of Impeachment against him. 3. To lay him by, and settle the kingdom without him: He cared not what form of government they set up, so it were not by Kings and devils.' Then

Commissary Ireton, seeming to speak the sense of the Army, under the notion of many thousand godly men, who had ventured their lives to subdue their enemies, said after this manner, 'The King had denied safety and protection to his people by denying the four Bills: that subjection to him was but in lieu of his protection to his people; this being denied, they might well deny any more subjection to him, and settle the kingdom without him: that it was now expected, after so long patience, they should shew their resolution, and not desert those valiant men who had engaged for them, beyond all possibility of retreat; and would never forsake the parliament, unless the parliament forsook them first.'—After some more debate,

General Cromwell brought up the rear: and, giving an ample character of the valour, good affections, and godliness of the Army, argued, 'That it was now expected the parliament should govern and defend the kingdom by their own power and resolution, and not teach the people any longer to expect safety and government from an obstinate man, whose heart God had hardened: that those men, who had defended the parliament from so many dangers with the expence of their blood, would defend them herein with fidelity and courage against all opposition. Teach them not by neglecting your own and the kingdom's safety, in which their own is involved, to think themselves betrayed, and left hereafter to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom they have subdued for your sake; and therefore are likely to find his future government of them insupportable, and fuller of revenge than justice; lest despair teach them to seek their safety by some other means than adhering to you who will not stick to yourselves. And how destructive such a resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge.'—Our author adds, That Cromwell laid his hand upon his sword at the latter end of his speech, which having something of menace in it, was thought very prevalent with that house: and accordingly we find by the Journals, That the first of the four Resolutions being carried in the affirmative by 141 voices against 92, the rest were passed without any division. The same writer imputes the concurrence of the lords in these Votes against the King, on the 15th, to a letter sent the day before to sir Thomas Fairfax, by order* of the house of commons, requiring him to send a convenient number of foot to garrison Whitehall, and a party of horse to quarter in the Mews.

After all this, the commons passed a Vote to give power to colonel Hammond and sir Wm. Constable, to require and injoin them to remove, from their attendance on the Person of the King, all such persons as they, in their judgments, had suspicion of to be prejudicial to the safety and security of his person, or to the discharge of that trust which was laid upon them; notwithstanding such persons were appointed to attend the King by order of both houses. The house also ordered, That it be referred to the Committee of the Revenue to consider what persons are fit and necessary to attend on the King's Person, and which way the expences might be conveniently retrenched. An Ordinance for taking away and utterly abolishing all the First Fruits and Tenths payable to the crown, and discharging all arrears due to it on that score, was put to the question, Whether to reject it or not? and carried in the negative, by 44 against 36.

Declaration of the Army, of their Resolutions to adhere to the Commons in their Proceedings against the King; and to support the Peerage.] These vigorous Resolutions of the parliament against the King gave so great satisfaction to the Army, as to produce two Declarations from that body.* The first was addressed to the

* "It is very true," says lord Clarendon, "that within few days after the King's withdrawing from Hampton-Court, and after it was known that he was in the Isle of Wight, there was a meeting of the General Officers of the Army at Windsor; where Cromwell and Ireton were present, to conclude what should be done with the King. For, though Cromwell was weary of the Agitators, and resolved to break their meetings, and though the parliament concurred in all he desired, yet his entire confidence was in the officers of the Army; who were they who swayed the Parliament and the Army itself, to bring what he intended to pass. At this conference, the preliminaries whereof were always fastings and prayers, made at the very Council by Cromwell or Ireton, or some other inspired person, as most of the officers were, it was resolved, 'That the King should be prosecuted for his life as a criminal person.' The great approach they made towards this, was, their Declaration that they would make no more Addresses to the King, that by an inter-regnum they might feel the pulse of the people, and discover how they would submit to another form of government." History of the Rebellion, vol. v. p. 92.

house of commons, and presented on the 11th of this month by sir Hardress Waller, with this submissive Introduction, "That the General had commanded seven colonels of them, with other officers of rank and quality, in the name of the whole Army, to make their humble Addresses, and represent their Intentions in writing, under the title of a Declaration; with this reference, that it should either have name or life, and be exposed to view, according as it should receive approbation and direction from the house of commons." The Officers being withdrawn, the Paper by them delivered in was read, intitled, 'A Declaration from his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax and the General Council of the Army, of their Resolutions to adhere to the Parliament in their Proceedings concerning the King;' and signified at the end, that it was resolved on nem. con.

"Notwithstanding the high violation of the kingdom's rights and liberties, and the endeavours to swallow up the whole interest of the kingdom into the power and will of a King, which the present king's reign hath afforded; we have observed that this parliament was, through his necessities and against his declared intentions to the contrary, called and put into a condition of vindicating the kingdom in those things; and hath yet acted with great tenderness towards the king, (as to any thing of right that might be in him, or duty towards him) as appears by the Protestation, Covenant, and many Declarations published by them: they have held forth a careful regard to the preservation of the King's Person and just rights, with and in the preservation and vindication of the public interests and safety of the kingdom; and, by the whole service of their actions, and their manifold humble Addresses to him for the preservation and settlement of all, they have, we conceive, abundantly demonstrated the reality and innocency of their intentions towards him: in all which we have still understood the sense and intention to be no other, than that the preservation of the King's Person and particular Rights should be so endeavoured as it might be consistent with, and not destructive to, those great and more obliging public interests of religion, and the rights, liberties, and safety of the kingdom; and not otherwise. And accordingly in the late Declarations and Papers that have occasionally passed from this Army, as to our Desires of settlement to the kingdom, we have expressed our real wishes, that if the king would, in things necessary and essential to the clearing, settling, and securing of those public interests, give his concurrence to put them past future dispute; then his rights should be considered and settled, so far as might be consistent with those superior interests of the public, and the security thereof for the future. And that by an address to the King, upon things so purely essential to those public ends, it might once more come to a clear trial, whether we could, with the preservation of the King's Person and particular interests, have a security to the other, it hath been our earnest desire, our great expectation, and our endeavour, that we and others might be in a patient waiting for such an issue.—Now in the parliament's last Address to the King, we find they have insisted only upon some few things, so essential to that interest of the kingdom which they have hitherto engaged for, as that, without betraying the safety of the kingdom and themselves, and all that engaged with them in that cause; without denying that which God in the issue of this war hath borne such a testimony unto, they could not go lower; and (those things granted) they have offered to treat for all the rest. Thus we account that great business of a Settlement to the kingdom, and security to the public interest thereof, by and with the king's concurrence, to be brought to so clear a trial, as that (upon the King's denial of those things) we can see no further hopes of settlement or security that way. And, therefore, understanding that, upon the consideration of that denial added to so many others, the honourable house of commons, by several Votes upon the 3rd instant, have resolved to make no further Address or Application to the King, nor receive any from him, nor to suffer either in others; we do freely and unanimously declare, for ourselves and the Army, That we are resolved, through the grace of God, firmly to adhere to, join with, and stand by, the parliament in the things voted, on Monday last, concerning the King, and in what shall be further necessary for prosecution thereof; and for the settling and securing of the parliament and kingdom without the king, and against him, or any other that shall hereafter partake with him.—By the Appointment of his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax and his Council of War, Jo. Rushworth, Secretary."

This Declaration being read a second time, the commons voted their approbation thereof; ordered their Thanks to be returned to the General and the Army for it; and that the same be forthwith printed and published.

The following Declaration was presented to the house of lords by the same Officers that had attended the commons with the foregoing:

"The General and his Council of War taking notice of some unworthy endeavours to asperse the integrity of their proceedings, as aiming at the overthrowing of Peerage, and undermining of the rights and privileges of the house of peers, do unanimously declare, That they hold themselves obliged, in justice and honour, to endeavour to preserve the Peerage of this kingdom, with the just rights belonging to the house of peers; and will really, in their places and calling, perform the same. And as, in the first place, they look upon the carrying on this great common cause, wherein both houses of parliament stand engaged, (which they hope no respects shall make them to desert) so shall they, to and in prosecution of those public ends, be very careful to preserve and maintain the right and honour belonging to the places and persons of the Peers of England.—By the Appointment of his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax and his Council of War, Jo. Rushworth, Secretary."

The Officers who presented this Declaration, being called in, received the following Answer :

"Gentlemen; The lords receive, with great satisfaction, this Declaration which you have presented unto them, as the unanimous Engagement of the Council of War: and they have commanded me to return particular thanks to the General and yourselves; and by you they desire their thanks may be returned to the Council of War and the whole Army. And they further have commanded me to assure you, that as they have hazarded their lives and fortunes in the maintenance of the true religion, the liberties of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament, according to their former engagements, and for procuring a just and safe peace to this distracted and distressed kingdom, so they shall still pursue those ends, from which no respects whatsoever shall either alienate their hearts or lessen their endeavours."—After which it was ordered by the lords, That this Declaration, with the Answer to it, should be printed and published.

The Scots Commissioners take Leave of the Lords.] Jan. 17. A Letter from the Scots Commissioners in London, dated this day, directed to the Speaker of the house of peers, was read, to this effect :

"That having been here several years, employed in pursuance of the ends of the Solemn League and Covenant, and of the Treaty between the two kingdoms; where, according to their mutual Engagements, they had constantly endeavoured to preserve a right understanding betwixt them: they had, in discharge of the trust committed to them, given in to both houses what they were warranted to offer unto them. And now, that they might give an account to the parliament of Scotland, they were to begin their journey within 2 or 3 days, of which they thought fit to give notice to both the honourable houses of parliament; and if they were pleased to address any thing by them to that kingdom, it should be represented with all fidelity and respect."

Upon this Letter the lords appointed a committee to consider what Papers and Letters of the Scots Commissioners did remain unanswered, and to report the same to the house.

Jan. 18. It was ordered that the earls of Warwick and Manchester, should go to the Chancellor of Scotland and the rest of the Scots Commissioners, from that house, to wish them a good journey; and to let them know that in regard of their speedy departure, the lords could not give any present Answer to their Desires concerning their Monies, and the other particulars mentioned in their last Papers; yet the lords do hope that there will be a real care taken to give just satisfaction unto the kingdom of Scotland; and that the house desired the continuance of the brotherly union and good correspondency between the two nations, which the lords would be always ready to use their best endeavours to preserve.

The Impeached Peers demand, and obtain, their Liberty.] Jan. 19. A Letter directed to the Speaker, from the earl of Lincoln and the other lords under restraint, except the lord Hunsdon, was read :

"My lords; After so long a restraint, by your lordships order, and no prosecution against us, we may expect, from your justice, our liberties; the which we shall enjoy with the more satisfaction, as it will appear a right to your lordships quality, as well as a freedom to the present condition of Your, &c. Berkeley, Willoughby, Maynard, Lincoln, Suffolk, Middlesex. Jan. 19."

It was then ordered that these six Lords, that have subscribed this Letter, shall have their liberty from the restraint they lie under, in the custody of the gentleman-usher of the black rod attending that house; and it was referred to a committee to consider of some Declaration, to be entered in the Journal Book, concerning the commitment of peers of this realm upon Impeachments. The lord Hunsdon was also released the next day, on his application, by letter, to the house.

Jan. 28. The commons sent up a Message to impeach Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, and sir John Maynard, knight of the Bath, of High Treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors, and exhibited Articles of Impeachment at the same time against them both.

Here follows an hiatus, marked by asterisks in the Journals; and, by a note of reference, the editor tells us, That in the margin of the original, where several Entries are erased, is wrote 'Obliterated by Order of March 2, 1659.' To which time we refer for a further explanation.

Jan. 29. The Scots Commissioners having now left London, and gone into their own country, both houses thought proper to send some commissioners of their own after them; in order, as may be supposed, to take off any sinister impressions or misrepresentations that might be made to the Scots parliament by the former; and so prevent a rupture, at this critical conjuncture, between the two nations.

The Commons send up Articles of Impeachment against the seven Lords lately set at Liberty.] Jan. 31. The commons sent up to the lords Articles of Impeachment against the earls of Lincoln and Suffolk, with the rest of the seven Lords formerly impeached by them of High Treason, for levying war against the king, parliament, and kingdom; and desired that such further proceedings might be had thereupon as to justice and the course of parliament did appertain, and then the commons would be ready with their Evidence to support the said Charge.

Articles of Impeachment against sir John Maynard, one of the 11 Members formerly charged by the Army.] February 1. The separate Articles against the seven impeached Lords were read, though not as yet entered in the Journals; but those against sir John Maynard being also read, are inserted: viz.

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of the Commons in Parliament assembled, against sir John Maynard, Knight of the Bath, whereby he stands charged of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

I. "That the said sir John Maynard hath, maliciously and traiterously, endeavoured, combined, and conspired to subvert the freedom of parliament. II. That, upon the 30th of July last, and divers days before and since, he, the said sir John, at the Guildhall, and other places within the cities of London and Westminster, and county of Middlesex, hath, maliciously and traiterously, plotted and endeavoured to raise and levy war; and accordingly, then and there, hath, maliciously and traiterously, raised and levied war against the parliament, king, and kingdom. III. That whereas, on the 26th of July last past, a great company of Reformado officers, soldiers, apprentices, and other dissolute and desperate persons, (many whereof have been in arms against the parliament) being tumultuously assembled at Westminster-Hall, and parts adjacent, within the city of Westminster and liberties thereof, did, by a most horrid force and violence, possess themselves of the doors and passages of the houses of parliament in Westminster aforesaid, (the members of the said houses then sitting in parliament) and did then and there, contrary to the honour and freedom of parliament, threaten, and, for divers hours, imprison, the said members so sitting in parliament; and, by the said menacing imprisonment, and violence, did force the said houses to pass an Ordinance of parliament, for the revoking and making void an Ordinance made the 23d of July abovesaid, concerning the Militia of London, and for the constituting of sir John Gayer, knt. Tho. Adams, James Bunce, Aldermen, and others, citizens of the city of London, a committee of the Militia of the said city, and parts adjacent within the lines of communication: and did likewise, then and there, forcibly enter into the said houses of parliament and forced the members of the said houses to pass such Votes as they, the said tumultuous persons, then and there required; and did then and there violently assault the persons of the Speakers, and divers members of both houses then attending on the parliament; and, by their violent menacings and assaults, did force the said Speakers, and divers members, from their attendance in parliament. And whereas sir Tho. Fairfax, knt. and the Army under his command, was formerly, by both houses of parliament, raised and maintained, and is still continued, for the safety and defence of the parliament and the kingdom; and the said sir Tho. Fairfax and the said Army, hearing of the said horrid force and violence offered to the said houses of parliament as aforesaid, did march towards the cities of London and Westminster to suppress the said tumults, and to restore the said houses of parliament, and the members thereof, to their just freedom, safety, and honour; and to secure the said houses of parliament from the like violence and traitorous attempts for the future, he, the said sir J. Maynard, knowing of the said horrid force and violence, and that the said Ordinance, for the Militia of London, so by force obtained as aforesaid, was void and null, and that the said sir Tho. Fairfax, and the Army under his command, were marching towards the cities of London and Westminster, for the intents and purposes aforesaid, he, the said sir John Maynard, for the better advancing of his traitorous purposes, designs, and actions as aforesaid, did, on the 30th of July aforesaid, and divers days since, with Denzill Hollis, and Walter Long, esqrs. Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, col. Edw. Massey, col. Sydenham Pointz, and divers others, meet at the Guildhall aforesaid, and other places within the cities of London and Westminster, and county of Middlesex; and did, then and there, sit with, and traiterously consult, abet, and maintain the said sir John Gayer, alderman James Bunce, and others of the said pretended Militia, in putting in execution the said pretended Ordinance for the said pretended Militia of London, so by force obtained as aforesaid; and, together with the said Denzil Hollis, Walter Long, Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, sir John Gayer, alderman James Bunce, and others, did traiterously and maliciously plot, contrive, and order the raising of another Army to embroil the kingdom in a new and bloody war; and did, traiterously and maliciously, at the time and place, and with the persons aforesaid, plot, contrive, and order the levying, raising, listing, arming and arraying several forces, both of horse and foot, for the maintenance of the said new and bloody war against the king, parliament, and kingdom, and to ruin and destroy the said Army under the command of the said sir Tho. Fairfax, raised for the defence of the parliament and kingdom as aforesaid, and to prevent and hinder them from vindicating the honour and safety of parliament as aforesaid; and the said several forces, both of horse and foot as aforesaid, were listed, raised, and levied accordingly; sundry of them having been aiding and abetting to the abovesaid horrid force and violence amongst the said soldiers, officers, and tumultuous persons as aforesaid, upon the said 26th of July last past, against the said houses of parliament as aforesaid. IV. And, in further pursuance of the said traitorous purposes and designs, he the said sir John Maynard, knowing of the said horrid force and violence, did, together with the said Denzil Hollis, Walter Long, and Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, on the 30th of July aforesaid, at the Guildhall, and other places aforesaid, traiterously order and appoint the Reformado officers, which, by former Ordinance of parliament, were commanded to depart forth of the lines of communication, to rendezvous in a certain place in Westminster, and liberties thereof, commonly called St. James's Fields, to be listed, and put into a regimental way; to the intent to be arrayed, armed, and employed for the destruction of the Army under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, and all such as did adhere to them, and did, then and there, traiterously order, direct, and cause to be raised and levied 18 regiments of the Trained Bands of the cities of London and Westminster, and the Auxiliary Bands, and all other forces of the said cities, and the sailors, watermen, and seamen within or near the river Thames, to be mustered, arrayed, armed, and put into a warlike posture, to be employed in the said war, traiterously contrived, levied, and raised by him, the said sir John Maynard, and the persons abovenamed, against the king, parliament, and kingdom, and the said army of the parliament, under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax. V. That, on the said 30th of July last, he the said sir John Maynard, at the Guildhall aforesaid, together with the said Denzil Hollis, Walter Long, esqrs. Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, and others, in pursuance of his said traiterous plots and contrivances, did traiterously order, command, and appoint the raising, seizing, and listing of all horses, geldings, and mares within the cities of London and Westminster, and lines of communication, and ten miles distant, to be employed in the said new and bloody war, so as aforesaid traiterously raised and levied by him, and the persons in this Article afore-mentioned, against the king, parliament, and kingdom. VI. The said sir John Maynard, with other the persons aforenamed, at the Guildhall aforesaid, upon the 3rd of August last, and divers days before and since, did traiterously order and command the officers of the Ordnance within the Tower of London, to issue 400 barrels of powder, and 4000 muskets and other arms, ammunition, and provisions for war, formerly provided by the said houses of parliament for the defence of the kingdom, and to furnish the said army of the parliament under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, and the navy at sea appointed for the safety and defence of the kingdom, to be employed and used for the arming and arraying of the said Reformed officers and soldiers, raised and listed as aforesaid for the maintenance of the said new and bloody war, so as aforesaid traiterously plotted, contrived, and fomented by him and the persons aforesaid, and to be employed for the destruction of the said parliament's Army under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, and the subjects of the kingdom adhering to, and joining with, the said army of the king, parliament, and kingdom. VII. That whereas sir John Maynard, with others afore-named, in pursuance of their said traiterous and malicious designs to embroil the kingdom in a new and bloody war, and to fight against the parliament's Army, then marching up towards London, for the purposes before recited, did, at the time and place abovesaid, cause a Declaration, (framed by some person within the city of London, containing matter of reproach and scandal of the Army doing their duty in the service of the parliament; and reflecting on the authority and freedom of parliament in several of their Ordinances, lawfully and duly passed; and abetting the engagement declared against by the said houses of parliament the 23d of July then instant, as a traiterous and seditious design of divers ill-affected persons in and about London, and parts adjacent; and to bring in the King, without security and satisfaction first given to both kingdoms, as was insisted on by the parliaments of both kingdoms; and tending to engage the rest of the kingdom with them in the said war against the parliament and Army) to be published in all or most of the churches and chapels within London and lines of communication, in or upon the 1st of August last past.—By all which designs, endeavours, and actions, he, the said sir John Maynard, hath traiterously laboured to ruin and destroy the king, parliament and kingdom; for all which they do impeach him of High Treason against the king, his crown and dignity. And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves a liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any further Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir John Maynard, and also of replying to the Answers that the said sir John Maynard shall make to the said Articles, or to any of them, and of offering further proof of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Impeachment or Accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the cause shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray that the said sir John Maynard may be put to answer all and every of the premises; and that such proceedings, examinations, trial, and judgment may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice."

The Lords take into Consideration the Articles of Impeachment against the seven Peers.]

Feb. 2. The lords took into consideration the Articles of Impeachment against the seven Lords, of High Treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors, brought from the commons; and it was moved that it might be considered, Whether the releasing of the said Lords, and giving them their liberty on the 19th Jan. last, be not a discharging and acquitting them of the general accusation of High Treason; and whether the releasing of their persons be a discharging of that accusation? Then the general Accusation of the 8th Sept. last was read, and the Order for their commitment, with the several Messages sent to the house of commons concerning them, (see p. 782): And the question being put, Whether, upon what hath been now read, the general Impeachment against the Seven Lords is dismissed? it was resolved in the negative.—Next, it was taken into consideration, Whether, in the particular Articles against the Seven Lords, there be not a contrariety in the averment of the house of commons; because the Articles make mention, That they are in maintenance of a former Charge brought up from the commons against them, of high treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors; and it was moved to have a conference with the commons about it; and the question being put, Whether to send to the seven Lords copies of their several and respective Articles, and appoint them a day to put in their Answers to the same, before such time as a conference be had with the commons concerning this business, it was resolved in the affirmative; and ordered, That the earls of Lincoln, Suffolk, and Middlesex, the lords Berkeley, Hunsdon, Willoughby, and Maynard, shall attend at the bar on Friday morning, and receive their several and respective Articles of Impeachment of high treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors, brought from the commons against them; and that they put in their several and respective Answers thereunto by to-morrow fortnight. And it was further ordered, That the aforesaid lords be sequestered from the house, upon this Charge: and that they shall put in bail of 4000*l.* a-piece and 2000*l.* by sureties for each lord, on Friday next.

Feb. 3. The lords made the following Orders: 1. "That the seven impeached Lords be allowed till Tuesday next for coming to receive their Charges and bringing in their Bail. 2. That the lieutenant of the Tower do bring sir John Maynard to the bar, on Saturday morning next, to receive his charge of High Treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, brought up from the house of commons against him."

Both Houses resolve to reduce the Number of Servants about the King.] The lords also gave their concurrence to the following Resolutions, sent up by the commons for that purpose: 1. "That all the Servants, appointed by both houses to attend on the King, be discharged from their attendance. 2. That all those Servants that shall be appointed to attend the King, and their servants, shall not exceed the number of 30. 3. That the Governor of the Isle of Wight be hereby enjoined not to admit of any greater number than this of 30 to come within the Castle, to attend as servants upon the King, or as servants upon the king's servants. 4. That it be referred to sir Tho. Fairfax the General, to appoint such persons as shall attend the King, not exceeding the number of 30, to continue in the said service during the pleasure of both houses."*

* "No sooner had the king refused his assent to the four Bills, than Hammond, by orders from the Army, removed all his servants, cut off his correspondence with his friends, and shut him up in close confinement. The King afterwards shewed to sir Philip Warwick a decrepid old man, who, he said, was employed to kindle his fire, and was the best company he enjoyed during several months that this rigorous confinement lasted. No amusement

Sir J. Maynard refuses to submit to the Proceedings of the House of Lords against him.] Feb. 5. The lieutenant of the Tower having brought sir John Maynard to the bar, the Speaker told him, "That the lords did send for him to appear this day to receive his Articles of High Treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, brought up from the commons against him;" and commanded him to kneel at the bar as a delinquent. Sir John refused; but desired that the doors of the house might be set open for any body to come in that would, and this house not be made private, as the Council Table was: and he said, This way of Articles was not a way of proceeding of this kingdom; therefore he, being a commoner of England, and a free-born subject, ought to be tried as a commoner, by bill or indictment in the inferior courts of justice; and desired counsel to speak to it. He also, being again commanded to kneel as a delinquent, refused, saying, "He did not come to make bargains." Upon this, the house commanded sir John to withdraw, and the lords ordered that he should be fined 500*l.* for his refusal, in not submitting himself to the usual and ordinary way of proceeding of their house, upon Articles brought from the commons against him.—Then the lords commanded sir John to be brought in again, and the Speaker told him, "That their lordships had fined him 500*l.* for his refusal, in not submitting himself to the usual and ordinary way of proceeding of that house, upon Articles brought up from the commons against him; and let him know that the lords had ordered, That the Articles brought up from the commons, the 28th Jan. last, should be read." He refused to hear them read. However the Articles being read, the Speaker told him, "Now his Articles having been read, he might have a copy of them if he would; and that he is to put in his Answer to them within was allowed him, nor society, which might relieve his anxious thoughts: to be speedily poisoned or assassinated was the only prospect which he had every moment before his eyes: for he entertained no apprehension of a judicial sentence and execution; an event of which no history hitherto furnished an example. The great source whence the King derived consolation amidst all his calamities, was undoubtedly religion; a principle which in him seems to have contained nothing fierce or gloomy, nothing which enraged him against his adversaries, or terrified him with the dismal prospect of futurity. While every thing around him bore a hostile aspect; while friends, family, relations, whom he passionately loved, were placed at a distance, and unable to serve him; he reposed himself with confidence in the arms of that Being who penetrates and sustains all nature, and whose severities, if received with piety and resignation, he regarded as the surest pledges of unexhausted favour." Hume.

14 days." He replied, "He did not hear them read, and protested against the reading of them; and that these Articles brought up against him were not believed by them that drew them up: and he said (comparing this proceeding against him with the proceedings of the Council Table) that he did admire the justice of the Council Table, in regard of the arbitrary proceedings against him here." After this he was commanded to withdraw, and the lords ordered that the said sir John being impeached by Articles of the commons assembled in parliament, whereby he stands charged of high treason, and other high crimes, misdemeanors, and offences, shall stand committed to the Tower, there to be kept in safe custody until the pleasure of their house be further signified.—A warrant was immediately issued in that behalf; and it was ordered that the fine of 500*l.* imposed upon him, be presently estreated into the exchequer.

Next, a committee, consisting of the earls of Northumberland, Kent, Denbigh, Mulgrave, and Salisbury, with the lords North and Wharton, were appointed to consider which way to vindicate the honour of the house; and to prevent, for the future, the like Contempt which sir John Maynard had now offered at their bar. Mr. Baron Atkins and Mr. Justice Rolle were appointed to attend this committee.

Ordinance for the absolute Suppression of all Stage Plays.] About this time a very severe Ordinance passed both houses against Stage Players, Players of Interludes, &c. The preamble to this Ordinance is very remarkable, and shews how widely different the sentiments and fashions of the present age are from those of their ancestors in the 17th century. It runs thus:

"Whereas the acting of Stage Plays, Interludes, and common Plays, condemned by antient Heathens, and much less to be tolerated amongst professors of the Christian Religion, is the occasion of many and sundry great vices and disorders, tending to the high provocation of God's wrath and displeasure, which lies heavy upon this kingdom, and to the disturbance of the peace thereof; in regard whereof the same hath been prohibited by Ordinance of this present parliament, and yet is still presumed to be practised by divers in contempt thereof."—Then the Ordinance proceeds to enact, "That all Stage Players, Players of Interludes, and common Players, shall be taken to be Rogues, and punishable within the Statutes of the 39th Eliz. and the 7th James, and liable under the pains and penalties therein contained; and proceeded against according to the said statutes, notwithstanding any licence whatsoever from the king, or any other person for that purpose." By this Ordinance also the lord mayor, justices of the peace, and sheriffs of London and Westminster, and of the counties of Middlesex and Surry, or any two of them, were authorized to pull down all stage galleries, seats, and boxes used for the acting of Stage Plays or Interludes within their several jurisdictions; and all such common players and actors were to be proceeded against as Rogues, if they still persisted to act. Every person present as a spectator at any Stage Play or Interlude hereby prohibited, was, for every time he should be so present, to forfeit 5s. to the use of the poor of the parish, being convicted thereof by his own confession, or proof of one witness upon oath, before one justice of the peace. And all mayors, bailiffs, constables, soldiers, &c. to be aiding and assisting in the execution of this Ordinance, upon pain of being fined for their neglect or refusal."

Declaration of the Commons, expressing their Reasons for declining any further Application to the King.] Feb. 11. The commons had been some time employed in framing a Declaration to go along with the Votes of both houses, passed on the 15th of January last, against any further Application to the King, or receiving any Messages from him; the aim of which was to satisfy the whole kingdom of the necessity and justice of their Proceedings against his majesty. There had been many divisions of the house on the several Additions and Alterations in this Declaration; which being at length fully settled, a motion was this day made, That the same do pass, which was carried in the affirmative, by 80 voices against 50: the Tellers on this remarkable occasion were, for the question, sir Arthur Heslerig and sir Peter Wentworth; against it, sir John Evelyn of Surrey and Mr. Bulkeley. Next, it was resolved that this Declaration be forthwith printed and published; and it was particularly referred to the care of Mr. Lisle and Mr. Chaloner,* to see that the same be truly and well printed; all the members were also required to send copies thereof to be published and dispersed in the respective places for which they served. We shall give the whole at large from the original edition published by order of the house of commons only†; the concurrence of the lords not having been desired for that purpose‡:

A DECLARATION of the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, expressing their Reasons and Grounds of passing the late Resolutions touching no farther Address or Application to be made to the King.

"How fruitless our former Addresses have been to the king, is so well known to the world, that it may be expected we should now declare why we made the last, or so many before, rather than why we are resolved to make no more. We cannot acknowledge any great confidence that our words could have been more persuasive with him than Sighs and Groans; the Tears and crying Blood (an heavy Cry); the Blood of Fathers, Brothers, and Children at once; the Blood of many hundred thousand free-born subjects in three great kingdoms, which cruelty itself could not but pity to destroy. We must not be so unthankful to God, as to forget we never were forced to any treaty; and yet we have no less than seven times made such applications to the King, and tendered such Propositions that might occasion the world to judge we have not only yielded up our wills and affections, but our reason also and judgment, for obtaining any true peace or good accommodation. But it never yet pleased the King to accept of any tender fit for us to make, nor yet to offer any fit for us to receive. It is very well known that the Propositions sent to the King at Oxford, and treated on at Uxbridge, were agreed on by the parliaments of both kingdoms, not only as just, but necessary also for the very being of these kingdoms in a settled peace and safety. And although the King's persisting in his wonted ways and denials, might have caused us to improve the advantage of that great success which it pleased God to afford us, yet when his armies were all broken, so that, in disguise, he fled from Oxford to the Scots at Newark, and from thence went to Newcastle; and that Oxford, and almost all his garrisons were taken, we tendered, at Newcastle, Propositions, the same in effect with those which had been presented before in the midst of all his strength and forces.—And notwithstanding this change of his condition, and denial of those Propositions, after he was left to the Commissioners of Parliament, and our Brethren of Scotland quietly departed home; after all his garrisons taken, and no visible force in the whole kingdom appearing for him, the King being at the sole disposal of the parliament without dispute; yet even then the same Propositions were again presented to him at Hampton-Court.—In all which Addresses the Commissioners of Scotland agreed with us, and joined with our commissioners in attending the King.—The King not granting our Propositions, but still giving such strange, unexpected, and conditional Answers or Denials, it might justly have made us consider some other course for settling the kingdom in peace and safety, without any further application; which was also so far agreed by our brethren of Scotland, at their leaving Newcastle, that their Commissioners declared, in case the King consented not to the Propositions, yet they would maintain the treaties and union made between the kingdoms. But so desirous were we of his concurrence in the settlement of the kingdom's peace, that we yet again resolved upon another Address, and did so qualify the said Propositions, that, where it might stand with the public safety, his wonted scruples and objections were prevented or removed.—And although we could not forget how dangerous and void of success our former treaties had been, and that a personal treaty had been declared, by both houses and the commissioners of Scotland, to be unsafe, without security and satisfaction first given; yet we also yielded to that, on condition the king would sign but four Bills, which we judged not only just and honourable, but necessary even for present peace and safety during such a treaty.—We have cause enough to remember, that he sometimes denied to receive our humble Petitions for Peace; and when we desired him to appoint some place for a committee of both houses to attend him with Propositions for Peace, he named Windsor, promising to abide thereabouts till they came unto him; but presently marched forward, that very night, so near London, that he had almost surprised it, while he had so engaged himself for a treaty, had not some few of our foot at Brainford, with invincible courage, exposed themselves to apparent death, till his army was forced to retire in fear and shame, with the guilt of most inhuman and barbarous cruelties committed at Brainford to assure London, what it must have expected, had not God prevented those bloody designs.—And we well remember, that the King once sent us a specious Message of renewing a treaty, when at the same time his messenger was instructed how to manage that bloody Massacre in London, which was then designed by virtue of the king's commission, since published.—And, about the time of the Treaty at Uxbridge, he excused himself to the Queen by a Letter under his own hand, as forced to that treaty by the mutinous motions of his mungrel parliament at Oxford; and that he could not find any two of them of his mind, else he would not have acknowledged us for the parliament of England; which yet he did with a protestation, entered into the Council-Books, That his calling us so, did not make us a parliament. All which was but small encouragements again to make ourselves his sport or scorn by any other treaty; yet we now yielded to this also.—But notwithstanding this and all former tenders, we have now received such a denial, that we are in despair of any good by addresses to the King, neither must we be so injurious to the people, in further delaying their settlement, as any more to press his consent to these or any other Propositions. Nor can we see why it should be expected a new Engagement could prevail on him, or oblige him more strongly to the kingdom, than the solemn Oath of his Coronation, and the several other Vows, Protestations, and Imprecations so frequently by him broken, during his whole reign, and so often renewed before God and the whole world.—We may be the more justified herein by those that know what passed between the King and our Brethren the Scots, when those Articles were agreed and confirmed in the first pacification, not long before these wars; which, as soon as their backs were turned, and their armies out of sight, were disavowed again by the king, and by his command publicly burnt at London by the hands of the hangman.

Which yet might have been forgotten, had not a continued track of breach of trust to the three kingdoms, since he wore the crown, made us, though unwilling, to remember it. We take no pleasure to repeat our own miseries, or others mischief, if it might be hidden or forgotten; but we are now forced to speak what hath long been suffered in too much silence. The King himself, in public Speeches and Declarations, hath laid a fit foundation for all tyranny, by this most destructive maxim or principle, which he saith he must avow, 'That he oweth an account of his actions to none but God alone; and that the houses of parliament, joint or separate, have no power either to make or declare any Law.' The private Articles agreed, in order to the Match with Spain, and those other private Articles upon the French Marriage, so prejudicial to the peace, safety, laws, and religion here established, and the continued correspondence which hath since been carried on with Rome, are so evident as cannot be denied.—We cannot but call to mind the Proceedings and Passages of the parliament held in the 2nd year of this king's reign, concerning the Death of his Royal Father. The 10th of May, 1626, the house of commons charged the duke of Buckingham, among other things, in these words, * viz. "Whereas the sworn physicians of our late sovereign lord king James, of blessed memory, attending on his majesty in the month of March, in the 22nd year of his most glorious reign, in the times of his sickness, being an ague, did, in due and necessary care of and for the recovery of his health, and preservation of his person, upon and after several mature consultations in that behalf had and holden at several times in the same month, resolve, and gave directions, That nothing should be applied or given unto his highness, by way of physic or diet, during his said sickness, but by and upon their general advice and consents: And, after good deliberation thereof first had, more especially by their like care and upon like consultations, did justly resolve and publickly gave warning to and for all the gentlemen and other servants and officers of his said late majesty's bedchamber, That no meat or drink whatsoever should be given unto him within 2 or 3 hours next before the usual time of and for the coming of his fit in the said ague, nor during the continuance thereof, nor afterwards, until his cold fit was past; the said duke of Buckingham being a sworn servant of his late majesty, of and in his majesty's said bedchamber, contrary to his duty, and the tender respect which he ought to have had of his majesty's most sacred person, and after the consultations, resolutions, directions, and warning aforesaid, did nevertheless, without any sufficient warrant in that behalf, unduly cause and procure certain plaisters, and a certain drink or potion to be provided for the use of his said majesty, without the direction or privity of his said late majesty's physicians, not prepared by any of his majesty's sworn apothecaries or surgeons, but compounded of several ingredients to them unknown; notwithstanding the same plaister, or some plaister like thereunto, having been formerly administered unto his said majesty, did procure such ill effects, as that some of the said sworn physicians did altogether disallow thereof, and utterly refuse to meddle any further with his said majesty until those plaisters were removed, as being prejudicial to the health of his majesty; yet, nevertheless, the same plaister, as also a drink or potion, was provided by him the said duke, which he the said duke, by colour of some insufficient and slight pretences, did, upon Monday the 21st day of March, in the 22nd year aforesaid, when his majesty, by the judgment of his said physicians, was in the declination of his disease, cause and procure the said plaister to be applied to the breast and wrists of his said late majesty; and then also, at and in his majesty's fit of his said ague, the same Monday, and at several times, within two hours before the coming of the same fit, and before his majesty's then cold fit was past, did deliver, and cause to be delivered, several quantities of the said drink or potion to his late majesty; who thereupon, at the same times, within the seasons in that behalf prohibited by his majesty's physicians as aforesaid, did, by the means and procurement of the said duke, drink and take divers quantities of the said drink or potion, applied and given unto, and taken and received by, his said majesty as aforesaid, great distempers and divers ill symptoms appeared upon his said majesty; insomuch that the said physicians finding his majesty the next morning much worse in the estate of his health, and holding a consultation thereabout, did, by joint consent, send unto the said duke, praying him not to adventure to minister unto his majesty any more physic without their allowance and approbation; and his said majesty himself, finding himself much diseased and afflicted with pain and sickness after his then fit, when, by the course of his disease, he expected intermission and ease, did attribute the cause of such his trouble unto the said plaister and drink, which the said duke had so given, and caused to be administered unto him; which said adventurous act, by a person obliged in duty and thankfulness, done to the person of so great a king, after so ill success of the like formerly administered, contrary to such directions as aforesaid, and accompanied with so unhappy an event, to the great grief and discomfort of all his majesty's subjects in general, is an offence and misdemeanour of so high a nature, as may justly be called, and is by the said commons, deemed to be, an act of transcendent presumption, and of dangerous consequence.—And delivered it at a conference to the lords. After which the king came into the lords house and took notice of that Charge, and told them he could be a witness to clear him in every one of them; unto which Charge no Answer came in until the 8th of June following; and the 10th day after, it was ordered by the house of peers to be communicated to the commons: but while the house were preparing to send up their Proofs, upon which they declared, 'That they doubted not but to have judgment against the said Duke,' the King expressed a sudden purpose to dissolve the parliament. And although the house of peers petitioned for its continuance, expressing their great and universal sorrow for his intentions to dissolve it; yet, notwithstanding all this, the said Parliament was dissolved the 15th day of the same June.—At the same time also, during the parliament, sir Dudley Diggs and sir John Elliot, who specially managed that Conference and Examinations, were committed close prisoners to the Tower, within two days after the said Charge, by warrant under the king's own hand. And Messages and Interruptions were constantly sent from the King to the houses while they had the said Charge in agitation; and the parliament being dissolved before justice could be done, there never was any legal inquiry made, at any time since, concerning the Death of the said King.—We leave the world now to judge where the guilt of this remains.—We can fully shew how Rochelle was by him betrayed, and thereby a fatal blow given to the Protestant cause in France. How also he lent divers of the navy royal, and other merchant ships, to the French King, to be employed against those whom he was engaged to have assisted.—And, when some of the commanders and others in those ships were so much English as to dispute those Orders, we can shew the King's letter under his own hand to Capt. Pennington, to put them into the service of the French King, or to sink them in case of refusal.—We cannot forget the designs to enslave us by the German horse (that we say nothing of the late Spanish Fleet, with a great army therein, brought into the Downs, 1639) and to grind us by enforced Loans, Privy-Seals, Coat and Conduct-Money, inlarging of Forests, inclosing of Commons, ingrossing of Gunpowder, with innumerable Patents and Monopolies of malt, salt, sea-coal, soap, leather, wine, sugar, allom, farthings, pins, tobacco, and almost all things else; together with that one compendium of all oppression and slavery, called Ship-Money.—The torture of our bodies, by most cruel whippings, slitting of noses, cutting off ears, branding of cheeks, racks and pillories, with close imprisonment at pleasure, might be the sooner forgotten, had not our souls been also lorded over, led captive into superstition and idolatry; triumphed on by oaths ex officio, excommunications, ceremonious Articles, new Canons, Canon Oaths, &c.—One thing more was found to make us worse than slaves, in that we might not hope for liberty: the very name of Parliament became so odious at the court, that if in 12 years time there was so much as one summoned, it served but to shew the lawless power of those that could not be content only to dissolve it at pleasure, but we must be forbidden, by proclamation, to speak or hope for another parliament: and, at such dissolutions, there was no privilege strong enough to secure the closets, cabinets, pockets, and persons of those that, in duty and conscience, did but vote or act as men above mere slaves; this was fault enough for close imprisonment and death; for that hath also followed.—Nor was it enough thus to enslave one kingdom; but the same projectors who had so enthralled England, must contrive also to reduce Ireland, and conform Scotland, that so the mingling of neighbour tears might, by sympathy, increase each others woe. Scotland was to be the first scene; where a new Liturgy, with new Canons, are to make the prologue to the following act. This not succeeding as was hoped, an Army must be raised to force compliance; but, by the mediation of the English lords, a pacification is concluded, and it held till the King's return to court made him forget and disavow it; but the burnt Articles left ashes enough to beget a new flame. There wanted but a form of law to make all just; for this and for Supply, not for advice, a parliament is ventured on; yet with proviso, that it should not hurt, although it would not help; and not complying (as was hoped to assist that war against the Scots) was crime enough to merit dissolution, with a false and scandalous Declaration, in the King's name. The parliament being dissolved, the King took from his subjects by power what he could not otherwise obtain.—We need not tell the world how, in the midst of all our miseries, the Scots, our Brethren, entered with a powerful army, marching on as friends, till they were forced to make their passage over Tyne. It was then thought necessary by the King to summon this present parliament; in which we did proceed with ease so long as there was but any hope we would comply with him against the Scots, and give assistance to that war. But he quickly found it vain to hope to be supplied by us against the Scots: and when we began to consider how we came to be again involved in a new war, notwithstanding the late pacification, we saw it impossible to quash those pernicious councils at the present, or to prevent them for the future, without questioning their authors. At this the King discovered himself so strongly and passionately affected to such malignant counsellors, and their counsels, that he would sooner desert or force his parliament and kingdom, than alter his course, and deliver up his wicked counsellors to law and justice.—By this time the Queen's pious design (as they termed it) to advance Popery was almost ready for the birth, being helped much by a Popish Fast, enjoined weekly by the Pope's Nuncio, and by Letters from secretary Windebank, who durst not abide examination; but, after he was questioned by the house of commons, got a pass from the king to go beyond sea.—What was done abroad will hereafter appear, although the king made light of all our intelligence from foreign parts, yet he could not so well avoid or deny the commissions given at court to Popish agents for private levies; or that the Papists began to rise and arm themselves in the north-west of England and Wales, till they were suppressed; or that there were regiments raising and listing in London, and parts adjoining, under pretence of Soldiers for Portugal; or that some of these came to seize and possess themselves of the Tower, and the lieutenant threatened for refusing them; all which he knew might be sufficiently proved. To the like pious design we may refer the great Cabal for bringing up the Northern Army to over-awe the parliament, which the King did so often and solemnly disavow, as nothing but loose discourses of a modest Petition, which also vanished 2 or 3 months, he saith, before we knew it. But he now knoweth we can prove the chief part of that Cabal came from himself to the main actors; and that some of them did dissuade him from his way, because it was so sharp and high, exceeding the limits of honour and law: and yet their Propositions, which were the lower way, were much above the size of Petitions, as they are already published in their own Confessions. And it is very strange Mr. Piercy, sir John Suckling, and Mr. Germin (sent away by the King's special warrant) should fly beyond sea only upon discovery of a modest Petition.—But notwithstanding any dissuasions, yet the King persisted in his way; so that, after this, there was appointed a meeting of Officers at Boroughbridge, and Propositions made, with private Instructions brought from the King, by some that told them they were unwise to shew their teeth, except they would bite; and that the King would pawn his Jewels for them, would they be faithful to him; and if they marched forward, they should be met by the Prince and the earl of Newcastle, with a good body of horse; and that the French also would be ready to assist them. This was in April, and we had notice of this in the beginning of May; when also there was a Design for some French to have seized on Portsmouth, whither the Queen was then going; but the ports were better secured by a special committee.—So far was it also from vanishing divers months before our notice, that some of those Cabalists, after Examination by us, were again attempted by the King, and some of them sent again to the Army with new Instructions and Directions, signed by the King himself, as most clearly appeareth by comparing the Journals of May 1641, with the months following; together with the time specified in the Confessions of sir Jacob Astley, sir John Conyers, col. Legg, and others, already published.—And when there was yet demur, among the chief officers, there went another agent from court to quicken them, and treat of some Directions signed by the King; but he was to go farther, the Scots Army being then at Newcastle.—What Offers were made to them of the plunder of London, if they would advance, or of 4 Northern Counties, with 300,000*l.* or jewels of great value, but to stand neuters in that design, is already declared by some who may better know the Propositions made by O' Neal, (who brake prison here) sir John Henderson, and others, with letters of credence from the King. After that he was so resolute to go into Scotland, that he could not be persuaded, by our Petitions, to defer that journey; and though in the year 1641, he was not pleased to leave such a Commission as the parliament desired of him, yet was he pleased before, in the year 1639, to intrust secretary Windebanke, a known favourer of papists, with blank sheets, both of parchment and paper, signed with his sign manual, which were employed by him for disposing great commands by land and sea.—It is well known what Letters the King sent into Ireland by the lord Dillon, immediately before the Rebellion; and where the Great Seal of Scotland was, and in whose hands, when that commission was sealed at Edinburgh to the Irish Rebels, who dispersed copies thereof in Ireland, with Letters or Proclamations; and we have a Copy thereof, attested by oath, with Depositions also of those who have seen it under the seal: which commission was promised (as some of the chiefest Rebels confessed) to the Irish Committee at London, for the most part Papists, (which was thought a good omen) and since most active rebels; upon whose private mediations the King gave away more than five counties; saying, 'That he expected they should recompence him some other way;' and, 'that he would willingly grant all their Desires, but he was oppressed by the parliament in England, of whom he wished that he could be revenged.'—It hath formerly been declared, how we desired and pressed the King to disband that Irish Popish army, which (as was cleared at the earl of Strafford's Trial) was raised to reduce the kingdoms: but sometimes he would give no Answer at all; and sometimes did plainly tell us, 'He could not disband it, for reasons best known to himself.' Sometimes the Scots must first disband; and then there was a new pretence of divers regiments promised to Spain; for which the King was engaged, and could not go back. Which we now wonder not at; for by the confession of Macarte and Macguire, with others, it is clear, that this pretence of men for the King of Spain's service, was but a colour to keep some in arms for a foundation of that Rebellion; and that some of the committee coming from London, contrived this Plot for defence of the King, who was then, they said, so much injured in England and Scotland.—And the first clause of that Oath enjoined by the general council of rebels was, 'To bear true faith and allegiance to king Charles, and by all means to maintain his royal prerogative against the Puritans

' in the parliament of England.'—And although we declared to the King, That they styled themselves the King's or Queen's Army, yet we could not obtain a Proclamation against them in divers months; and then also but 40 copies might be printed, and express order given, That none should be published till his further directions, as appeareth under his own secretary's hand.—Which might very well stand with the Letters from court to the lord Muskerry, a great rebel in Munster, who was assured his majesty was well pleased with what he did, and would in time give him thanks for it, although, for the present, it did not then stand with the convenience of the King's affairs to give him public countenance: and this was afterwards made good by the King, who, in one of the Letters taken at Naseby, commandeth the earl of Ormond to give particular thanks to the said Muskerry and Plunket.—We may yet remember how the earl of Leicester was delayed and detained by the King, beyond all pretence, from going against the rebels. How also the King refused a commission, often asked by both houses, for the lord Brooke and the lord Wharton; when, at several times, there were large provisions made for relief of Munster, and other parts so much distressed, that Limerick was wholly lost. But when the Rebels wanted commanders at their very beginning, we have long since named divers papists and persons of quality that, by the King's special warrants, after the ports were shut by both houses of parliament, passed hence, and headed the said Rebels. And we likewise named commanders and officers, whom the King called off from their trust against the Rebels, and ships from their guards at sea, that so the rebels might be supplied with foreign aids: besides, all the arms and ammunition they had from the King's magazine there, and from hence also by the earl of Antrim, lord Aboyn, and others from the Queen, although the council of Ireland, desiring some pieces of battery from hence for the poor Protestants there, could not obtain them from the King; but some of our ships sent to relieve them, were seized by his men of war (as the cloaths and other provisions by land) and sold or exchanged for arms and ammunition for the King; and the Rebels gave letters of mart for taking the parliament's ships; but freed the King's as their very good friends.—Let the world now judge how much reason we had to believe the Rebels, when they did so often swear they did nothing without good authority and commission from the King; so that sir Phelim O'Neal would not be persuaded general Lesley had any authority from the King against the Rebels.—Divers months also before it began, there was information given, upon oath, to the archbishop and others of the king's council, That there was a great design among the Papists for a general Massacre of all the Protestants in Ireland and England also, and that a great royal person had a hand in it; but it was to be managed by direction from the Pope. And besides the King's Letters to the Pope, when he was in Spain, and others, long since his return, on the behalf of the duke of Lorrain, (which must be requited by the said duke with a foreign army to invade England upon the king's design) it is clear that some months before the Irish Rebellion, the King had an agent in Rome, as by divers of his own secretary's papers appeareth.—And that the same designs were laid for England also at the same time, if we might not believe the confession of the Queen-Mother's servant, attested upon oath, that there were many thousands appointed to cut the Protestants throats in this kingdom also, when the King went to Scotland, yet we may remember it was confessed by some of the principal rebels, That their Popish committee here with the King had communicated that design to many Papists in England, by whose advice, though some things were altered, yet it was generally concluded that, about the same time, there should be the like proceedings of the Papists here; insomuch that when Charles-Mount was seized in Ireland, sir Phelim O'Neal and other great Rebels did, with much confidence, affirm the Tower was also seized at London, and the archbishop released by their party here; where, they said, there was as much blood running as in Ireland.—And it is very well known that, upon the King's return from Scotland, besides the unusual preparations of ammunition and arms, with new Guards within and about Whitehall; and besides the great quantity of fire-works found and taken in Papists houses, the Tower was also filled with new guards, many cannoneers, grana- does, and all sorts of fire-works, mortars, with great pieces of battery, ready prepared and mounted against the city: sir Wm. Balfour, who was formerly threatened for refusing the new guards while the earl of Strafford lived, was now displaced, and such officers placed by the King, as were not only suspected by us, but the whole city, who durst not abide in their own houses, as by their several Petitions is manifest. From this time the track of open force against this parliament and kingdom did appear more visible. The charge of Treason against some of both houses, and that unpa- ralleled act of violence, by the King's coming so attended to the house of commons, after he had discharged our guards, denying us any but what might restrain or overawe us, was but the prologue to a bloody tragedy, had not the parliament and the good affections of the city interrupted that design, and caused the King's new guards (already listed and moulded under colonels and other officers) to withdraw a little to another scene.—Neither would the country more comply with these designs, although they were attempted with unusual arguments of armed troops in warlike manner to compel them; which succeeded yet so ill, that the lord Digby durst not abide the trial, but was sent away upon a special errand by the king's own warrant. What his errand was beyond sea we may well conclude from the List of Arms and Ammunition, for which we can pro- duce the King's own hand, taken amongst his Papers, and printed with his own Letters to the Queen at her first landing in Holland.—What Advice he gave for the King's retiring to some safe place, and declare himself; and how the king followed it, is known well enough. But before the king's settling at York, the notice we had of his commissions to the earl of Newcastle and col. Legg, for attempting New- castle and Hull, may justly occasion us to pro- vide for their security; especially when we had certain intelligence from the Low Coun- tries of foreign forces from Denmark to come in about Hull; whither also came with the lord Digby divers commanders, with much am- munition and arms from other foreign parts.— And had not the Swedes at that time invaded part of the king of Denmark's dominions, we had had reason enough to expect a storm that way to have fallen also on Hull, where was then a great magazine: and before we ever asked the King to remove it, we represented to him, that, besides all other intelligence of foreign negotiations, we had good notice of a Fleet preparing in Denmark; and that one of lord Digby's servants had solicited a mariner, or pilot, to conduct it into Hull. And, before that time, the King had dispatched an agent into Denmark, with letters of credit, com- plaining against the parliament as unjustly fixed on the destruction of one man (the earl of Strafford, then living); but he was resolved to take another course, and therefore desired aid.—And there came such an Answer, that, among large offers made to the Scots before the King's going into Scotland, they were told the king was assured of horses and money from Denmark. And, by an intercepted Letter from the Hague to secretary Nicholas, long since published, we found that, besides many arms and cannon, then provided in Holland, there were also coming from Denmark ships with 10,000 arms for foot, and 1500 horse for the King's use; and that Cochran very hand- somely evaded that which was like to have frustrated all their expectations from thence. And in Cochran's latter Instructions, (for there had been others before in Denmark) long since printed, the King saith, 'We were 'then beginning to make head against him, 'and were then levying Forces;' and therefore he presseth for men, money, arms, and ships from Denmark; for which also he useth many arguments, and, among others, one in these words: 'That, in pursuance of their great de- 'sign of extirpating the royal blood and mo- 'narchy of England, they have endeavoured 'likewise to lay a great blemish upon his royal 'family; endeavouring to illegitimate all de- 'rived from his sister, at once to cut off the 'interest and pretensions of the whole race; 'which their most detestable and scandalous 'design they have pursued, examining wit- 'nesses, and conferring circumstances and 'times to colour their pretensions in so great

‘a fault; and which, as his sacred majesty of England, in the true sense of honour of his mother, doth abhor, and will punish; so he expects his concurrence in vindicating a sister of so happy memory, and by whom so near an union and continued league of amity hath been produced between the families and kingdoms.’—A most false scandalous Charge of that which never entered into our thoughts; so that we believe there never was a more unworthy act done by any prince, so to betray his trust and people to a foreign nation, by incensing them with such an odious slander to the shame of his own mother; which we repeat the rather, because when we declared our intelligence that Cochran was sent into Denmark to procure forces thence, the King disavowed it, calling it ‘a vile Scandal,’ in his Answer to our Declaration of the 22nd Oct. 1642. In the same Instructions to Cochran he declareth also, ‘That he then expected assistance from all his neighbour princes and allies, in particular the greatest part of the States Fleet from Holland; whither,’ he confessed, ‘he had then sent the Queen.’—He might also have added, that, with the Queen, contrary to his trust, he had sent the antient Jewels of the Crown of England, of a very vast value, to be pawned or sold for ammunition and arms; of which we had certain knowledge before we took up arms.—Neither had we so much as once asked the settling of the Militia till the Queen was going into Holland. And it may be remembered that, many months before the voyage to Holland, she was going beyond sea, had not our motions to the king staid her; and that, among other reasons given, because we then also heard she had packed up the Crown Jewels and Plate; by which we might see what was then also intended by that journey, had we not prevented it till the winter. But at Boroughbridge, before the earl of Strafford’s death, the officers were told the king would pawn his Jewels for them, and the French were promised to assist them.—All this, and much more yet to be said, maketh us stand amazed at the King’s solemn Protestation, so often made, calling God to witness, and revenge it also, if he had any thought of bringing up the Northern Army; or of levying forces to wage war with his parliament; or to invade the rights of his subjects; or of bringing in foreign forces or aids from beyond sea, ‘which,’ as himself saith in his Declarations, ‘would not only have buried this kingdom in sudden destruction and ruin, but his own name and posterity in perpetual scorn and infamy.’ Yet, at very first, when himself and the lords made such a Protestation at York against levying forces, he commanded his subjects, by Proclamation, to resist the Orders of parliament; and had signed that most illegal Commission of Array; and did privately contrive the getting out of the stores, ships, or otherwise, such ordnance, powder, shot, and ammunition, as could be possibly got and provided; for which we can produce a Letter of the 20th of June, 1642, under his own hand, to sir John Heydon, lieutenant of the Ordnance, to convey it secretly in ballast of ships; and required subscriptions for plate, horses, and arms; and had also raised such guards of horse and foot about him, that, by them, he did not only abuse our committees sent unto him; beat our public officers and messengers; protect notorious papists, traitors, or felons, such as Beckwith and others, from the posse comitatus; but also, with those guards, cannons, and arms from beyond sea, did attempt to force Hull in an hostile manner; and that within few days after that solemn Protestation at York.—It was not long before he proclaimed us Rebels and Traitors, setting up his standard against the Parliament, which never any king of England did before himself. Nor did ever any but king Charles set up a Mock Parliament at Oxford, or any other place, to oppose and protest against the Parliament of England, which himself and both houses had continued by act of parliament. And when he had made those pretended members at Oxford to falsify their faith and trust they owed to this kingdom, finding that by them he could not carry on his own pernicious designs, he derided their meeting in a Letter to the Queen, and called them a ‘Mungrel Parliament;’ whereby his own party may perceive what reward they must expect when they have done their utmost to shipwreck their faith and conscience to his will and tyranny.—And for calling in of foreign forces, besides that which we have said already, it is very well known by his own Letters taken at Naseby, and the lord Digby’s Cabinet, what negotiations he hath long had in all states round about us. We have also remaining with us an authentic Copy of his Commission for calling over 10,000 of the Irish Rebels to subdue this parliament, the ‘disloyal and rebellious’ city of London, as he calleth it; and for this purpose, expressly against an act of parliament, he made a pacification first, and since a Peace, with those most cruel bloody Rebels, on such odious, shameful, and unworthy conditions, that himself blushed to own or impart them to his own lieutenant the earl of Ormond; but a private commission was made to the lord Herbert, called earl of Glamorgan, commanding him to manage it with all possible secrecy.—And for letting us see this secret commission, which was taken at Sligo, the said lord did endure a specious confinement.—Neither do we, by this time, wonder he should forget his Vows and Protestations, ‘That he would never consent, upon whatsoever pretence, to a toleration of the Popish Profession, or abolition of the Laws then in Force against Recusants,’ with most solemn Imprecations, ‘that God would so deal with him and his, as he continued in such professions, and inviolably kept those Protestations;’ notwithstanding, about the very same time, it appears, by Letters under his own hand to the Queen and the earl of Ormond, that he would consent to the taking away all penal laws against Papists both in England and Ireland.—And also we had sufficient notice and proofs of most of these things before, notwithstanding all his breach of trust with the protestants in France, Scotland, Ireland, and this kingdom; which, besides all other oppressions by unjust prerogative, he hath so often endeavoured to enslave by German, Spanish, French, Lorrain, Irish, Danish, and other foreign forces, yet so really we sought his own, as well as the kingdom's, peace and happiness, that, after so many denials, we made this last application, so just and honourable, that we cannot but now conclude, he hath wholly forgotten, not only his duty to the kingdom, but also the care and respect he owes to himself and his own family.—These are some few of the many Reasons why we cannot repose any more trust in him, and have made those former resolutions; yet we shall use our utmost endeavours to settle the present government, as may best stand with the peace and happiness of this kingdom."

Lord Clarendon writes *, "That this Declaration found much opposition in the house of commons, in respect of the particular reproaches they had now cast upon the person of the king, which they had heretofore, in their own-published Declarations to the people, charged upon the evil counsellors and persons about him; and some persons had been sentenced and condemned for those very crimes which they now accused his majesty of. But there was much more exception to their conclusion from those premises, that therefore they would address themselves no more to him; and John Maynard, a member of the house, and a lawyer of great eminence, who had too much complied and concurred with their irregular and unjust proceedings, after he had with great vehemence opposed and contradicted the most odious parts of their Declaration, told them plainly, "That by this resolution of making no more Addresses to the King, they did, as far as in them lay, dissolve the parliament; and that, from the time of that determination, he knew not with what security, in point of law, they could meet together, or any man join with them in their counsels: That it was of the essence of parliament that they should, upon all occasions, repair to the king; and that his majesty's refusal at any time to receive their Petitions, or to admit their Addresses, had been always held the highest breach of their privilege, because it tended to their dissolution without dissolving them; and therefore if they should now, on their parts, determine that they would receive no more Messages from him, which was likewise a part of their Declaration, nor make any more Address to him, they did, upon the matter, declare that they were no longer a parliament; and then, how could the people look upon them as such?" This argumentation being boldly pressed by a man of that learning and authority, who had very seldom not been believed, made a great impression upon all men who had not prostituted themselves to Cromwell and his party. But the other side meant not to maintain their resolution by discourses, well knowing where their strength lay; and so still called for the question, which was carried by a plurality of voices, as they foresaw it would; very many persons who abhorred the determination not having courage to provoke the powerful men by owning their dissent; others satisfying themselves with the resolution to withdraw themselves, and to bear no farther part in their counsels; which Maynard himself did, and came no more to the house in very many months, nor till there seemed to be such an alteration in the minds of men, that there would be a reversal of that monstrous determination; and many others did the same." His lordship proceeds to inform us, "That the publishing this Declaration wrought very different effects in the minds of the people, from what they expected it would produce; and it appeared to be so publicly detested, that many who had served the parliament in several unwarrantable employments and commissions, from the beginning of the war, in the city and in the country, withdrew themselves from the service of the parliament, and much inveighed against it for declining all the principles upon which they had engaged them. Many private persons took upon them to publish Answers to that Declaration, that, the King himself being under so strict a restraint that he could make no Answer, the people might not be poisoned with the belief of it. And the several Answers of this kind wrought very much upon the people, who opened their mouths very loud against the parliament and the Army; and the clamour was increased by the increase of taxes and impositions, which were raised by new Ordinances of parliament upon the Kingdom."

The King's Declaration to all his Subjects thereupon.] The following Declaration of the King, occasioned by the Votes against any further Address to him, printed at this very time, and said, in the title-page thereof, to be published by his majesty's special command; with an Answer to the foregoing Declaration of the Commons, published by his appointment, are of such authority as to demand a place in these enquiries. The names of the printers are not affixed to either of them, nor is it to be expected any would dare to own them at a crisis when it was declared high treason to hold any correspondence with his majesty without leave of the parliament; but, by several typographical circumstances, they appear to have been printed by Royston; and this conjecture is confirmed by their being reprinted in his edition of the King's Works.*

* In the Life of King Charles, prefixed to the folio edition of his works, we are told, That the first of these two pieces was written by the king himself, and the other by sir Edward Hyde, afterwards earl of Clarendon. The above

The KING'S DECLARATION to all his Subjects; Carisbrook-Castle, Jan. 18, 1647.

"To all my people, of whatsoever Nation, Quality, or Condition.—Am I thus laid aside, and must I not speak for myself? No: I will speak, and that to all my people; (which I would have rather done by the way of my two houses of Parliament, but that there is a public Order neither to make Addresses to, or receive Messages from me) and who but you can be judge of the differences betwixt me and my two houses? I know none else; for I am sure you it is who will enjoy the happiness, or feel the misery, of good or ill government; and we all pretend who should run fastest to serve you, without having a regard, at least in the first place, to particular interests: and therefore I desire you to consider the state I am, and have been, in this long time, and whether my actions have more tended to the public or my own particular good; for whosoever will look upon me barely, as I am a man, without that liberty (which the meanest of my subjects enjoy) of going whither, and conversing with whom, I will; as a husband and father, without the comfort of my wife and children; or, lastly, as a King, without the least shew of authority or power to protect my distressed subjects; must conclude me not only void of all natural affection, but also to want common understanding, if I should not most cheerfully embrace the readiest way to the settlement of these distracted kingdoms: as also, on the other side, do but consider the form and draught of the Bills lately presented unto me, and, as they are the conditions of a Treaty, ye will conclude that the same spirit which hath still been able to frustrate all my sincere and fact is confirmed by the following extract from the Life of the noble historian: "The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Hyde) no sooner received a copy of the Vote that no more Addresses should be made to the King, than he prepared a very large and full Answer to it; in which he made the malice and the treason of that libellous Declaration to appear, and his majesty's innocence in all the particulars charged upon him, with such pathetic applications and insinuations, as were most like to work upon the affections of the people: all which was transmitted (by the care of Mr. Secretary Nicholas, who resided at Caen, in Normandy, and held a constant correspondence with the Chancellor) to a trusty hand in London; who caused it to be well printed, and divulged, and found means to send it to the King; who, after he had read it, said he durst swear it was writ by the Chancellor, if it were not that there was more divinity in it, than he expected from him, which made him believe he had conferred with Dr. Steward. But some months after, being informed by Secretary Nicholas, he sent the Chancellor thanks for it; and expressed, upon all occasions, that he was much pleased with that Vindication." Vol. I. octavo edit. p. 204.

constant endeavours for Peace, hath had a powerful influence on this Message; for though I was ready to grant the substance, and comply with what they seem to desire, yet, as they had framed it, I could not agree thereunto, without deeply wounding my conscience and honour, and betraying the trust reposed in me, by abandoning my people to the arbitrary and unlimited power of the two houses for ever, for the levying and maintaining of land or sea forces, without distinction of quality, or limitation for money taxes: and if I could have passed them in terms, how unheard-of a condition were it for a Treaty to grant beforehand the most considerable part of the subject matter? How ineffectual were that debate like to prove, wherein the most potent party had nothing of moment left to ask, and the other nothing more to give? So, consequently, how hopeless of mutual compliance, without which a Settlement is impossible: besides, if, after my concessions, the two houses should insist on those things from which I cannot depart, how desperate would the condition of these kingdoms be when the most proper and approved Remedy should become ineffectual.—Being, therefore, fully resolved that I could neither, in conscience, honour, or prudence, pass those four Bills, I only endeavoured to make the reasons and justice of my denial appear to all the world as they do to me, intending to give as little dissatisfaction to the two houses of parliament, without betraying my own cause, as the matter would bear. I was desirous to give my Answer of the 28th Dec. last, to the Commissioners, sealed (as I had done others heretofore, and sometimes at the desire of the commissioners); chiefly because, when my Messages or Answers were publickly known before they were read in the houses, prejudicial interpretations were forced on them, much differing, and sometimes contrary to my meaning: for example, my Answer from Hampton-Court was accused of dividing the two nations, because I promised to give satisfaction to the Scots in all things concerning that kingdom: and this last suffers in a contrary sense, by making me intend to interest Scotland in the laws of this kingdom, (than which nothing was, nor is, further from my thoughts) because I took notice of the Scots Commissioners protesting against the Bills and Propositions, as contrary to the interests and engagements of the two kingdoms: Indeed, if I had not mentioned their dissent, an objection, not without some probability, might have been made against me, both in respect the Scots are much concerned in the Bill for the Militia and in several other Propositions, and my silence might, with some justice, have seemed to approve of it; but the commissioners refusing to receive my Answer sealed, I (upon the engagement of their and the governor's honour, that no other use should be made, or notice taken of it, than as if it had not been seen) read and delivered it open to them; whereupon what hath since passed, either by the governor, in discharging most of my servants, redoubling the guards, and restraining me of my former liberty, (and all this, as himself confessed, merely out of his own dislike of my Answer, notwithstanding his before said Engagement) or afterwards by the two houses, as the governor affirms, in confining me within the circuit of this Castle, I appeal to God and the world, whether my said Answer deserved the reply of such proceedings; besides, the unlawfulness for subjects to imprison their King.—That, by the permission of Almighty God, I am reduced to this sad condition, as I no way repine, so I am not without hope but that the same God will, in due time, convert these afflictions unto my advantage. In the mean time I am content to bear these crosses with patience and a great equality of mind; but by what means or occasion I am come to this relapse in my affairs, I am utterly to seek; especially when I consider that I have sacrificed to my two houses of parliament, for the Peace of the kingdom, all but, what is much more dear to me than my life, my conscience and honour; desiring nothing more than to perform it in the most proper and natural way, a Personal Treaty. But that which makes me most at a loss, is the remembering my signal compliance with the Army and their interests; and of what importance my compliance was to them; and their often-repeated professions and engagements for my just rights, in general, at Newmarket and St. Alban's; and their particular explanations of those generals, by their voted and re-voted Proposals, which I had reason to understand should be the utmost extremity would be expected from me, and that in some things therein I should be eased (herein appealing to the consciences of some of the chiefest officers in the Army, if what I have said be not punctually true); and how I have failed of their expectations, or my professions to them, I challenge them and the whole world to produce the least colour of reason.—And now I would know what it is that is desired: Is it Peace? I have shewed the way, being both willing and desirous to perform my part in it, which is a just compliance with all chief interests. Is it Plenty and Happiness? They are the inseparable effects of Peace. Is it Security? I, who wish that all men would forgive and forget like me, have offered the Militia for my time. Is it Liberty of Conscience? He who wants it is most ready to give it. Is it the right Administration of Justice? Officers of trust are committed to the Choice of my two houses of parliament. Is it frequent Parliaments? I have legally, fully concurred therewith. Is it the Arrears of the Army? Upon a Settlement they will certainly be paid with much ease; but, before, there will be found much difficulty, if not impossibility, in it.—Thus all the world cannot but see my real and unwearied endeavours for Peace; the which, by the grace of God, I shall neither repent me of, nor ever be slack-ened in, notwithstanding my past, present, or future sufferings; but if I may not be heard, let every one judge who it is that obstructs the good I would or might do. What is it that men are afraid to hear from me? It cannot be reason, (at least none will declare themselves so unreasonable as to confess it) and it can less be impertinent or unreasonable discourses; for thereby, peradventure, I might more justify this my restraint than the causers themselves can do; so that, of all wonders yet, this is the greatest to me, but it may easily be gathered how those men intend to govern who have used me thus: and if it be my hard fate to fall together with the liberty of this kingdom, I shall not blush for myself, but much lament the future miseries of my people; the which I shall still pray to God to avert, whatever becomes of me. CHARLES R."

Answer to the foregoing Declaration of the Commons.] The Answer to the foregoing Declaration of the Commons is as follows:

AN ANSWER to a Pamphlet intitled, "A Declaration of the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, expressing their Reasons and Grounds of passing the late Resolutions touching no further Address or Application to be made to the King."

"I believe it was never heard of until now, that heavy imputations were laid on any man, (I speak not now of Kings, which I confess makes the case yet more strange and unjust) and he not permitted to see, much less to answer, them: but so it is now with the King; which does, though silently, yet subject him to as great an imputation as there is any in the said Declaration; for those who know no better may think that he cannot, because he does not, answer it: wherefore I hold it my duty, knowing these things better than every ordinary man, to do my best, that the King should not be injured by the ignorance of his people; and albeit I (lying under persecution for my conscience and love to regal authority) have not the means, in every thing, to make full probations; yet I am confident, in all the most material points, so to make the truth of the king's innocency appear, that I shall satisfy any impartial judicious reader.—What the issue of former Addresses to the King hath been, is most certainly known to all the world; but where the fault rests, whereby Peace hath not ensued, bare asseverations without proofs cannot, I am sure, satisfy any judicious reader. And, indeed, it seems to me that the penner of this seeks more to take the ears of the ignorant multitude with big words and bold assertions, than to satisfy rational men with real proofs or true arguments: for, at the very first, he begs the question, taking it for granted that the King could ease the sighs and groans, dry the tears, and stanch the blood of his distressed subjects. Alas! Is it he that keeps armies on foot when there is none to oppose? Is it he that will not lay down excise, taxations, and free quarterings? but it is he, indeed, who was so far from power, even at that time, being far worse since, that in most things he wanted the liberty of any free-born man: it is he who never refused to ease his people of their Grievances; witness more acts of grace passed in his reign than, to speak within my compass, in any five kings or queens times that were ever before him: moreover, it is he who, to settle the present unhappy distractions, and as the best means to it, to obtain a Personal Treaty, hath offered so much; that, to say truth, during his own time, he hath left himself little more than the title of a King; as it plainly appears by his Message from the Isle of Wight, concerning the Militia, and choosing the Officers of State and Privy Counsellors, besides other points of compliance, which it is needless here to mention.—Good God! are these Offers unfit for them to receive? have they tendered such Propositions that might occasion the world to judge that they have yielded up not only their wills and affections, but their reasons also and judgments, for obtaining a true Peace or good Accommodation? It is true that, if they can shew what reasonably they could have asked more, or wherein the King's Offers were deficient, either in point or security, or by with-holding from any of his subjects a jot of their just privileges, then they said somewhat to challenge belief: but bare asseverations, even against what a man sees, will not get credit with any but such who abandon their judgments to an implicit faith: nor can the determinations of all the parliaments in the world make a thing just or necessary, if it be not so of itself: and can it be imagined that any, who were ever acquainted with the Passages at the Treaties of Oxford and Uxbridge, will believe, though it be said, 'That the Propositions tendered at Newcastle were the same, in effect, which had been presented to the King before, in the midst of all his strength and forces?' indeed, methinks, such gross slips as these should, at least, make a man be wary how to believe such things, for which he sees no proofs; and yet it should seem that a man must either take their words for good payment, or remain unsatisfied; for, a little after, it is said, 'That the King's strange, unexpected, and conditional Answers or Denials might justly have made them consider some other course for settling the kingdom in peace and safety, without any further Application;' but never shewn wherein the strangeness of his Answers or Denials consists: and I should think that those reasons upon which the laying by of a king's authority is grounded, for it is no less, ought to be particularly mentioned for the world's satisfaction, and not involved in general big words: for it thereby seems, that it is their force of arms, more than that of reason, which they trust to for procuring of obedience to their determinations, or belief to what they say; otherwise can it be imagined that their saying, 'That their last Propositions were so qualified that, where it might stand with the public safety, the wonted scruples and objections were prevented or removed,' can give satisfaction to any rational man who hath seen all their former Propositions? for it is most evident that their demands have always increased with their good fortune.—And for their great condescension to a personal Treaty (which, under favour, can scarcely be called so; for the King, though he had granted what was desired, was not to come either to or near London, but to stay in the Isle of Wight, and there to treat with Commissioners) upon signing the four Bills, surely they incurred therein but little danger? for it is most evident that they contain the very substance of the most essential parts of their demands, which being once granted, the King would neither have had power to deny, nor any thing left worth the refusing; for after he had confessed that he had taken up arms to invade the liberty of his people, (whereas it was only for the defence of his own rights) and had likewise condemned all those who had faithfully served him, of rebellion; and that he had totally divested himself, his heirs, and successors for ever, of the power of the sword; whereby the protection of his subjects, which is one of the most essential and necessary rights belonging to regal authority, is totally torn away from the crown; and that, by a silent concession, he had done himself and successors an irreparable prejudice concerning the Great Seal (I speak not of the other two Bills, neither of which are of little importance); what was there more for him to grant, worth the insisting upon, after such concessions? or, indeed, what power was left him to deny any thing? So that the king's necessity of giving the Answer he did, for it was no absolute refusal, is most evident; unless he had resolved to have lived in quiet without honour, and to have given his people peace without safety, by abandoning them to an arbitrary and unlimited power of the two houses, for ever, concerning the levying of land or sea forces, without stinting of numbers or distinction of persons; and, for payments, to levy such sums of monies, in such sort, and by such ways and means as they shall think fit and appoint. And now I cannot but ask, Is this the Militia that the King contends for? or, did ever any king of England pretend to, or seek for such a power? surely no. But this is a new Militia, and take heed lest this should prove like the Roman Pretorian cohorts, that what they did in choosing and changing emperors, these do not to this government, by moulding and altering it according to their fancies. Now, my eagerness to clear this point concerning the four Bills, had almost made me forget a most material question: I wonder much wherein the danger consists of a Personal Treaty with the king ever since he was last at Newcastle: surely he cannot bring forces along with him to awe his two houses of parliament; and it is as well known that he hath not money to raise an army; and, truly, there is as little fear, that the eloquence of his tongue should work miracles; but, on the contrary, if he were so ill a man as you describe him to be, whatsoever he shall say or write, must more prejudice him than you: for, let him never flatter himself, it must be clear, not doubtful, reason that can prevail against that great visible prevailing power, which now opposes him; nor do I say it will, but certainly less cannot do it: Where is then the danger? believe it, reason will hardly maintain those who are afraid of her.—After this it is said, ‘That they had cause enough to remember that the King sometimes denied to receive their humble Petitions;’ but they neither tell where nor when, which I am most confident they cannot; but I am certain that the king hath sent divers Messages of peace to them, unto which he hath yet had no Answer; namely, his last from Oxford, of the 15th Jan. 1645, and all the rest since. As for the Fight at Brentford; whosoever will read the collections of the Declarations in print upon that subject, will clearly find that the king hath more reason to complain, that they, under colour of treaty, sought to environ him with their forces, than they for what he then did. And his retreat was neither for fear nor with shame; for the appearing of the enemy made him retard, not hasten, his orders for retiring, which divers hours before their appearing he had given; which he did without any loss at all; but, on the contrary, retreated with more arms, 11 colours, and 15 pieces of ordnance, besides good store of ammunition, than he had before: and, for cruelty; there was not a drop of blood shed but in the heat of the fight, for I saw above 500 prisoners, who, only promising never after to bear arms against the king, were freely released.—Again they seem to have good memories, saying, ‘That the king once sent them a specious Message of renewing a Treaty, when at the same time his messenger was instructed how to manage that bloody massacre in London, which was then designed by virtue of the king’s commission, since published:’ And hath the king sent but one Message for the renewing of a Treaty? then what was that from Tavistock, in August 1644, and five others from Oxford the next year, viz. of the 5th, 15th, 26th, and 29th Dec. and the 15th Jan. 1645? but indeed this, that is here mentioned, they knew not how to answer, (for at that time they knew not the way of silence) but by this forged accusation against the messenger; who, I dare say, knew nothing of that which might have been, at that time, intended for the king’s service by some who had more zeal than judgment; but that there was a massacre intended, or that any commission from the king should countenance such a design, is a most notorious slander.—As for the king’s mentioned Letter to the queen; I am confident that any judicious reader will find the gloss made upon it very much wrested: and certainly after-ages will think these times very barbarous, wherein private letters betwixt man and wife are published to open view; and, in other countries, there is such respect carried to private letters of princes that, to my knowledge, the last emperor, in the greatest heat of the Bohemian war, having intercepted a packet, wherein were private letters to king James of blessed memory, (who was then known to be no great friend to the emperor) from his only daughter, then avowedly the emperor’s greatest enemy; yet he sent them to the king, without the least offer of violence to the seals.—And now I come to their determination upon the whole matter, what course they have resolved to take with the King: their words are, ‘But, notwithstanding this and other former tenders, we have now received such a Denial, that we are in despair of any good by Addresses to the king; neither must we be so injurious to the people in further delaying their settlement, as any more to press his consent to these, or any other Propositions.’ Besides, it is resolved upon the question, ‘That they will receive no more any Message from the king;’ and do enjoin, ‘That no persons do presume to receive or bring any Message from the king to both or either houses of parliament, or to any other person.’ Thus you see that the king is laid by: but that is not all; for he must neither justify his innocency against calumny, nor is there any way left him to mend any error that he may have committed: is this a just way of proceeding, when truth, though offered, must not be heard, and that no way must be left to recant an error? and why all this severity? because, as I have already shewn you, the king will not injure his conscience or honour, nor suffer his people to be oppressed; to which they give the term of such a Denial, though really it was none. But since they thus seek to hood-wink the people, it is no great wonder that they forbid the king to repent him of those faults which he never committed; and I believe all indifferent men will easily judge of the king’s innocency, even by their way of accusation: for those who will lay such high crimes to his charge, as the breach of oaths, vows, protestations, and imprecations, would not spare to bring their proofs, if they had any: but, on the contrary, it is known to all the world, that he had not suffered as he has done, if he would have dispensed with that part of his Coronation Oath, which he made to the clergy, which is no great sign that he makes slight of his engagements; of which it is so universally known that he has been so religiously careful, as I hold it a wrong to his innocency, to seek to clear him of such slanders, for which there are no proofs alledged; for malice, being once detected, is best answered with neglect and silence: and was there ever greater or more apparent malice, than to offer to put the horrid slander of parricide upon him, who was eminently known to be as obedient and loving a son to his blessed father, as any history can make mention of? but indeed the loss of Rochelle doth fitly follow, to shew how malice, when it is at the height, is ordinarily accompanied; for there are none, but ignorant or forgetful men, who know not that it was merely the want of assistance from the two houses of parliament (contrary to their public general Engagement) that lost Rochelle: and there is nothing more clear (to any who hath known French occurrences) than that real assistance which the king, to the utmost of his power, gave to those of the religion at that time, made cardinal Richelieu an irreconcilable enemy to the king; wherefore I cannot but say, that it is a strange forgetful boldness to charge the king with that which was evidently other men's faults.—There are also other things that, to any knowing man, will rather seem jeers than accusations; as the German Horse, and Spanish Fleet in 1639. But my affection shall not so blind me as to say that the king never erred; yet, as when a just debt is paid, bonds ought to be cancelled; so Grievances, be they never so just, being once redressed, ought no more to be objected as errors: and it is no paradox to affirm, That truths this way told are no better than slanders; and such are the catalogue of grievances here enumerated; which, when they are well examined, every one of them will not be found such as here they are described to be.—Now, as concerning those Discourses which mention the beginnings of these troubles, which are in two several places of this Declaration, I will only say this, That what the king did upon these occasions, was merely to defend the rights of his crown, which were and are evidently sought to be torn from him: nor can I acknowledge all those relations to be true; such as private levies of men by Popish agents; arming of Papists in the North; calling in of Danish Forces, and the like: and as for the stale slander of calling up the Northern Army, now renewed; it is well known that the two houses, even at that time, were not so partial to the king, as to have concealed a practice of that kind, if they could have got it sufficiently proved.—But if the Irish Rebellion can be justly charged upon the king, then I shall not blame any for believing all the rest of the allegations against him; only I protest against all rebels testimony as good proof, it being most certain by experience, that they who make no conscience of rebelling, will make less of lying, when it is for their advantage. And it is no little wonder that so grave an assembly as the house of commons should so slightly examine a business of that great weight, as to alledge that the Scots Great Seal did countenance the Irish Rebellion, when I know it can be proved, by witnesses without exception, that, for many months before, until the now lord-chancellor had the keeping of it, there was nothing at all sealed by it. Nor concerning this great point will I only say that the king is innocent, and bid them prove (which, to most accusations, is a sufficient answer); but I can prove, that if the king had been obeyed in the Irish Affairs before he went last into Scotland, there had been no Irish Rebellion; and, after it was begun, it had, in few months, been suppressed, if his directions had been observed; for if the king had been suffered to have performed his engagements to the Irish agents, and had disposed of the discontented Irish army beyond sea, according to his contracts with the French and Spanish ambassadors, there is nothing more clear, than that there could have been no Rebellion in Ireland; because they had wanted both pretence and means to have made one: then when it was broken forth, if those vigorous courses had been pursued which the king proposed, first to the Scots, then to the English parliament, doubtless that Rebellion had been soon suppressed. But what he proposed took so little effect, that, in many months after, there was nothing sent into Ireland but what the king himself sent, assisted by the duke of Richmond, before he came from Scotland, unto sir Robert Stuart; which, though it was little, will be found to have done much service, as may be seen by sir Robert's voluntary testimony, given in writing to the parliament's commissioners then attending the king at Stoak. And certainly a greater evidence for constancy in religion there cannot be, than the king shewed in his Irish Treaty; for in the time that he most needed assistance, it was in his power to have made that kingdom declare unanimously for him, and have had the whole forces thereof employed in his service, if he would have granted their demands in points of Religion, they not insisting on any thing of civil government which his majesty might not have granted without prejudice to his regal authority; and this can be clearly proved by the marquis of Ormond's Treaties with the Irish, not without very good evidence by some of the King's Letters to the queen, which were taken at Naseby, that are purposely concealed, lest they should too plainly discover the king's detestation of that Rebellion, and his rigid firmness to the Protestant profession. Nor can I end this point without remarking with wonder, that men should have so ill memories as again to renew that old slander of the king's giving Passes to divers Papists and persons of quality, who headed the rebels; of which he so cleared himself, that he demanded reparation for it, but could not have it, albeit no shew of proof could be produced for that allegation; as is most plainly to be seen in the first Book of the Collection of all Remonstrances, Declarations, &c. fol. 69 and 70.—Thus having given a particular Answer to the most material points in this Declaration, the rest are such frivolous, malicious, and many of them groundless, calumnies, that contempt is the best Answer for them. Yet one thing more I must observe, that they not only endeavour to make fables pass for current coin, but likewise seek to blind men's judgments with false inferences upon some truths: for example; it is true that the King hath said in some of his Speeches or Declarations, 'That he oweth an account of his actions to none but God alone; and that the houses of parliament, joint or separate, have

'no power either to make or declare any law ;' but that this is a fit foundation for all tyranny, I must utterly deny. Indeed if it had been said, That the king without the two houses of parliament, could make or declare laws, then there might be some strength in the argument ; but, before this parliament, it was never so much as pretended, that either or both houses, without the king, could make or declare any law ; and certainly his majesty is not the first, and I hope will not be the last king of England, that hath not held himself accountable to any earthly power : besides it will be found that his majesty's position is most agreeable to all divine and human laws ; so far it is from being destructive to a kingdom, or a foundation for tyranny.—To conclude : I appeal to God and the world, whether it can be paralleled by example, or warranted by justice, that any man should be slandered, yet denied the sight thereof ; and so far from being permitted to answer, that, if he has erred, there is no way left him to acknowledge or mend it : and yet this is the king's present condition ; who is at this time laid aside, because he will not consent that the old fundamental laws of this land be changed, regal power destroyed, nor his people submitted to a new, arbitrary, tyrannical government."

Letter from the Duke of York, excusing his Attempt to make his Escape.] March 2. Some attempts made for the duke of York's Escape from St. James's being discovered, his highness thought fit, for fear of stricter confinement, to write the following Letter to the Speaker of the house of lords :

"My lord ; I understand there was a Letter of mine intercepted going to my father, which I confess was a fault ; and therefore desire you to let the house know, that I will engage my honour and faith, never to engage myself any more in such business. My request is that I may continue where I now am ; in doing which you will much oblige me, who am your affectionate Friend, J. YORK."

Resolutions of the Lords thereupon.] A committee of lords was hereupon appointed to go and take the duke's Engagement from his own mouth ; and it was this day ordered, That, upon the duke of York's Letter, the lords had condescended to give so much credit to the engagement and ingenuity expressed in it, and to the tenderness of his years, as to pass by all such resolutions as they might justly have taken upon this occasion ; and to desire the earl of Northumberland that he would still continue under his care the said duke and the rest of the King's Children, who are now under the protection of the parliament : moreover, that the said earl should be desired, from time to time, to dismiss from attending on the duke and the rest of the King's Children, all such persons as he shall conceive to be anywise ill-affected, or likely to promote any ill designs to the prejudice of the parliament. Likewise that all papists, or such other persons as have been in arms, or adhered to the king in this war against the parliament, be restrained from coming or speaking to the duke and the rest, but in the presence of the earl of Northumberland : and that the said earl should take care that none of his servants suffer such resort ; and if any persons should presume to press in, contrary to these Instructions, that intelligence be forthwith sent of it to one or both houses of parliament. Hampton-Court was also ordered to be fitted up for the King's Children.

This day, Mr. Fiennes carried up the Declaration of the commons, in reply to the Scots Commissioners Answer to the Propositions of Peace, to the house of lords ; who, the next day, passed it. This Declaration was afterwards ordered, by both houses, to be printed and dispersed in the usual manner, also to be translated into Latin and French ; but it is not entered in the Journals of either house :

March 8. Both houses passed an Ordinance for settling 2500*l.* a-year out of the earl of Worcester's estate, on lieut. general Cromwell : they also appointed Henry earl of Kent, Wm. lord Grey of Werke, sir Tho. Widdrington, and Bulstrode Whitlocke, esq. commissioners of the Great Seal of England.

March 15. An Ordinance for raising 60,000*l.* a month for the support of the Army under Thomas lord Fairfax* was passed ; as also another for better securing the payment of 8000*l.* a-year to the Prince Elector, count Palatine of the Rhine, who had now resided in England some years ; a former Ordinance for that purpose having been ineffectual.

Sir J. Gayre, and three more Aldermen of London, impeached of High Treason.] March 21. A Message was brought from the commons by Mr. Chaloner and others, with Articles of Impeachment for High Treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, against sir John Gayre, knight, alderman of London, James Bunce, Thomas Adams, and John Langham, aldermen of the same : who, in the name of the commons, and of all the commons of England, did desire their lordships to put the said aldermen to their Answer ; and that such proceedings might be had thereupon as were agreeable to justice ; that the house of commons were ready with their Evidence, and that the four impeached Aldermen were by virtue of an order from their house, committed prisoners to the Tower.

* About this time died Ferdinando lord Fairfax, baron of Cameron in Scotland, and knight of the shire for the county of York. In the Commons Journals of the 16th of this month we find the following Entry : Ordered, "That the now lord Fairfax, General, shall have the place of Steward of the Honour of Pontefract, and Keeper of Pontefract Castle, Park, and Appurtenances, and be Custos Rotulorum for the county of York, in the like manner as his father, lately deceased, formerly had."

Insurrection of the Apprentices of London, and others, in favour of the King.] April 13. A great tumult, or rather an Insurrection, had taken place in London a day or two before, in which the Apprentices and others rose in great numbers and did much mischief: they beat up drums upon the water to invite the Seamen and Watermen to join them, to fight 'for God and king Charles.' The whole city was in great consternation, nor was the parliament free from fears; for Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That it was no small happiness to the houses, that this Insurrection was, at length, well quieted: since, in those times of discontent and distraction, if it had not been so soon appeased and nipped in the bud, it might have proved of most dangerous consequence to all the parliament's party, and have occasioned a new war." The Memorialist here again adds another moral reflection, viz. "We may take notice of the uncertainty of worldly affairs; when the parliament and their Army had subdued their common enemy, then they quarrelled amongst themselves, the Army against the Parliament: and when they were pretty well pieced together again, then the Apprentices and others make an Insurrection against them both. Thus they were in continual perplexities and dangers."

The following Act of Common Council, as delivered to the house of lords this day by some Aldermen and others, gives a fuller Account of this Tumult:

"At this Common Council, Mr. alderman Fowke and Mr. alderman Gibbs, by the direction of the Committee of the Militia of London, did make a large Relation of the great multitude, insurrection, and mutiny which happened in this city on the last Lord's day and Monday last, by many evil-disposed persons; which first began on the Lord's day in the afternoon, in the county of Middlesex, where they seized the colours of one of the Trained Bands of the said county, who were there employed for the suppressing of such persons as did profane the Lord's day: and, being dispersed by some of the General's forces, did gather together within the city of London and liberties thereof; and, in a riotous manner, did break open divers houses, and magazines of arms and ammunition, and took away arms, plate, money, and other things; and did seize upon the drums of the Trained Bands of this city, which were beating to raise their companies; and armed themselves, and beat up drums, and put themselves in a warlike posture, and seized upon the gates, chains, and watches of this city; and then marched to the lord mayor's house, and there assaulted the lord mayor, sheriffs, committee of the militia of London, and other magistrates of the same; and did shoot into the lord mayor's house, beat back his guards, killed one of them, wounded divers others, and seized and took away a piece of ordnance from thence, with which they did afterwards slay and wound divers persons, and committed many other outrages. All which matters being largely debated, and many particulars insisted upon, both for the discovery and punishment of the said misdemeanors and outrages, and also for the preventing of the like for the time to come, it was at last concluded and agreed by this Common Council as followeth: First, This Common Council do generally conceive that this city was in great danger by reason of the said outrages and misdemeanors; and that if the same had not so timely been prevented and stayed, the whole city would have been exposed to the fury and rage of the said malefactors. And this Common Council do declare, That the same misdemeanor and outrage was a horrid and detestable act, tending to the destruction of the city; that they do disavow the same, and with an utter detestation do declare their dislike thereof. And this Common Council do appoint the Committee of the Militia of London to make the same known to the honourable houses of parliament: and also to make an humble request unto them, That an Order may be issued forth from them to the several ministers of this city, and the places adjacent, that they may be directed to give public Thanks to Almighty God, the Author of this great and wonderful deliverance from that imminent danger wherein the city and parts adjacent were involved. And further the said committee are appointed by this court to apply themselves to the honourable houses of parliament, for the obtaining of a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, for the trying and punishing all the malefactors that had a hand in this detestable action, according to the known laws of this land. And this court, with thankful hearts, do acknowledge the instruments, under God, by which they obtained this deliverance, to be by the forces raised and continued by the parliament, under the command of his excellency the lord-general Fairfax: and to manifest the same, this Common Council do also order, That the said Committee of the Militia, in the name of this city, as a thing agreed upon by an unanimous consent, shall return their hearty Thanks to his excellency, for his speedy and seasonable aid offered unto the city in this their great strait and danger. And this Court, with a general consent, do well approve of the endeavours of the said Committee of the Militia for London, for the raising of the forces of this city; and in their procuring of the said aid and help from his excellency in this extremity, and what else they have done for the appeasing and suppressing of the said Tumults. And this Court do give thanks to the said Committee of the Militia, for their care and pains by them taken upon this sad occasion; and they do appoint Mr. alderman Fowke to declare the same, their Thanks, to such of the said committee as are not of this court. And this court do also, with all thankfulness, acknowledge the pains and care of the right hon. the lord mayor, and the right worshipful the sheriffs of this city, therein. And this court do generally declare, That it is the duty of every citizen of this city by himself, and all that do belong unto him, or is under his command, to be ready, upon all occasions, to be aiding and assisting unto the lord mayor, and the rest of the magistrates of this city, for the suppressing of all tumults and disorders within the same. And the several persons now present at this Common Council, by the holding up of their hands, have promised, That, for the time to come, they will use their utmost endeavours, and be ready upon all occasions, to do the same. April 11."

The next ensuing Sunday was appointed by the lords as a day of Thanksgiving for this Deliverance; and a Letter of Thanks was written to the General for his care and diligence in this matter.

Articles of Impeachment against sir John Gayre.] April 14. The commons sent up to the lords their Articles of Impeachment against sir John Gayre, knt. which were read as follows:

ARTICLES of the Commons assembled in Parliament, in Maintenance of their Impeachment against Sir John Gayre, knight, Alderman of the City of London, whereby he stands charged of High Treason; and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

"That upon the 26th of July last past, and divers days before and since, he the said sir John Gayre, being then lord mayor of London, at the Guild-hall, and other places within the said cities of London and Westminster, and counties of Middlesex and Surry, contrary to his oath and duty as lord mayor of London, and against his allegiance, hath, together with Thomas Adams, John Langham, and James Bunce, aldermen of London; Wm. Drake, Jeremiah Bains, John Milton, Thomas Papillion, Richard Rumney, and Richard Crook, citizens of London; and with col. Sydenham Pointz, col. John Dalbier, col. James Midhop, capt. Robert Massey, and other Reformado officers and soldiers, and other persons, maliciously and traiterously plotted and endeavoured, with open force and violence, and with armed power, to compel and enforce the lords and commons, then assembled in parliament at Westminster, to alter the laws and ordinances by parliament established for the safety and weal of the realm; and likewise, maliciously and traiterously, to raise and levy war within the places aforesaid, against the king, parliament, and kingdom; and accordingly, at the times and places aforesaid, hath, with the persons aforesaid, and others, maliciously and traiterously raised and levied war against the king, parliament, and kingdom; and together with the persons aforesaid, with open force and violence, and with armed power, did, at the times and places aforesaid, maliciously compel and enforce the said lords and commons, in parliament assembled, to alter, annul, and make void several laws and ordinances by parliament established, and to make new laws and ordinances according to their own will and pleasure.—That the said sir John Gayre, together with the said John Langham, &c. and other reformado officers and soldiers and other persons; which reformadoes, by ordinance of parliament, the lords and commons assembled in parliament, for their tumultuous carriage towards the parliament, were commanded to depart out of the cities of London and Westminster, and 20 miles about the late lines of communication; and the execution of the said Ordinance was committed to the said sir John Gayre, &c. the then Militia of the city of London, who were, by divers orders of the house of commons, put in mind of their duty, and required to put the said ordinance duly in execution, which they did not do; but did, at the times and places aforesaid, traiterously and seditiously procure, abet, maintain, and encourage the said reformado officers and soldiers, and many Apprentices of the city of London, and divers other persons ill-affected to the proceedings of parliament, by open force and violence, and with armed power, to compel and enforce the houses of parliament to revoke, annul, and make void an Ordinance of parliament, made and passed by the lords and commons, now assembled in parliament, the 23d day of July last. (See p. 712.) And likewise, by such open force and violence, and armed power, to compel and enforce the said lords and commons, assembled in parliament, to revoke, annul, and make void a Declaration, made by the said lords and commons the 24th of July last. (See p. 714.) And further, by the said open force and violence, and with armed power, to compel and enforce the said lords and commons, in parliament assembled, to make and ordain an Ordinance of parliament of the 26th of July, whereby they made the ordinance of parliament of the 4th of May, for and concerning the Militia of the city of London, formerly repealed, to be in full force and virtue, any thing in the Ordinance of the 23d of July to the contrary notwithstanding.—And the said col. James Midhop, capt. Robert Massey, and the said other reformado officers and soldiers, apprentices, and others the said ill-affected people, by the procurement, abetting, maintenance, encouragement, and assistance of the said sir John Gayre, &c. did accordingly, traiterously and maliciously, with open force and violence, and with armed power, upon or about the 26th of July, compel and enforce the said lords and commons, in parliament assembled within the city of Westminster, to repeal and make void the aforesaid Ordinance of the 23d of July; and also revoke, annul, and make void the aforesaid Declaration of the 24th of July; and to make again and pass the said Ordinance for the Militia of the 4th of May, formerly repealed.—And by the said open force and violence, and armed power, and by the procurement, abetting, maintenance, encouraging, and assistance as aforesaid, did, on or about the 26th of July, traiterously and maliciously compel and enforce the house of commons to vote, That the king should forthwith come up to the city of London; which procuring, abetting, maintaining, encouraging, and actual force as aforesaid, was procured and done to the intent and purpose to annul and make void several laws and ordinances made by the lords and commons assembled in parliament for the safety and welfare of the people of this realm, and to destroy and take away the just power and authority of the parliament; and to the further intent, that he the said sir John Gayre, with others his said confederates, might be the better enabled to carry on their traiterous design of levying the said war against the king, parliament, and kingdom.—That, in further prosecution of his said traiterous levying the said war, and other his traiterous plottings, contrivances, and abetting as aforesaid, he the said sir John Gayre, &c. and other persons, caused many of the reformado officers and soldiers, and many regiments of other armed men, to the number of 10,000 armed men, and upwards, upon or about the 30th of July last past, to be listed and raised; and being so listed, armed, and raised, to be employed with weapons of war, offensive and defensive, in a warlike manner, to fight against the Army under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, who was, by Ordinance of lords and commons, assembled in parliament, appointed to defend the parliament and kingdom, and was then marching up to the city of London to that purpose: and the said sir John Gayre, and the said reformado officers and soldiers, and persons aforesaid, with the said regiment of armed men and other forces, at the time aforesaid, did levy actual war within the cities of London, and Westminster, counties of Middlesex and Surry, against the king, parliament, and kingdom.—By all which means and ways, he the said sir John Gayre hath, traiterously and maliciously, conspired, continued and actually levied war against the king, parliament, and kingdom, and hath traiterously and maliciously plotted, contrived, procured, and abetted the forcing of the said houses of parliament as aforesaid; which actually by him, and his abetment and procurement, hath been done accordingly: for all which they do impeach him of High Treason against the king, his crown and dignity.—And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves a liberty of exhibiting, at any times hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said sir John Gayre; and also of replying to the Answers that the said sir John shall make to his said Articles, or any of them, and of offering further proof also of the premises, or any of them, or any other Impeachment or accusation that shall be, by them, as the cause shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray that the said sir John be put to answer all and every the premises; and that such proceedings, examinations, trial, and judgment may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.”

Hereupon the lords ordered, That sir John Gayre, now prisoner in the Tower, be brought to their bar on Wednesday next to receive this Charge brought up from the house of commons against him.

*The Lords fine sir J. Gayre 500*l.* for a Contempt.*] April 19. The lieutenant of the Tower having brought up sir John Gayre to the house of lords, the Speaker commanded him to kneel at the bar as a delinquent; which he refused to do, and desired to be heard: but being commanded again to kneel, and he still refusing to do so, the lords directed him to withdraw; and then taking into consideration the high Contempt hereby offered to their house, fined him 500*l.* to the king, to be presently estreated into the exchequer.—Sir John being called in again, and told by the Speaker, That the lords had fined him 500*l.* for his high Contempt; and the Impeachment being then read in his presence, he said, He disavowed and abhorred the offences which he had heard read to him: he also desired a copy of his charge, time to answer it, and that such council as he should desire might be assigned him; which the lords agreed to.

April 12. The Articles of Impeachment brought up from the commons against Thomas Adams, alderman of the city of London, were read: but, being the same as those against sir John Gayre, it is unnecessary to repeat them.

The Earl of Northumberland's Narrative of the Duke of York's Escape.] April 22. The earl of Northumberland acquainted the lords, that the duke of York had conveyed himself privately from St. James's, none of his servants knowing of it. On which that house ordered a present conference with the commons, at which the earl was to make the Narrative of the manner of the duke's Escape, as he then had done. It was afterwards agreed by the lords, that the matter, to be communicated to the commons at this conference, should be as follows:

“That the lords do well remember that it was reported to both houses from the committee of lords and commons at Derby-House, upon a former design of the duke of York's going away, that the earl of Northumberland desired that he might not be further accountable for the duke of York; for that it appeared there was a design of taking him away, and that the duke was consenting to it. The same declaration was likewise made by the said earl in the house of peers; yet notwithstanding this report and declaration of the said earl, upon the receipt of two letters from the duke of York, directed to the Speakers of both houses, by which he engaged his honour and faith never to engage himself any more in such business, both houses did, by a Vote of the 2d of March, 1647, desire the earl of Northumberland to take the best care he could of the said duke and the rest of the King's Children, and to continue them still under his charge and care; which the said earl did accept, so as he might not be accountable if any such accident should fall out as that he should go away. Upon consideration thereof, and the account which the earl hath this day given, the lords do declare, that they are fully satisfied that the said earl hath discharged his duty and trust so far as could be expected from him."

The commons gave their concurrence to this Declaration of the lords, and immediately resolved that the allowance, made by parliament to the duke of York, should be taken off.

Proceedings on the Impeachment against Alderman Adams, &c.] April 26. Alderman Adams was brought to the bar of the lords, to receive his Charge of high treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors brought up from the commons against him; where, being commanded to kneel as a delinquent, he desired to be excused from kneeling; which answer the lords took for a Contempt; and, after commanding him to withdraw, fined him 500*l.* to be estreated into the exchequer, and levied forthwith.—Then he was called in again, and the Speaker told him, That their lordships had fined him 500*l.* for his high contempt to that house, in refusing to kneel at their bar; and then commanded his Charge to be publicly read to him, which was accordingly done. Next the Speaker told him he should have a copy of his Charge, if he desired it, and counsel assigned him; which was accordingly ordered.

Next John Langham and James Bunce, aldermen, were called in separately, and both set to the bar and commanded to kneel; which they also refusing, were each fined 500*l.* for their Contempt, and were remanded back to the Tower. The fines were ordered to be estreated forthwith, and copies of the writs for that purpose are entered in the Journals.

Information of the Scots intending to march into England.] On the 23d of this month information had been made upon oath, before the lord mayor of London, by one John Everard, "That he being in bed at the Garter Inn at Windsor, three days before, over-heard some gentlemen in the next chamber (who he believed were officers of general Fairfax's Army) discoursing together to this effect; "That they doubted not but the Scots would come in, and that the city of London would join with the Scots; for preventing of which they found no way but to disarm the city, friend and foe; and afterwards they would intimate, that such as were friends to the Army should come forth into the fields and there be armed, and also maintained at the charge of the citizens, so long as was thought fit to continue them, and so keep the rest in awe: that the city should advance a million of money, or else be plundered: and that they had acquainted commissary-general Ireton therewith." *

* The following account of the state of parties in Scotland, at this time, is given by Mr. Hume: "Three parties now prevailed in Scotland: The Royalists, who insisted upon Petition from the City of London to both Houses thereupon.] April 27. The lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London presented a Petition to both houses, (to which was annexed a copy of Everard's Information) setting forth, "that they had received divers reports to the same effect, by letters from different parts of the kingdom, and from the restoration of the king's authority, without any regard to religious sects or tenets: of these Montrose, though absent, was regarded as the head. The Rigid Presbyterians, who hated the King, even more than they abhorred toleration; and who determined to give him no assistance, till he should subscribe the Covenant: these were governed by Argyle. The Moderate Presbyterians, who endeavoured to reconcile the interests of religion and the crown, and hoped, by supporting the presbyterian party in England, to suppress the Sectarian Army, and to reinstate the parliament, as well as the king, in their just freedom and authority: the two brothers, Hamilton and Laneric, were leaders of this party. When Pendennis Castle was surrendered to the parliamentary Army, Hamilton, who then obtained his liberty, returned into Scotland; and being generously determined to remember ancient favours, more than recent injuries, he immediately embraced, with zeal and success, the protection of the royal cause. He obtained a vote from the Scottish parliament to arm 40,000 men in support of the King's authority, and to call over a considerable body under Monro, who commanded the Scottish forces in Ulster. And though he openly protested, that the Covenant was the foundation of all his measures, he secretly entered into correspondence with the English royalists, sir Marmaduke Langdale and sir Philip Musgrave, who had levied considerable forces in the north of England.—The General Assembly, who sat at the time, and was guided by Argyle, dreaded the consequence of these measures, and foresaw that the opposite party, if successful, would effect the restoration of monarchy, without the establishment of presbytery, in England. To join the King before he had subscribed the Covenant, was, in their eyes, to restore him to his honour before Christ had obtained his; and they thundered out anathemas against every one who paid obedience to the parliament. Two supreme independent judicatures were erected in the kingdom; one threatening the people with damnation and eternal torments; the other with imprisonment, banishment, and military execution. The people were distracted in their choice; and the armament of Hamilton's party, though seconded by all the civil power, went on but slowly. The royalists he would not as yet allow to join him, lest he might give offence to the ecclesiastical party: though he secretly promised them trust and preferment as soon as his army should advance into England."

abroad; and therefore desiring that a proper examination might be made into this business, and such course taken therein as the houses should think fit: also that the chains of the city, which had been lately taken down, might be set up again: the Army be removed to a farther distance: and that an Ordinance might pass to appoint major-general Skippon to be major-general over the forces of the city, and within the lines of communication and bills of mortality, for defence of them and the parliament; to whom the city resolved to adhere according to the solemn League and Covenant."

—The lords gave the petitioners thanks for their good affections and resolutions to adhere to the parliament according to the Covenant: that as to the setting up again the chains of the city, they leave it to the lord-mayor and common-council to do as they think fit: and that as to major general Skippon, he being a member of the house of commons, they can do nothing without the assent of that house, but will take the matter into farther consideration.—The same Petition, with a copy of Everard's Information, was presented to the commons, who approved the desires of the lord mayor and common council concerning major-general Skippon; ordered the militia to see the chains set up again; and gave their thanks to the petitioners. The Speaker was also ordered to acquaint them, That the occasion of part of the Army's being drawn so near, was the late tumults; that the house would take this business into consideration, and proceed thereupon in such manner as might be most for the good and safety of the parliament and city, so far as thereby they might receive satisfaction.

Votes of the Commons relating to the Settlement of the Kingdom.] April 23. A question was proposed in the house of commons, That they will not alter the fundamental government of the kingdom, by king, lords, and commons. And another question being also put, Whether this word will should be in it? it was carried in the affirmative, 165 against 99; so that it was resolved, upon the question, That they will not alter the fundamental government of the kingdom by king, lords, and commons. After which it was resolved, 'That the matter of the Propositions sent to the King at Hampton-Court, by consent of both kingdoms, shall be the ground of the debate for the Settlement of the peace of the kingdom.' These words, That the Matter of, were prefixed to the Resolution, after debate, by a majority of 108 against 105.—Next it was proposed, 'That leave be given to any members of this house, in debate of the Settlement of the kingdom, to propound any thing for the same as they shall think fit, notwithstanding the Votes of the 3rd Jan. last;' which was carried also in the affirmative, by 146 against 101.

Desires of the Parliament of Scotland, touching the Covenant, the King, the Army, &c.] May 2. A Letter from the parliament of Scotland, dated at Edinburgh, April 26, 1648, was read, directed to the Speaker of the house of lords:

"Right honourable; The Parliament of Scotland, now assembled, being resolved, by all fair and just means, to endeavour the preserving and maintaining the brotherly union and good correspondency betwixt the kingdoms, to which, by so many bonds and ties, they are mutually obliged; yet being very sensible that the many just and necessary Desires, given in by their commissioners, by order from this kingdom, for the good of religion, of his majesty, and for the interest of Scotland, have not received a satisfactory Answer, and considering the many great and imminent dangers threatening religion, his majesty's person and authority, yea monarchical government itself, and the peace and union of these two kingdoms of Scotland and England, by the power and prevalence of sectaries and their adherents, have thought fit to make these just and necessary Demands to the honourable houses of the Parliament of England, to which the parliament desires a clear and satisfactory answer; not having the least thought or intention to incroach upon the national rights of the kingdom of England, nor to entrench upon the privileges of parliament, but their zeal to the glory of God, their loyalty to their king, and their desire of unity betwixt the kingdoms, have moved them to make these inclosed Demands, whereby religion may be settled according to the Covenant, his majesty may enjoy his freedom and just rights; and so, by settling a religious and safe Peace, the present confusions and distempers may be removed, and all occasions of mistakes and differences betwixt the two kingdoms prevented. This is all I have in command from the parliament, in whose name this is subscribed by your, &c. LOUDON, Canc. President of the Parliament."

DESIREs of the Parliament of Scotland, to the Honourable Houses of the Parliament of England, referred to in the foregoing; dated Edinburgh, April 26, 1648.

1. "It is desired, that an effectual course be taken by the houses, for enjoining the Covenant to be taken by all the subjects of the crown of England, conform to the first Article of the Treaty, and conform to the Declaration of both kingdoms, in 1643; by which all who would not take the Covenant, were declared to be public enemies to religion and the country, and that they are to be censured and punished as professed adversaries and malignants; and that reformation and uniformity in religion, be settled according to the Covenant: that as the houses of parliament have agreed to the Directory of Worship, so they would take a real course for practising thereof by all the subjects of England and Ireland: that the Confession of Faith, transmitted by the Assembly of Divines to the houses be approved; and that presbyterian church-government, with a subordination of the lower assemblies to the higher, be settled and fully established in England and Ireland; and that effectual course be taken for suppressing and extirpating all heresies and schism, particularly Socinianism, Arminianism, Arianism, Anabaptism, Antinomianism, Erastianism, Familism, Brownism, and Independency; and for perfecting of what is yet further to be done, for extirpating Popery and Prelacy, and suppressing the practice of the Service-Book, commonly called 'The Book of English Common Prayer.' II. That, conform to the former Desires of this kingdom, the king's majesty may come with honour, freedom, and safety, to some of his houses in or near London, that the parliaments of both kingdoms may make their applications to him, for obtaining his royal assent to such Desires, as shall be by them presented to him for establishing of religion as is above expressed, and settling a well-grounded peace. III. That all the members of both houses, who have been faithful in this cause, may freely and safely return and attend their charges; the city of London may enjoy its liberties and privileges, which it had before the late encroachment of the Army, the parliament may sit and vote with freedom and safety; both kingdoms, without interruption or disturbance, may make their applications to his majesty; and the settling of religion and peace may not longer be hindered and obstructed; it is desired that the present Army of Sectaries, under the command of Thomas lord Fairfax of Cameron, be disbanded; and none employed but such as have or shall take the Covenant, and are well-affected to religion and government; excepting from the said disbanding the garrisons necessary to be kept up by the parliament of England for the security of that kingdom, which are desired to be commanded by such as have or shall take the Covenant, and are well-affected to religion and government as aforesaid. LOUDON, Canc.' President of Parliament."

The Speaker further declared, that the messenger that brought this Letter told him, he had directions from the parliament of Scotland to stay in England but 15 days after the delivery of this letter: whereupon the lords ordered it to be immediately communicated to the commons.

The Scots had frequently expressed a jealousy of the parliament's falling off from their Solemn League and Covenant. To remove therefore all such imputations, they passed, this day, an Ordinance for suppressing Heresy and Blasphemy.

Votes of both Houses in favour of the Constitution of the Kingdom, a Treaty with the King, &c.] May 6. Petitions having come up from several counties to the parliament, to settle the government and restore the public peace: hereupon, the commons thought proper to send up some votes to the Lords for their concurrence, which were agreed to, and are as follow:—1. "That they do declare that they will not alter the Fundamental Government of the Kingdom, by king, lords, and commons. 2. That they do declare themselves fully resolved to maintain and preserve inviolably the Solemn League and Covenant, and the Treaties between the kingdoms of England and Scotland; and that they shall be ready to join with the kingdom of Scotland in the Propositions agreed on by both kingdoms, presented to the King at Hampton-Court, for the making such proceedings thereupon, as shall be thought fit for the settlement of the Peace of both kingdoms, and the preservation of the union according to the Covenant and Treaties. 3. That this last Vote be sent to the Commissioners in Scotland, to be by them communicated to the parliament in that kingdom."—But, notwithstanding these seemingly pacific proceedings, the commons took care to make peace sword in hand, by passing a vote this day, on a division of 127 against 76, That the seven northern counties be forthwith put into a posture of defence.

About this time came advice that the duke of York, who had lately made his escape from the earl of Northumberland, was arrived at the Hague, where he was kindly received by his sister, the princess royal of Orange. The manner of his highness's Escape, and the circumstances that occasioned it, are particularly related by lord Clarendon.*

May 11. Both houses having thought fit that a Letter should be sent to the parliament of Scotland, to acquaint them, That the sending the General with the Army into the North, was but to settle and secure those parts, and regain Berwick and Carlisle; a committee was ordered accordingly.—The same day a Letter from col. Horton was read, giving intelligence of the routing of Laugharn's forces in Wales. In consequence of which, it was ordered that Monday next, the 18th instant, be appointed a day of Thanksgiving for so great and seasonable a Victory.

Remarkable Petition of the County of Surrey for a Personal Treaty with the King; which occasions a Riot.] May 16. We have already taken notice that several Petitions had been sent up, from different parts of the kingdom, praying for a speedy Settlement of the nation. The most remarkable of these was this day presented to both houses, from the county of Surrey; the heads of which are thus given by Mr. Whitlocke: "That the King may be restored to his due honour and just rights, according to the oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance; and that he may be forthwith established in his throne, according to the splendor of his ancestors: That he may, for the present, come to Westminster with honour and safety, to treat personally for composing of differences: That the free-born subjects of England may be governed by the known laws and statutes: That the war now beginning may be prevented:

See vol. v. 8vo. edition, p. 130.

And that the Ordinance for the preventing free-quarter may be duly executed, and speed made in disbanding all Armies, they having their due Arrears paid them."—The lords answered the petitioners, "That they were at present upon consideration of the Settlement of the kingdom, and doubted not but to satisfy all."

The Memorialist proceeds thus: "This Petition was presented to the commons in the afternoon, when some of the countrymen being gotten almost drunk, and animated by the Malignants, as they came through Westminster-Hall, they fell a quarrelling with the Guards, and asked them, 'Why they stood there to guard a company of rogues?' That then words on both sides increasing, the countrymen fell upon the Guards, disarmed them, and killed one of them, and wounded divers. Upon this alarm more soldiers were sent for from Whitehall and the Mews, who fell upon the countrymen, killed five or six of them, and wounded very many; chasing them up and down through the Hall, and the lanes and passages thereabouts."—General Ludlow gives much the same account of this tumult; adding, "That lieut. colonel Cobbett, who commanded the Guard, being called into the house to give an account of what had passed, went to the bar, bleeding from the wounds which he had received, and related the passages before-mentioned; but some friends of the petitioners within doors informing the house that the matter of fact was otherwise than had been represented by the lieut. colonel, the parliament appointed a committee to examine into the truth of it."—This last circumstance is confirmed by the Journals; which authority also further informs us, "That the petitioners gave out words, 'That they would have a speedy and satisfactory Answer, or else they would have the Blood of that house;' and had withdrawn themselves into the Fields." Hereupon the commons ordered their thanks to be returned to the officers upon guard for the preservation of their house: but a motion being made for giving an Answer to the petitioners, it passed in the negative.

Information of some Insurrections being intended, in and about London, against the Parliament.] May 18. The last Petition from the city of London had been long under consideration by both houses; and this day a Paper from the committee of lords and commons, for the Safety of the Kingdom, sitting at Derby-House, was read in these words:—"Ordered, That it be reported to both houses, that this committee hath secret intelligences, that there is a design of very dangerous consequence ready to be put in execution against the parliament, city, and kingdom, by forces being listed for that purpose under an oath of secresy, a more particular account whereof this committee will be able to give the houses to-morrow; in the mean time to desire the houses to give present order to the several Militias of London and parts adjacent, to be in a ready posture to prevent or resist the same; and that also present order be forthwith given to all the keepers of the prisons, that all prisoners committed for acting any thing against the Parliament, may be kept securely within the said several prisons."—Both houses approved of the particulars of this report, and ordered, That the lord mayor do call a Common-Council next day; and that then a committee of lords and commons do go thither to let the citizens know how ready the houses have been to grant their desires; and to desire them that they would take care for the suppressing of Insurrections and Tumults, and for preservation of the parliament.—The same day, the lords passed an Ordinance, sent up from the commons, for making major-general Skippon major-general of all the forces within the late lines of communication and bills of mortality, according to the city of London's Petition.

May 19. The earl of Manchester presented to the house of lords a Report from the Committee of Safety at Derby-House, containing several Letters and Papers relating to the many Insurrections now on foot in different parts of the kingdom: these, being rather military than parliamentary, we shall omit. They will all be found in the Lords Journals, vol. 10. p. 267, et supra. Amongst them was a Report from the Committee of Safety, of the transactions of major Desborough and the commissioners sent down to Bury, in Suffolk, to suppress a riot in that town; where, as Mr. Whitlocke informs us, "Six hundred men got together in arms, about setting up a may-pole, crying out 'For God and King Charles,' laid hold on some of the parliament's soldiers, and set guards in several places."—Lastly was read, a Letter from the lord Fairfax, with several Papers inclosed, relating to a high quarrel between the mayor of Exeter and the soldiery there. Upon reading these Papers in the house of commons, they resolved that the forces under sir Hardress Waller be forthwith removed thence; and that a Letter be sent from their Speaker to the General, to desire immediate execution of that Order.

Declaration against presenting Petitions to Parliament in a tumultuous Manner.] May 20. The following Declaration, for preventing tumultuous Assemblies under pretence of presenting Petitions to parliament, was agreed to by both houses:

"The lords and commons in this present parliament assembled do declare, That as it is the right and privilege of the subjects of England, to present unto the parliament their just Grievances, by way of Petition, in a due manner; and they shall be always ready to receive such Petitions, and to provide such remedies for redress of such grievances, as they in their wisdom and judgment shall think best; so, in regard that by tumultuous Assemblies of persons in several counties and cities of this kingdom, in the framing of such Petitions, divers plots and designs are carried on by Malignants and Delinquents, and persons ill affected, to the endangering the destruction of religion, this present parliament, and the laws of this kingdom, and liberties of the subject; and, by the like tumultuous presenting of the same by great numbers of rioters and ill-affected persons, contrary to former usages in antient times, many mischiefs have ensued, and bloodshed; and both houses of parliament hindered and interrupted in their debates and resolutions, concerning the Settlement of the great affairs, peace, and safety of the kingdom; the said lords and commons do hereby declare and ordain, and be it ordered and ordained by authority of this present parliament, That every such Petition, which hereafter shall be brought up and presented to the houses of parliament, from any county or city, or otherwise, shall be brought up and presented only by a convenient number, not exceeding 20 persons; and all such Petitions shall be by them delivered to the knights, citizens, or burgesses, who serve in parliament for the said county, city, or borough, from whence the said Petitions come, or to some member of either of the said houses, by them to be offered to the said respective houses; and that all persons who shall bring up any such Petition, do behave themselves peaceably, orderly, and without offence. And if any person or persons shall hereafter, under any such or the like pretence, tumultuously assemble as aforesaid, the said person or persons so offending, shall be adjudged as persons ill affected to the parliament and kingdom."

Several Members appointed to go down into Surrey, on account of the late Petition from that County.] We have before taken notice of a remarkable Petition from the county of Surrey, presented on the 16th, to the house of commons, in a riotous manner; that thereupon they had refused to give any Answer to it, and had appointed a committee to examine into the occasion and circumstances of the riot: however, we find the commons thought it more prudent, at this crisis, to sooth, than to exasperate, the petitioners; for, this day, they made an Order, That the members who served for Surrey, and other members dwelling in that county, be desired to go down there. The following Instructions were also drawn up, and sent by sir Richard Onslow to the lords, who gave their concurrence:

INSTRUCTIONS for such Lords, and Members of the House of Commons, as shall be sent into the County of Surrey.

"That the earl of Northumberland be desired to go suddenly down, with such other gentlemen as the house shall please to nominate, into the county of Surrey. That they use their endeavours, by the best ways and means they shall think fit, to inform the county of Surrey of the undue manner of delivering a Petition to the houses, on Tuesday last, by many of the inhabitants thereof; and of the great disorder that was amongst the petitioners, by tumultuous shoutings, whilst the houses were in consideration of the Petition; to the drawing together many disaffected persons in and about Westminster, to the danger and interruption of the peaceable sitting of the houses. That the houses cannot attribute those disorders to that county; but do retain in memory their many faithful services and good affections expressed to the parliament; and doubt not but those distempers that fell out were contrary to the desires and liking of that county. That they inform the inhabitants of that county, That the houses intend not to hinder their presenting of Petitions in a due and fitting way; but shall be ready to give all encouragement and answers thereunto, for the satisfaction of their just desires. That the houses are upon the present consideration of matters of most weighty concernment to the Settlement of the Kingdom in a safe and happy Peace; and expect to be free from tumultuous interruptions therein. That the houses have ordered the restoring such horses as were taken away from divers of the petitioners, that behaved themselves in a peaceable manner at that time: and they shall take care that the whole business be duly examined; and that all witnesses be freely heard; and expect that no misrepresentations may be made thereof in the mean time."

The City of London resolve to adhere to the Parliament, and petition for the Discharge of their impeached Aldermen, &c.] The same day Mr. Annesley reported the substance of the Answer of the common council of London, to the committee of both houses who went into the city on the 19th, viz. "That they did acknowledge, with all thankfulness, the great pains and care of the parliament for them; that their resolutions were constant, to remain firmly conjoined in opposition to the common enemy, who watch for their ruin; that they look upon the news the committee brought them, as light breaking through the clouds; and that they do resolve, in pursuance of the Solemn League and Covenant, to live and die with the parliament."

May 23. The following Petition was presented to both houses from the city of London.

The Humble PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Commons, of the City of London in Common Council assembled,

"Sheweth; That as your petitioners, in all humility, do thankfully acknowledge the many former favours of this honourable house, manifested to this city, so in particular in granting their desires, expressed in their late Petition concerning the Tower and Militia of London; and in communicating unto the petitioners several Votes of both houses of parliament; wherein, to your petitioners great joy and comfort, are expressed your Resolutions, That you will not alter the Fundamental Government of the kingdom, by king, lords, and commons: That you will preserve inviolably the Solemn League and Covenant, and the Treaties between the kingdoms of England and Scotland; and that you will be ready to join with the kingdom of Scotland in the Propositions agreed upon by both kingdoms, and the Preservation of the union according to the Covenant and Treaties.—And your petitioners further humbly present to this honourable house, That the inhabitants of the city are much grieved, in that their magistrates and fellow-citizens have, for a long time, been under restraint, and the city thereby deprived of their service; and humbly pray, That in prosecution of your said Votes, you will be pleased to improve all good opportunities in perfecting so desirable a good as is therein expressed, for the speedy settlement of the Peace of both kingdoms, and preservation of the union according to the Covenant and Treaties, and preventing a new and bloody war. That the Aldermen now in the Tower, the Recorder, and the rest of their fellow-citizens restrained upon the same occasion, may be discharged and restored; whereby the city may be the better united, their hands strengthened, and they made more serviceable to the parliament and city for their preservation and safety, which they shall endeavour to the utmost of their power and abilities. And the petitioners shall ever pray, &c.”

The lords returned the petitioners Thanks; and gave them assurance of taking all opportunities for a speedy settlement of a safe Peace in both kingdoms, according to the Covenant; and endeavouring to prevent a new and bloody war: That upon the Impeachments sent from the commons, they had proceeded no otherwise than in the usual course of parliament: That as to the Recorder and the rest not impeached, they would endeavour their release; and assured the city of their inclinations to comply with these desires from them, as a means firmly to unite them, to fasten their hearts, and strengthen their hands to serve the parliament, in order to the establishment of religion and the peace of the kingdom according to the Covenant.

Votes of the Commons in Consequence thereof.] The Speaker of the commons acquainted the citizens, That the house had considered their Petition; that in it were many Desires which are expressed to tend very much to the union of the city in itself: which how much that house desired, would appear by the following Votes: 1. “That Mr. Glynn, Recorder of the City, be discharged from any proceedings upon the Vote for his Impeachment. 2. The like order made for lieut. col. Baines; the colonels Chapman, Vaughan, Copley, Bromfield, and Ilooker; the captains Jones and Cox. And, 3. That upon the desire of the Militia of London, the horse and foot in the Tower should be removed from thence, and joined with the forces at Whitehall and the Mews; there to continue till the city declare they are in a posture to defend the parliament and themselves.”—He also further informed them, That as to the case of the Aldermen in the Tower, it was a business of a very serious and important consideration; and therefore the house had resolved to resume the debate of it on that day se’nnight.—The citizens being withdrawn, the commons resolved, “That such members of their committee as went to the last Common Council, be enjoined to go to another, appointed to meet tomorrow, and represent unto them the great necessity there is for the payment of the Arrears due from the city to the Army: that neither they, the parliament, nor city, can be long safe without a speedy payment of those Arrears; besides the influence it hath upon other parts, by the ill precedent that this great city should be so far behind in arrears, at such a time; and to press that 30,000*l.* of the said Arrears may be forthwith advanced; and the remainder thereof brought in with all speed.”

The Commons resolve to treat again with the King.] May 24. The commons still pursued their design of beginning another Treaty with the king, for settling a safe and well-grounded Peace. And this day the question being put in that house, That Religion and the Militia being first settled, and the Declarations, &c. being recalled, then a Treaty should be had with the king upon the other Propositions sent to him at Hampton-Court, it passed in the affirmative, on a division, 169 against 86. These Propositions being afterwards reduced into form, it appeared thereby that the King must agree to settle the Presbyterian Government for 3 years, and the Militia, by sea and land, in the hands of the parliament for ten: And that all his declarations, proclamations, judgments, indictments, and outlawries should be recalled and made null before any Treaty was to be had with him.

Information of an intended Insurrection in London, &c. in favour of the King.] May 26. The lord Say and Sele reported a Paper from the committee at Derby-House, which was read as follows: “Ordered, That it be reported to both houses, that this committee having written to the General to take care for prevention of the dangers, that are imminent from the Insurrections and distempers of the people in several counties adjacent; the lord general hath desired, that, to enable him to it, the forces in the Tower and the Mews may be free to follow his order for it: To offer it, thereupon, to the consideration of the houses, if those forces be made use of to that end, how the houses may sit secure.—That whereas this committee formerly reported to the houses, that there was a Conspiracy carried on in and about London, under an Oath of Secresy; that we have received several informations since, that the said conspiracy is still carried on; that the committee of the Militia of London sent to this committee a copy of that Oath of their Association, which is hereunto annexed.—We have also intelligence, that, on Tuesday next, there will be a meeting at Black-Heath of the Kentish men; the same day, of the Surrey men at Putney-Heath; and of the Essex men, at Wanstead; and that they had intelligence one with another, as we are informed.—We are also informed, that the people about Greenwich and Deptford are risen, and have seized the stores at Deptford.”

Copy of the Oath of Secresy.

“Imprimis, It is covenanted and agreed by all the parties to these presents, that all and every of them shall forthwith voluntarily take the Oath and Covenant hereunto annexed, and shall engage as many friends to join with them in the same as possible may be.—Item. It is agreed that one or more person or persons, parties to these presents, for every parish or precinct, shall be elected to be agents for the rest, to list the names of such persons within their parishes as shall voluntarily join with them in the said Oath; and they, from time to time, to hold intelligence each with the other, as occasion shall require, for the advancement of the design.—We do voluntarily swear by the Holy Evangelists, and the contents thereof, with our lives and fortunes to maintain, preserve, and defend the true protestant religion established by law, the laws of the land, the just rights and prerogatives of the king’s majesty and his successors, and the just rights of his subjects; and also to be faithful, true, and just unto all persons whomsoever here interested, and faithfully to keep their secrets; also faithfully and duly to observe, perform, and keep this Oath and Covenant, and above-recited Covenant, Orders, and Ordinances; and not to reveal or discover them to any but those who are or shall be hereby engaged.”

The foregoing Report having been laid before the commons, they sent a message to the lords, desiring the same might be communicated to the common council of the city of London that afternoon; which was agreed to.

Letter from Col. Hammond, relating to the Security of the King’s Person, and the Insurrections in his Favour.] May 27. A Letter from col. Hammond to the committee of safety was communicated to the lords and read in that house:

“My lords and gentlemen; The last night there came hither one Job Weal, a physician as he calls himself, living at Kingston upon Thames. He came hither with post horses, pretending to come in great haste from my lord-general, employed by him to me on business of highest concernment. He counterfeits himself in a fainting fit, by reason of hard riding, and that he would not declare his business to me till he had drank some hot waters to recover his spirits; which preamble being ill managed to this business, made me suspect him to be a knave, as I afterwards more plainly found him: so soon as he feigned to come to himself, he began to tell me that his business imported the safety of my life, and, that which was dearer to me, the great charge in my hands, the security of the Person of the King; and that to this end I should immediately remove the king to Portsmouth, to major Lobb, to whom he had directions to receive him; that otherwise the king would be violently taken hence the next morning by 4 o’clock, and myself a dead man; for to his knowledge the scheme was so laid; and it was thus: That there was a fleet of ships at sea, near the coast, that were to come in between the island and the land-shoar that evening, who were to land in the night; and that great numbers were to come out of the main land, pretending occasions at a fair which was to be kept at Newport on the morrow, who should assist them; and at the same time all the beacons in the island were to be set on fire, and to raise the country for the king; and if not, to amaze them with fear, that so they might the better carry on their design, which there was no way to avoid, but as he had given me direction. When he had concluded his tale, I inquired of him, Whether he had any thing in writing to confirm it? He told me, That this instruction to me was intrusted to him to communicate only by word of mouth, but he had instructions in writing, quitted up in his waiscoat, for major Lobb. I desired him to let me see them, he told me his order was only to communicate them to major Lobb. I said I must see them; he refusing, I told him I apprehended he had other business here, and if he would not immediately let me know it, I must take another course with him; whereupon I caused him to be strictly searched, and found only these Papers about him; that Letter from him, without subscription or direction, he said was to my lord of Dover; the rest Petitions and some notes of Instructions of his own. When he found his idle plot would not take, and that he was discovered, he told me that he would deal ingenuously with me, and would tell me truly: his business was principally, by this means, to gain an interest with me, that he might speak with the king, to procure leave from him that the county of Surrey, from whom he was sent to that purpose, might have his majesty’s approbation to choose a commander in chief, under whom to put their country in a posture of defence. Upon his way he stopped a post going from Portsmouth to London with this inclosed packet, which, if your lordships please, may be speedily delivered, being about victuals for the Navy. I perceive by discourse with him, that he hath been a great promoter of the Surrey Petition, and an agent of the Malignants there.—My lords, I take this occasion to let your lordships know that I wrote formerly to the General for a company or two of foot more, for the better security of this island from any sudden accident that may happen from sea, which it seems he hath not thought fit to spare; I desire your lordships that, if you shall approve of it, there may be another company or two more raised and maintained during this occasion some other way; and that some force may lie in Hampshire near the water side, in the room of those lately removed thence, to be ready upon all occasions to be transported hither; the two companies to be paid out of the remainder of the 30*l.* per diem I am now raising; but I fear I shall be much troubled with them in the island, by reason the money comes not so constantly and duly as were to be wished, for there is no keeping soldiers in very good order without money before hand, where there is no free-quarters. I desire also that, for the better ordering of those companies here already, and to be raised, and for my own ease, if you shall think fit, that I may have a major under me, and pay allowed for him during this occasion: I desire it may be capt. Rolph, who hath a company here already, who is an honest, faithful, and careful man, and who taketh a great deal of pains and deserveth encouragement. The addition of major's pay to him will be little, and not worth speaking of; but so much deserved by him, and such an officer is so necessary for me, that maketh me beg of your lordships it may be moved in the house, if it cannot be otherwise done.—Here is now but one ship riding before this island for the guard of it, and the captain of her hath this day sent me word, that he is to go in to victual on Wednesday next. I desire that care may be taken that we may not in these times of trouble, be without a sea-guard, I am, &c. R. Hammond. Carisbrooke Castle, May 22."

COPY of the intercepted LETTER to the Earl of Dover, mentioned in the foregoing.

"My lord; Since I spake with your honour, I was with my lord Fairfax at Windsor, and dispatched the business with him, the particular account whereof I will render, God willing, to the county at their next meeting. I could not get from thence till about 4 o'clock on Saturday, and, for want of good horses and a guide, I could not make Farnham until 6 o'clock on Sunday morning; I thought it fit therefore to take post horses and a guide to Portsmouth. You shall have an account so soon as I can dispatch the business with his majesty. In the mean time I desire your lordship to communicate to sir Edm. Bowyer and Mr. Price as much, as soon as possibly you can; and desire them to use their endeavours that sir Rd. Onslow and sir Ambrose Brown may be intreated to give meeting to the county in general, the next Wednesday at the furthest, on Epsom common by ten in the morning; and that the county advise with them how they may give satisfaction to the parliament concerning the Petition, and what to do therein, and hereof that they will not fail; at which time, God willing, I will be there with Instructions from his majesty for our safe and secure proceedings, and satisfaction to all those who shall make any objection thereunto. And I beseech you that order may be taken that the examination of the county for their injuries, and the true cause thereof, upon oath may be ready against the same time; and so in post haste, I remain, on the oath of a soldier, 'Fide & Taciturnitate,' your lordship's friend and servant to command, for my country's and county's good; and the word is the Anagram of my name, 'Obey Law.' Job Weal. Farnham. May 21."

Mutiny in the Fleet.] May 27. A Letter from col. Rainsborough, vice-admiral of the Fleet, at Landguard-Fort, was sent to the lords by the commissioners of the admiralty, and read as follows:

"May it please your lordships; The present distemper of this county is such as hath put as sad a face on things as ever England saw; and it hath begot a Distemper in the Fleet, which I am confident, though something allayed at present, will be of as dangerous consequence as any one thing besides, if this gathering be not, by some means or other, speedily suppressed. That which is the greatest motive to the disturbance of the seamen, is that these parts are wholly for the King. The Swan set sail yesterday, being convoy to the Hopeful and one small vessel more, for Dublin; the Satisfaction stays here to convoy the rest. We wonder exceedingly they come not away. The complaints from the north are so exceedingly great, that to-morrow, if the men will be commanded to it, the Convertine and Providence go to the westward. The Weymouth pink is now setting sail to be convoy of the ship Lady of London, laden with ammunition for Weymouth and Pendennis. A line or two from your lordships at this time might be of great encouragement to many among us. Of all other things this bearer will give your lordships a perfect account. I am, and shall be till death, Your &c. Tho. Rainsborough. Landguard-Fort May 24."

The lords ordered nothing to be done on this letter at present; but on the 29th, the earl of Warwick informed the house he had received Letters which were sent him from some officers in the navy, that they had displaced col. Rainsborough from being vice-admiral.

Cornelius Evans apprehended in Kent, for personating the Prince of Wales.] Besides these disorders in the Fleet, the parliament were again alarmed with a formidable Petition, signed by many thousands in the county of Kent, and coming up to be presented to both houses. It was agreed to send down a committee of lords and commons, natives of that county, to stop its progress; and, during this time a person, pretending to be the Prince of Wales, was apprehended, and sent up to the lords with the following Letter from the mayor of Gravesend to the Speaker of the house of lords:

"May it please your honour; The pretended Prince, lately landed at Sandwich, was seized on by the East-Kent gentlemen; and, together with this Examination taken by Mr. Mayor, of Rochester, sent us by them, with instructions to have him safely conveyed and delivered to your honours, that you may be informed in the premises; which, according to our duty, we humbly present to your mature consideration, and rest, your, &c. E. Bromling, mayor, John Stert, George Clark, Walter Hill. Gravesend, May 29."

"Who saith, That about 3 weeks since, he, this examinant, came from his lodgings in St. Catherine's, near the Tower of London, the house where he lodged being inhabited by Nicholas Evans, mariner; and passed through the county of Kent to Dover, hoping there to have got passage thence to Marseilles; but not meeting any shipping there bound for the Straits, and understanding that there were ships in the Downs bound thither, (after he had continued 3 days at Dover) went from thence to Deal, hoping there to get passage; and, in this examinant's journey thither, going by a castle, near the town of Deal, he took notice that a gentleman with a gentlewoman was walking in a garden near the said castle, whom this examinant, upon enquiry, understood to be colonel Rainsborough, governor of the said castle, and his wife; and this examinant came to Deal to the house of one Mr. Beaker, at the sign of the Crown; immediately after his coming thither there came 3 seamen into his company, who presently called for beer; and, desiring to drink with this examinant, pressed him to drink the king's health, which they all did; and, upon conference, one of the said seamen belonging to col. Rainsborough's ship, whom this examinant, upon speech with him, conceived to be the coxswain of the said ship, told him, that he thought he knew him to be the Prince; and that col. Rainsborough had sent him to this examinant, wishing him to say that he was the Prince; and telling him, that if he would so say, and take upon him to personate the prince, that the prince would well reward him for the same, and would come over in a short time; and thereupon prevailed with this examinant to assent thereunto; but after the said seamen were departed from him, he, thinking with himself that it might not be safe for him to stay and give out that he was the prince, resolved to shun the same, and thereupon went from Deal to Sandwich: and upon this examinant's coming along by the sea-side, before he came into the town he observed a ship's long-boat, with divers seamen therein, some having pistols, and others swords about them, rowing very hastily towards Sandwich, but before they were landed this examinant was got to the Bell tavern there; and so soon as the seamen were landed, they presently came up to the town of Sandwich, and declared about the town that the prince was there; and thereupon the seamen and inhabitants of the town came to the house where this examinant was; and the seamen affirming that he was the prince, declared privately that they came to take him (calling him the prince) into their custody, to carry him on board their ship; which they so did, as this examinant conceived, the better to beget a belief in the inhabitants of the town that he was the prince indeed: and about an hour after this examinant so came to the Bell tavern in Sandwich aforesaid, one capt. Foster, inhabiting in the said town, came to him; and, upon private conference, told him of the confident report about the town that he was the prince, desiring to know the truth thereof; and this examinant doth confess that thereupon he did affirm that he was the prince, whereat the said captain Foster stood bare to him, and carried himself very civilly to him; but this examinant then desired the said capt. Foster that he would not discover that he was the prince; and thereupon the said capt. Foster took order in the house that this examinant should be well accommodated, promising to come to him the next morning, and departed for that night; and, in the next morning, the said capt. Foster, with the mayor of the town and town-clerk there, came to this examinant, and told him, that it was reported about the town, and known, that he was the prince, and that it could not be concealed; and thereupon took an examination in writing from him: and this examinant still affirming himself to be the prince, thereupon the said captain Foster and the mayor of the town desired to know, whether he would go to one of their houses, or to the other; and this examinant making choice to go to the said capt. Foster's house, was carried thither accordingly: but before he went from the Bell tavern, and not above two hours before he first came thither, he was presented by a gentlewoman (whose name he knows not) with 100 pieces of gold and 3 bunches of asparagus.—And this examinant further saith, That after he came to the said captain Foster's, there came, at several times, two seamen to him, one after another, and told him that their master, colonel Rainsborough, remembered him to this examinant, and desired him to remember the message which colonel Rainsborough had sent to him whilst he was at Deal, and desired him to be resolute in affirming that he was the prince; that col. Rainsborough bid them tell him, that it would not be long ere the prince came over, and that he would well reward this examinant for the same.—And this examinant further saith, That after he came to the said capt. Foster's house, in the afternoon of that day, he was invited by the seamen, who the day before came with the said boat off Sandwich, to go with them in their boat, that they might shew him sport on the water with a dog which they had there; and this examinant went with them accordingly, who, whilst he was in the boat, were all bare, and carried themselves with all respect to him, as if he had been the prince indeed. And whilst this examinant was in the boat, he observed that it was said amongst the seamen, that if Black Tom were there, now would be the time to hinder the Petition from going to the parliament. And this is all this examinant can say, save that the seamen who spake with him from col. Rainsborough, at Mr. Beaker's house at Deal, wished him to get a blue ribbon, and to wear the same across his breast. CORNELIUS EVANS."

Evans being then brought up to the bar of the house of lords, the Speaker asked him, How he durst take upon him the name of the Prince of Wales? He confessed his fault, desired pardon for it, and declared the particulars to be the same as he had already confessed before the mayor of Rochester: hereupon it was ordered, that the said Evans be committed to Newgate, there to remain during the further pleasure of the house, for taking upon himself to be the Prince of Wales; and that the captain of the guard do convey him safely to that prison.

The Earl of Warwick appointed Lord Admiral.] May 29. p. m. The conduct of the sea-officers, in putting out Rainsborough, made the parliament afraid of a thorough revolt, if they did not stop it. Those of them who wrote to the earl of Warwick about it, at the same time told him, That they had chosen him for their Admiral; which the houses thought fit, by a public Ordinance, to confirm: and also gave him power to give indemnity to the captains and mariners who had turned out the other.

Col. Hammond's Account of the King's intended Escape from Carisbrook-Castle.] June 1. A Letter from col. Hammond was read, addressed to the Speaker of the house of lords:

"My lord; On account of the great trust your lordships have been pleased to repose in me, I take the boldness to acquaint your lordships of a design, cunningly laid and carried on almost to perfection, for the king's Escape from this place, which was the last night, being the set time for putting it in execution, by the blessing and goodness of God prevented. It was thus: Through the corruption and naughtiness of two gentlemen attending on the king, Mr. Osborne and Mr. Dowcett, 3 soldiers were suborned and dealt with to assist in his escape, who were to be on duty at the king's window, at the time appointed; Mr. Dowcett was to be accommodated with cords to convey him down the Castle wall, and then the outline, after he had let himself through his window, to be prepared; centinels were to be his guide to his horses, which were ready provided and laid at a convenient place within musket-shot of the works; and Mr. Osborne and one Mr. Worsley of Gatcombe, a young gentleman of this Island, were to conduct him to a creek, where also, at the same time, lay ready a boat to transport them into the main land, into a place where, as is confessed by one whom I have apprehended, there were horses to convey the king whither he pleased.—This design hath been long in hand, but kept from me till yesterday, the day before the night it should have been acted, when two of the soldiers, who had been dealt with, came to me and acquainted me with the whole business; which I am confident, though I had had no knowledge of it, they would have found some difficulty in effecting; I suffered and advised them to carry it on, as if I had not known it, that so I might the better discover the whole business with the less pretence of excuse to those unworthy men who were to assist the King in this Escape; but being over curious in securing all places in a more exact manner than formerly, Mr. Dowcett, by happening on an unusual guard, who at the first apprehended them to be of his own party, but upon examination finding other answers than expected, made a discovery; which, so soon as I understood, I secured Dowcett and a soldier who was the chief instrument in this design; then I sent after Osborne and Worsley to apprehend them; but they, finding they were discovered, fled in great haste to the water side, where their boat lay ready to receive them, whither they were pursued; but they, as it seems, quitted their horses and turned them loose on the shore, and themselves escaped in the boat. I have since apprehended one John Newland of Newport, whose part it was in the design to act the business concerning the boat. This morning I find the window-bar of the king's bed-chamber, looking to the centinels, appointed to be cut in two in the middle by aqua fortis.—By this your lordships may not only see the dangers past, but also may expect that nothing will be unattempted that the art of man can find out to perfect the king's Escape; which makes me humbly bold to offer to your lordships, if you resolve it necessary to continue the king in this place, that you would please to consider some better way for his security; either by appointing, to this weighty charge, a committee of parliament, as formerly, or otherwise as shall seem best to your lordships. This I move not so much to free myself from burthen or hazard; truly, when I am commanded by you in your service, I know no such thing; but that affairs of so great concernment to your lordships and the kingdom may be better provided for, than by a man so unapt for such weight as myself. In this I beseech your lordships not to look back upon the hazards and difficulties it hath pleased God alone to carry me through in this your service; which if the recital of them to your lordships might not too justly seem my vanity, I should trouble your lordships with a relation that would speak them not few nor ordinary, and thence to pass a judgment for future; but to consider they are like to continue, and accordingly to provide as to your wisdoms shall seem best.—The next thing which I shall make my humble suit to your lordships, and which is so just as I am sure your lordships will not deny, is that you will please to order such provision for those gentlemen attending the king, who have and do still faithfully and honestly serve you here, and that with no small hazard, in some measure answerable to their merit and the trust in their hands; at least that they might not have cause to think themselves neglected, and so rendered more liable to temptation, which they cannot want. I have often written of this particular, and as yet nothing is done in it, which makes me now the more bold thus to press your lordships.—My lords, if your lordships shall see fit longer to continue this heavy weight wholly upon me, seeing I may not be admitted to wait on your lordships at this time, I humbly beg that you would please to send down some persons hither whom you may trust, that may bring back an account of the true state of this place, that so better security may be added to it in divers particulars, too long and troublesome now to relate; to signify unto me your lordships pleasure concerning the persons afore-mentioned now in custody for this matter. My lords, Your, &c. RO. HAMMOND. Carisbrook-Castle May 29."

"Sir; The lords have commanded me to give you thanks for your great care in the discharge of that trust committed to you; and to assure you they will be ready, upon all occasions, to express their respects for you, and will not omit to press for those supplies mentioned in your Letter. I rest, Your, &c. June 1."

June 2. The earl of Warwick being come back from the Fleet, delivered in to the lords divers Papers, containing, 'A Representation of the Proceedings of the Earl of Warwick, Lord High-Admiral, in order to the reducing of such Ships in the Downs as have revolted from the parliament's Obedience.' After reading all these Papers, the lords ordered, That they be communicated to the commons.

Lord Fairfax's Account of his Victory over the Army raised by the Kentish Gentlemen.]

June 3. The following Account was read in the house of lords :

"My lord; It having pleased God to give us a Victory against those, who, without and against the authority of parliament, raised an Army, I held it my duty to give your lordships Account thereof in brief, time not permitting me at present to give the particulars at large: the engagement with them begun the last night about 7 of the clock, near Maidstone, and continued a very hot and fierce dispute until after 12, before we could be masters of the town: the enemy, by reason of the continued supplies which they received from their forces by the passage over Aylesford, were enabled to dispute every street and passage; the choicest of their forces, as we understand, were appointed for this service, and the lord Goring commanded them as general. There were about 200 of the enemy slain, many wounded; about 900 prisoners, 400 horse, 8 pieces of cannon, and great store of arms and ammunition, taken. Sir Wm. Brockman and others of the gentry are prisoners. As God hath been pleased in mercy to give you this Victory, so I desire that we may return all thankfulness unto him for it. I shall (as God shall enable me) improve this advantage, and remain, your, &c. FAIRFAX. Maidstone, June 2."

The Commons drop their Impeachments against the late Lord Mayor, the 3 Aldermen, the 7 Lords, and their own Members.] The commons, this day, resolved that they would proceed no further in their Impeachments against sir John Gayre, knt. late lord mayor of London, Thomas Adams, John Langham, and James Bunce, aldermen; nor against sir John Maynard; nor the earls of Lincoln, Suffolk, and Middlesex; the lords Willoughby of Parham, Berkeley, Hunsdon, and Maynard. They likewise resolved, That the Votes, whereby Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Wm. Waller, sir Wm. Lewis, col. Massey, sir John Clotworthy, Mr. Anthony Nichol, and Mr. Walter Long, stand accused by their house, be discharged. Some colonels, and other officers of the Trained Bands, were also released out of prison.

Lord Fairfax's farther Account of his Success in suppressing the Commotions in Kent.] June 5. The lords received intelligence from the General, discovering the depth of the whole Kentish Plot :

"My lord; I shall, according to my last, give your lordships this further Account of our Success at Maidstone: Upon Thursday in the evening, about 7 o'clock, after very long marches, we got near the town, and a troop of dragoons was sent to make good a pass, whilst the town was viewing at what place our men might best enter: it being resolved upon to force our passage, in case of a resistance, the gaining of that town over the river being of great advantage to our affairs; but before there could be a view taken of the town, the dragoons had engaged the enemy, and forced them from that guard which they kept. The dragoons being very forward to engage, pursued, and so the enemy drew forth a considerable party of horse and foot to maintain a pass against us, which necessitated the drawing down of the greatest part of the foot, with some horse; and though that part of the town was of the greatest difficulty to enter, yet, through the great goodness of God, our men made their entrance, and became masters of the town after 4 or 5 hours hot service.—The town being very strongly barricaded, and through the darkness of the night and our ignorance of the town, they disputed the barricades and places of advantage with our men, playing hard with their cannon upon them; in which service both horse and foot did exceeding well, and particularly I cannot but take notice of the valour and resolution of col. Hewson; whose regiment had the hardest task, major Carter, his major, being hurt, and capt. Price, a deserving and faithful officer, slain. The best of their men were there, whereof many are cavaliers and London Apprentices, they looking upon the consequence of that place to be very great, and therefore did resolve to make what resistance they could. The old lord Goring was that day proclaimed General at the head of their Army, upon the hill near Aylesford, where we saw their body drawn up; which, as their prisoners since do confess, and they themselves gave out, consisted of 8000, besides those in Maidstone and Aylesford, in both which places there were about 3000. Those of Aylesford coming as a fresh supply to relieve those engaged in Maidstone, there were near 300 slain, and about 1300 prisoners, many of them being taken next morning in the woods, hop-yards, and fields, whither they escaped in the time of their flight; amongst whom were many gentlemen of good quality, sir Samuel Dudley, sir Wm Brockman, Mr. Scot, major Price, and others. There were about 500 horse, 3000 arms, 9 foot-colours, and 8 pieces of cannon, with store of ammunition, also taken.—After it had pleased God to give us this great mercy of gaining the town, their men received so great discouragement, that the greatest part of the army left them and were dispersed, and a great number of officers and gentlemen since fled to shift for themselves. Their word at the engagement was, ‘King and Kent;’ ours, ‘Truth’. Having thus possessed ourselves of the passes at Maidstone and Aylesford, the enemy being much confused with our success, and their own men deserting them, they at last marched over Rochester bridge towards Blackheath with about 3000 horse and foot, most of which were cavaliers, apprentices, and watermen. Our men not being able to make so speedy a march after them as was necessary, I sent col. Whaley with a party of horse and dragoons after them, upon whose approach they have left Kent, and fled over the water into Essex, by Woolwich and Greenwich. Col. Whaley is in pursuit, and I doubt not but he will give a good account of that Service. I have sent col. Rich with a party of horse and foot to relieve Dover, wherein I trust we shall find the same presence of God as we hitherto have had. My prayer to the Lord is, that this great mercy may be further improved to his glory and this kingdom’s good. I thought fit to present to your lordships these Papers inclosed, taken from the Enemy; whereby you will perceive the depth of their Plot, and their Engagement to pursue what they have undertaken. I remain Your, &c. FAIRFAX. Rochester, June 4.”

An Act of Indemnity was passed for those who had taken up arms in Essex: also, a Declaration of both houses, That George lord Goring’s taking up arms in Kent and Essex was levying war against the parliament and kingdom; that he was a Traitor, and ought to be proceeded against for the same, in the usual course and proceedings of parliament. Lord Capel likewise was ordered to be sent for up to answer to a Charge against him.

The impeached Peers restored to their Seats.] June 6. The commons sent up a Message to acquaint the lords, That they would proceed no farther upon the Impeachments against the seven Peers. Upon which the lords ordered, That the said Lords by name should be forthwith discharged from the restraint they laid under on account of the said Impeachments; and that the same, upon the aforesaid Declaration of the Commons, should be vacated in the Journal-Book. The same Order was made for discharging the late lord mayor, sir John Gayre, &c. but we do not find above one or two of the Articles of Impeachment vacated, notwithstanding this Order. Ordered, also, That the Lords impeached should have notice to attend the service of the house the next morning.

The new Propositions of Peace to be sent to the King.] This day the lords took into consideration the new Propositions from the commons to be sent to the king; and, after some debate, the following were agreed upon: 1. “Whereas both houses of the parliament of England have been necessitated to undertake a war in their just and lawful defence; and afterwards both kingdoms of England and Scotland, joined in Solemn League and Covenant, were engaged to prosecute the same: That, by act of parliament in each kingdom respectively, all Oaths, Declarations, and Proclamations, heretofore had, or hereafter to be had, against both or either of the houses of parliament of England, the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, and the late convention of estates in Scotland, or committees flowing from the parliament or convention in Scotland, or their ordinances and proceedings, or against any for adhering unto them, or for doing or executing any office, place, or charge, by any authority derived from them; and all judgments, indictments, outlawries, attainders, and inquisitions, in any the said causes; and all grants thereupon made or had, or to be made or had, be declared null, suppressed and forbidden: and that this be publicly declared in all parish-churches within his majesty’s dominions, and all other places needful. 2. Whereas both kingdoms are mutually obliged, by the same Covenant, to bring the Churches of God, in the three kingdoms, to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed Churches: That the Presbyterial government be confirmed by act of parliament, in such manner as both houses of parliament have agreed, in several Ordinances of parliament; that is to say, &c. for the term of 3 years, from the 6th of June 1648.—That it be established by act of parliament, That the lords and commons, in the parliament of England assembled, shall, during the space of 10 years from the 6th of June 1648, arm, train, and discipline, or cause to be armed, trained, and disciplined, all the forces of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales, the isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, already raised, both for sea and land service; and that from time to time, during the said space of 10 years, shall raise, levy, arm, train, and discipline, or cause to be raised, levied, armed, trained, and disciplined, any other forces for land and sea service, in the kingdoms, dominions, and places aforesaid, as in their judgments they shall, from time to time, during the said space of 10 years, think fit and appoint: and that neither the king, his heirs or successors, nor any other, but such as shall act by the authority or approbation of the said lords and commons, shall, during the said space of 10 years, exercise any of the powers aforesaid. And the like for the kingdom of Scotland, if the estates of the Parliament there shall think fit.—That Monies be raised and levied for the maintenance and use of the said forces, for land service, and of the navy and forces for sea service, in such sort, and by such ways and means, as the said lords and commons shall, from time to time, during the said space of 10 years, think fit and appoint, and not otherwise: and that all the said forces, both for land and sea service, so raised or levied, or to be raised or levied, and also the Admiralty and Navy, shall, from time to time, during the said space of 10 years be employed, managed, ordered and disposed, by the said lords and commons, in such sort, and by such ways and means, as they shall think fit, and not otherwise.—And the said lords and commons, during the said space of 10 years, shall have power, 1. To suppress all forces raised, or to be raised without authority and consent of the said lords and commons, to the disturbance of the public peace of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales, the isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any of them; 2. To suppress any foreign forces who shall invade, or endeavour to invade, the kingdoms of England and Ireland, dominion of Wales, the isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any of them; 3. To conjoin such forces of the kingdom of England with the forces of the kingdom of Scotland, as the said lords and commons shall, from time to time, during the said space of 10 years, judge fit and necessary, to resist all foreign invasions, and to suppress any forces raised, or to be raised, against or within either of the said kingdoms, to the disturbance of the public peace of the said kingdoms, or any of them, by any authority of the Great Seal, or other warrant whatsoever, without the consent of the said lords and commons of the parliament of England; and the parliament, or the estates of the parliament of Scotland, respectively: and that no forces of either kingdom shall go into, or continue in, the other kingdom, without the advice and desire of the said lords and commons of the parliament of England, and the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, or such as shall be by them appointed for that purpose.—Provided that, during the said space of 10 years, nothing herein before contained shall extend to the taking away of the ordinary legal power of sheriffs, justices of peace, mayors, bailiffs, coroners, constables, head-boroughs, and other officers of justice, not being military officers, concerning the administration of justice: so as neither the said sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, coroners, constables, head-boroughs, and other officers, or any of them, do levy, conduct, employ, or command any forces whatsoever, by colour or pretence of any commission of array; or extraordinary command, from his majesty, his heirs or successors, without the consent of the said lords and commons.—And if any persons, during the said space of 10 years, shall be gathered and assembled together, in warlike manner, or otherwise, to the number of 50 persons, and shall not forthwith disband, or disperse themselves, being required thereunto by the said lords and commons, or command from them, or any by them especially authorized for that purpose, then such person and persons, not so disbanding, or dispersing themselves, shall be guilty, and incur the pains of high treason; being first declared guilty of such offence by the said lords and commons; any commission under the great seal, or other warrant, to the contrary notwithstanding: and he or they that shall offend herein, to be incapable of any Pardon from his majesty, his heirs or successors; and their estates shall be disposed as the said lords and commons shall think fit, and not otherwise.—Provided that the city of London shall have and enjoy all their rights, liberties, and franchises, customs and usages, in the raising and employing the forces of that city, for the defence thereof, in as full and ample manner, to all intents and purposes, as they have, or might have, used or enjoyed the same, at any time, before the making of the said act or proposition.—And, after your majesty's assent given to the three Propositions now tendered to your majesty, and to such acts of parliament as shall be offered by both houses, for confirmation thereof; then both houses of parliament will treat with your majesty concerning the future settlement of the Government of the Church, the settlement of the Militia, and upon the rest of the Propositions formerly tendered to your majesty at Hampton-Court. And the houses of the parliament of England do desire, That such Propositions as shall be fit and necessary for the kingdom of Scotland, may be prepared to be sent to his majesty with all convenient speed."

A Letter from the Earl of Warwick touching the Mutiny in the Fleet.] June 8. The following Letter from the lord-admiral, was read in the house of lords:

"My lord; Since my coming hither I have used my best endeavours to settle, in a firmness to their duty, the ships found in these parts; which I have done as well as I am able, the several ships companies here having engaged themselves to live and die with me in defence of the parliament's cause. I have not heard any thing from the Downs by sea since my coming hither; but, by a letter received this day from London, I hear that the 6 revolted Ships, lately at the Downs, are gone northward, that some Kentish gentlemen are aboard them, who were engaged in the late Rebellion; and that some of the seamen give out they will speedily go for Holland; which I conceive is not improbable, as the gentlemen aboard may advise and make it their design to provoke them unto it, out of a despair of their non-indemnity, having opposed to the last.—My lord, I have as yet spoken but with four ships, of whose firmness to their trust I have much confidence, and so I have of some others which I shortly expect: yet, considering the uncertainty of affections, and those impressions of discontent which I find upon too many spirits, I humbly offer it unto the wisdom of the houses, whether it may not be a great advantage, to the more speedy and effectual reducing of the revolted Ships, to grant an indemnity to those gentlemen of Kent that are aboard, as they have been pleased to do to the seamen, so as they procure their ships to be delivered to me, or such as the parliament or myself shall appoint; which, in my own private opinion, may be of great use: and, if it shall be so thought fit by the houses, to whose pleasure I do wholly submit, I do make it my humble request accordingly. Your &c. WARWICK. Portsmouth, June 6."

The late impeached Members of the House of Commons restored to their Seats.] This day the commons reversed their Order of the 7th Sept. last, against John Glynne, esq. Recorder of London, on the Petition of the inhabitants of Westminster, for which place he served, and restored him to his seat in the house. The next day they revoked their Orders made in Sept. and Jan. last, disabling sir John Maynard, Lionel Copley, and Denzil Hollis, esqrs. sir Wm. Lewis, sir Wm. Waller, sir John Clotworthy, col. Massey, Walter Long and Anthony Nichol, esqrs. from being members.

Debate on that Occasion.] We meet with the following Minutes of a Debate in the house of commons on this remarkable occasion, drawn up by a member of this parliament.* His account of the affair now before us runs thus: "About the beginning of June, a Debate happened in the house of commons, about the four imprisoned Aldermen, occasioned by a Petition from the city of London; and concerning the impeached Lords and Commons.

Mr. Gewen spake modestly in their behalf, saying, That what they did was done by virtue of an Ordinance of parliament made this very session of parliament, and without any intent to raise a new war; but only to defend the city against the menaces of the Army march-up against them and the parliament. But

Mr. Gurdon answered, He thought they intended a new war, and were encouraged thereto by the gentleman that spake last; when he said to them at their common-council, 'Up and be doing.'

Mr. Walker, perceiving Mr. Gewen to be causelessly reflected on, replied, That since this debate on the City-Petition tended towards a closing up of all differences, it was unfit men that spake their consciences freely and modestly should be upbraided with repetitions tending to disunion; and desired men might not be permitted to vent their malice under colour of shewing their zeal: when, presently,

Mr. Thomas Scot replied upon Mr. Walker, That the gentleman that spake last was not so well affected, but that the close committee of examinations would find cause to take an order with him shortly.—Mr. Walker offered to answer him, and demanded the justice of the house, but could not be heard. Those that spake in behalf of the Aldermen were often affronted, and threatened with the displeasure of the Army; which, they alledged, would be apt to fall into distempers if we discharged them. Notwithstanding these menaces, it was voted, 'That the house would not prosecute their Impeachments against the said four Aldermen, sir John Maynard, and the seven Lords; and that they would proceed no farther upon their Order for impeaching Mr. Hollis, sir Wm. Waller, &c.'—Two or three days after, a motion was set on foot, That the Order whereby the said Members were disabled from being of the house might be revoked. Many zealots argued fiercely, and threatened against it. Amongst other arguments for them a precedent was insisted upon, that Mr. Henry Martin was by order, disabled from being a member, yet he was afterwards re-admitted upon his old election: and it was desired these gentlemen might find equal justice; for the house, having freed them à culpá, could not, in equity, but free them à pænâ, and put them in the remitter of all that belonged to them. But

Sir Peter Wentworth answered, That Mr. Martin's case and theirs differed; Mr. Martin was expelled for words spoken against the king, such as every man's conscience told him were true; but because he spake those words unseasonably, when the king was in good strength, and the words, whether true or false, were, in strictness of law, treason; the house, especially the luke-warm men, considering the doubtful events of war, disabled and committed him, lest the whole house might be drawn in compass of high treason for conniving at them; which was a prudential act, though contrary to justice, and contrary to the sense of the godly and honest party of the house: but afterwards, the king growing weaker and the parliament stronger, the house restored Mr. Martin, and thought fit to set every man's tongue at liberty to speak truth, even against the king himself: and now every day words of a higher nature are spoken against him, by the well-affected godly in the house.—After many threats used by Wentworth, Ven, Harvey, Scot, Gurdon, Weaver, &c, the said disabling Order was repealed."*

* Mr. Ludlow imputes this extraordinary turn of affairs to the many insurrections and

The Commons Answer to the late Petition from Surrey.] June 10. An order was made that the knights of the shire for Surrey do take care to publish and give notice of the following Answer to the late Petition from that county, pressing for a Personal Treaty with the King:—"This house, being sensible of the former services of the county of Surrey, and their late peaceable demeanour in the said county, hath thought fit to give this Answer to the Petition received thence, That this house doth not doubt but the said county must needs take notice of their proceedings, in relation to the Settlement of the Peace of the kingdom, by a Treaty with the king for a safe and well-grounded Peace: and this house hath in consideration such further means, as are most conducive to that end, and to the easing of the burdens of the people; which, by God's blessing, they hope may give satisfaction to the petitioners and to the kingdom."

Insurrections in different Counties, and Petitions for an Agreement with the King.] Insurrections against the parliament still continued in several counties: but rising in small bodies, and in places at a wide distance from one another, they were soon subdued. Letters were this day read in the house of lords, from col. Waite, with an account of a Victory he had obtained against some forces raised in Huntingdon and Cambridge shires, under the command of col. Hudson, who was killed himself in the action, and all his men; no quarter being given to any but the superior officers.—Petitions also came up from different counties, all praying the parliament to agree with the King, in order to relieve them from their miserable and distracted condition; which quickened the house in their Propositions to be sent to his majesty for a Peace.

Debate upon an Information of a Design to murder the King.] June 17. The contemporary historian last cited, gives us the following Account of a Debate relating to a Design of taking off the king by poison, which neither the Journals, Whitlocke, nor Rushworth, take the least notice of in the proceedings of this day; although they all of them make mention of many subsequent particulars concerning this extraordinary plot, which so much engaged the attention of both houses:—"About one of the clock in the afternoon, most of the members being gone to dinner, and very few presbyterians left, the Speaker of the house of commons stood up and told them, That he had received letters from Richard Osborne (he that projected to deliver the King out of the custody of col. Hammond at Carisbrooke-Castle) but that he conceived they tended only to the setting of us altogether by the ears; and propounded, Whether they should be read or no? some were against the reading of them, but the major part called to have them read; which was done accordingly. The Letter to the Speaker had a copy of another Letter inclosed in it, to the lord Wharton, which bore date June 1, 1648, to this purpose, giving his lordship to understand, 'That, upon private conference with captain 'Rolph, (a man very intimate with col. Hammond, and high in the esteem of the Army) 'the said captain Rolph told him (the said 'Osborne) That to his knowledge Hammond 'had received several Letters from the Army, 'advising him to remove the King out of the 'way by poison, or any other means, for it 'would much conduce to their affairs. But ' (said Rolph,) Hammond hath a good allowance for keeping the king, and is therefore 'unwilling to lose so beneficial an employment: but if you will join with me, we will 'endeavour to convey away the King to some 'secret place, and we may then do what we 'will with him.' Osborne offers in his said Letter, 'That if he may come and go with 'safety, he would come and justify this relation upon oath.' He likewise wrote to the Speaker of the lords house about it.—Then was read Osborne's Letter to Mr. Lenthall, Speaker, dated the 10th of June 1648, containing the same narration; with an offer to appear and make it good upon oath, if he might come and go with safety and freedom. The clerk had no sooner done reading this Letter, but, with a slight neglect, and the laughter of some members, the business was passed over without debate, and Mr. Scawen stood up to propound a new business from the Army; when, presently, Mr. Walker, interrupting Mr. Scawen, desired to speak a word to the late business, and asked Mr. Speaker, From whence that Letter came, and who brought it? The Speaker called upon the serjeant at mace, who answered, The Letter was given him at the door by a man that he knew not; that he had many letters and papers thrust upon him, of which he could give no account; but he would endeavour to find out the messenger: then Mr. Walker urged, That such an information coming to the house, ought not to be neglected, whether true or false, but to be examined and sifted to the bottom. If the king should die a natural death, or any mischance befall him, the people, (calling to mind how little care we had taken of his safety) would never be satisfied with our protestation; and moved, That a committee might be named to examine Osborne, Rolph, Hammond, and such others whose names should occur in the examination. This was seconded by sir Symonds D'Ewes, Mr. Henry Hungerford, Mr. Edward Stevens, and some others, who pressed it farther; but received a slight answer, That those that desired to examine the business knew not where to find Osborne; that Osborne was a Malignant, and had attempted to set the King at liberty. To which Mr. Walker replied, That the other day we had named a committee to examine the business concerning the foot-boy that struck sir Henry Mildmay; and yet we neither knew then where to find the foot-boy or what his name was.* If we do but publish that Osborne shall, with freedom and safety, come and go, in case he appear to make good his charge; either he will appear, or we shall declare him an impostor, and punish him when we take him, and clear the reputations of those upon whom this letter seems to reflect. Consider how vast a difference there is between beating a subject and killing a king. And if Osborne whom I know not, be a Malignant; yet, unless you can prove him a nullifidian, or a person convict of perjury, both according to the rules of Christian charity, and in the charitable intendment of our laws, his oath is valid and good. Then Mr. Thomas Scott stood up and said, That this pressing for a committee to examine this business, was but a device to draw col. Hammond and Rolph up to the town to be examined, that the king might the easier make an escape. And sir John Evelin, of Wilts, alledged, That he conceived this to be an invention of Osborne's to bring the king to town with honour, freedom, and safety. Then Mr. Walker stood up again, but was interrupted by Mr. Hill, and not suffered to speak, having already spoken twice.—At the end of almost every motion made for a committee to examine the business, either Mr. Scawen or major-general Skippon stood up, and offered to divert the business by new matter concerning the Army, which usually beareth all other businesses down before it. At last those few that moved for an examination of this information, having spoken as oft as the orders of the house do permit, were forced to be silent; so the business was buried in silence.—I hear that some of the lords called upon this business the Monday following, being the 19th of June; and that the lord Wharton being asked, Why he did not impart Osborne's said Letter to the house? answered, That, as soon as he opened the said letter he received from Osborne, and saw his name at the bottom, he looked upon the business as not considerable; yet he sent the letter to Hammond.—Upon Tuesday, the 20th of June, the lords sent a Message to the commons; the first Paper whereof concerned Osborne's said letters; they desired, That 40 days might be assigned for Osborne to come and go with safety, to make good his information. But sir W. Armyne stood up, and desired, That the minutes of two letters, prepared to be sent into Holland and Zealand, concerning the revolted ships, might be first dispatched, as being of present use. And when the business was ended, Mr. Pierpoint propounded another part of the said message: so Osborne's information was left sine die, for that time: but, since, the lords have quickened it, and 40 days are given to Osborne to come and go with freedom and safety to make good his information, who is come and avoucheth it; and one Dowcet speaketh much in affirmation of a design of Rolph's to pistol the King. Rolph presents himself at the commons bar, with a Letter from Hammond, which denies the design, and pleads Rolph's cause for him. Rolph denied it before the commons with a trembling voice, yet afterwards hid out of the way; but being discovered, upon search, he was found to have a boil upon him that disabled him from riding, otherwise, it is thought, he would have fled far enough.”

Account of the above Design, as given by the Contemporary Historians.] A Review of what is set down upon this remarkable affair by the other Contemporary Writers will be no improper digression; but tend greatly to illustrate our extracts from the Journals relating thereto, which follow under their proper dates.—And first lord Clarendon, who gives a very particular narrative of the whole Transaction, with the circumstances that occasioned the King to endeavour his escape, and what passed between major Rolph and Mr. Osborne previous thereto: * “Before the Treaty,” says his lordship, “and after the Votes and Declarations of no more Addresses, when the king's treatment was so barbarous, his majesty had proposed to himself to make an escape, and was very near the perfecting it. He had none about him but such persons who were placed by those who wished worst to his safety; and therefore chose such instruments as they thought to be of their own principles. Amongst those there was a young man, one Osborne, by extraction a gentleman, who was recommended by the lord Wharton (one who deserved not to be suspected by Cromwell himself) to col. Hammond, to be placed in some near attendance about the king; and he, from the recommendation, never doubting the fitness of the man, immediately appointed him to wait as gentleman-usher; which gave him opportunity to be almost always in the presence of the king. This young man, after some months attendance, was wrought upon by the dignity of the king's carriage, and the great affability he used towards those who were always about him, to have a tenderness and loyal sense of his sufferings; and did really desire to do him any service that might be acceptable. By his office of gentleman-usher he usually held the king's gloves when he was at meat, and first took that opportunity to put a little billet, in which he expressed his devotion, into one of the fingers of his glove. The King was not forward to be credulous of the professions of a person he knew so little, and who, he knew, would not be suffered to be about him, if he were thought to have those inclinations: however, after longer observation, and sometimes speaking to him whilst he was walking amongst others, in the garden allowed for that purpose, his majesty began to believe that there was sincerity in him; and so frequently put some memorial into the fingers of his glove, and, by the same expedient, received advertisement from him.—There was in the garrison one Rolph, a captain of a foot company, whom Cromwell placed there as a prime confidant, a fellow of a low extraction, and very ordinary parts; who, from a common soldier, had been trusted in all the intrigues of the Army, and was one of the Agitators, inspired by Cromwell to put any thing into the soldiers minds, upon whom he had a wonderful influence, and could not contain himself from speaking maliciously and wickedly against the king, when dissimulation was at the highest amongst the great officers. This man grew into great familiarity with Osborne, and knowing from what person he came recommended to that trust, could not doubt but that he was well inclined to any thing that might advance him; and so, according to his custom of reviling the king, he wished he were out of the world; for they should never make any settlement whilst he was alive. He said, he was sure the Army wished him dead, and that Hammond had received many letters from the army to take him away by poison, or any other way; but he saw it would never be done in that place; and therefore, if he would join with him, they would get him from thence, and then the work would easily be done. Osborne asked him, How it could be possible to remove him from thence, without Hammond's, or the king's own consent? Rolph answered, That the king might be decoyed from thence, as he was from Hampton-Court, by some letters from his friends, of some danger that threatened him, upon which he would be willing to make an escape, and then he might easily be dispatched. Osborne shortly found an opportunity to inform the king of all this.—The king bid him continue his familiarity with Rolph, and to promise to join with him in contriving how his majesty should make an escape; and he hoped thereby to make Rolph's villainy the means of getting away. He recommended one of the common soldiers to Osborne, who, he said, he thought might be trusted; and wished him to trust one Dowcet, whom the king had known before, and who was then placed to wait upon him at his back stairs, and was indeed an honest man; for it was impossible for him to make an escape, without the privity of such persons who might provide for him, when he was got out of the castle, as well as help him from thence. Osborne told Rolph, he was confident he should in the end persuade the king to attempt an escape, though he yet seemed jealous and apprehensive of being discovered, and taken again. Dowcet concurred very willingly in it, and the soldier who was chosen by the king proved likewise very honest, and wrought upon one or two of his companions, who used to stand sentinels at the place where the king intended to get out. All things were provided, and the king had a file and saw, with which he had, with wonderful trouble, sawed an iron bar in the window, by which he could be able to get out; and, being in this readiness, the night was appointed, and Osborne at the place where he was to receive the king. But one of the soldiers informed Rolph of more particulars than Osborne had done, by which he concluded that he was false, and directed the soldier to proceed, and stand sentinel in the same place to which he had been assigned; and he, and some others trusted by him, were armed, and stood very near with their pistols. At midnight the king came to the window, resolving to go out; but as he was putting himself out, he discerned more persons to stand thereabout than used to do, and thereupon suspected that there was some discovery made, and so shut the window, and retired to his bed. And this was all the ground of a discourse, which then flew abroad, as if the king had got half out at the window, and could neither draw his body after, nor get his head back, and so was compelled to call out for help; which was a mere fiction.—Rolph acquainted Hammond with what the king had designed; who presently went into his chamber, and found the king in his bed, but the bar of the window cut in two, and taken out; by which he concluded his information to be true; and presently seized upon Dowcet, but could not apprehend Osborne; who was either fled out of the island, or concealed in it that he could not be found. Rolph could not forbear to insult upon Dowcet in prison, and scornfully asked him, Why his king came not forth when he was at the window? And said, He was ready with a good pistol charged to have received him. When Osborne had got into a place of present safety, he writ a letter to his patron the lord Wharton, informing him of the whole matter; and desired him to acquaint the house of peers of the design upon the king's life, and that he would be ready to appear and justify the conspiracy. That lord, after he had kept the letter some time, sent it to Hammond, as the fittest person to examine the truth of the relation. Osborne was not discouraged with all this; but sent two letters to the Speakers of both houses, and inclosed the letter he had formerly writ to the lord Wharton. In the house of commons the information was slighted and laid aside; but it made more impression upon the house of peers, who sent, with more than ordinary earnestness to the commons, That Rolph might be sent for, and a safeguard for 40 days to Osborne, to appear and prosecute.—Rolph brought with him a large testimonial from Hammond of his integrity, and of the many good services he had done to the state. Osborne appeared likewise at the lords bar, and made good, upon oath, all that is before set down, and undertook to produce other evidence. The house of commons had no mind to have it examined farther: but the clamour of the people was so great, that, after many delays, they voted, That it should be tried at the general assizes at Winchester. And thither they sent their well-tryed serjeant Wyld, to be the sole judge of that circuit; before whom the major part of the same jury that had found capt. Burley guilty, was impannelled for the trial of Rolph. Osborne and Dowcet, who, upon bail, had liberty to be there, appeared to make good the indictment; and upon their oaths, declared all that Rolph had said to them, as is set down before. The prisoner, if he may be called a prisoner who was under no restraint, had two lawyers assigned to be of counsel with him, contrary to the law and custom in those cases; but he needed not to have had any counsel but the judge himself, who told the jury, That it was a business of great importance that was before them, and therefore that they should take heed what they did in it: that there was a time, indeed, when intentions and words were treason, but God forbid it should be so now: how did any body know but that those two men, Osborne and Dowcet, would have made away with the king, and that Rolph charged his pistol to preserve him? or perhaps they would have carried him away to have engaged them in a second war? he told them, They were mistaken who did believe the king in prison; the parliament did only keep him safe to save the shedding of more blood. Upon these good directions the grand jury found an Ignoramus upon the Bill."

Sir Philip Warwick writes*, "That Dowcet, whom Rolph had tampered with to poison the king, was clerk of his majesty's Kitchen; and imputes the major's acquittal at Winchester to the dexterity of serjeant Maynard his counsel, who declared in the court unto the grand jury-men, that this accusation, amounting to treason, ought to have had two witnesses to each fact, but there was only one to each fact."—Mr. Ludlow gives this last circumstance a quite different turn, saying†, "That those who were to have been instrumental in the King's Escape, not knowing otherwise how to revenge themselves on those who had defeated their enterprise, accused major Rolph (a captain in that garrison, very active and vigilant in his charge) of a design to kill the king; raising such a clamour about it, that the parliament thought not fit to decline the putting him upon his trial; but the accusation appearing to the grand jury to be grounded upon malice, they refused to find the bill."—Thus much for the Contemporary Writers: return we now to our Journals, which will best enable the reader to form a proper judgment of the Accounts given by those historians.

Two Letters from Mr. Osborne, relating thereto.] June 19. Colonel Hammond was written to, by the Speaker of the house of lords, to take care of the King, for that their lordships were informed of some evil designs against him. What these designs were, appears by the following Letters from Mr. Osborne, read this day: and first, that directed to the earl of Manchester, their Speaker:

"Right Honourable; I did, by a Letter of the first of June, acquaint my lord Wharton with what I send here inclosed, expecting it would before this have been communicated to both houses. What should be the reason for concealing a business of this nature, I know not, except it be to give those time that are concerned in it better to think of some stratagem to evade this discovery. I humbly desire your lordship, upon sight of this relation, to communicate it to the house of peers; which I shall be ready to attest upon oath in every particular, whenever their lordships shall please to allow me that freedom and security which ought to be afforded to any gentleman and Christian in witnessing a truth. My Lord, Your, &c. Rich. Osborne, June 16."

The Letter to the lord Wharton, a copy of which was inclosed in the foregoing, ran thus:

"My lord; Though I cannot but imagine I stand so highly condemned in your lordship's and many persons thoughts, that any thing of vindication from me must come with all the disadvantage and prejudice that may be; yet, my lord, being conscious of my own integrity, and confident that I shall be judged by your lordship by no other rules but those of justice and reason, I cannot doubt but, when I have discovered the grounds and reasons of my actions, that it will appear to your lordship that what I have done hath been as agreeable to the several duties I stand engaged in, as I am supposed to have acted contrary before I am heard. Not to detain your lordship in circumstances, I shall make this protestation. That as no other thing but the danger of the king's life could, in reason, excuse such an attempt, so I do protest, that no inferior consideration did, or could have moved me to such an action: but, my lord, having had such a particular and well-grounded information, that so horrid a design was intended, and moved from those that could, when they pleased, have had the power to put it in execution, I hope I shall not be censured for having postponed all other considerations to that loyalty which, it cannot be questioned, I owe to the king.—But not to leave your lordship unsatisfied with this general account: the intelligence I speak of, concerning this design, I received from capt. Rolph, a person very intimate with the governor, privy to all councils, and one that is very high in the esteem of the Army; he, my lord, informed me, that, to his knowledge, the governor had received several letters from the Army, intimating they desired the king might, by any means, be removed out of the way, either by poison or otherwise; and, at another time, the same person persuaded me to join with him in a design to remove the king out of the castle to a place of more secrecy; proffering to take an oath with me, and to do it without the governor's privity; who, he said, would not consent, because of losing the allowance of the house. His pretence for this attempt was, That the king was in too public a place, from whence he might be rescued; but if he were conveyed into some place of secrecy, he said we might dispose of his person upon all occasions as we thought fit; and this he was confident we could effect without the governor's privity.—My lord, considering all these pregnant circumstances, I think it will appear that there were, if there are not, such intentions concerning his majesty's person, as may well justify any endeavours that have been made for his remove from so much danger. And for my own part, my lord, I must be so plain as to declare, concerning my own acting in relation to this business, that had I done less, having such grounds, I must believe I had then verified all those aspersions of disloyalty and breach of trust, which I am contented to suffer from those whose interest is, perchance, opposed by my endeavours to prevent such damnable designs.—My lord, I have spoke nothing here but what I shall be ready to justify upon oath whenever I shall be called to it, with promise of freedom and security; till then I must be contented to support all censures, and satisfy myself with the vindication I receive from my own conscience. I am, my lord, Your, &c. Rich: Osborne. June 1."

The Fleet still continuing in their revolt against the parliament, both houses thought necessary to pass a Vote, That another Fleet should be fitted out, of as large a number of ships as was necessary to reduce the others to obedience. And, to prevent any insurrections at home, the parliament set forth a Declaration, in which were recited the three Votes, passed May 20, 1642, declaring all those Traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom, that aided and assisted the king against the parliament; and applying them to those who rose in arms at this time.

Col. Hammond's Complaint against the foregoing Letters from Mr. Osborne.] June 23. The following Letter from colonel Hammond, giving an Account of an intention to aid the King in an Escape from his custody, was read in the house of lords:

"My lord; Having lately received knowledge of the unparalleled wicked practices of Mr. Osborne, from the right hon. the lord Wharton, by a Letter which his lordship sent me, directed to him, from the said Mr. Osborne, who hath been the chief instrument in contriving and acting, as far as in him lay, the late design of the king's intended Escape; wherein it appears that, failing in that his treacherous purpose, and meeting with new counsellors, he proceeds in a more abominable way, by shameful and unheard-of lies, as much as in him lieth, to abuse and inflame the disturbed minds of the people in these distracted times; and most unworthily to scandalize me, and the rest of the gentlemen now attending the King, in those things wherein his own heart is a witness that they are of all others most contrary to truth: and being since further informed, that, in prosecution of this his audacious villainy, he hath written public Letters to both houses of parliament, asserting such horrid falsities that are hardly fit to be named, but by such a wretch, whose principles being falsehood and treachery, knows no limits in wickedness:—My lords, my sense of the ill that, in such times as these, may accrue to the kingdom by such abuses, causes me to send up this bearer, major Rolph, (though through weakness he be very unable to travel) whom he avouches for his author; that if your lordships please he may be examined, who will sufficiently inform your lordships of the great untruths raised by that unworthy person; whom, if you let pass, (as not worthy taking notice of to bring to shame, like those who spread abroad the late false report of my inhuman abusing the person of the King,) it were indifferent to me, were not the public more than myself concerned in it; but the wisdom of your lordships doth, and I doubt not will, more thereby discern the design driven at in such reports; and will take care for a right understanding of those who have been, and yet may be, deceived by such abuses. For my own particular, had I not been thus occasioned by my duty to your lordships and the kingdom, I should have left the clearing of my integrity (as formerly, so still) to the righteous God; who, if with patience men can wait and trust in him, will certainly confound and destroy that structure, whose foundation is laid in lies, with shame and sorrow to its wicked builder.—My lords, I have not only, to support and bear me up against these calumnies, the testimony of a good conscience; but, to clear me amongst men, it pleased God to order it, that, upon several occasions given, and that before many witnesses, the King is so just as to vindicate me from all those aspersions; and so I doubt not will all others that have any sense of honour or truth, or such who have been witnesses to my actions and deportment since his majesty's unexpected coming to this place.—My lords, I conclude with this profession to your lordships, as in the presence of God, the Searcher of all Hearts, That as all the goods of this world could not have hired me to this employment, could I have avoided it, or would your lordships have seen it fit otherwise better to have provided for it; so, seeing Providence hath cast me upon it, or rather it upon me, I have, (and by the assistance of God will so continue) to the utmost of my power and knowledge, demeaned myself with all dutiful respect to his majesty's person, with an equal eye to the duty I owe your lordships and the kingdom, in the great trust your lordships have been pleased to place upon me; and this with that integrity and evenness, that I stand ready to give an account to God and all men of my actions herein. This satisfaction I need not give to your lordships, for I find, upon all occasions, the constant testimony of your favour to me; yet being a little sensible of the wickedness of this most ungrateful and unworthy person, makes me thus to trouble your lordships, though I need not: reason itself will plead sufficiently against him, who having attempted and failed in such a design, being so principled as such a man must be, that, for his own interest, he should proceed thus to colour his villainy, as by his late addresses to both houses.—My lords, I shall not further trouble your lordships but with a most earnest expectation, looking for a deliverance from my intolerable burthen, which God and a good conscience only support a weak man to undergo; either by a removal of his majesty's person from hence, when to your lordship's wisdom it shall seem safe and fit, or by a better providing for it by a person, or persons, more able to undergo it; either of which that may best suit your lordships affairs is most heartily desired, and that with speed, if God see it good; till when, in the strength of that God who hath carried me on hitherto, and as he shall enable me, being sufficiently guarded against the worst that malice can throw on me, in all constant integrity, I shall endeavour to express myself, Your, &c. ROB. HAMMOND.—P. S. Mr. Osborne's Letter to my lord Wharton, which his lordship sent me, I have inclosed in a letter to the committee at Derby-House. Since I ended this letter I have examined the three soldiers that were dealt with to have been assistant in the King's Escape; but they all affirm, and are ready to make good upon oath, that neither Osborne, Dowcet, or any other, told them that the King's life was in danger; so that it seems clear that this is a device of his own to inflame the people. Carishrooke Castle, June 21."

Major Rolph examined before the Commons, touching the Design against the King's Life.] The same day, the house of commons being informed that major Rolph was at the door, he was called in; and the Speaker, (having acquainted him, That what he was to speak, was to be spoken in an high court of justice; and therefore requiring and exhorting him to speak the truth, as he would answer the same at the dreadful day of judgment) by command of the house, examined him strictly what he knew concerning the design of taking away the King's Life, wherewith he was charged by the Letter of Richard Osborne? He answered, That he never knew of any such Design, either by discourse or letter; or ever received any intimation from the governor of the Isle of Wight, or from any other person, by writing or otherwise, touching the same: Hereupon the house sent a message to the lords, acquainting them, That major Rolph being come to town they desired their lordships to nominate a committee of their house to examine him forthwith, upon oath, in the presence of a committee of the commons; and also to take the Examinations of all other persons that will come in to testify their knowledge touching the allegations of Osborne, in his Letters to the Speaker and to the lord Wharton. It was also ordered, That the said Osborne have 40 days to come, and depart, with safety to his person, to make good his allegations mentioned in these Letters; that the same be forthwith printed and published; and also posted up at Westminster, Paul's, and both the Exchanges.

A Committee appointed to consider of a Peace with the King.] June 26. The lords resolved to appoint a Committee to consider what the parliament had done towards the settling of a Peace, and what the King had offered; also, what was fit to be further offered to the king for his satisfaction, and for settling of a speedy and well-grounded Peace; and, likewise, That the said Committee should consider of the time, place, and other circumstances, where Addresses were to be conveniently made to the King.

Mr. Osborne avows his Charge against Major Rolph: who makes his Escape.] June 28. Richard Osborne, the person complained of in col. Hammond's last Letter to the lords, was brought to the bar; when the Speaker told him, That that house had received a Letter from him of a very high nature, whereupon he had a protection to come in. He said, He was come to make good what he had written; but much did depend upon Dowcet's deposition to clear things. Then the lords commanded that the Letter he had written to the earl of Manchester, and also the copy of his Letter to the lord Wharton inclosed, should be shewed unto him, which was done: and it being demanded of the said Osborne, Whether he would avow the Letters, and justify the matter thereof, he answered, Yes; whereupon the house commanded that the said Letters should be read in his presence; which was accordingly done. The said Mr. Osborne being asked, What witnesses he would desire to have examined concerning this business, he said, Mr. Dowcett and one Mr. Worsley; and then he withdrew.—Being called in again and sworn, he was asked, Whether major Rolph did acquaint him with a design of poisoning the King? This he avowed upon his oath.—Hereupon the lords ordered that major Rolph, being accused of High Treason before that house, shall stand committed to the Gatehouse, Westminster, there to be kept in safe custody until their pleasure be further signified. A warrant was issued accordingly, and Mr. serjeant Finch was ordered to prepare a Charge against the said major, and present the same to the house, after advice had with the judges: Mr. Osborne was bound in a recognizance of 5000*l.* to make good his Charge against him, and ordered to attend the house of lords the next Thursday, and so de die in diem, for that purpose. Mr. Worsley and Mr. Dowcet were also ordered to give their attendance as witnesses.—But the major, in the mean time, thought fit to make his escape: for, sengers belonging to the gentleman-usher attending the house of lords, gave Account that he had searched all places about the town for major Rolph, but could not find him: hereupon their lordships ordered a Letter to be written to col. Hammond, governor of the Isle of Wight, requiring him to make search there for the major; and, upon discovery of him, to send him up in safety to the house; and that a proclamation be issued out to summon him to come by a certain day.

Petition for a Personal Treaty.] This day a Petition was presented to the lords from the master, wardens, and fellowship of the Trinity-house, for a Personal Treaty with the King. Another was also presented from the Watermen upon the Thames, to the same end. These Petitions, with those sent up from several counties, all calling for a Personal Treaty, evidently shew that the greater part of the nation was strongly attached to monarchy. That the house of lords were in earnest to bring about a reconciliation with the king appears by the proceedings of the next day.

The Votes of Jan. 3, 1647, forbidding all Addresses to the King, vacated.] June 30. The earl of Northumberland reported from the committee last appointed to consider of what had been, and what might be offered to the King, &c. "That they had resolved the best way for opening a Treaty with his majesty, was, That the Votes of Jan. 3, 1647, forbidding all Addresses to be made to or from the King, be taken off: and that the three Propositions sent into Scotland, to be granted by the king before a Personal Treaty be begun, be not insisted on."—The lords agreed to these Votes, and ordered them to be sent down to the commons for their concurrence: to the first of them that house agreed without a division, but took time to consider of the second.

Siege of Colchester.] July 1. The Siege of Colchester had now been carried on for some months, without much notice being taken of it in the Journals. This town had been seized on by the Kentish royalists under the command of the earl of Norwich, lord Capel, and sir Charles Lucas. Mr. Rushworth* has preserved a very particular Diary of this Siege, to which we refer: observing only, That the few brave men who composed the garrison, held out against the force of lord Fairfax's veteran army, to the last extremity; and were reduced to such distress, that butter was sold at 5s. a pound, and even horse-flesh at 10d.

Major Rolph's Letter to the House of Lords, avowing his Innocency.] This day the following Letter was sent to the house of lords from major Rolph.

My lords; "Being informed that this honourable house hath passed an Order for my commitment, and knowing myself (I speak in the presence of God who searcheth all hearts) to be so perfectly clear and innocent of that foul and horrid crime charged upon me, that I abhor the very thoughts both of that and also of concealing myself from your lordships; and therefore earnestly desire an opportunity of appearing for vindication of my innocency in this matter, or whatever else malice in wicked men can lay against me; resting fully assured, that whatsoever award I may find at the hands of men, I shall enjoy the happiness of an upright and peaceable conscience with the same God. I should still have attended your lordships pleasure, had not that distemper of body, which was before upon me, by its growth necessitated me to apply myself unto the use of means; whereby I am at present so disabled that, without apparent danger, I cannot now wait upon your lordships; the truth whereof these bearers, my surgeons, can testify. Thus craving your lordships favourable construction of my present condition, with acceptance of these lines, I rest Your, &c. E. Rolph."

The lords shewed little regard to this Letter, for they ordered the major to be removed from his own lodging to the Gatehouse: he was accordingly conveyed thither in a horse-litter, under a guard of the Trained Bands.

Mr. Dowcet's Declaration relative to the Design of Killing the King.] July 3. Mr. Dowcet, one of the persons mentioned before to have been acquainted with the design upon the King's life, was brought to the bar of the house of lords; and being asked by the Speaker, What he knew of that affair, he delivered in a Paper, signed with his own hand, which was read as follows: "I am ready to make oath, That Mr. Rd. Osborne told me, the King's Person was in great danger; and that Rolph had a design on foot for conveying the king's person to some place of secrecy, where he might dispose of his person as he thought fit. Which information from Mr. Osborne, and the assurance I had of his majesty's intentions forthwith to come to his parliament, was the cause of my engaging in this affair.—I am ready likewise to depose, that the said Rolph came to me when I was a prisoner in the castle; and, in a jeering manner, asked me, Why the king came not down according to his appointment? And then, with great indignation and fury, said, He waited almost 3 hours, under the new plat-form, with a good pistol ready charged, to have received him if he had come. A. Dowcett."

Hereupon the lords ordered, That Mr. Serjeant Finch should make use of this Paper in drawing up a Charge against major Rolph; and that he be kept close prisoner in the Gatehouse until the pleasure of their house be further known.

Debate in the Commons upon a Motion for a Personal Treaty with the King.] This day there was a warm debate in the commons, upon a motion for a Personal Treaty with the King.*

Mr. Thomas Scott said, He was of opinion

* Walker's History of Independency. p. 112.

that there could be no time seasonable for such a treaty, or for a peace with so perfidious and implacable a prince; but it would always be too soon, or too late. He that draws his sword upon the king, must throw his scabbard into the fire; and that all peace with him would prove the spoil of the godly.—To which it was answered, That some men got well by fishing in troubled waters; and accounted peace their spoil, because war was their gain; and these looked upon a Personal Treaty as a design against themselves, (under the notion of the godly, honest, confiding party) because it was the high way to peace. But that the generality of the people, who had been despoiled of their estates by the war, were resolved to be no longer made fuel to that fire wherein those salamanders live; nor any longer feed those horse-leeches the Army, their engaged party and servants, with their own blood and marrow; and therefore were determined upon a Personal Treaty with the king, as the only means of settling the Peace of the kingdom.—The next point was, the place where such a Treaty should be held. For this purpose the isle of Wight and the king's house at Holdenby were proposed, or any other of his majesty's houses not nearer than ten miles off London, or the city of London itself. The Independents were for the two first, but principally affected the isle of Wight. The Presbyterian adhered to the two latter, but insisted chiefly for London. In favour of the city it was argued, That the common council and officers of the soldiery would undertake for the king's safety against all tumults: in any other place he would be within power of the Army, who might probably take him away again (as they did at Holdenby) if they liked not the manner and matter of the treaty. London was a place of most honour, safety, and freedom; and would best satisfy the king, the Scots, and the people: in all other places, especially the isle of Wight, he would be still a prisoner to the Army; and therefore all he should agree to would be void by reason of that duress. To this

Serjeant Wylde answered, 'That custodia did not always, in law, signify imprisonment: Though the king was under restraint of the Army, he was not in prison (making a difference between restraint and legal imprisonment); that the king cannot plead duress; no man can imprison or hurt the king in his political capacity, as king; though in his natural capacity, as a man, he is as passive as other men.—To this it was replied, That it had been frequently said in the house, the king was a prisoner; and there was no difference, in law, between a restraint and an imprisonment, whether legal or illegal. A tortious restraint is called, in law, a false imprisonment. That former kings have voided their own acts, by pleading restraint or imprisonment, and constraint, as Henry 3, Richard 2. That the king may as well plead imprisonment as the parliament plead a force, which they have lately done. That the king's restraint, in law, is arcta custodia; and they wished it might be salva custodia, though but lately they had information to the contrary. The distinction between the king's natural and political capacity was treason in the Spencers; (and so declared by two acts of parliament Ed. 2. and Ed. 3.) and my lord Coke, in Calvin's case, affirmed, they are inseparable by law.' In Answer to this

Mr. Scott said, That the city was as obnoxious to the king's anger as any part of the kingdom; and if the Treaty should be in London, who could secure the parliament that the city would not make their peace with the enraged king, by delivering up their heads to him for a sacrifice, as the men of Samaria did the heads of the 70 sons of Ahab?—It was also further moved, That if the king came not to London, but to one of his houses about ten miles from thence, he might be desired to give his royal word to reside there until the conclusion of the Treaty.

Colonel Harvey slighted this motion, vilifying the king's royal word, and saying, There was no trust in princes: to this purpose he alleged, That the King's promise had been frequently broken; as when he protested that the safety and privileges of parliament should be as precious to him as the safety of his wife and children; and yet, within 3 or 4 days after, came with armed guards to force the house, in the case of the five Members. This argument was farther urged by sir Henry Vane, junr. and sir Henry Mildmay*, who attempted to instance many particulars to prove that the king was a perjured man, and therefore ought in no case to be trusted: whereupon

Sir Symonds D'Ewes stood up, and declared himself to be of a contrary opinion; for that the house not only ought, but must trust his majesty; and that they were not in a condition to stand upon such high terms: 'For,' said he 'Mr. Speaker, If you know not in what condition you are, give me leave in a word to tell you: your silver is clipped; your gold shipped; your ships are revolted; yourselves contemned; your Scots friends enraged against you; and the affections of the city and kingdom quite alienated from you. Judge then whether you are not in a low condition, and also if it be not high time to endeavour a speedy settlement and reconciliation with his majesty.'

The Commons resolve that the King shall assent to the Three Propositions before any Treaty.] At length, the house came to this resolution, upon a division of 80 against 72, "That the three Propositions for settling Church-Government, for the Militia, and for recalling all Proclamations and Declarations against the parliament, be sent to the king; and be by him assented to, and signed with his hand, before the Treaty: and that the same be made acts of parliament when the king shall come to Westminster." But the place of Treaty was not fixed upon till some months after.—Next day, the commons sent up the foregoing Vote; which was referred to consideration the next morning, and all the lords to be summoned to appear. At which time, after reading the said Vote, it was unanimously agreed to adhere to their former Vote, That the three Propositions sent into Scotland, to be granted by the King, before a Personal Treaty be begun, be not insisted on. A committee of lords were also appointed to draw up Reasons, to be given at a conference with the commons, why their lordships adhere to their own Vote.

July 6. The commons resolved, That all the Papers relating to the Negotiations between the English commissioners and the parliament of Scotland, should be forthwith printed and published, but this was not done till the 14th of August following.*

The Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Holland, Peterborough, &c. take up Arms in favour of the King.] At this time came intelligence of 500 horse being got together near Kingston upon Thames, headed by the earl of Holland and the duke of Buckingham, with his brother lord Francis Villiers; that the earl of Peterborough had joined them; that they had declared for the King; summoned the country to come in; and plundered some of the parliament's friends. This affair soon discovered itself more fully.

A Declaration of their Intentions.] July 7. A Letter was read in the house of lords, from col. Dingley at Hampton-Court, directed thus:

For my honoured Friend, John Brown, esq.
Clerk of the Parliament.

"Sir; These Letters are of much concern to the public business, therefore I desire the packet may be delivered with all speed; for the timely notice may prevent much danger. Your servant, Jo. Dingley. July 6."

In the packet were three Letters inclosed; one directed for the Speaker of the house of lords, another for that of the commons, and a third for the lord mayor. The two last were immediately sent as directed, and the first was read as follows, together with a Declaration under the same cover:

For the Right Hon. the Speaker of the House of Peers.

"My lord; We do here take away your jealousies, by giving you a clear knowledge of our Designs; which if you shall be pleased to communicate to the house of peers, we hope they will find we do not vary from those principles and grounds we have been engaged in, both for his majesty and the parliament; which God give them grace so to think and advise upon it, as his majesty may find his just rights, according to our Covenant and Declarations, and the Parliament rise and recover the dignity due unto them, by a speedy way of settling the Peace of this distracted kingdom. Your, &c. G. BUCKINGHAM, HOLLAND, PETERBOROUGH."

* In the Title Page the design of the publication is thus set forth: 'That it may appear what the endeavours of the kingdom of England have been to keep a good understanding, and to preserve the union between the nations: and how the Seizing of Berwick and Carlisle by Papists and other notorious Delinquents (against whom both kingdoms lately joined in war as enemies to the happiness and peace of both) was countenanced, if not procured, by the Scots nation, contrary to several Treaties and Agreements between the kingdoms of England and Scotland.'

The DECLARATION of the Duke of Buckingham, the earls of Holland and Peterborough, and other lords and gentlemen, now associated for the King and Parliament, the Religion, Laws, and Peace of his Majesty's Kingdoms.

"Finding this conjuncture to be the proper time when this wearied kingdom may be delivered from those miseries it both hath and may apprehend yet to feel by such persons as are ill-affected to our peace; who at this time, without authority or commissions, disperse themselves into all parts to raise forces, with no other intention but to continue a bloody and intestine war; which may prove dangerous to the whole kingdom from the assistance they find by the committees of the several counties, who have so abused their power and the people by an arbitrary way of government, as they shun and apprehend nothing more than what we shall endeavour and seek, peace and a well-settled government: and therefore that the whole kingdom may be satisfied upon what grounds and principles we go to oppose and prevent this mischief and danger, we do here declare, That we do take up Arms for the king and parliament, religion and the known laws, and peace of all his majesty's kingdoms; professing before Almighty God, That we have no other design in this undertaking, but to see this well and speedily established; and will, with readiness and joy, lay them down whensoever God shall give us the enjoyment of this blessing; professing that, whatsoever may be our success and prosperity in this good cause, we shall not say by way of menace to the parliament, that we will use the power God hath put into our hands; but shall bless God that he hath made us the instruments to serve the king, the parliament and kingdom, in the way of peace, in a just and equal composure between them: and we hope the city and kingdom will well weigh and consider, whether they may not more reasonably and conscionably join with us in these pious and peaceable resolutions, than with those forces that have, by their breach of faith and their disobedience, kept up the sword, when those that delivered it into their hands commanded the laying of it down; which disobedience hath brought this fresh storm of blood that is now falling upon this kingdom, and all those fears and confusions that Petitions daily shew to be in the thoughts and apprehensions both of the city and the whole kingdom. We might add sad circumstances that are of late discovered and broken out concerning his majesty's Person, and likewise a confused and levelling undertaking to overthrow monarchy, and to turn order, that preserves all our lives and fortunes, into a wild and unlimited confusion: but we desire not to express any thing with sharpness, since our end and pursuit is only Peace; which shall appear to all the world, whensoever we may see a Personal Treaty so begun with his majesty as we may expect a happy conclusion by it; which cannot follow but by a cessation of arms, that in all parts of the world hath accompanied these Treaties, even between the bitterest enemies, Christians and Turks, much more to be expected in these our civil divisions amongst ourselves; for the sword should not be in action as long as a Treaty of Peace is in agitation, since accidents of hostility on both sides will sharpen and divide us rather than close and unite us. This we thought fit both to desire and to declare, that the discourses that may be raised upon our actions may not have power to abuse the kingdom, as if we did only move in a way to set up his majesty in a tyrannical power, rather than in his just regal government; the which hath been always found, in this nation, very well consistent with the due rights and freedom of parliament, which we do here most faithfully protest the endeavouring a preservation of, and call God to witness our sincerity in this intention. G. BUCKINGHAM, HOLLAND, PETERBOROUGH."

The foregoing Letters being read in the house of commons, they immediately passed a Vote, declaring the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Holland and Peterborough, and all that have or shall adhere to them, traitors and rebels, as levying war against the parliament and kingdom; and that they ought to be proceeded against as such: also, that the Committees in the several counties, where any of their estates lie, do forthwith proceed to the sequestration thereof.

Their Attempt defeated by the Parliament's Forces.] This Attempt in favour of the King proved abortive, the forces raised upon that occasion being totally routed, a few days after, by sir Michael Livesay and major Gibbons. The earl of Holland fled to St. Neot's, in Huntingdonshire, where he was taken by col. Scrope; and being, by order of parliament, committed to Warwick-Castle, continued a prisoner till he lost his head upon the scaffold. The duke of Buckingham and the earl of Peterborough made their escape into London, and there lay concealed till they found an opportunity of going into Holland, and joining the prince of Wales. The motives to this insurrection, and the particulars of the defeat, are amply related by the contemporary historians.*

Col. Hammond's Vindication of himself, touching the Charge against Major Rolph.] July 3. Another Letter from col. Hammond, concerning the charge against major Rolph, was read, directed to the Speaker of the house of peers: "My lord; Being deeply sensible of the reflection upon me, and divers other innocent persons, by Mr. Osborne's proceedings in excuse of his odious Treachery; I am bold to beg of you, that this Charge against major Rolph may be brought to a speedy examination; who, I am confident, will appear a man exceedingly injured, and this only a design to work greater disturbances in these distracted times. As this horrid scandal relates to the Army, I must say, that, neither directly nor indirectly from any member of it, or from any other person or persons whatsoever, did I ever receive a word or tittle tending, in the least, to such a wicked purpose; much less, as it relates to myself, could I, or did I, speak any such thing to Major Rolph. But this is not the first fruit of this kind I have received for my faithful service to you, nor is it more than what I have expected; yet herein I am satisfied, that, in faithfulness and integrity, I have observed your commands with all possible care of, and respect to, the person of the king; so that, come what will come, I can say from a good conscience, the will of God be done: and in this I appeal to his majesty, who, of any man, best knows it; and who doth, and I doubt not will still, upon every occasion, as opportunity serves, sufficiently clear me.—My lord, if through Mr. Osborne's malice, or rather the wicked design of those who have set him on work, you have received the least prejudice against me, be pleased to send down some other, whom you may judge more worthy of your trust, to receive my charge; and I shall immediately, with all possible speed, present myself to you to receive your pleasure. In the mean time it shall be the business of my best endeavours to preserve his majesty's person from danger, as well as in security, in this place, according to your commands, until I receive instructions for his removal; which I hope and expect will be sudden. Your, &c. Ro. Hammond, Carishbrooke Castle, July 4."

Petition from the City of London not to make Peace with the King without previous Security.] July 12. A Petition was presented to the lords, by alderman Fowke and others, of a different tendency to any of the foregoing:

To the Right Hon. the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled; The Humble PETITION of divers well-affected Magistrates, Ministers, Citizens, and other Inhabitants of the City of London, and Parts adjacent.

"Sheweth; That we cannot but take notice of the many obstructions you have met withal, whilst, with indefatigable care and diligence, you have been earnestly labouring and endeavouring the deliverance of the people of this kingdom from those many and great invasions made, and much more intended, upon Religion and Civil Liberties, had not you, assisted by the Almighty God, interposed, for which we cannot but render all humble and hearty thanks; and now finding the same evil spirit reviving and working much more strongly and effectually, though much more closely and cunningly, under specious pretences; attempting that by subtilty, which, by the goodness of our God, they could not obtain by power; using such things as an occasion and means to divide, which, at first, were ordained for uniting of all the godly and honest people of the three kingdoms upon safe and just principles, viz. the Protestation in May, 1641; the Vow in June, 1643; the Solemn League and Covenant in Sept. 1643; and your other several Votes and Declarations to the same effect: although your petitioners do most heartily desire a right understanding and an happy reconciliation between the king and parliament, yet it is far from the thoughts of the petitioners (and they hope of many others that have lately, out of good affection, petitioned for a Personal Treaty) to make use of tumults or commotions, and revolts of castles and ships, thereby engaging the kingdom in a new war, or of any other difficulties the parliament hath been, or may be, exposed unto, to precipitate their councils, or to destroy their forces that now are, or hereafter shall be, raised; being, as the petitioners conceive, contrary to the said Protestation, Vow, and Covenant, as it is also calculated to necessitate the parliament to a Treaty, before such Satisfaction and security be given as may obtain the ends of our former Engagements.—Your petitioners therefore humbly pray, That, you will adhere to the said Protestation, Vow, and Covenant, and to the constant tenor of all your former Declarations; and not recede from those first and just principles, viz. the Safety of yourselves, and all that have or shall adhere to you; the Reformation and Preservation of Religion; the Maintenance and Defence of our Laws and Liberties which you have openly held forth to all the world, and by which you have engaged all the honest and well-affected people of all the three kingdoms to serve you, with their lives and estates; lest you betray yourselves and them to the merciless cruelties of those that seek your and their destruction, and draw the blood of many innocent persons upon you and yours.—For preservation whereof your petitioners further humbly desire you will faithfully persevere in the due execution of your said just undertakings and engagements; and that such a course by your wisdoms may be taken, for security and satisfaction to be given as aforesaid, that neither his majesty, nor any other, may have occasion or opportunity of renewing the old, or raising a new war; and so doing, that God, who hath hitherto owned you and your cause, will assuredly do so still; and we your petitioners, with many thousands, as formerly, so are still ready, in pursuance of the said Protestation, Vow, and Covenant, with their lives and fortunes, to adventure all with you and your forces, in this common cause, against all opposition. And we shall ever pray, &c."

This Petition, as the Journal expresses, was said to be subscribed by divers Thousands, in the name of several well-affected Magistrates, Ministers, Citizens, and other inhabitants of the city of London; and parts adjacent; but the persons who brought it in being withdrawn, the lords debated some time on the question, Whether to return them Thanks for it, or not? which was carried in the affirmative; the earls of Lincoln and Suffolk, and the lord Hunsdon, entering their dissent against it. After which the Speaker, by command of the house, returned the following Answer:

"The lords have full confidence of the faithful services and constancy of you, who now have delivered this Petition; and have commanded me to give you thanks for your fidelity to the parliament; and to desire that, in their names, thanks may be returned to all the rest of the petitioners, for the expressing of their good affections and zeal to the honour and safety of the parliament. They have further commanded me to assure you, That their endeavours shall be so to act, as that they may declare to the whole kingdom their constant adherence to their Protestation, Vow, and Covenant, in the maintenance of the cause they are engaged in, and in the procuring and settling a safe and well-grounded Peace."

But when this Petition was presented to the commons, they were so far from debating whether the petitioners should receive thanks or not, that the Speaker, by order of the house, gave them an Answer expressed in the highest terms of satisfaction; which, with the Petition, was ordered to be forthwith printed and published, as follows:

"The house hath received your Petition, and taken into their serious consideration the matter thereof: they find it a Petition for Peace, for peace indeed: such a peace as is pursued by this house, and all honest men, with preservation of religion, the laws, and the liberties of the subject, in a safe and well-grounded peace, upon the principles whereon we first engaged: they look also upon the seasonableness of it, at such time when men's spirits, by the artifice of Malignants, are so heightened against the parliament, that honest men scarce dare own the former cause: and yet, at this time you dare justify your first principles: and when there is scarce power to imprison any of our enemies, that either hath, or doth now engage in this new and bloody design, without tumults and rescues; and yet now you dare avouch your former undertakings.—The house doth also observe the quality of the petitioners; divers aldermen, and great magistrates of the city of London; many reverend ministers, who have always held close to the cause; many noble commanders and officers, and other the gentlemen of birth and quality, that have less valued their blood, than the hazard and loss of so noble an undertaking, in which they perceive the constancy of your resolutions to the cause of the kingdom, and of your affection to this house.—I am commanded to give you their real and hearty Thanks, and to declare unto you, That they are resolved to adhere to their first principles, and with their lives and fortunes maintain the same, and all that do adhere to them therein; and also do approve of the Petition, and the matter thereof: and they have further commanded me to assure you, That, in composing of the Peace they are now upon, they will take care for the preservation of Religion, the Laws, and the Liberties of all those that have or shall adhere and remain constant to these ends.”

The Duke of Hamilton's Letter to Gen. Lambert, upon the Scots Army marching into England.] The same day a Message came up to the lords from the other house, along with a Letter from major general Lambert, in which was inclosed another from the duke of Hamilton; the purport of which was as follows: and first the duke's.

“Noble sir; The parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, upon the consideration of the great danger imminent to religion, his majesty's sacred person, and the peace of his kingdoms, from the prevailing power of sectaries and their adherents in England, did lately send to the honourable houses of parliament such Demands as they conceived just and necessary; whereunto not receiving any satisfactory Answer, and finding their dangers still increasing by great forces drawn together upon their borders, the Committee of Estates of Parliament have thought fit to lay their commands upon me, with such other noble persons as they have joined with me in this their service, for prosecuting their just Desires, in pursuance of the ends of the Covenant, according to the joint Declaration of both kingdoms of the 6th of Jan, 1643, 4 for settling of religion; liberating his majesty from his base imprisonment; freeing the honourable houses from such restraint by forces which have been long upon them; disbanding all armies, whereby the subjects may be freed from the intolerable burthen of taxes and free quarter, which they have so long groaned under; and for procuring the settling of a solid Peace and firm union betwixt the two kingdoms under his majesty's government.—These being the true intentions and Desires of the kingdom of Scotland, who will most faithfully observe, on their parts, their Engagement by covenant and treaties to their brethren of England; I expect therefore you will not oppose this pious, loyal, and necessary undertaking; but rather join with them and me in the prosecution of those ends.—I shall desire that the bearer, the trumpeter, may not be long kept; but returned with your present positive answer, that accordingly I may move as I am commanded. I am, sir, &c.
HAMILTON. Annan, July 6.”

To his Excellency James duke of Hamilton and Chastleherault, &c. General of all the Scots Forces by Sea and Land,

“My lord; I have received a Letter from your excellency by your trumpeter, which mentions that the parliament of Scotland having, upon consideration of the danger to religion, his majesty's person, and kingdoms, by sectaries in England, addressed themselves to the parliament of England for redress, they have not received a satisfactory Answer therein. To this, my lord, I shall not take upon me to give any Answer, seeing their late Ordinances concerning the Settlement of Religion, their sundry Addresses and Propositions tendered to his majesty, in order to the Peace and well-being of this kingdom, are published and laid open to the view of the world; all which, I doubt not, are well known to your excellency.—To what your lordship mentions concerning the increase of Danger, by the drawing of some forces upon the borders of Scotland, I can more fully answer; having the charge and conduct thereof, by commission from his excellency the lord Fairfax; and I have his positive command to be most tender in acting any thing which might give any seeming occasion of offence to our brethren of Scotland: these commands I can confidently say I have hitherto most cautiously and punctually observed; and further, that I do believe that it never entered into the parliament's or his excellency's thoughts, to act any thing prejudicial or harmful to the kingdom of Scotland; and what the true reasons are which did occasion the drawing these forces so near the Borders I shall not need to mention, all men knowing it to be for the suppressing of sir Marmaduke Langdale and his adherents, many of whom are papists and grand Delinquents, and are lately risen in rebellion against the parliament; and have ever been, and still are, notorious opposers of the ends of the Covenant, according to the joint Declaration of both kingdoms of the 6th of Jan. 1643, 4 for settling of religion, his majesty in his due rights and prerogatives, and for the procuring of a firm peace and union betwixt both nations.—For what your lordship mentions for the freeing the honourable houses from restraint of forces lying upon them; I cannot but wonder at their artifice who have so cunningly suggested these things to the parliament of Scotland, as to possess them with the belief thereof; seeing it is apparent to all men that the parliament sits and votes free; and no visible force in this kingdom acts any thing but by their immediate command, except those Malignants and some few of their adherents formerly mentioned. And for your lordship's further satisfaction in this, I know no surer way to understand the truth than by an Answer from the parliament, which I doubt not but you will readily receive. I should trouble your lordship too much, if I should only briefly run over their labours for the disbanding of all forces, except such as they did judge necessary for the kingdom's and their own defence; as also their zeal for freeing the subjects from unnecessary taxes and free quarter, which I persuade myself your lordship cannot but, in some measure, have heard of before this time; and therefore I shall still, in satisfaction to your lordship's expectation, 'That I should not oppose the Committee of Estates in their pious, loyal, and necessary undertakings,' answer, that I conceive their resolutions are wholly grounded upon mistakes; desiring you to consider whether also not contrary to the Covenant: and I must, in prosecution of the trust reposed in me, to the uttermost of my power, oppose all forces whatsoever, either raised or brought into this kingdom, except those by authority and command of the parliament of England; in which I hope your lordship will not oppose, but rather assist me, if the parliament of England shall desire it.—I have, according to your excellency's desire, returned your trumpeter as speedily as I could dispatch him; and doubt not but, upon your lordship's addresses to the parliament of England, you may receive more ample satisfaction herein; and, in the mean time, this is tendered to your lordship as an Answer from my lord, Your &c. J. LAMBERT. Castle Sowerby July 8."

Declaration, offering an Indemnity to the revolted Seamen.] July 13. A Message was sent from the commons to the lords, desiring their concurrence in the following Declaration concerning the Mutiny in the Fleet. To which they agreed:

"It cannot be unknown unto all men, that the commerce and navigation of this kingdom hath been, by the blessing of God, an especial means of the honour and greatness of the English seamen; and that the courage, industry, and fidelity of the English seamen and mariners, hath been a principal means for the increase of the trade and commerce of this kingdom in all the parts of the world; the consideration whereof hath caused both houses of parliament to have an especial care unto the royal navy, by building many ships and frigates, and setting forth and maintaining fleets; expending in that service the whole revenue of the Customs, (the greatest part whereof, in former times was diverted to other uses) besides other vast sums of money laid out in that action; and for the better encouragement of such mariners as were employed in the service of the state, they have much advanced their pay above that which it was formerly; and at the coming in of the Fleet have so carefully provided for them, that they were not discharged from boarding, victuals and wages, until their moneys were duly paid them; hoping that, by these and many other encouragements upon all occasions, they would have approved themselves faithful to the kingdom, in the discharge of the trust reposed in them; but, contrary hereunto, the mariners of several royal ships, set forth in this last summers fleet, being seduced by the cunning insinuation of some men ill-affected to the Peace of this kingdom, have treacherously revolted from their duty, and do still persist in their disobedience; by which horrid and detestable act, in breach of their trust, they have much blemished the honour and credit of the navigation and mariners of this kingdom; and as much as in them lay, betrayed the public interest and liberties thereof and retarded those ends of an happy Peace which the parliament have ever pursued, and now are more especially employed in: and although both houses of parliament have, after an Act of Indemnity already offered, good reasons to proceed to the reducing of them by force; yet, to the end it may appear that the parliament do, as much as in them lies, seek to prevent the effusion of blood, the said lords and commons do hereby offer and declare, That if the seamen, officers, and commissioners aboard the ships shall, within 20 days after publication hereof, or forthwith upon notice given them by the lord-admiral, or such other person or persons as he shall appoint, render themselves, and the ships wherein they are, to the parliament's obedience, and bring them into some port under the command of the parliament, the persons so submitting shall be indemnified in their persons and estates, any former act of theirs notwithstanding: But if they shall, after the said time prefixed is expired, persist still in their disobedience, then the house will proceed to the reducing them by force, and doubt not of a good success by the blessing of Almighty God; hoping that every true-hearted Englishman will contribute his utmost assistance to this great work, especially the merchants and owners of ships, they being principally interested in the consequences thereof, it being to be expected that the revolted will endeavour to maintain their defection by rapine and violence: and for the encouragement of seamen to engage themselves herein, the lords and commons do promise and declare, That such seamen as shall so engage, and use their best endeavours in so honourable a work, shall have two months wages extraordinary duly paid them as soon as the said ships shall be, by them, reduced and brought into port: and it is lastly declared, That not only the persons aboard the said ships, who shall, notwithstanding this offer of Indemnity, stand out, but also all others the subjects of this kingdom, and others whatsoever, who shall hereafter join with, assist, supply, or any way adhere to them, shall be dealt with and proceeded against as traitors and enemies to the kingdom, and their estates confiscated; and for the miseries that shall ensue they will stand charged with the same as guilty of them, and authors of that ruin which will attend them and their posterity."

The Commons vote the Scots Army under the Duke of Hamilton to be Traitors.] July 14. A Letter being read in the commons from major-general Lambert at Penrith, signifying that an Army of Scots were come into England under the duke of Hamilton, who arrived at Carlisle the 8th of this month, and that his forces were now lying about Wigton, in Cumberland; the house resolved, "That the forces so come out of Scotland into England in a hostile manner, (under the command of the duke of Hamilton*) being without the authority of the parliament of England, are enemies to this kingdom; and that all persons of the English or Irish nation that join with, or adhere unto, or voluntarily aid or assist them, are Rebels and Traitors; and shall be proceeded against as such."—Thus the Resolution stands in the Commons Journals: but a member of this parliament writes,† That the question was at first proposed, That all such Scots as are, or shall, come, &c. and that upon debate the words or shall were left out upon this consideration, "That the marquis of Argyle might haply come into England with a party, and fall upon the duke of Hamilton in his rear."

Petitions from the Watermen on Thames; and the Inhabitants of Westminster, Southwark, &c. for a Personal Treaty.] July 18. Two more Petitions were presented to the lords, but of a different nature from the last: that from the Watermen is the most pathetic we have yet met with, and very expressive in the King's favour. The lords Answers to these and the foregoing both shew, that they thought themselves obliged to use all parties with civility.

To the Right Hon. the Lords in Parliament assembled; The Humble PETITION of the WATERMEN belonging to the River of Thames,

"Sheweth; That the Petitioners, being in fraternity above 2000 persons, are all undone and like to perish by reason of his majesty's absence from us; he being kept away notwithstanding his many former gracious offers; and therefore, having an interest both in his person and government, we cannot do less than humbly beseech your honours speedily and really to invite him to London, with honour, freedom, and safety. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c."

The Petitioners were called in again and answered by the Speaker, "That the lords have not been wanting in their endeavours to bring his majesty to treat at London, and shall still continue to do what in them lies for the procuring a speedy settling of these unhappy distractions."

To the Right Hon. the Lords in Parliament assembled; The Humble PETITION of divers well-affected Inhabitants of the City of Westminster, Hamlets of the Tower, Borough of Southwark, and parts adjacent within the Weekly Bills of Mortality,

"Sheweth; That your petitioners, notwithstanding their grievous sufferings and heart-breaking fears of utter ruin to all that is precious in this sometime flourishing kingdom, by the continued, nay encreasing, distractions thereof, cannot but look on your present resolutions of a Personal Treaty with the king's majesty as a door of hope opened by the God of Salvation for the cure of our, otherwise remediless and all-destroying, distempers; and as they give you hearty and humble thanks for your Votes and Resolutions already passed to that purpose, so they cannot but as Englishmen, nay Christians, humbly and earnestly beg your lordships speedy and effectual progress therein, until the great Creator of the ends of the earth create a happy Peace to this now miserably tossed and afflicted kingdom.—And whereas the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London have, in order to the said Personal Treaty, made several late Addresses to the houses of parliament; offering their utmost endeavours, both of estate and life, for securing of his royal majesty and both houses of parliament, from all force and tumults impeding or disturbing the said Treaty; and desiring, in order thereunto, that the Militia of the out-parts may be united to and with the said city of London, as it was constantly, during our said troubles, with very good success and advantage to the public safety, fixed till of late: your petitioners, in concurrence with the said Engagement and Desires of the honourable city of London, do humbly pray that the said Personal Treaty may be hastened; the Militia of the out-parts united with the said city, and the command thereof vested in the hands of such persons only as are cordial to the ends of the Protestation, Solemn League and Covenant; which we humbly conceive may best tend to the preservation of his majesty's royal person and both houses of parliament, in their settling a safe and well-grounded Peace by this so much desired Treaty. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c."

The Petitioners being called in again, Answer was returned by the Speaker, as follows: "The lords return you Thanks for the expressions of your good affections and zeal for the public peace of this kingdom: they have further commanded me to let you know, that they shall improve their best endeavours in Answer to your Desires contained in the several particulars of your Petition; nothing being more in their care than the restoring of the peace and happiness, and the establishment of the fundamental government, of this now distracted and divided kingdom."

The Lords refuse their Concurrence in the Vote against the Scots Army.] This day the commons sent up a Message to the lords, with their Resolution of the 14th, "That the Scots, now come into England in an hostile manner, were enemies to the kingdom of England, and that all such English and Irish who join them are Traitors." This Resolution occasioned a warm debate in the house of lords, which ended in a division on two questions: the first, Whether the consideration of this matter should be deferred for some days? the next,

Whether to agree to the Resolution? and both passed in the negative.

The Commons declare all such to be Traitors as invited the Scots Army.] July 20. The commons passed a Resolution, declaring all such persons of this kingdom that had invited the Army of the Scots, now come into England, under the duke of Hamilton, or had assisted that Army, to be Traitors, and that they should be proceeded against as such; which Vote they immediately sent up to the lords for their concurrence.—The occasion of passing this Vote is thus set down by Mr. Walker: “The Speaker informed the house, That major general Lambert having stopped one Mr. Haliburton, a Scots gentleman, in passing through his quarters with Letters from the duke of Hamilton to the two houses and the king, he found upon him divers private Letters, for carrying of which he had no public authority; and therefore Lambert made bold to seal those private letters in a packet by themselves, with his own seal and Mr. Haliburton’s; and Lambert had sent up Mr. Haliburton with lieutenant Osborne, a godly Scots gentleman, and another keeper, in nature of a prisoner. Mr. Osborne delivered that private packet to the Speaker; so a committee was named to peruse the same. Mr. Osborne was then called in to speak what he knew of this matter, who declared at the bar, That the godly party in Scotland were oppressed, and trodden under foot, by the duke of Hamilton’s party; that their very souls were afflicted at his proceedings; that the kirk of Scotland, with one mouth, proclaimed to their faces their Engagement, and the proceedings thereupon, to be damnable and destructive: he also desired the house not to look upon those proceedings as the act of the nation of Scotland, since there were a great many godly men who hoped the Lord would enable them, in his good time, to march into England with the marquis of Argyll, and fall upon the rear of the duke of Hamilton with a diversion. He reported the Scots that came in to be but 8000 horse and foot, and Langdale but 2000. Then were read the Letters of the duke of Hamilton, wherein he complained that no Answer had been given to the parliament of Scotland’s just Desires of the 26th of April last; that by authority of the Scots parliament he was necessitated to come into England according to the Covenant, and not without the invitation of divers well-affected English who had taken the Covenant. There was a Declaration inclosed in the Letters, but the prevailing party obstructed the reading of it; and then the question being put for declaring all such persons Traitors who had invited the Scots Army under the duke of Hamilton to come into England, it passed in the affirmative.”

Paper from the Scots Committee of Estates, expressing their Dissatisfaction at the Proceedings of the English Parliament.] The same day, the earl of Manchester presented to the house of lords a Letter from the earl of Nottingham at Edinburgh, inclosing

A PAPER from the Committee of Estates of Scotland, of the 8th of July, to the Commissioners of England, in Answer to some of their former Papers: dated Edinburgh, July 8, 1648.

“We the Committee of Estates of the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, do return this Answer to your lordships Paper of the 17th and 22d of June: that although our commissioners at London did often, for some months together, after the return of our Army out of England, attend without any Answer to their Papers, and the just Desires of this kingdom; and at several times, for many days, could obtain no hearing; yet the parliament, notwithstanding of their important business, and that this last session was very short, did always, immediately after the receipt of your lordships Letters and Papers, read them; and returned such Answers as they conceived ought to satisfy, and particularly to your Desires concerning Berwick and Carlisle, as likewise to that Engagement which you were pleased to offer, upon the advance of the Army under the command of the lord Fairfax, into the north of England towards our Border; which therefore we shall not here repeat.—The parliament also, upon consideration of the great dangers threatening religion, his majesty’s Person and authority, yea monarchy itself, and the peace and happiness of these kingdoms, strictly united by Covenant, Treaties, and so many near Relations, did, upon the 26th of April last, send such Demands to the houses of the parliament of England, as they conceived to be just and necessary; to which they did, upon the 15th of May, return a very general Answer, relating to a more particular satisfaction, to be expected from your lordships. And the Committee of Estates did, on the 23d of May last, desire to know if your lordships had received any further Instructions for satisfying the Desires of this kingdom: to which your lordships answered, ‘That as yet you had not received any;’ neither have we, since that time, heard any thing concerning the said Desires from your lordships; which we cannot but look upon as a great contempt and neglect of this kingdom, and an evidence of no great forwardness or inclination towards a peace or settlement, or resolution to entertain that amity and good correspondence betwixt the nations, which we, by treaties, messages, and all imaginable means, have still studied to preserve: and, had a satisfactory Answer been returned to these our necessary Desires, all the inconveniences which hereafter may ensue, would probably have been prevented, which we have still since that time patiently expected, and acted nothing as to an engagement, in hopes thereof: but finding the dangers to all that is dearest to us still increasing; no satisfaction, nor so much as an Answer offered to these our just and necessary Desires; no security to religion, but rather a greater danger thereunto from the three Propositions now communicated unto us; no hope of safety or freedom thereby to his majesty's person, and as little of freedom to the honourable houses of the parliament, ease to the oppressed subjects of England, or security to either nation; we have therefore resolved to pursue our duties in order to all these, as Christians, as subjects, and as brethren joined together in Covenant, upon the grounds contained in the inclosed Declaration; which we desire your lordships would be pleased to communicate to the honourable houses.* By command of the committee of the estates of parliament, ARCH. PRIMROSE, Cler."

The foregoing Paper, and the Declaration mentioned to be inclosed therein, was read, as were also the Desires of the Parliament of Scotland of the 26th of April last, which had been presented to the parliament on the 2d of May. Then the Vote sent up this day from the commons, declaring, "That all such persons of this kingdom, who have invited the Scots Army now in England, under the command of the duke of Hamilton, to come into this Kingdom, or have assisted that Army, are Traitors, and shall be proceeded against as such," was also read. And the question being put, Whether to agree to this vote? it passed in the negative: but the earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, and Mulgrave, the lord viscount Say and Sele, and the lord Howard of Eskricke, entered their Dissent.

It was then ordered, that a Message be sent to the commons, to desire that the committee formerly appointed to consider of a Peace with the King, should meet this afternoon, to review the Declaration from the Committee of Estates of the kingdom of Scotland, and also their Desires of the 26th of April last; likewise to find out some expedient, that the Treaty between the king and parliament may be speeded, and that care might be taken to prevent the casting the two kingdoms into war and bloodshed. The lords also resolved, That the Scots Declaration should be printed and published.

Declaration of the Scots, containing their Reasons for returning into England.† This Declaration, which is a recapitulation of all the proceedings of the English Parliament since the Independent party and the Army gave the rule there, we shall give at large from the Original Edition.†

A DECLARATION of the Committee of the Estates of the Parliament of Scotland to the Honourable Houses of the Parliament, and to all their Brethren of England, concerning the Necessity,

* To this Paper the English Commissioners returned no Answer, seeing that the Scots Army had then invaded England.

Grounds, and Ends of their Engagement; and of the Return of the Scots Army into England.

"After so long continuance of the sad calamities that have almost wasted these three kingdoms, and the uninterrupted endeavours of this nation to have all the causes of them removed, we cannot possibly express with what grief of soul we find them still more likely to be increased than diminished; neither did any part of our former sufferings more deeply afflict us, than again to be necessitated to expressions and actions, that, by some, will rather be looked upon as incentives of new troubles, than means to quiet and calm the present distempers: Wherefore we have thought fit to offer this ensuing Declaration to the honourable houses of the parliament, and to our brethren of England, for satisfaction of all religious, loyal, and honest men, That heaven and earth may bear witness with us of the necessity of our engagement and undertaking at this time, and of the candor of our intentions and resolutions. —After that, by the blessing of God upon the endeavours of this nation, and their armies at home and in England, in two several expeditions, a happy peace was settled, religion and the just liberties of this kingdom established, a parliament called in England, and great progress made towards the redress of all grievances, and reforming abuses both in church and state, it pleased God again to call us to new troubles; for the differences betwixt the king and parliament being increased and heightened into a bloody war; the many Addresses of this kingdom to his majesty and the two houses, for an amicable composure of differences, having proved fruitless and ineffectual; and the parliament reduced to a low condition; this kingdom was invited to the assistance of their Brethren, large professions by them were made of their desires of unity and uniformity in religion, of a nearer conjunction with this kingdom; and the dangers were fully represented to us of a prevailing party in England, different from us in religion and Church-Government.—It was then acknowledged, That the same fate in religion attended both; and (because it was well known that, although unhappy differences had arisen betwixt his majesty and his subjects in that kingdom, yet Scotland could never be drawn into any action against his majesty, or that fidelity and subjection which they owe to him and his posterity;) large professions were therefore made, by the two houses, of their loyalty to the king, whose greatness and authority they professed they never intended to diminish, as may more fully appear in their several Declarations; commissioners were sent into this kingdom, invitations renewed, a treaty made, and a Covenant solemnly sworn and signed, for reformation and defence of religion, the honour and happiness of the king, and the peace and safety of the kingdoms.—Thus both kingdoms were equally and mutually engaged; and, in pursuance of that Covenant and Treaty, an army marched into England in the hardest season; and both kingdoms, in their joint Declaration, Jan. 6, 1643-4, obliged themselves, and decreed, never to lay down arms till truth and peace, by the blessing of God, were settled in this island upon a firm foundation, for the present and future generations.—Although we shall not mention what success that Army had, what blood they lost both in Scotland and England, what hardships they endured, and how much this kingdom was thereby impoverished; yet we cannot but remember how that, by the blessing of God upon the joint councils and forces of both kingdoms, the two houses of parliament were recovered into a condition of making good those engagements; and with what unity both kingdoms proceeded towards attaining of those ends, until that party in the houses, who since have declared themselves Independents (who seemed most forward in engaging of this kingdom, and at first professed greatest care of our army) had attained to power, discovered their intention, and interrupted all those fair beginnings: they created and fomented jealousies against the Scots; and, by their influence on the houses, cashiered all in England by sea and land, how eminent, how faithful soever, that they could not confide in; and, by the success of their new-modelled Army, (for the most part Sectaries) they engrossed all power, military and civil, into their own and their creatures hands. The Propositions formerly agreed on by both kingdoms, and treated on at Uxbridge, were altered; yet this kingdom was content so far to deny themselves and their own interests, as to wave the Propositions most advantageous to Scotland; and, for witnessing their desires of Peace, to join in those framed by the two houses where the Independents had got such a power.—And for the greatest testimony of our confidence in the honourable houses of parliament, (notwithstanding the many injuries and discouragements received in England, from the then and still prevailing party in the English Army, and their abettors, who were grown Anti-Covenanters, and threatened a disappointment of all the ends of the Covenant; yet, upon the public faith of the two houses given to us, for the preservation and safety of his majesty's sacred person, and of making joint Addresses to his majesty for settling a safe and well-grounded Peace, and free access of all employed by this kingdom to his majesty) the armies of Scotland returned from England, and left the king with the English commissioners; most of our army were immediately thereafter disbanded; and no more kept on foot but so many as were necessary for reducing some Scots rebels and Irish subjects of the crown of England, whom, by the Large Treaty, England was bound to reduce.—We expected that the like course would have been taken for disbanning the armies in England, and none kept on foot but such as were necessary for the garrisons and safety of the kingdom, there being then no professed enemy in arms, and these to have been such as both kingdoms might have confided in for affection to religion and monarchy: whereunto the honourable houses of the parliament did effectually apply themselves, as appears by their Declaration of the 28th of May 1647; but the Independent Party was as diligent to hinder it, by contriving and procuring a Petition from the Army against their Disbanding: this by the houses was voted mutinous, and the abettors of it enemies to the state. Then 200,000*l.* was provided, and commissioners sent down to the Army for disbanning it, and engaging a considerable Supply for Ireland, under the command of major-general Skippon, and lieutenant-general Masssey; 167 Presbyterian officers engaged for Ireland, and gave obedience to the commands of the parliament; but, on a sudden, the sectaries of that Army drew themselves together; entered into a solemn Engagement against the Resolutions of the parliament; cashiered all the Presbyterian officers who had adhered to the parliament, or subscribed for Ireland; placed Sectaries in their charges; erected a supreme council of Agitators, and then grew indeed into a complete new model.—Soon thereafter a party out of several regiments, commanded by a taylor, a cornet of theirs, one Joyce, violently seized on the person of the king; and carried him from his house at Holdenby, against his own will, and the Protestation of the commissioners then attending upon him, and against the declared resolutions of both kingdoms: and though this action was at first disavowed by the General, yet it appears to have been done by some under-hand warrant; for the king was kept still within the army's quarters, and strong guards placed about him: and when the houses thought fit to command the Army not to come within 30 miles of London, and to vote his majesty's coming to Richmond, they, by a threatening Message, forced the recalling of these Votes, and carried the king along with them to Hatfield and other places at their pleasure.—The houses did then justly think it necessary to look to their own preservation, lest they should be served as his majesty was; and, upon the 11th of June 1647, they appointed a Committee of Safety to meet with the Militia of London, and to consider upon the preservation of the parliament and city.—The great work of the Army being to new-model the parliament, as well as they had done themselves, and to subdue and enslave that great and glorious city: in order thereunto they first began with a false and frivolous general Charge against divers members of the houses, eminent for affection and action in this cause, and violently pressed their suspension from the houses; but, upon a full and free debate, it was voted to be against the law to suspend any member upon a general charge, without bringing in and proving of particulars. This procedure did not fit the Army's occasions; they therefore sent several threatening Messages, That they would march to Westminster; that they would purge the house, and that they must take extraordnary courses: thus they force the houses to recall their Votes for a Committee of Safety, and to disband what forces they had drawn together under Presbyterian officers; they compel the 11 members to withdraw from their attendance in the house: and, the Militia of London, at the unanimous desire of the common council, being then settled in the hands of such persons as the city might most confide in, the Army, to perfect their designs upon them, enforced the houses to a new model of that Militia.—Having thus in their power the person of his majesty, and having over-awed the parliament and city, they disperse themselves in the several counties about London; list and raise daily more forces; and resolve to settle, or rather alter and subvert, religion and government after their own will; as is held forth in their Proposals which they first presented to his majesty, and afterwards sent to the houses, as that which they would have the ground of Peace: but the city was so enraged at the change of their Militia, that they came down to Westminster to petition against it; and the 'Prentices, who had learned from the Army the powerfulllest arguments to persuade, came in multitudes, and pressed the granting of the common-council's Petition.—Thus, on the 26th of July 1647, the houses again settled the Militia as formerly; many in London entered into an Engagement, but the Militia of London quieted all tumults, settled orderly guards, and next day the house of commons sat quietly: yet it was resolved by that party, that the two Speakers and the friends of the Army should fly thither, which they did; the houses notwithstanding sat, chose new Speakers, revived the Committee of Safety, and put themselves in a posture of defence; and, upon the desires of the commissioners of this kingdom, they invited his majesty to come to London with honour, freedom, and safety.—The Army hereupon drew together; refused to own the parliament; declared against them; printed their own Proposals; cried out against a new war. In the mean time they and their friends that fled to them, being engaged by writing to live and die together, marched up against the parliament and city, who seemed to have been in a readiness to oppose them; until, by the endeavours of some that were better friends to the sectaries than to the parliament and city, by their many Addresses to the Army and returns, the city was surrendered; and the sectaries, having brought up the Speakers and members that fled to them, marched in triumph through London with laurel in their hats. Sir Tho. Fairfax was made captain-general of all England, constable of the Tower of London, and commander of all the garrisons of England: he put out an honest faithful citizen, and put in a sectary-lieutenant of the Tower; and then they fell afresh upon purging of the house, as they called it; 7 Lords were impeached of a new pretended Treason; the 11 members forced to fly; and, after a fortnight's debate, being often carried in the negative, (for a little liberty yet remained) at last, by a threatening Declaration from the Army, and the Swordsmen's coming into the house, all Orders past in absence of the old Speakers were repealed; some of the most active of the houses, the lord mayor, three honest aldermen, and divers common-counsellors of London, charged and imprisoned; the officers of the city altered; and all upon a general accusation for levying a new war: but indeed, really, for being zealous for the ends of the Covenant, and for defence of the privileges, yea, the being of the parliament, against the violence and insolence of this Schismatic Army.—The liberty of the Parliament was thus destroyed by their own servants, contrary to their many professions; the famous city of London enslaved to sectaries, and not only those privileges taken from them, which, by their faithfulness to the parliament, and with expence of so much blood and treasure they had merited, but even their antient liberties trodden on; and all things governed at Westminster and London according to Orders from the Court of War, who also, by a reigning spirit of levelling democracy, were or seemed to be, over-ruled by the new Supreme Council of Agitators, who had been soldiers, and now were turned superlative commanders.—As the labour of the Independent Junto was to court the people and the soldiery by Declarations and Engagements, which they as soon falsified, and even to trade with the Papists, as was informed; so they studied to interest the King's Party, and cajoled some of them to propose what was most obnoxious to the parliament, and excepted in the Propositions: but they soon manifested to the world what their intentions were to the king; for after they had made use of the detaining his majesty's Person in their Army, and of pretending for his interest and party, to enable them to subdue the parliament and city; that work being over, they first grew severer to his party, except such as they still made very good use of; and then endeavoured, by threatening, to fright him away from Hampton-Court. The power of the Levellers was much talked of, until his majesty was sure in the Isle of Wight, and then their lieutenant found a means to quiet them.—In the Isle of Wight they first made his majesty prisoner without any known authority, and then got the houses to own and order it; and, by the prevalence of the Independent Party, Votes were passed, making another kind of new high treason, viz. 'To make any Application to the King, to write to him, or to receive letters from him.' A severity greater than is usual against malefactors. And for justifying of these Votes, a Declaration was published with many false scandals cast upon his majesty; and it is even declared, That they will put no more trust in him; yea, now we are informed, that, by horrid treachery and poison, endeavours are used to take away his life.—And as that Independent Party hath endeavoured to subvert the begun Reformation of Religion; to destroy the king and monarchy; overthrow the parliament; and persecute honest men; so it hath been their study, ever since the removal of the Scots Army, to break the happy union betwixt the kingdoms; to lay aside the Covenant; disappoint all the ends of it; and violate all treaties betwixt the kingdoms.—We shall not need to repeat the Jealousies they created and fomented against Scotland and the Scots Commissioners, and our Army whilst it was there; how they withheld the maintenance from them due by the Treaty, that by free Quarter they might grow burthensome and odious to the country: nor need we now to mention any violation of the Large Treaty, concerning the remainder of Money due upon the Brotherly Assistance, nor of the money due by Treaty for our Army in Ireland, or by the late treaty upon the march of our army: nor shall we now insist upon the breach of that Article of the Large Treaty, by which the houses were obliged to pursue, take, and punish the Irish rebels, subjects of the crown of England, who so long infested us.—We have already declared what Breaches they have made of the solemn Engagements for the King; and when our commissioners at London demanded Whether the Votes against all Application to his majesty did extend to his subjects of Scotland, to debar such as are warranted by the parliament of this kingdom, or their committees, from free access to, or intercourse with his majesty; or that he should be hindered from, and so made incapable of, any act of government in relation to the affairs of Scotland? no Answer was then, nor as yet is, returned thereunto; but before that time, not only such as had warrant for access to him were debarred thereof, (notwithstanding the Engagement of the house, the 27th Jan. 1647, to the contrary) but even the earl of Lauderdale, a public minister of this kingdom, contrary to that Engagement and to the law of nations, was violently removed by a party of the Army from Wooburne, where his majesty then was, and not suffered to have access to him; and though reparation was therein desired by the last Committee of Estates, yet none was given. And although, by the 8th Article of the Treaty, 1643, it is agreed, ‘That no Cessation, Pacification, nor Agreement for Peace whatsoever, shall be made by either kingdom, or the Armies of either kingdom, without the mutual advice and consent of both kingdoms,’ (which Engagement the houses of parliament also repeated in their Letter of the 27th Jan. 1647; to observe that Article, after the removal of our Army out of England) yet contrary thereunto, the Sectaries and their adherents framed Propositions, destructive to the ends of the Covenant, which were presented to his majesty without the advice or consent of the kingdom of Scotland; and having cunningly inserted therein some things more pleasing to his majesty than the Propositions of both kingdoms were, it was their study to persuade his majesty, in his Answer to their Propositions at Hampton-Court, to throw himself on their Propositions; and thereby unsatisfy both his kingdoms; which, as soon as the king had done, they themselves laid them aside, and used his majesty as we have before expressed.—And whereas the houses of parliament, whilst in liberty, made it their work first to disband the Army before any applications to be made to his majesty; the Independent Party, having the king within the Quarters of their Army, and the city reduced, pressed vehemently the sending of the Propositions of both kingdoms, whilst themselves were fastest trinketing with their Propositions. A short and preremptory day was set for the delivery of the Propositions, without the advice or consent of the Commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, then at London; and Instructions given, that if the Scots Commissioners were not present that day, the Propositions should nevertheless be delivered without them: and as we have great reason to believe that it was the study of the Sectaries, and those that were their instruments in that Treaty, that his majesty should not satisfy his parliaments by his Answer; yet, upon that Answer, by the power and prevalence of that party, the parliament laid aside the Propositions agreed on by both kingdoms; and have, contrary to the Treaty, framed and presented Propositions and Bills to his majesty, against which the Commissioners of this kingdom declared; and thereafter, by order, according to their Instructions, protested against them in the Isle of Wight, as being destructive to religion, the crown, and union of the kingdoms; as may at large be seen in that printed Answer to the New Propositions, which the parliament here have owned and approved as the sense of this kingdom, and which we hold as if they were here repeated. The parliament of this kingdom taking into their consideration the dangers thus threatening Religion, his majesty’s sacred person and posterity, yea monarchy and all government; how that by the injustice, violence, and treachery of the Independents, and their adherents in parliament and Army, the Covenant was laid aside; all the ends of it frustrated; toleration countenanced, and, by the new Propositions, endeavoured to be settled; his majesty imprisoned, and such height of insolences committed against him; the privileges, yea the being, of the parliament in a manner destroyed, and the foundations of it razed; the famous city of London, to which this nation and all that are faithful in this cause must needs acknowledge great obligations, enslaved; its liberties trodden on, and many of the best affected to the Covenant in parliament and city, for their fidelity, persecuted and driven away; the Treaties with, and Engagements to, this nation broken; the public faith of England, yea almost all laws, divine and human, violated; the people of England oppressed with free quarter and taxes; and the union and brotherly correspondence betwixt the kingdoms much weakened and endeavoured to be taken away: and being very sensible of the many injuries and affronts done to this nation, their army, and those employed by them; weighing also well how fruitless all their endeavours by way of Treaties and Messages, for curing those evils and removing those differences, had proven, and how little regard was had to our commissioners and their endeavours at London of late; they thought it high time to look to their own preservation, and to put this kingdom into a posture of arms: yet, before any further Engagement, they resolved to try if, by the three just and necessary Demands, of the 26th of April last, made to the houses of parliament, it were possible, in an amicable way, to compose those differences, and provide for the security of religion, of his majesty, and of the peace and union of the kingdoms; to the which had a satisfactory Answer been returned, all the inconveniences that may ensue might have been prevented, which we have still since that time patiently expected.—But, instead of security to Religion according to the Covenant, against the dangers on all hands; instead of freeing his majesty from his base Imprisonment, that he may come to some of his houses in or near London with honour, freedom, and safety, where both kingdoms may make their applications to him for settling Religion and a well grounded Peace; instead of disbanding the Army of Sectaries by whose power and tyranny all these evils were come upon us, and further threaten us; without taking any notice at all of what, upon so just and necessary grounds, we demanded; without any reparation made for the many injuries done to this kingdom and those employed by them, or any Answer to that demand made by our commissioners, Whether it was intended that his majesty should be debarred from exercising any act of government in relation to this kingdom? Or whether Scotsmen, employed and allowed by Scotland, might have free access to him? Instead, we say, of all these, we have received three Propositions to be presented to his majesty, that after his majesty's assent thereto, and to such acts of parliament as shall be offered by both houses for confirmation thereof, then both houses will treat with his majesty (without telling him or us where, or with what security to either) concerning the future Settlement of the government of the Church and Settlement of the Militia, and the rest of the Propositions formerly tendered at Hampton-Court; with a desire from the English commissioners residing here, for us to prepare such Propositions as we shall judge fit and necessary for this kingdom, that they may be sent to his majesty with all convenient speed. They did also communicate to us some Votes of the two houses: and the Committee of Estates told them, That they could return no Answer till first they received satisfaction to the Demands of this kingdom of the 26th of April. And these are as little satisfied; religion, the king, and his kingdoms as little secured; and the solid grounds of a religious and good Peace, as little provided for now as formerly.—We shall not much insist upon the particulars of these Three Propositions; our commissioners did, on some of them, so fully express themselves, especially that of the Militia, in their late Answer to the Propositions before they went to the Isle of Wight, which we here hold as repeated; but we cannot conceal how very unsatisfactory that concerning Religion is; and we are sorry to see other interests still so carefully provided for, and so little security to religion; which indeed was the main and principal cause of our Engagement in the late wars. In these Propositions we still find the Covenant omitted, one end of it only mentioned by way of Narrative, and the Propositions for Uniformity according to the Covenant, with all the other Propositions of Religion, left to the future treaty. And all that is now desired, is, that Presbyterial Government be confirmed by act of parliament, in such manner as both houses of parliament have agreed in several ordinances of parliament; that is to say, &c.—The Commissioners of the parliament and General Assembly of this kingdom have several times expressed their sense of these Ordinances, which we shall not here repeat: but we doubt this new et cetera is of a larger extent, and relates to that impious toleration, settled by both houses, so contrary to the Covenant, so destructive to the ends of it, and, for ought we know, not yet repealed; against which this kingdom hath so fully declared in the afore-mentioned Answer to the new Propositions; for it was then brought in as a part of the Proposition for settling Presbyterial Government, as the way that both the houses then agreed to. And seeing the same over-awing power continues, which first brought in that toleration avowedly, we have reason to apprehend it still remains; but it is now covered and rolled up in this new et cetera; and we have the greater reason to be unsatisfied, in that Presbyterial Government is only demanded for 3 years; and, in the end of the Propositions, it is professed, That the houses will treat with his majesty concerning the future Settlement of the government of the church, without relating the Covenant as a rule of that government, or the Propositions formerly agreed upon by both kingdoms; but in such a general way as may overthrow all the reformation established and open a door to hierarchy or anarchy, to episcopacy, independency, and to toleration; all abjured in our solemn Covenant.—And seeing no satisfaction is given to the so just and necessary Demands of the parliament, of the 26th of April, either for Religion or the King's majesty; but that religion is still in as much hazard as ever; the king still barbarously detained in his base imprisonment, and, as we are credibly informed, daily in danger of his life by treachery and poison; and that army of Sectaries, the great cause of all our evils and dangers, still kept up, strengthened, and a great part of it now marched close to our Borders; though this kingdom shall never be averse from giving and receiving mutual satisfaction by Treaty, yet we cannot agree to these Propositions, nor join with the two houses in presenting of them to his majesty, whilst neither king nor parliament enjoy their liberties.—Wherefore we can no longer, as unconcerned spectators, be witnesses to the loss and ruin of all, which, by the oath of God that lies upon us in our Solemn League and Covenant, and by many other obligations, we are bound to endeavour to preserve: and the ends being now the same for which we were invited, and in prosecution whereof we have lost so much blood, did undergo so many hardships, and so much impoverished our own country; and being now engaged by the joint Declaration of both kingdoms, never to lay down arms till truth and peace be settled in this island, upon a firm foundation, for the present and future generations; being also invited thereunto by many of that kingdom joined in Covenant with us, our forces are again in England; and, in discharge of our duties to God, our native king, our own country, and our Brethren in England, we have undertaken this so necessary Engagement, in prosecution of those just, pious, and loyal ends, to which we are so solemnly sworn. And although we have not at all departed from our good old principles, and that our demands and desires are contained in our several Declarations, Papers, and Addresses this time past to the houses of parliament; yet seeing, by the malice of our enemies, many scandalous and false aspersions are cast upon us, our actions and intentions traduced, and jealousies raised in the minds of many good, though too credulous, men, both at home and abroad; for satisfaction of all that are satisfiable, and to witness the sincerity of our intentions and resolutions, we shall here repeat our most material Desires, and the Grounds of our undertakings. And, 1st, we declare before God and all the world, That we are resolved, sincerely, really, and constantly, to maintain and preserve inviolably, with the hazard of our lives and fortunes, and all that is dearest unto us, the Reformation of Religion, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, as it is, by the mercy of God and his majesty's goodness, established by law amongst us; and never to suffer it, by fraud or force, to be taken from us; nor yet to endure the bringing in of Episcopacy, the Book of Common Prayer, or any other of those innovations and superstitions thrown out of this kirk, as some have been so impudent to aver: and also, with the same sincerity, reality, and constancy, in our places and callings, to the uttermost of our power, faithfully to endeavour the confirming what is already done in the work of Reformation, establishing the Covenant, and attaining all the ends of it in England and Ireland, particularly Reformation of Religion, and uniformity according to the Covenant. 2. We do also declare, That we will endeavour the rescue of his majesty's Person from his base Imprisonment, that he may come with honour, freedom, and safety to some of his own houses in or near London, that the parliaments of both kingdoms may make their applications to him for obtaining his royal assent to such Desires as shall be by them presented unto him for establishing Religion, as is above expressed, and settling a well-grounded Peace; that so his majesty may live in the splendour and glory of his royal progenitors, as becometh his royal place and dignity; that all differences and troubles may end in mutual confidence and rejoicing; the King may enjoy the comfort of his royal consort and children, with other contentments; and we, after so great distractions and long continued sufferings, may reap the blessed fruits of truth and peace under his government: for however the late proceedings of this kingdom may have been misunderstood, yet God knows that we have never admitted of any thoughts to the prejudice of our gracious sovereign, his person, or government, to whom we pray that the Lord will grant a long and a happy reign; and that there may not want one of his seed to rule over us rightly, and to sit upon his throne, while the sun and the moon endureth. 3. That the two houses of parliament may be restored to their freedoms; that all members, who have been faithful to this cause, may freely and safely attend their charges; that the parliament, being masters of their own councils and results, they may, together with the advice and consent of the kingdom of Scotland, conclude upon a Treaty with his majesty; and all other things expedient to a thorough Settlement. 4. That the city of London, which hath expended so much in blood and treasure, may have their former Propositions, presented to the king at Oxford and Newcastle, pressed as was formerly intended. 5. That the Army of Sectaries, under the command of Thomas lord Fairfax, of Cameron, be disbanded; and none employed, either in relation to the prosecution of the war in Ireland, or the necessary garrisons and forces, but such as have or shall take the Covenant, and are well-affected to Religion and Government; that so the people of England may be eased of taxes, free Quarter, and other great impositions under which they have so long groaned. 6. And although the interest of Religion, the king, and kingdoms, and the settling of a solid Peace, be the cause of this undertaking; yet we do not doubt but due regard will be had to the concerns of Scotland, contained in our several former demands, both in relation to what is due to this kingdom and their armies here and in Ireland, as also what is necessary for the better safety, union, and government of the kingdoms.—We have now expressed the true Grounds and reasons of this Engagement, and the Ends we propose to ourselves; and we do expect that none who will not declare themselves enemies to God, the king, the parliaments, and the peace of these kingdoms, will oppose us in this so pious, so necessary an undertaking; and therefore we hope all jealousies and misunderstandings will be laid aside; and that we shall meet with a hearty concurrence both of all the subjects of this kingdom, and of our brethren of England: and we do declare, That it shall be our endeavour to protect, in their persons and goods, all of the English nation who shall join in Covenant with us, and for prosecuting of these ends; and that we will do prejudice or use violence to none, as far as we are able, but such as oppose us, or those ends above-mentioned: particularly we should endeavour that the Arrears due to all soldiers who have served the parliament of England in this cause, excepting such as have engaged and abetted the army in their courses, and shall not immediately desert them, may have their accounts audited, part of their arrears paid, and security for the rest, with full indemnity.—And because our Army will be necessitated to live upon the country, until a regular course be taken for their maintenance, we do declare, That it shall be our care that they carry themselves soberly, and be as little burthensome as is possible; and that, before we return, we shall labour to see the northern counties satisfied for what extraordinary burdens they sustain.—To conclude: We declare before God and the world, That we resolve, by God's assistance, in all our proceedings, never to break, on our parts, the union betwixt the kingdoms, nor to incroach upon the national rights of the subjects of England, or to entrench upon their just liberties; much less is it our intention at all to make a National Engagement against the parliament and kingdom of England, but for them, whose freedom, privileges, and happiness shall ever be as dear to us as our own; and that our just Desires being provided for and secured, then immediately our Army shall depart the kingdom of England, and return peaceably home again, whereof we have twice already given real testimonies; our intentions being ever the same with our professions; resolving still to continue steadfast in the prosecution of them: for the accomplishment whereof, we shall be ready to sacrifice both our lives and fortunes. ARCH. PRIMEROSE.*

* Mr. Whitlocke makes the following reflection on the Scots Army's coming into England: "Here you may take notice of a strange turn in the affairs of this parliament, to which all human affairs are subject, but in these times much more than ordinary. You have read the great endeavours formerly to bring the Scots in as friends to assist the parliament; and may remember the story of their actions and return home again: now the other faction in Scotland prevailing, the Scots are turned enemies to England, and invade them with a considerable army. Before they joined with the parliament against the king, now they join with the king's forces against the parliament. How like the sea the people of the

The Parliament offer an Indemnification to the Duke of Buckingham.] Both houses, about this time, passed the following Vote, "That in regard the duke of Buckingham hath not formerly borne arms against the parliament, and in regard of his youth to which his late miscarriage may be rather attributed than to any malice in opposition to the parliament, and in regard he is the only son now left to inherit that great honour; the lords and commons do think fit to offer this favour to him, and do hereby declare that, in case the said duke of Buckingham shall come within 14 days after the publishing hereof, and render himself to the parliament, and engage never to take up arms against the parliament hereafter, that then he shall be indemnified for his late opposition made in taking up arms against the parliament"—However, the duke did not think proper to comply with the terms of this offer, but made his escape into Holland.

The Parliament recall their Commissioners in Scotland.] July 22. The commons sent up a message to acquaint the lords with a resolution they had taken to recall the members of their house that were commissioners in Scotland, that so their lordships might send for theirs if they thought fit; which they ordered accordingly.

The Prince of Wales appears on board a Fleet off Yarmouth.] July 27. The following Letter was presented to the house of lords, addressed to the committee of lords and commons at Derby-House, from the bailiffs of Yarmouth:

"Right Honourable; We received your Letter of the 20th instant, informing us of two companies by you ordered to be drawn down into our town, the one from capt. Brewster, the other from Norwich, for our defence and assistance, in case the revolted Ships should make their descent hither. Before the receipt of which letter, viz. on Saturday last at noon-tide, the ships were come and at an anchor in the road, to the great amazement of all the beholders; the Prince of Wales, prince Rupert, and divers lords and many gentlemen being in them.† We stood upon our defence, and forthwith addressed letters to the committee for the county of Norfolk, and to Norwich, to capt. Brewster, in Suffolk, to sir John Wentworth and others, for assistance; which very readily they gave us, and had major Jermy with his troop very active for us, and other forces provided by his excellency to be sent down unto us. We waited for some messengers or message to be sent unto us from the Prince, but none came; yet we heard, from the seamen

that were on board, that his highness took great offence at some conceived discourtesies from the town; and that sending some messengers on shore to provide flesh-victuals, they were not suffered to come on shore, but driven back by the troopers; whereupon we thought fit to send two of our brethren on board the Prince, and did it this day in the morning, to satisfy his highness touching those misapprehensions; which was very well taken by him, and very good respect given to our messengers; and this only desired, that we should accommodate his highness with some small provisions for his money, (which was readily assented unto) and expressing to them that there were no designs upon this place, or for the ships to come hither, but that they were driven into the road by cross winds, going for the Downs, on Friday last, and would be gone again the first fair wind. His highness was pleased to give a fair dismissal to our messengers, and the wind coming more to the West this afternoon, the ships weighed anchor and set sail, and are gone to the Downs.—Yesterday the two companies, ordered by your honours for our assistance, being sent down, we advised with sir John Wentworth, major Jermy, and Mr. Brewster, to have them drawn up, one company on the right side of the town, and the other company on the left side, without entrance into the town; which was assented unto by all parties, as being thought more convenient, and to do better service than to come in.—This is all the Account we can give your honours in these affairs, which we humbly pray may be accepted, together with our humble thanks for the great care of the safeguard and security of our town; and so relying upon your favours, with a tender of our humble duties and service, we rest, Your &c. Tho. Menthorp, Israel Ingram, Bailiffs, July 24." P. S. This inclosed Copy was delivered to our messengers that went on board, but without any desire for us to engage upon the same.

The Prince of Wales's Letter to the Lord Mayor of London.] The Paper referred to in the foregoing Letter, which is entered in the Lords Journals, contains the Heads of a Declaration from the Prince of Wales, setting forth the Reasons of his Appearance on board the Fleet; and ordered to be digested into form by the lords Willoughby of Parham, Hopton, Colepeper, and his highness's secretary: this, being printed both in Rushworth and Whitlocke, we purposely omit; in order to make way for the Declaration at large, which was, soon after, sent inclosed in the following Letter from the Prince to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London.*

Charles Pr. Right Trusty and Well-beloved, and Trusty and Well-beloved, we greet you well:

"We have endeavoured by our public Declaration, which we send you herewith, to give satisfaction to the whole kingdom of England, in the Grounds and Reasons of our present undertaking: but we think fit notwithstanding, to make a particular Address to you as the most considerable part of the kingdom; being extremely desirous that the city of London should be fully satisfied that our intentions are just and honourable, and such as we have professed in our said Declaration, for the peace and happiness of all his majesty's subjects; and we cannot despair of gaining a belief and confidence with you, when it shall appear that our actions and proceedings are conformable to our professions, and in order to those public ends and that happy Settlement of the kingdom, which we have proposed as the chief end of all our Endeavours.—And because there are divers Ships now stayed in the Downs by our order, whereof some of great value belong to members of the city of London; to prevent all misinterpretation of our intentions in that particular, we think fit to assure you, that we are so far from intending violence to the persons or goods of any of that city, or any other particular advantage therein, that our only aim and end is to procure a subsistence for the Navy under our command; that thereby we may be enabled to protect the ships, vessels, and goods, and to secure the trade, not only of the city of London, but of all other his majesty's good subjects: and being for the present utterly unable to provide for so great a charge, as having been for some years deprived as well of our own estate, as of the supplies we might have drawn from the bounty of the king our royal father, we think fit to have recourse to you; desiring you to supply us with the present sum of 20,000*l.* to be employed for the support and subsistence of the Navy now under our command.—To this end, we shall put the same into the hands of such persons, as shall render an exact Account thereof, which shall be communicated to you; and being thus furnished by you in this necessity, for which we have no other means to make provision, we shall immediately discharge all ships of merchandize, which have been stayed by our fleet, though of a far greater value than the sum we desire; shall carefully hereafter protect the ships and goods, and secure the trade and commerce of that city, which we conceive to be one of the proper and natural employments of his majesty's Navy; and for which, as for other reasons, it hath always been maintained out of the Customs paid to his majesty; out of which, as soon as it shall be in our power, we shall take care to have the said sum of 20,000*l.* repaid you. And so desiring a present supply, the pressing necessities of the Fleet admitting no delay, we bid you heartily farewell. Given under our Hand and Seal the 29th of July, in the 24th year of the reign of our Royal Father the King."

The DECLARATION of his Highness Prince CHARLES, to all his Majesty's loving Subjects, concerning the Grounds and Ends of his present Engagement upon the Fleet in the Downs.

"How naturally and strongly our particular interest inclineth us to contribute our utmost endeavours towards the settling of a well-grounded and lasting Peace, in all his majesty's dominions, is notoriously evident to every man of common understanding, that considereth the relation we have to them, as Heir Apparent to the Crown, together with the measure of our present sufferings, and the portion which we are to expect in such a happy Settlement: besides which particular consideration, we find ourself charged with a more public duty, both to the King our father in his present distress, as likewise to all his loyal subjects in this their common calamity, obliging us to lay hold on all opportunities which shall be offered us, proper to obtain this blessed Peace; that only being able to free his majesty and all his good people from their present sufferings, and to restore him and them to that happiness which the practices, power, and violence of evil men, the now enemies of peace, have bereaved them of.—This blessed Peace is that which we humbly and earnestly implore of Almighty God in our daily prayers; and which is, and shall be, the principal and ultimate end of all our councils and resolutions, and particularly of this our present undertaking; on which we beg a blessing of the God of Peace, as this our profession is real and sincere. Neither ought it to seem strange to any, that thus professing for peace, we now appear in arms, as well in person at sea, as likewise by our correspondency and commissions at land; since the malice and wicked arts of these peace-haters, against whom we now declare as public enemies to God and good men, have rendered all other endeavours to obtain the same vain and ineffectual; and thereby utterly obstructing all means of reconciliation betwixt his majesty and his people, have compelled us to this last, and indeed only, expedient that is left us: so that, being thus necessitated either to sit still as unconcerned, whilst the King our father is a close prisoner in the power of his enemies, and whilst all his good people lie miserably groaning under the cruel tyranny of fellow subjects; or, by force of arms, to endeavour to free him and them from these unheard-of outrages: as our election in this case is easily made, so ought all men to look upon us thus engaged as acting in order to that peace, and prosecuting the only means left to obtain the same.—Being thus rightly understood by those whose interest, as well as their duty, obligeth them to join with us in this good work; as we shall, in the first place, look up to Heaven for a blessing from the Lord of Hosts on this good cause, so we shall desire, and expect, the ready and cheerful assistance of the hearts and hands of all his majesty's good subjects, as opportunity, effectually to appear with and for us, shall be offered to them. And that the usual cunning arts of their and our enemies may not abuse any of them with false suggestions or misinterpretations of our proceedings, we hereby, with that candour and sincerity which becomes a Christian and a prince, declare and publish to the whole world, that the true grounds, reasons, and ends of this our engagement are these, and none other: 1. The Honour of God's holy Name, in the defence of the true Protestant Religion, and his Divine Worship, against all opposers whatsoever; and particularly against the heresies, schisms, scandalous doctrines and practices declared against in his majesty's Agreement with the Scots Commissioners, bearing date at Carisbrook Castle the 26th of Dec. last;* and the establishing of Church Government as is therein mentioned, and accorded to by his majesty, as also the mutual performance of that Agreement. 2. The restoring of his majesty to his liberty and just rights; and in order thereunto, and for the settling of a happy Peace, a speedy Personal Treaty with his majesty, with honour, freedom, and safety. 3. The support and defence of the known Laws of the kingdom. 4. The maintenance of the Freedom and just Privileges of Parliament. 5. The defence of the Liberty and Property of the subject against all violence, rapine, and oppression; such as Excise, Contribution, Free-quarter, and all other illegal Taxes. 6. The obtaining of such an Act of Oblivion and Indemnity as may most firmly bind up the bond of peace. 7. The speedy Disbanding of all Armies, and particularly that under the command of the Lord Fairfax. 8. The defence of the honour of the English nation, and his majesty's Rights in the Narrow Seas; the protection and security of the Trade of all his majesty's loyal subjects; the support of the Navy Royal, and the encouragement of all the officers and mariners of the same, to whose exemplary courage, conduct and good affections, we owe this present opportunity, with them, thus to appear for peace.—And now, having thus fully and sincerely declared our Intentions and Resolutions, we earnestly invite, and (by the authority as well inherent in our person during his majesty's restraint, as also derived particularly and formally from him, under the Great Seal of England) do require and command, all his majesty's loyal subjects heartily to join and associate themselves with us in this our undertaking; and, with force of Arms under us, as likewise by all other good means in their power, to oppose and resist all such persons and forces, as well by land as sea, as shall oppose us and this blessed peace: as likewise to be aiding and assisting to all such as are now in arms against those enemies of peace, and particularly to encourage, aid, and relieve, as friends and brethren, the Scots Army, now on their march for his majesty's rescue; of whose loyalty to his majesty, and good affections to the kingdom of England, we are fully satisfied. And we more especially exhort the city of London and the port-towns of England, upon whose actions the eyes of the whole kingdom are particularly fixed, by their good example, to encourage all the people of England manfully to shake off the heavy yoke now imposed on them by force of arms, as on a conquered nation; and instead of that lawless power which now depriveth them of the security of their persons, and the property of their goods and estates, to vindicate the just rights of free-born subjects of England, in seeking their protection under the government of their undoubted sovereign lord our royal father, and the law of the land.—Upon these foundations, by the blessing of God on the chearful and effectual concurrence of the now undeceived people of England, we shall yet hope for such a speedy conclusion of the present distractions, as may prevent the further unnatural effusion of Christian and English blood, and the miseries of a new war: to which end, that all prejudices whatsoever, so far as possibly shall be in our power, may be removed, we further declare, That we shall not only willingly decline the unpleasing memory of all that is past, so far as may concern any, who, upon this our invitation, shall return to their duty; but shall very particularly accept of, and esteem the persons and assistance of those howsoever formerly misled, which shall now join with us: and, in particular, we hereby promise, that all such officers and soldiers in the lord Fairfax's Army, without exception; as likewise all such officers and seamen with the earl of Warwick (of the good affections of most of whom we are well assured) as shall, upon the first proper opportunity, quit that their Engagement, shall be fully satisfied of their Pay and Arrears due unto them, with assurance of such Indemnity as they shall propound, and shall be safely received into our protection and care.—In the last place; we shall desire, that no interested persons will misinterpret the present stop of any vessels, or merchandizes, now made by us here in the Downs; our intention not being to break bulk, or alter the property of the owner thereof, except we shall be compelled thereunto by the refusal of such reasonable and necessary support for our Navy as may enable them and us to subsist, and proceed in our present undertaking. Which demand of ours, herewith sent to the city of London, we hope no man will think unreasonable who considers, that, by the laws of the land and practice of all times, the Customs and Sea-Duties have been granted, and ought to be employed, for the maintenance of the king's Navy, as the proper and natural provision for the same.—And now, for conclusion of what we have to say, we conjure all the good subjects of England, by the duty they owe to God and man, and by all that is precious to themselves, that they be not discouraged in their attempt to free the nation from the tyranny they live under; by obtaining, maugre all opposition, this blessed Peace (it being visible to all men, and confessed even by those that live upon the spoil of the people, that nothing but a speedy peace can preserve the kingdom from utter ruin); but, on the contrary, that they join and associate themselves as one man, against the power and practices of all persons whatsoever, who, under specious pretences, propose to themselves their particular ambitious ends in the change of the happy government of England; which, if not thus prevented, will necessitate not only the continuance of the present miseries, but will entail the same to posterity, and kindle a bloody war for many generations to come; which God of his mercy avert."

Both Houses order the Earl of Warwick to fight with the revolted Part of the Fleet.]

July 28. These revolted Ships had perplexed the parliament very much. Some Orders had been made to allow time for them to come in, and their whole Arrears to be paid them: all which having no effect, the commons sent up to the lords the following Vote for their concurrence: "That the earl of Warwick, lord-high-admiral of England, be authorized and required to fight with the revolted Ships; or any person or persons, of any condition or quality whatsoever, that shall be upon the said Ships; or shall join with them; or shall any way oppose the power and authority of parliament."

The earl of Pembroke having expressed great earnestness in favour of this Resolution of the commons, the earl of Lincoln stood up * and desired the lords to consider, that the Prince of Wales was on board one of the revolted ships, and he hoped that noble peer would not have a commission granted so at large as to kill the Prince. To which the earl of Pembroke answered with great warmth, 'That he loved the Prince as well as himself; and if he were out of the house he would call the earl of Middlesex to account for his words.' To this the latter replied, 'He knew not what spirit might be in the earl of Pembroke now he was an old man, but that he was sure his lordship was of another temper when he was young.'—At length, the question being put for concurring with the commons in giving power to the lord-Admiral as proposed, it passed in the affirmative; but the earls of Rutland, Suffolk, Lincoln, Middlesex, and the lord Hunsdon, entered their dissent.

Both Houses agree to a Personal Treaty with the King in the Isle of Wight.] The same day, the commons took into consideration the Manner of settling a Peace with the King; and the question being put to adhere to their former Vote, "That the King should assent to the three Propositions previous to a Treaty," it passed in the negative by 71 against 64. Then it was resolved, "That a Treaty be had in the Isle of Wight, with the King in person, by a committee appointed by both houses, upon all the Propositions presented to him at Hampton-Court, and for the taking away of Wards and Liveries, for settling a safe and well-grounded Peace." But it being moved, to add these words 'and not elsewhere,' the Yeas and Noes were each 57. Whereupon the Speaker turned the scale by giving his Vote against the Addition proposed. A remarkable instance of the equality of the Presbyterian and Independent parties at this juncture.

July 29. The foregoing Vote being sent up to the lords, they not only agreed to it, but also sent a Message to the other house to desire, "That the Committee for Peace might meet the next day, to consider of all the circumstances necessary for the safe and speedy carrying on this Treaty with the King; in particular, That his majesty might be, with honour, freedom, and safety, in such place in the Isle of Wight as he should make choice of; and also concerning the time when the said Treaty should begin." To both which desires the commons agreed.

Sir John Maynard's Speech in favour of Colonel John Lilburne, Prisoner in the Tower.] We shall conclude our account of the proceedings of this month with a Speech made by sir John Maynard, (one of the Eleven Members accused by the Army, and lately restored to his seat in the house) on behalf of the famous colonel John Lilburne, of whom frequent notice has been taken in this parliament. The last mention we made of him was in July 1646, (p. 493) when he was sentenced by the house of lords to pay a Fine of 4000*l.* and to be committed to the Tower for 7 years, where he had continued prisoner ever since, although many attempts had been made in parliament for his release.

Sir John Maynard* spoke thus: "Mr. Speaker; We are called hither as trustees and representatives of the people; and it is our duty to represent to you the Grievances of any which are injured or oppressed: to be as careful of them as ourselves, being the essential part of our privileges. The law of the land is every Englishman's birth-right; and you are the conservators of the law, in which are wrapped up our lives, liberties and estates.—Mr. Speaker: without any further preamble or introduction, I shall acquaint you briefly with the sufferings of lieut. col. John Lilburne, who hath been imprisoned two years illegally by the lords, who by law have no jurisdiction over commons, in criminal cases, against their wills. About 4 years since, there was a great falling out betwixt lieut. col. Lilburne, and col. King, his officer; both faithful men to your service, and of high spirits, fierce and resolute: the difference grew to such a height, that lieut. col. Lilburne complained to his commander in chief, the earl of Manchester, that col. King had betrayed Crowland, &c. and humbly besought his lordship to call a council of war, and he would make good his accusation. The earl of Manchester, hoping to compose the difference, put it off, and lieut. col. Lilburne persisted; but, seeing justice delayed, he came to London, and divulged abroad that col. King was a traitor to his trust; whereupon col. King sued him, at common-law, in an action of 2000*l.* and lieut. col. Lilburne applied himself to the house of commons, praying that the whole business might be heard and tried at a Council of War, by that Ordinance which was established in the earl of Essex's Articles, they being both soldiers, and having subjected themselves to the law martial: for lieut. col. Lilburne knew, by the letter of the common law, he was gone, it being treason by the common law to hold a fort or castle against the king.—It seems this business depended before Judge Reeves, who was a faithful worthy judge, and never deserted the parliament, but adhered when we were in the lowest condition: but lieut. col. Lilburne, being young and hot, wrote a letter to Judge Reeves, wherein he expressed himself in acrimonious language, which had better been forborne; and, in a satirical way, shewed how he was hardly dealt withal both by him and the earl of Manchester; and spake truth in sharp language, viz. 'That the Judges took many extraordinary fees which they could not justify by law; that the proceedings in their courts were so irregular, that no man knew where to find them; and that the earl of Manchester had delayed him justice, &c.' Hereupon he was convened before the lords. The earl of Manchester, being Speaker of the house of peers, pro tempore, asked lieut. col. Lilburne, Whether he did not deliver to Judge Reeves such a scandalous Paper? lieut. col. Lilburne answered, That his lordship was judge and party in his own cause; that he was in England and not in Spain; and the quære put unto him was like the oath ex officio, which proceedings they themselves had condemned as tyrannical and unjust, a little before in his own case: that by law no man ought to be asked such an ensnaring question, whereby he might condemn himself; that if he had offended, the law was open; and therefore he appealed to the house of commons, as his competent judges, being his peers and equals; and then delivered his protest against their jurisdiction: whereupon he was commanded to withdraw, and committed to prison for so protesting.—Not long after he was sent for a second time before the lords, and commanded to kneel, which he absolutely refused, as a subjection to their jurisdiction; so they remanded him to prison to be kept close, not suffering wife, child, or any other friend to come to him for the space of 3 weeks; nor allowing him to enjoy the benefit of pen, ink, or paper. After 3 weeks imprisonment, he was again forced before the lords, into whose house he went with his hat on his head; and, being there, refused to hear his Charge read: this was rashly done; but you know, Mr. Speaker, what Solomon saith, ‘oppression will make a wise man mad.’ After lieut. col. Lilburne had made this one fault, (for I conceive he had committed none before, but that the injustice rested upon the lords) he was fined 4000*l.* for his contempt, and 7 years imprisonment. Upon the whole matter I beseech you judge in point of law and equity, Whether this was not like a Council-Table or Star-Chamber sentence? and I pray observe likewise the Warrant, which the judges confessed was illegal when lieut. col. Lilburne pleaded upon his Habeas Corpus.—I shall acquaint you with some precedents, where you have relieved commoners committed by the lords, and fined in this parliament, in the like case. Col. King having a difference with the lord Willoughby of Parham, the lords took upon them to hear the cause against col. King’s will; they fined him 500*l.* and committed him to the Fleet. Colonel King appealed to the house of commons, and shewed that the lords had no jurisdiction over him; and so he was released by the house of commons, and the fine discharged.—Captain Massey, under the command of colonel Mainwaring, being one of the guards who had opened the Commissioners of Scotland’s packets, being for the same committed to the Fleet, the house of commons released him; and inclined to have rewarded him. The case was the same with this, and the like proceedings, as to Mr. William Larnier, bookseller, his brother, and his maid.—But that which is most observable is, that Mr. Richard Overton, who affronted the lords more than lieut. col. Lilburne, by protesting to their faces against them, at his first coming before them; and afterwards appealed to the house of commons, and all the commons of England, and particularly to the General and whole Army; yet notwithstanding, the lords approved of his Protestation, by their releasing him out of prison, without stooping to them: but lieut. col. Lilburne hath lain 2 years, and above, in prison; and all his estate kept from him, to the hazard of starving him, his wife, and children.—Mr. Speaker: you have formerly heard the report at large made by Mr. Maynard; and thereupon you gave him his liberty to follow his affairs, though you did not absolutely determine the business: but such is his misfortune, that he is since committed by a warrant of this house, upon the single information of one Mr. Masterson, a minister, who was not sworn: and truly, Mr. Speaker, I conceive it one of his greatest sins and errors that he hath committed, viz. His idolizing this house; for he believes that you are the Supreme Authority, and the Chief Judicatory, in representing the people, from whom all power is derived; according to that maxim, ‘Quicquid efficit tale, est magis tale:’ But I have shewed him the contrary, as you may find it in the first of Henry 4. Mem. 14. No 79. where the commons made their Protestation, ‘That they had no Jurisdiction but in making of Laws, and Money Matters, as granting Subsidies, &c.’* And truly I conceive it not honourable nor just, that we, that are legislators, should be Administrators or executioners of justice; but to leave these petty things to the constables, justices, and judges, whom we may call to question, and punish if there be occasion.—Mr. Speaker: I dare not speak against your warrant for what is past; but I pray observe, it is a prison door with two locks and bolts upon it; so that it is impossible the prisoner should ever get out, but die in prison. Lieut. col. Lilburne is committed in order to his trial at law, and yet is debarred all law; for, upon his pleading, when he had brought his Habeas Corpus, the judges confessed the warrant to be illegal, and yet they durst not release him: Secondly, The Cause is general, which is nothing in law, viz. ‘For treasonable and seditious Practices, &c.’ But sir Edw. Coke tells us the particular treason is to be expressed; and that which is worst of all, the Word of God doth not warrant it: for Festus, the pagan and corrupt judge, who expected a bribe from poor Paul, would not send him to Cæsar without specifying the cause in his Mittimus.—It is not in the power of parliaments to make a law against the law of God, nature, or necessary reason; and it was the chief cause why Empson and Dudley, those favourites and privy counsellors to Henry 7, were beheaded; as it appears in the indictment, which you may read in the 4th Institute, under the chapter, ‘Court of Wards,’ for subverting the fundamental laws of the land: they had an act of parliament for their indemnity, as 11 Henry 7, wherein the judges were authorized to proceed by information, whereas by law it should have been by indictment; and they were to judge by discretion, which was contrary to law, for it ought to have been by Juries of 12 men.—I beseech you, for the time to come, that we commit none but our own members; and that we avoid these old Council Table Warrants, which run in generals, ‘during pleasure;’ which was the cause of that excellent law, got with so much difficulty, called ‘The Petition of Right:’ That ‘for abolishing the Star-Chamber, and regulating the Council-Table,' is not inferior to it.—I pray let us remember, and apply it to ourselves, how dangerous and fatal it hath ever been for kings to extend and stretch their prerogatives above, and beyond law; for the same fate befell the Council-Table, Star-Chamber, and High Commission. I pray let us keep ourselves within our sphere, and not make our privileges, Entia transcendentia, which are not to be found in any predicament of Law.—As touching generals, I pray remember what you yourselves declared, in Answer to the king, in the case of the lord Kimbolton and the five Members accused; and alderman Pennington, alderman Foulk, col. Ven, and col. Manwaring, viz. "That it is against the rules of justice that any man should be imprisoned upon a general Charge, when no particulars are proved against him."—But leaving that, I shall acquaint you what this brave invincible spirit hath suffered and done for you; he was persecuted by the Bishops; had 500 stripes with knotted cords, from the Fleet to Westminster; there he was pillored and gagged; lay long in a nasty close prison in irons, without pen, ink, or paper, or any company: alas! I cannot remember half his sufferings. all this was in his youth, when but about 20 years of age; from which murdering imprisonment this parliament set him free, with Dr. Bastwick, &c.—Shortly after he was questioned for his life at the lords bar, for asserting the privileges of parliaments, and was accused, by a single witness, of treason; but he was cleared by other witnesses, and discharged by the lords. When the parliament was about to be forced, he fought with the Cavaliers, and brought many friends to assist in the Court of Requests. He was one of the first that took up arms, and behaved himself bravely at Keinton, where he kept the Field all night. Afterwards, he fought stoutly at Brentford, but was taken prisoner; used cruelly, got a pestilential fever in the Castle of Oxford, and was arraigned for his life before sir Robert Heath and sir Tho. Gardiner: there he asserted the parliament's cause, having the Observator without book; and spake more for us than many of us are able to speak for ourselves. He relieved with money, and held up the spirits of his fellow-prisoners. He resisted strong temptations from several lords, who offered him great preferment. He was an eminent actor in that famous Battle in Marston-Moor; took Tick-hill Castle with only 4 troops of dragoons; and, for his pains, had like to have been hanged. You must pardon me for injuring him, for I am not able to remember half his services to the public. For all his sufferings and actings for you, I beseech you, 1. Take off the mark of your own displeasure, which wounds him to the heart. 2. Discharge him from the lords imprisonment. 3. Pay him his Arrears; and pass the Order into an Ordinance for 2000*l.* out of the estates of those which gave that wicked, cruel, bloody, and tyrannical judgment against him in the Star-Chamber. These are your own expressions in your Vote of May 5, 1641.*—Mr. Speaker, I have forgot one material thing, which is this: You have allowed lieut. col. Lilburne 40*s.* a week, but he hath not received one penny; neither is he in any hope of it, for he cannot flatter, or comply; besides this supposed gift of yours hath almost starved him, for his friends in the country, thinking he had received it, have thereupon withdrawn their benevolence; and he and his family are thereby exposed to want and misery."

In consequence of which he is discharged.]
August 1. This Argument of sir John Maynard, in favour of col. Lilburne, was followed by a Petition signed by a great number of eminent citizens, and presented to the commons: but this we omit, all the allegations thereof being comprised in the foregoing Speech; observing only, that after the petitioners were withdrawn, the house passed the following Resolutions: 1. "That the Order of Restraint of lieut. col. Lilburne, be taken off and discharged. 2. That a message be sent to the lords, expressly to recommend him, and to desire them to take off their hand of restraint from him. 3. That it be referred to a committee to consider how he may have satisfaction and allowance for his sufferings, as was formerly intended to him by this house. 4. That it be recommitted to the Committee of Accounts to state and audit his Accounts. And 5. That a conference be desired with the lords for his enlargement."—These Resolutions were carried up the next day to the lords; whereupon they immediately made an order for his Discharge, and for taking off the Fine and Sentence imposed upon him by their lordships.

A Committee appointed to wait upon the King, with the Votes for a Personal Treaty.]
Aug. 2. The lords sent a Message to the commons, signifying, That they had nominated the earl of Middlesex, and desiring the other house to add two of their members to wait on his majesty, as a Committee from both houses, with all convenient speed, to acquaint him with their Resolutions concerning a Personal Treaty. This Message being taken into consideration by the commons, they proceeded to nominate two members of their house to be Commissioners to wait on the king. Mr. Bulkley was proposed and agreed upon for one without opposition. The Presbyterian Party having named Mr. Povey to be the second, the Independents proposed sir James Harrington, who had formerly been a servant of the crown; but he was excepted against by sir Harbottle Grimston, who said, 'He was sorry it should be his lot to speak against any member of the house in particular; but that he conceived sir James Harrington a very unfit man to present a Message to the King, because he did remember, and his majesty was since informed, That when a motion was made heretofore, in the house, for an Impeachment to be drawn up against the King, he was the only man that did second it; and consequently could be no welcome messenger to his majesty: he therefore desired the house to pitch upon some other.* This was zealously opposed by Mr. Gurdon, who said, It was maliciously done to except against any man for delivering of his conscience, which was no just ground of exception: to this it was answered, That the exception against sir James was agreeable to former proceedings in the house; as an instance of which, when a motion was made, some time ago, for sending Mr. Fiennes as one of the Commissioners into Scotland, it was over-ruled, because that gentleman was the penman of a Declaration against the Scots. But it being replied, That the house was not to regard the sending to the king such men as were acceptable to him, because he was in the condition of an enemy; to this it was smartly returned, "That the parliament had not yet declared the king an enemy, therefore it was not fit for any particular person to do so, and that the parliament could not declare the king an enemy, because they had taken a Covenant to maintain his honour and defend his person." At length, to put an end to the dispute, sir James Harrington and Mr. Povey were both laid aside; and sir John Hippeley was appointed to join with Mr. Bulkley and the Earl of Middlesex, in this embassy from both houses to the king.

Their Instructions.] Aug. 3. The commons sent up a copy of Instructions which they had passed, for the Commissioners who were to go to the king; which the lords, on perusal, agreed to, viz. 1. "You, or any two of you, whereof one to be a lord, shall, with all speed, repair unto his majesty at the castle of Carisbrook, in the Isle of Wight. 2. You shall present unto his majesty the Resolutions of both houses concerning a Personal Treaty to be had with him in that Island. 3. To desire his majesty's speedy Answer to the said Resolutions. 4. To acquaint him that you had only ten days allotted for going, stay, and return. 5. That in case his majesty desires to see the Propositions that were presented him at Hampton-Court, to give him a copy thereof."—Ordered, That 100*l.* be allowed for the Charges of this Expedition.

Major Huntington's Charge of High-Treason against lieutenant-general Cromwell.] This day, major Huntington, of lieutenant-general Cromwell's own regiment, who had lately resigned his post in the Army, presented to the house of lords a Narrative of his Reasons for so doing; in which he charged Cromwell with carrying on a private negotiation with the King, under pretence of restoring him to his rights, but, in fact, designing to destroy his majesty and the whole royal family, and to overturn both houses of parliament, in order to his own advancement. The lords received this Narrative very favourably, and ordered it a reading in their house. The major had also endeavoured to lay it before the commons, but could not prevail upon any member to present it: not discouraged at this, he sent it inclosed to the Speaker himself, who not communicating it to the house as desired, he tendered it to Mr. Birkhead, the serjeant at arms, who also refused to meddle with it: however, some days after, the lords sent down the Narrative to the commons; but the lord Wharton followed the messengers into the lobby, sent for the serjeant at arms, and desired him to give notice to the Speaker of what was coming, who contrived means to prevent those messengers from being called in. All these circumstances seem to account for the absolute silence of the Commons Journals upon this subject. Mr. Whitlocke* and Mr. Rushworth† take notice of major Huntington's presenting to the house of lords his Reasons for leaving the Army, which the latter styles a 'Narrative of pretended carriages of lieutenant-general Cromwell;' though they both agree with the Journalists‡ of the times, That the major made oath before the lords that what he had affirmed in this Charge, as of his own knowledge, was true; and what upon hearsay, he believed, would be attested; whereupon their lordships ordered him to attend their house, and granted him their protection.—Notwithstanding all this, nothing was done in the business, which is thus accounted for by general Ludlow,§ who writes "That the malevolent spirit, which now threatened the parliament from the north, prevailed with them to discountenance a Charge of High Treason framed by major Huntington, with the advice of some members of both houses, against lieutenant-general Cromwell, for endeavouring, by betraying the king, parliament, and army, to advance himself; it being manifest that the preferring that accusation at this time, was principally designed to take him off from his command; and thereby to weaken the Army, that their enemies might be better enabled to prevail against them."—Major Huntington finding, by all these obstructions thrown in his way, that it was impossible to prevail upon the house of commons to admit his accusation against Cromwell, resolved to appeal to the people; and accordingly published his Narrative with his name subscribed to it. Two editions of it were printed on the same day. It is entered in the lords Journals, as follows:

Sundry REASONS inducing Major Robert Huntington to lay down his Commission, humbly presented to the Honourable Houses of Parliament.

"Having taken up arms in defence of the authority and power of king and parliament, under the command of the lord Grey of Werke and the earl of Manchester, during their several employments with the forces of the Eastern

Association; and, at the modelling of this Army under the present lord-general, having been appointed, by the honourable houses of parliament, major to the now regiment of lieutenant-general Cromwell; in each of which employments I have served constantly and faithfully, answerable to the trust reposed in me: and having lately quit the said employment, and laid down my commission, I hold myself tied, both in duty and conscience, to render the true reason thereof, which, in general, is briefly this: Because the principles, designs, and actions of those officers, which have a great influence upon the Army, are, as I conceive, very repugnant and destructive to the honour and safety of the parliament and kingdom, from whom they derive their authority. The particulars thereof, being a Breviate of my sad Observations, will appear in the following Narrative:—First, That upon the Orders of parliament for disbanding this Army, lieutenant-general Cromwell and commissary-general Ireton were sent commissioners to Walden, to reduce the Army to their obedience, yet more especially in order to the present supply of forces for the service of Ireland; but they, contrary to the trust reposed in them, very much hindered that service, not only by discountenancing those that were obedient and willing, but also by giving encouragement to the unwilling and disobedient; declaring that there had lately been much cruelty and injustice in the parliament's proceedings against them, meaning the Army. And commissary-general Ireton, in further pursuance thereof, framed those Papers and Writings then sent from the Army to the parliament and kingdom; saying also to the Agitators, That it was lawful and fit for us to deny Disbanding, till we had received equal and just satisfaction for our past service: lieutenant-general Cromwell further adding, That we were in a double capacity, as soldiers and as commoners; and having our pay as soldiers, we had something else to stand upon as commoners. And when, upon the rendezvous at Triploe-Heath, the commissioners of parliament, according to their orders, acquainted every regiment with what the parliament had already done, and would further do, in order to the Desires of the Army; the soldiery being before prepared, and notwithstanding any thing that could be said or offered by the commissioners, still cried out for 'Justice, Justice.'—And for the effecting of their further purposes, advice was given by lieutenant-general Cromwell and commissary-general Ireton, to remove the King's Person from Holdenby, or to secure him there by other guards than those appointed by the commissioners of parliament: This was thought most fit to be carried on by the private soldiery of the Army, and promoted by the Agitators of each regiment; whose first business was to secure the garrison of Oxford, with the guns and ammunition there, and from thence to march to Holdenby, in prosecution of the former advice, which was accordingly acted by cornet Joyce; who, when he had done the business, sent a Letter to the General then at Keinton, acquainting his excellency that the king was on his march towards Newmarket. The General being troubled thereat, told commissary-general Ireton that he did not like it; demanding, withal, who gave those orders. He replied, That he gave orders only for securing the King there, and not for taking him away from thence. Lieutenant-general Cromwell, coming then from London, said, That if this had not been done, the king would have been fetched away by order of parliament; or else colonel Graves, by the advice of the commissioners, would have carried him to London, throwing themselves upon the favour of parliament for that service. The same day cornet Joyce being told that the General was displeased with him for bringing the king from Holdenby; he answered, That lieutenant-general Cromwell gave him orders at London to do what he had done, both there and at Oxford.—The person of the King being now in the power of the Army, the business of lieutenant-general Cromwell was to court his majesty, both by members of the army, and several gentlemen formerly in the king's service, into a good opinion and belief of the proceedings of the Army, as also into a dissatisfaction and dislike of the proceedings of the parliament; pretending to shew that his majesty's interest would far better suit with the principles of independency than of Presbytery: and when the king did alledge, as many times he did, that the power of Parliament was the power by which we fought, lieutenant-general Cromwell would reply, That we were not only soldiers but commoners; promising that the Army would be for the king in the settlement of his whole business, if the king and his party would sit still, and not declare, nor act, against the Army, but give them leave only to manage the present business in hand.—That when the King was at Newmarket, the parliament thought fit to send to his majesty, humbly desiring that, in order to his safety, and their Addresses for a speedy Settlement, he would be pleased to come to Richmond: but, contrary hereunto, a Resolution was taken by the aforesaid Officers of the Army, that if the king could not be diverted by persuasion, (to which his majesty was very opposite) that then they would stop him by force at Royston, where his majesty was to lodge the first night; keeping accordingly continual guards upon him, against any power that should be sent by order of parliament to take him from us. And to this purpose out-guards were also kept to prevent his escape from us, with the commissioners, of whom we had special orders given to be careful; for that they did daily shew a dislike to the present proceedings of the Army against the parliament, and that the King was most conversant and private in discourse with them: his majesty saying, 'That if any man should hinder his going, now his houses had desired him upon his late Message of the 12th of May 1647, it should be done by force, and

‘by laying hold of his bridle; which if any man were so bold to do, he would endeavour to make it his last.’ But, contrary to his majesty’s expectation, the next morning, when the king and the officers of the Army were putting this to an issue, came the Votes of both houses to the king, of their compliance with that which the Army formerly desired. After this his majesty did incline to hearken to the Desires of the Army, and not before: whereupon, at Caversham, the king was continually solicited, by messengers from lieutenant-general Cromwell and commissary-general Ireton, proffering any thing his majesty should desire, as revenues, chaplains, wife, children, servants of his own, visitation of friends, access of letters; and (by commissary-general Ireton) that his negative voice should not be meddled withal; and that he had convinced those that reasoned against it at the General Council of the Army: and all this they would do, that his majesty might the better see into all our actions, and know our principles, which lead us to give him all those things out of conscience; for that we were not a people hating his majesty’s person or monarchical government; but that we liked it as the best, and that by this king: saying also, That they did hold it a very unreasonable thing for the parliament to abridge him of them; often promising, that if his majesty would sit still and not act against them, they would, in the first place restore him to all these; and, upon the settlement of our own just rights and liberties, make him the most glorious prince in Christendom: that to this purpose they were making several Proposals for a Settlement, to be offered to the commissioners of parliament, then sent down to the Army, which should be as bounds for our party as to the king’s business; and that his majesty should be at liberty to get as much of those abated as he could, for that many things therein were proposed only to give satisfaction to others which were our friends; promising the king, that at the same time the commissioners of parliament should see the Proposals, and his majesty should have a copy of them also; pretending to carry a very equal hand between king and parliament, in order to the Settlement of the kingdom by him; which, besides their own judgment and conscience, they did see a necessity of as to the people: commissary-general Ireton further saying, That what was offered in these Proposals should be so just and reasonable, that if there were but six men in the kingdom that would fight to make them good, he would make the seventh against any power that should oppose them.—The headquarters being removed from Reading to Bedford, and his majesty to Woborne, the Proposals were given to me by commissary-general Ireton to present to the King, which his majesty having read, told me, He would never treat with the Parliament or Army upon those Proposals, as he was then minded: but the next day, his majesty understanding that a force was put upon the houses of parliament by a tumult, sent for me again, and said to me, ‘Go along with sir John Berkeley to the General and lieutenant-general; and tell them that, to avoid a new war, I will now treat with them upon their Proposals, or any thing else, in order to a Peace; only let me be saved in honour and conscience.’ Sir John Berkeley falling sick by the way, I delivered this message to the lieutenant-general and commissary-general Ireton, who advised me not to acquaint the general with it, till 10 or 12 officers of the Army were met together at the General’s quarters; and then they would bethink themselves of some persons to be sent to the king about it; and accordingly commissary-general Ireton, col. Rainsborough, col. Hammond, and col. Rich, attended the King at Woborne for three hours together, debating the whole business with the king upon the Proposals; upon which debate many of the most material things the king disliked were afterwards struck out, and many other things much abated by promises; whereupon his majesty was pretty well satisfied.—Within a day or two after his majesty removed to Stoke, and there calling for me, told me, He feared an engagement between the city and the Army; saying, He had not time to write any thing under his hand, but would send it to the General after me; commanding me to tell commissary-general Ireton, with whom he had formerly treated upon the Proposals, That he would wholly throw himself upon us, and trust us for a Settlement of the kingdom as we had promised; saying, If we proved honest men, we should without question, make the kingdom happy, and save much shedding of blood. This Message from his majesty I delivered to commissary-general Ireton at Colebrook, who seemed to receive it with joy; saying, That we should be the veriest knaves that ever lived, if in every thing we made not good what we had promised; because the king, by his not declaring against us, had given us great advantage against our adversaries.—After our marching through London with the Army, his majesty being at Hampton-Court, lieutenant-general Cromwell and commissary-general Ireton, sent the king word several times, That the reason why they made no more haste in the business, was because that party which did then sit in the house, while Pelham was Speaker, did much obstruct the business, so that they could not carry it on at present: the lieutenant-general often saying, Really they should be pulled out by the ears; and, to that purpose caused a regiment of horse to rendezvous at Hyde-Park to have put that in execution, as he himself expressed, had it not been carried by vote in the house that day as he desired. The day before the parliament voted, once more, the sending of Propositions of both kingdoms to the King by the commissioners of each kingdom at Hampton-Court, commissary-general Ireton bad me tell the king, That such a thing was to be done to-morrow in the house; but his majesty need not be troubled at it, for that they intended it to no other end, but to make good some promises of the parliament, which the Scots nation expected performance of: and that it was not expected, or desired, his majesty should either sign them or treat upon them; for which there should be no advantage taken against the king. Upon the delivery of which Message his majesty replied, That he knew not what Answer to give to please all without a Treaty.—Next day after this Vote passed, the lieut. general asking me thereupon, If the king did not wonder at these Votes? I told him, No; for that commissary-general Ireton had sent a Message by me, the day before the Vote passed, to signify the reason of it. The lieut. general replied, That really it was the truth; and that we, speaking of the parliament, intended nothing else by it but to satisfy the Scots, who otherwise might be troublesome. And the lieut. general and commissary-general enquiring after his majesty's Answer to the Propositions, and what it would be, it was shewed them both privately in a garden-house in Putney, and in some part amended to their own mind. But, before this, the King doubting what Answer to give, sent me to lieut. general Cromwell, as unsatisfied with the proceedings of the Army, fearing they intended not to make good what they had promised; and the rather because his majesty understood that lieut. general Cromwell and commissary-general Ireton agreed with the rest of the house in some late Votes that opposed the Proposals of the Army: they severally replied, That they would not have his majesty mistrust them, for that since the house would go so high, they only concurred with them, that their unreasonableness might the better appear to the kingdom: and the lieut. general bad me further assure the king, That if the Army remained an Army, his majesty should trust the Proposals, with what was promised, to be the worst of his conditions which should be made for him; and then striking his hand on his breast, in his chamber at Putney, bad me tell the king, he might rest confident and assured of it: and many times the same Message hath been sent to the king from them both; but with this Addition from commissary-general Ireton, that they would purge and purge, and never leave purging, the houses, till they had made them of such a temper as should do his majesty's business: and rather than they should fall short of what was promised, he would join with French, Spaniard, Cavalier, or any that would join with him, to force them to it. Upon delivery of which Message the king made Answer, That if they did so, they would do more than He durst do.—After this the delay of the Settlement of the Kingdom was excused, upon the commotions of col. Marten and col. Rainsborough, with their adherents; the lieut. general saying, That speedy course must be taken for outing them, the house and army, because they were now putting the Army into a mutiny, by having a hand in publishing several printed Papers, calling themselves the Agents of five Regiments, and in the Agreement of the People, although some men had encouragement from lieut. general Cromwell for the prosecution of those Papers; and he being further pressed to shew himself in it, desired to be excused for the present, for that he might shew himself hereafter for their better advantage; though, in the company of those men which were of different judgments, he would often say, That these people were a giddy-headed party, and that there was no trust nor truth in them; and to that purpose wrote a Letter to col. Whaley the day the king went from Hampton-Court, intimating doubtfully that his majesty's person was in danger by them, and that he should keep out-guards to prevent them; which letter was presently shewed to the king by colonel Whaley.—That about six days after, when it was fully known by the parliament and army that the king was in the Isle of Wight, commissary-general Ireton standing by the fire-side in his quarters at Kingston, and some speaking of an Agreement likely to be made between the king and parliament, now the person of the king was out of the power of the Army, commissary-general Ireton replied, with a discontented countenance, He hoped it would be such a peace as we might, with a good conscience, fight against them both.—Thus they who, at the first taking the king from Holdenby into the power of the Army, cried down Presbyterian government, the proceedings of this present parliament and their perpetuity; and instead thereof held forth an earnest inclination to a moderate episcopacy, with a new election of members to sit in parliament for the speedy settling of the kingdom; and afterwards, when the 11 Members had left the house, and marched through London with the Army, the 7 Lords impeached, the 4 Aldermen of London committed to the Tower, and other citizens committed also, then again cried up Presbyterian government, and the perpetuity of the present parliament; lieutenant-general Cromwell pleasing himself with the great sums of money which were in arrear from each county to the Army, and the tax of 60,000*l.* a month for our maintenance: Now, saith he, we may be, for ought I know, an Army so long as we live. And since the sending forth the Orders of parliament for the calling their members together, lieut. general Cromwell perceiving the houses will not answer his expectation, he is now again uttering words, persuading the hearers to a prejudice against the proceedings of parliament; again crying down Presbyterian government, setting up a single interest, which he calls an honest interest, and that we have done ill in forsaking it. To this purpose it was lately thought fit to put the Army upon chusing new Agitators, and to draw forth of the houses of parliament 60 or 70 of the members thereof; much agreeing with his words he spake formerly in his chamber at Kingston, saying, What sway Stapylton and Hollis had heretofore in the kingdom, and he knew nothing to the contrary but that he was as well able to govern the kingdom as either of them: so that in all his discourse nothing more appeareth than his seeking after the government of king, parliament, city, and kingdom; for the effecting whereof he thought it necessary, and delivereth it as his judgment, that a considerable party of the chief citizens of London, and some of every county, be clapt up in castles and garrisons, for the more quiet and submissive carriage of every place to which they belong. Further saying, That from the raising of the late Tumult in London, there should be an occasion taken to hang the recorder and aldermen of London, then in the Tower, that the city might see the more they did stir in opposition, the more they should suffer; adding, That the city must first be made an example.—And since lieut. general Cromwell was sent down from the parliament for the reducing of the Army to their obedience, he hath most frequently, in public and private, delivered these ensuing Heads as his principles, from whence all the foregoing particulars have ensued; being fully confirmed, as I humbly conceive, by his practice in the transaction of his last year's business: 1. That every single man is judge of just and right, as to the good and ill of a kingdom. 2. That the interest of honest men is the interest of the kingdom. And those only are deemed honest men by him, that are conformable to his judgment and practice; which may appear in many particulars. To instance but one, in the choice of col. Rainsborough to be vice-admiral; lieut. general Cromwell being asked How he could trust a man whose interest was so directly opposite to what he had professed, and one whom he had lately aimed to remove from all places of trust? He answered, That he had now received particular assurance from col. Rainsborough, as great as could be given by man, that he would be conformable to the judgment and direction of himself and commissary general Ireton, for the managing of the whole business at sea. 3. That it is lawful to pass through any forms of government for the accomplishing of his end; and therefore either to purge the houses, and support the remaining party by force everlastingly, or to put a period to them by force, is very lawful and suitable to the interest of honest men. 4. That it is lawful to play the knave with a knave. These gentlemen aforesaid in the Army thus principled, and, as by many other circumstances may appear, acting accordingly, give too much cause to believe that the success which may be obtained by the Army, except timely prevented by the wisdom of the parliament, will be made use of to the destroying of all that power for which we first engaged: and I having, for above these 12 months past, sadly and with much reluctancy observed the several Passages aforesaid; yet with some hopes that at length there might be a returning to the obedience of parliament; but contrary hereunto, knowing that resolutions were taken up. That in case the power of parliament cannot be gained to countenance their designs, then to proceed without it; I therefore chose to quit myself of my command, wherein I have served the parliament for these 5 years last past, and put myself upon the greatest hazards by discovering these truths, rather than, by hopes of gain with a troubled mind, continue an assistant or abettor of such as give affronts to the parliament and kingdom, by abusing of their power and authority, to carry on their particular designs; against whom, in the midst of danger, I shall ever avow the truth of this Narrative, and myself to be a constant, faithful, and obedient servant to the parliament of England. RO. HUNTINGTON.* August 2, 1648."

The Commons order their Votes against the Scots Army to be printed: and appeal to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland against the Declaration of their Committee of Estates.] We have before taken notice, That a Declaration had been presented to both houses from the Committee of Estates of the Parliament of

* Lord Clarendon writes, "That Ashburnham and Berkeley received many advertisements from some officers with whom they had most conversed, and who would have been glad that the king might have been restored by the Army, for the preferments which they expected might fall to their share; that Cromwell and Ireton resolved never to trust the king, or to do any thing towards his restoration; and they two steered the whole body; and therefore it was advised, that some way might be found to remove his majesty out of their hands. Major Huntington, one of the best officers they had, and major to Cromwell's own regiment of horse, upon whom he relied in any enterprize of importance, more than upon any man, had been employed by him to the king, to say those things from him which had given the king the most confidence, and was much more than he had ever said to Ashburnham; and the major did really believe that he had meant all he said, and the king had a good opinion of the integrity of the major, upon the testimony he had received from some he knew had no mind to deceive his majesty; and the man merited the testimony they gave him. He, when he observed Cromwell to grow colder in his expressions for the king than he had formerly been, expostulated with him in very sharp terms for abusing him, and making him the instrument to cozen the king; and, though the other endeavoured to persuade him that all should be well, he informed his majesty of all he had observed, and told him that Cromwell was a villain, and would destroy him if he were not prevented; and in a short time after he gave up his commission, and would serve no longer in the Army." vol. 5. p. 75.

Scotland, setting forth the Reasons of their Army's marching into England under the command of the duke of Hamilton; and that the Commons had thereupon passed a Vote, declaring that Army, and all such as joined them, to be Traitors; and another, with the same censure, against all those who had given them invitation: to both these the lords refusing their concurrence, the commons thereupon ordered them to be printed and published; and likewise the following Narrative to be sent to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

A NARRATIVE of the Proceedings of the PARLIAMENT of England in the Work of Reformation, and of their Resolutions to maintain the Government of the Kingdom established by Law, and of their Endeavours for Settlement of the Peace, and Preservation of the Union, between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland.*

"We the commons assembled in the parliament of England, taking it into our consideration, That however the late possessing of Berwick and Carlisle, and the coming of the Scots Army and forces into this kingdom, be most notorious and unparalleled breaches of the Solemn League and Covenant; and the many Treaties, national Agreements, and acts of parliament, passed both in England and Scotland: Yet, because we are assured these impious and unwarrantable actions cannot be done with the approbation and consent of the religious and well-affected people of the kingdom of Scotland; and that we understand there are very few amongst those who are in this Engagement against us, that first engaged with us in the Covenant and Cause; but such as have been professed enemies to them, however they be now content to pretend thereunto, that they may the better deceive the people of this kingdom: We are unwilling to impute such evils to the nation in general, but to those persons that own and appear in them; whom we are confident God, that hath still so remarkably manifested his displeasure against truce-breakers, in his due time will judge, whatever we may suffer in the mean while.—Therefore we now send to you, that it may appear we will not, by any provocation, be induced to withdraw ourselves from those in Scotland who retain their former principles; and still own the Cause wherein we have, with a blessing from Heaven, been so long engaged and solemnly united.—And because the enemies thereof have been very industrious in prosecuting a design to hinder the work of Reformation in this kingdom, by raising many scandals and reproaches upon the parliament; and, by unworthy insinuations of their ends and intentions, and false representations of their actions and proceedings, which they have framed suitable to the several present stirring distempers, the better to foment discontents in all sorts of people against them; charging them, That they do not intend any thing in the work of Reformation, though they do more inalign what they have done already than desire they should do more; that they have a purpose to alter the government of the kingdom; that they are enemies to Peace, and to the union of the kingdoms, and such like: Therefore, that by such practices neither you may be abused nor we further wronged, we have thought fit, for the necessary vindication of the parliament, to give you, in the first place, a short view, how far, through the assistance of Almighty God, to whom alone be the glory, the two houses of parliament have proceeded in the work of Reformation, notwithstanding the opposition of the enemies to truth; and the great dangers and difficulties which have been raised to hinder them, by the force and power, plots and designs, of the Popish, Prelatical, and Malignant party in this kingdom, with whom the Scots Army are now joined in forces and councils.—It is very well known how great a party in this kingdom were engaged for upholding of prelacy; yet the parliament, notwithstanding all discouragements and hazards to themselves, have taken away and extirpated that government, so disagreeable to what is practised in other Reformed Churches, and prejudicial to the power of Godliness.—And because the Peace of the Church, and Power of Religion, cannot long continue without good order and discipline established therein; they called an Assembly of godly, learned, and orthodox Divines from all parts of the kingdom, with whom some commissioners of the Church of Scotland joined, to sit at Westminster; and, after consultation had with them, both houses took away the Service-Book, commonly called 'The Book of Common-Prayer,' and established a 'Directory for Worship;' commanding the practice of it in all the churches and chapels of this kingdom: and, instead of Episcopacy, they have set up Presbyterian government in the Church, which is already settled in many parts of the kingdom; and do, by God's assistance, resolve to pursue the further perfecting and establishing of it in all parts, both in England and Ireland.—They have approved and passed 'The Confession of Faith' or 'Articles of Christian Religion,' as it came from the Assembly of Divines, with some small Alterations; only some small part is yet under consideration, the rest being printed and published by authority of parliament. They have passed a Greater and Lesser Catechism that came from the Assembly of Divines. They have taken away all superstitious Ceremonies and popish Innovations. They have given authority for the demolishing of all Representations of any persons of the Trinity, Saint, or Angel; and taking away all Altars, Crosses, Crucifixes, Pictures, and all other monuments of idolatry and superstition in any church, chapel, or place, within this kingdom. They have passed an Ordinance for the punishing of Blasphemies and Heresies. They have passed an Ordinance for ejecting scandalous Ministers and School-Masters; and thereupon have removed many, in whose stead they have placed godly and able men. They have passed an Ordinance, that none shall enter into the work of the Ministry, but such as are ordained thereto. They have given all the encouragement, and made the best provision, they could for the maintenance of a godly Preaching Ministry through the kingdom; not only in removing the ignorant and scandalous, but in augmenting the maintenance of painful Ministers, both out of the Improvements of Bishops, the Estates and Revenues of Deans and Chapters, and out of the Improvements of Delinquents, which they bought out and settled upon churches that wanted maintenance, to a very great value.—They have purged the Universities and chief Schools of the kingdom, which are the seminaries of learning for education of youth, of many heads of houses, fellows and scholars that were superstitious, prelatical, and malignant; and have placed, in their stead, such as are well-affected to Reformation of Religion, and to Uniformity with other Reformed Churches. They have passed several Ordinances for the better Observation of the Lord's Day, and Days of public Fast and Thanksgiving; they have condemned all licentious practices upon those days, and have ordered the Books, formerly written in favour of them, to be publickly burnt. They have passed an Ordinance for suppressing all Stage-Plays and Interludes, the nurseries of vice and profaneness.—And although we must needs say, That the greatest let and impediment which we have met with, in settling the Reformation of Religion according to the Covenant, hath come from his majesty; (who, by his refusing hitherto to grant our Desires for the taking away of Episcopacy and the Service-Book, and to settle the Directory for Worship and Presbyterian Government; and, by denying his concurrence to establish them by act of parliament, hath given great occasion to men of unsound judgments, to spread their opinions and errors, which is not unusual in times of Reformation when the settling of it is long delayed; and further, by his declaring in his late Message from the Isle of Wight, 'That he thinks himself obliged, both as a Christian and as a king, to employ whatever power God shall put into his hand for the upholding of Episcopacy,' hath given great encouragement to the Popish, Malignant, and Prelatical Party, to endeavour, by plots and designs, and now again by open force, the re-introducing of Episcopacy and the Service-Book; which, by the conjunction of the Scots Army with their forces, they have now great hopes to effect); yet, by God's assistance who hath helped us hitherto, it shall be our care and endeavour, against all dangers and discouragements whatsoever, to proceed in the work of Reformation until it be perfected.—For other things wherewith we are commonly aspersed; as, That we should have intentions to alter the Fundamental Government of this kingdom, both houses have endeavoured so to stop the mouth of malice, by declaring several times formerly, and so late as the 6th of May, last, 'That they will not alter the Government by king, lords and commons;' that we shall need say no more of it.—And for our Desires of Peace, our seven several Addresses to the King, with Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace, will sufficiently speak for us: and although the several denials which we have received from his majesty formerly, and the present preparations for war by the Malignant party of both kingdoms under pretence of Peace, might wholly discourage us; yet we, notwithstanding all the hazards that may attend it, have now again agreed to try whether a Peace can be settled by a Treaty with his majesty in the Isle of Wight, upon the Propositions presented to him at Hampton-Court; wherein we shall, by the help of God, approve ourselves such as are both desirous of a firm peace, and mindful of the trust reposed in us by the people of this kingdom, for the securing of Religion and their Liberties.—As for our Desires to preserve the Union and brotherly Agreement betwixt the kingdoms, we shall not here say much about it; because the whole transaction betwixt our Commissioners and the Parliament, and Committee of Estates of Scotland will be printed; wherein it will appear what was offered, in order to give them real satisfaction in our Engagements to them for the service of their armies in England and Ireland, to which we could never get any Answer; and what they demanded in the name and by the command of both houses, from the Parliament and Committee of Estates of Scotland, concerning several English Delinquents and Incendiaries then in Scotland, which, by treaties and acts of parliament passed in both kingdoms, ought to have been delivered to be tried in the kingdom of England; but instead of giving them up, they were countenanced and encouraged, consulted and agreed with, to seize and hold the towns of Berwick and Carlisle in the kingdom of England; which by acts of parliament, and several treaties and agreements of both kingdoms, were not to be garrisoned without the consent of both parliaments.—And when, in pursuance of those Treaties and Agreements, our commissioners did declare those traitors and enemies to this kingdom that had garrisoned them; and required the like Declaration from the parliament and committee of estates of Scotland, it would not be assented unto, although very often pressed; but, instead thereof, all manner of provisions were sent unto the commanders in those garrisons, though many of them notorious Papists; and they had much freedom and countenance to their proceedings by persons of eminent power in Scotland; and whereas, notwithstanding we had notice there was some design for seizing these towns, which might have been prevented by our timely putting forces into them, yet to avoid the guilt of Breach of Treaties, we rather resolved to run the hazard which did ensue, than to bring that imputation upon ourselves. And it now appears, that these towns were but taken in trust to be delivered to the Scots forces; who, however they do publicly declare for Religion and the Covenant, yet the Papists and Delinquents, not only in Berwick and Carlisle, but in other parts of the kingdom, (who are professed enemies to Religion and the Covenant, and do kill, plunder, and pursue those who have been faithful in them) are so well satisfied of their ends and intentions that they join and hazard their lives and fortunes with them.—Whilst these afore-mentioned Councils and Compliances were thus on foot in Scotland, with those that are declared enemies to the Peace of this kingdom and to the grounds of the union of both kingdoms, the parliament of Scotland did send us a Paper of Desires, dated the 26th of April last, which in the Letter wherein they were inclosed are called Demands (which implies a right that upon examination will not be found); yet the houses were so desirous to give the parliament of Scotland all possible satisfaction, that they did not take exception thereunto, nor to the person by whom they were sent, who was accused before them for endeavouring the revolt of the forces under the lord Inchequin in Ireland, which then had happened; nor did they insist upon the first granting of their aforesaid just Demands made to the parliament and Committee of Estates of Scotland; but perceiving so strange an alteration in that kingdom, they judged it fit for them to try, in the first place, whether Scotland would own the cause wherein we had both been engaged; and therefore (after our commissioners had acquainted the Committee of Estates with our Declaration of the 6th of May last, concerning our full resolution to maintain and preserve inviolably the Solemn League and Covenant, and Treaties betwixt the kingdoms) they did return Answer to this purpose; ‘That we did offer to join with the Parliament of Scotland, in the Propositions presented to the king at Hampton-Court, and in making such further proceedings thereupon as should be thought fit for the speedy Settlement of the Peace of both kingdoms, and preservation of the Union, according to the Covenant and Treaties; and when we should receive their Answer thereunto, the houses would be ready to give further satisfaction in those things which should not intrench upon the particular interests of the kingdom, and privileges of the parliament of England.’ But to these all the Answer our commissioners could obtain from the Parliament, or Committee of Estates of Scotland, was, ‘That they could return us no Answer, till just satisfaction were given to their Desires of the 26th of April.’—Afterwards, we agreed upon a Personal Treaty with the king’s majesty upon the Proposition, he first consenting to Three Propositions which, in substance, he had granted in former Messages; and the houses sent to the Committee of Estates for Scotland to join with them, and to prepare such Propositions as they thought fit for that kingdom: but to this neither we, nor our commissioners, received any Answer until a Scots Army had invaded this kingdom, and then it was sent with a Declaration, of which we will say no more in this place, but that, considering they were bound by treaties and acts of parliament to give us 3 months warning before their making war with us, it had been more honourable that their Declaration had rather come before, than followed after, their Army.—By all which, and by their vigorous pursuing the raising of their Army, before they sent their Desires; and even after, before they knew what Answer would be returned to them by the houses, it doth appear, that this invasion was intended and resolved upon, let us say or do what we would; wherein they have too little considered how many obligations did lie upon them to the contrary; how much this their Engagement tends to the utter ruin of poor Ireland, who, by their drawing away so many of the British and other forces to join with them and disabling us to send them relief, is exposed to imminent hazard; how much to the dishonour and danger of the Reformed Religion in all Christendom; and how highly the God of Truth and Peace is provoked by it: all which evils, seeing we have on our parts so much laboured to prevent, we doubt not but God will be with us, and the prayers of his people for us: and that those who have dealt falsely in striking hands with the common enemy, to kindle a new fire betwixt these kingdoms, shall themselves perish therein. H. ELSYNGE, Cler. Parl. Dom. Com.”*

The English Commissioners at Edinburgh return home.] The march of the Scots Army into England having rendered all further negotiations unnecessary, the English Commissioners applied for a safe-conduct home; in return to which they received the following Letter from the earl of Crawford, lord treasurer of Scotland:

“Right Honourable; I am commanded by the Committee of Estates, in answer to your lordships Desires of the 19th of this instant July, to return to your lordships from them the inclosed pass; and when your lordships shall

* Mr. Walker styles the foregoing Address to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, from the House of Commons of England, a dangerous precedent to both kingdoms: “To make a few ambitious pedantical Churchmen supreme judges over parliaments and state affairs, in ordine ad Deum; and how apt they are,” says he, “to lay hold upon such occasions, and kindle their zeal into a consuming flame, I leave all wise men to judge.” History of Independency, p. 126.

be pleased to acquaint them with the time of your parting from hence, they will be ready, if you insist thereupon, to appoint a competent convoy to attend your lordships for so much of the way as you shall think necessary; your lordships engaging the public faith of the kingdom of England for their safe return. I am likewise commanded by the Committee to shew your lordships, that, by their orders, the towns of Berwick and Carlisle are, for the peace of both kingdoms, secured from the sectaries; and that just satisfaction being given to the necessary Desires of this kingdom, not only these towns shall be put in the condition they were in formerly, and their fortifications slighted, but likewise all the forces of the kingdom of Scotland, now in England, shall immediately be recalled and return; and that they will still inviolably observe, on their parts, the union and brotherly correspondence betwixt the kingdoms. The Committee having employed one Mr. Thomas Haliburton, about a month since, to go to London as a public servant of theirs, they have commanded me to shew your lordships their desire that no let nor hindrance be offered to him in his return, which would be contrary to the law of nations, and to their expectations. I am, &c. CRAWFORD and LINDSAY. Edinburgh, July 31."

The English Commissioners Answer to the lord treasurer's Letter concludes this tedious and fruitless Negotiation between the parliaments of both kingdoms:

"Right Honourable; We received yours of the 31st of July; and to that part thereof which concerns public business, we cannot give your lordship any Answer, but have thought good to let your lordship understand, that an Order is come to our hand, dated July 22, 1648, by which we are recalled, and thereby our powers of any further transaction of business with your lordship, otherwise than in order to our return, we conceive are determined; as to that part wherein your lordship hath been pleased to manifest your care for our safe pass and convoy, we return your lordship thanks. We are, &c. NOTTINGHAM, BRYAN STAPYLTON, ROB. GOODWYN, JOHN BIRCH. Edinburgh, August 1."

Debate in the Commons, on a Motion for declaring the Prince of Wales a Rebel and a Traitor.] August 4. This day a debate took place in the commons, relative to the Prince of Wales. The Sheriffs of London had presented to that house the copy of a Letter sent from the Prince to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of that city, with a Declaration expressing the reasons of his appearing on board the Fleet, both which we have before given at large: to these were annexed the copy of another Letter from his highness, addressed to the Company of Merchant-Adventurers of England, informing them, That he had detained 3 of their ships, but without any intent to make prize of them; desiring to borrow 20,000*l.* to be repaid out of the Customs; and requiring their speedy Answer.—The citizens being withdrawn, Mr. Ashe moved, That the common council and merchants should be forbidden to give any Answer to the Prince's Letter; for that as he had engaged himself to the States of the Low Countries to do no act prejudicial to trade, there was no danger of his making prize of the ships he had stopped, though the 20,000*l.* should not be sent as desired.—Colonel Harvey, after aggravating many faults in the King's government, said, The Prince was his father's own son, as like him as could be. Sir Peter Wentworth urged, That he had animated the Scots to make the present invasion; and that, by his letter to the city, he had openly declared for them. To this Mr. Knighley adding, That the Prince had formerly been in arms against the parliament, and was but a subject, Mr. Blackiston moved, That the house should declare him a Rebel and a Traitor: but this motion, though earnestly insisted on, was laid by for the following Reasons: 1. "That they had not the originals of the Prince's Letter and Declaration, but only copies, not so much as attested upon oath by any authentic clerk; therefore no legal proceeding could be had upon them. 2. To vote the Prince a Traitor the same day that they sent messengers to invite the King, his father, to a treaty of Peace, would argue no peaceable inclination in them, and would be so understood by the people. 3. They were engaged by the National Covenant to defend the King's person, crown, and dignity; but the Prince, heir apparent to his crown, was, next under God, the chief supporter of his crown and dignity; therefore to vote him a Traitor, was to subvert his crown and dignity. 4. By the statute of the 25th Edw. 3. 'It is High Treason to endeavour the destruction of the Prince, the king's eldest son:' but to declare him a Rebel and a Traitor, was to endeavour to destroy him; and therefore high treason. 5. The people were already jealous that the King and his posterity should be laid by, and in them the monarchical government of this nation subverted, and a new form of government introduced; they had already, by the Votes of 'No Addresses to the King,' and by their Declaration against him, (wherein they say, 'They can no longer confide in him') laid by the King; and now, to vote the Prince a Rebel and a Traitor, was to lay by both him and his brother the duke of York, who adheres to him, which would exceedingly confirm the people in their fears."

Though this motion for declaring the Prince of Wales a Rebel and a Traitor, for taking arms against the parliament, miscarried in the house of commons; they nevertheless passed a Vote denouncing that censure against the subjects of this kingdom who should adhere to or assist him in the present war, either by sea or land; and that all such ought to be proceeded against as Traitors: they also made an Order forbidding the City and the Merchant-Adventurers to give any Answer to the Prince's Letter, without the consent of that house; whereby they most effectually prevented the loan he desired of 20,000*l.*—This conduct of the house of commons towards the Prince of Wales, gave him sufficient evidence how little favour he had to expect from that quarter, and seems to have induced him to make his application to the other house.

The Prince's Letter to the House of Lords, offering his Mediation for a Peace.] Aug. 8. The Speaker of the house of lords acquainted them with a Letter sent to him from his highness, which was read as follows:

“Understanding, with great contentment, that both houses of parliament have resolved upon a Personal Treaty with his majesty, on some of the particulars expressed by us in our Declaration of the 29th of July last, as most conducing to the Settlement of a blessed Peace; we have thought fit to acquaint you with our sense and desires concerning the same, to the end that they may be communicated by you to the house of peers from us. 1. We propose, that the Treaty be appointed to be in such place and manner as may best consist with the honour, freedom and safety of his majesty; whereby the agreement to be made may not be blemished with the face of restraint. 2. That the Treaty may be between his majesty and his kingdoms of England and Scotland, so as the matters in difference may equally fall under the consideration of all persons concerned therein. 3. That, during the said Treaty, there may be a general Cessation of Arms, to the end that the affections of the people, though engaged in several parties, may thereby be prepared to meet in amity and brotherly kindness; and that no intervening accidents or success may disturb the proceedings in this Treaty. Lastly, That an orderly moderate subsistence, during the Treaty, be agreed upon for all armies and forces now on foot, and particularly for the Scots Army, in such manner as may be with least pressure on the Northern counties.—If the two houses shall think fit to consent to the effect of what we now propound, as proper to render this Treaty effectual, we shall, with great joy and alacrity, interpose our Mediation to the king our father, for the obtaining of all such concessions and acts of grace, as, by the blessing of God, may most conduce to a firm and lasting Peace and the happiness of his majesty and all his people. We further desire you to propound to the house of peers, That some equal course may be suddenly settled for the support of us, and the Navy with us, whereby we may be enabled to protect the trade of the kingdom, and may forthwith discharge all ships and merchandizes now stayed by us. Given under our hand and seal from on board the Fleet in the Downs, the 5th of August, in the 24th year of the reign of the king our royal father.”

Mr. Pooley, who brought this Letter from the Prince, was ordered to attend the house, de die in diem, for an Answer.

Petition from the City of London, for a Personal Treaty with the King.] The same day the following Petition was presented to the lords, and read:

The Humble PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common-Council assembled, “Sheweth; That your petitioners, being deeply sensible of the sad, miserable, and deplorable condition of the king, parliament, and kingdom, by the long continuance of a bloody and unnatural war, whereof they had great hopes to be freed after the common enemy was subdued, the Army of our brethren of Scotland withdrawn, and the king's majesty placed at Holdenby by consent of both kingdoms, in order to a happy composure of all differences, both in Church and State; but, contrary to expectation, your petitioners, to the great grief and sorrow of their souls, do find the government of the Church to be still unsettled; blasphemy, heresy, schism, and profaneness increased; the relief of bleeding Ireland obstructed; the war, to their great astonishment, renewed; the people of England thereby miserably impoverished and oppressed; the blood of our fellow-subjects spilt like water upon the ground; our brethren of Scotland now entered into this kingdom in an hostile manner; his highness the Prince of Wales commanding at sea a considerable part of the Navy, and other ships under his power, having already made stay of many English ships with merchandize and provisions to a very great value: by reason whereof navigation will be destroyed: seamen desert us; the merchants enforced to leave off trading; clothing and other manufactures of this kingdom fall to the ground; wool, which is the staple commodity of the land, remains unsold; the mint stands still; the Customs and other profits by merchandize will be very much abated, if not utterly destroyed; coal, salt, corn, fish, butter, cheese, and all other provisions brought by sea to this city and kingdom, stopped; the innumerable number of the poorer sort, depending only upon manufacture, wanting work and bread, will, as is greatly to be feared, in a very short time, become tumultuous in all parts of the kingdom; and many be enforced to remove themselves and families into foreign parts, where they will settle the manufactures of this kingdom never to be regained: all which will unavoidably, in a very short time, totally ruin the people of this kingdom.—Your Petitioners humbly conceive no visible way can prevent the apparent ruin of these kingdoms, but the speedy freeing of his Majesty from that restraint wherein he now remains; and, by a Personal Treaty, restoring to the king his just rights; to the parliament their undoubted privileges; to the people their native freedom and benefit of the laws, being the birth-right of every subject; and, by the due attendance of the members of parliament, in the discharge of their trust to the kingdom, and in observing the Self-denying Ordinance.*

—The premises considered, your petitioners humbly pray that the king's majesty may be speedily freed from that restraint wherein he now remains, and humbly invited to a Personal Treaty for settling of a safe and well-grounded Peace; and that therein the union between the two kingdoms may be preserved; that, in the interim, all acts of hostility, both by sea and land, may, by command from the king and parliament, cease, and trade be free without any interruption; that the government of the Church may be speedily settled according to the Covenant; distressed Ireland relieved; the people of the land, by disbanding all armies, may be eased of their intolerable burthen; the liberties of the subject restored, and the laws of the land established; the members of this honourable house enjoined to attend the service of the kingdom; that the Self-denying Ordinance may be effectually observed; and this honourable house would be pleased speedily to take into their serious consideration the sad condition of such merchants, whose ships and goods are under the power of that Fleet which is now with his highness the Prince of Wales; and suddenly to find out some expedient for their releasement. And your Petitioners, as bound, shall ever pray. MITCHELL."

To this Petition the lords returned the following Answer by their Speaker:

* A Motion had been made, on the 4th of this month, for reviving the Ordinance against Places of Profit being held by Members of Parliament. The occasion of which was this: It being proposed, That Thursday the 10th of August might be appointed a Day of Humiliation for the late unseasonable Weather, this motion was seconded in a sarcastical manner to this effect: 'Mr. Speaker, I like the motion well, so it be done with due preparation, else it may bring a curse instead of a blessing; and the only preparative to a good Fast, is first to fast from strife, envy, malice, pride, ambition, vain glory, hypocrisy, uncharitableness and covetousness: and, in order to this, I propound that the Self-denying Ordinance may be reinforced; and that all Members who enjoy great Offices, contrary to that Ordinance, may quit them accordingly, that so the house may once stand upon equal feet.' Mercurius Pragmaticus, No. 20.

A day was appointed accordingly to take this matter into consideration, but postponed from time to time, and at last entirely laid aside; most of the Members having very powerful Reasons for dropping such an enquiry, as will appear by a curious Pamphlet, printed in the year 1660, entitled "The Mystery of the Good Old Cause briefly unfolded, in a Catalogue of such Members of the late Long Parliament, that held Offices, both Civil and Military, contrary to the Self-denying Ordinance;" a copy of which will be found in the APPENDIX to the present volume.

"The lords have commanded me to let you know, that they do thankfully accept the often-renewed expressions of your ardent zeal and care, that all possible means should be used for the procuring a safe and well-grounded Peace. Wherein they do so far sympathize with your Desires, that they do assure you, you may, with all confidence, expect their constant and industrious employment of their utmost endeavours for the obtaining so great a blessing, whereunto they hope-Almighty God will give a happy success. And for the particulars contained in your Petition, they will take them into speedy consideration, that you may reap all satisfaction and contentment thereby, so far forth as lies in their powers; as they are bound in their duty they owe to the common-wealth, and as they are obliged to the renowned city of London for their incessant demonstration of their affection and service to the parliament ever since the beginning of these unhappy distractions."

Debate thereupon in the House of Commons. The foregoing Petition did not meet with so courteous a reception from the commons, to whom it was presented the same day; for as soon as it was read there,

Mr. Weaner stood up and said, 'The citizens were become malignant, and that it was apparent by their Petition they intended to desert the parliament.'

Col. Harvey added, 'That he could affirm, of his own knowledge, this Petition was driven on by many common-council men, who had never done any good service for the parliament; yet he would not deny that there were many very godly men who had a hand in it; but those honest godly men were fooled by a company of knaves.' To this

Sir Benj. Rudyard answered, 'Mr. Speaker We have sat thus long, and are come to a fine pass; for the whole kingdom is now become parliament all over. The Army hath taught us a good while what to do, and would still teach us what we shall do; the city, country, and reformadoes teach us what we should do; and all is, because we ourselves know not what to do. Some men are so violent and strong in their own conceits, that they think all others dishonest which are not of their own opinion; but he that calls me knave, because I differ from him in opinion, is the verier knave of the two.'—At length it was resolved to call in the petitioners, and the Speaker told them, "That when the house received their Petition, they were in debate of matters of great concernment, and were also engaged in a conference with the lords; yet they had taken their Petition into consideration; which containing many things of very high concernment, both to the king, parliament, city, and kingdom, they would give them an Answer thereunto the next day in the afternoon."

Presently after this, a Petition from the Reformadoes, said to be subscribed by 8000 persons, consisting of many knights, colonels, and officers of quality, was presented to the commons praying, "That there might be a speedy, free, and personal Treaty, according to the Desires of the city; that their Accounts might be stated without delay; that they might have interest for their Arrears; that those imprisoned for debt might be set at liberty, and the rest protected till the payment of their Arrears; that they might have 3 months Pay according to the Ordinances of the 15th, 16th, and 21st of June, 1647; and present visible security for the remainder thereof."—The Petitioners being withdrawn,

Alderman Pennington said, 'He was sorry to see his brethren of the city and the Reformadoes to be all one in Malignancy; adding, That those two Petitions of the soldiers and the city made both but one plot.'

Mr. Ven said, 'He was told they had been laying their heads together a week since; and he was confident that, in the end, they would all join together against the parliament.'—However, the Petitioners being called in, received the following Answer from the Speaker: "Gentlemen; the house has considered of your Petition: and as your judgments have followed theirs heretofore, so you will make that your rule still. They have done what possibly they could, to satisfy the petitioners Arrears; and, for a great part thereof, have given them the same security that the lord Fairfax's Army had their Arrears secured: and they have further ordered, That all such Delinquents estates, fines, and compositions, as the petitioners shall discover, that are not discovered, shall go to such of the petitioners as shall make such discoveries, towards payment of their whole Arrears: and have further ordered, That the fifth and twentieth part of such Delinquents as the petitioners shall discover, not formerly discovered, shall also go towards payment of the Arrears of the petitioners: and the house have also appointed a Committee to confer with some of you for a way to give you further satisfaction."

Aug. 9. Mr. Swinfen reported an Answer to the Petition presented by the lord mayor, aldermen, and Common Council, as follows:—"The house of commons have considered of the Petition of the lord mayor, aldermen, and, commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, presented to them Aug. 8, 1648: and, upon serious debate had thereupon, they have thought fit to acquaint the common-council, That they have passed an Ordinance for the settling of Presbyterian Government: and therein (upon review of all their former Ordinances) they have perfected and compiled the same in one entire body: and for the obtaining a safe and well-grounded Peace, they have resolved upon a Treaty with the King in the Isle of Wight, upon the Propositions formerly agreed upon, and presented to the king at Hampton-court, and for taking away Wards and Liveries, and also upon such other Propositions as shall be propounded, either by his majesty or both houses of parliament; and that the king make choice of what place he pleaseth in that island, to be there with freedom, honour, and safety, to treat personally with the Commissioners of Parliament: and the Committee which they have sent to present this offer, are now with his majesty.—Concerning the seizing of Ships and Goods of the Merchants of the city of London, and the decay and obstruction of the Trade of the kingdom, by the revolted Ships that lie in the Downs, the house is deeply sensible thereof; and have done what lies in them for reducing those ships to their due obedience to the parliament, by offering them Indemnity for their offence, and payment of the mariners Arrears, upon their submission; and by sending the earl of Warwick, lord admiral, with power to command the rest of the Navy to reduce those ships by force, if they refuse the pardon offered them: which might have proved an effectual means, before this time, to have prevented the loss already suffered, and to have secured the trade of the kingdom, had not the going-out of the Fleet been retarded by the backwardness and treachery of divers, who have secretly complied with the late defection of the Navy: and, that the house may manifest their earnest desires to entertain any further means for their more speedy and certain effecting of this work, of so necessary importance to the honour and welfare of this nation, they have appointed a Committee to treat with the Merchants that are most concerned therein, to receive their advice, and to know what aids they will contribute to the clearing of the seas: and their readiness therein, as it will return abundantly to their own advantage, so it will be embraced as a most acceptable service to the whole kingdom, by this house.—As to the Scots Army, which have in hostile manner invaded this kingdom; are possessed of Berwick and Carlisle, contrary to the Treaties betwixt the kingdoms: and do join themselves with the Popish and Malignant Party in the North: the house of commons have declared them enemies to this kingdom; and that all those English or Irish, as voluntarily adhere unto them, are traitors and rebels, and to be proceeded with accordingly: and they resolve by God's assistant, to adhere and prosecute this their Resolution: and, upon the necessary grounds thereof, they do expect the hearty concurrence and assistance of the city of London, as of the rest of the kingdom; notwithstanding all the secret plots and endeavours of the Scots emissaries, or the agents of the Popish and Malignant party of this kingdom, to the contrary."

This draught being read, a member objected to it, saying, 'He hoped that copy must not pass for an Answer; for, as he remembered, the city Petition consisted of at least a dozen particulars, and this Answer mentioned only some of them, and those of the least moment. It gave no Answer to their Desires for the disbanding of all Armies to ease the nation of their burdens; the restoring the people's laws and liberties; the injoining all members to attend the house; nor the effectual observation of the Self-denying Ordinance.'

Mr. Hungerford objected to a passage in this Answer, wherein the house of commons had declared the Scots Army enemies to this kingdom, and to be proceeded against as traitors and rebels: and that they were resolved to adhere to this Resolution; urging, 'That as the lords had denied their concurrence in that Vote, he conceived the commons could make no such Declaration, nor act therein without them.' In answer to this

Mr. Reynolds positively affirmed, 'That the house of commons, being the representative of all the people, had power to act without the lords, for the safety of the people, in case the lords deserted their trust.' And

Mr. Weaver said, 'The house need not be so precise in giving an Answer to the city, because the citizens did now adhere to the lords, and neglect the house of commons; for when it was desired lately at a common council, that the originals of the Prince's Letter might be sent to the house of commons, a common council-man stood up and said, 'The better way was to deliver them to the lords, because they were of greater honour and power than the commons, being the highest court, and a court of judicature, which the commons were not; and therefore he conceived the Answer proposed was good enough.'—This the house acquiesced in, and the foregoing Answer was ordered to be delivered to the citizens.

The Earl of Middlesex's Account of what passed between the King and the Parliament's Commissioners, in the Isle of Wight.] This day the lords received a Letter from the earl of Middlesex, in the Isle of Wight, dated the 7th. The purport of it was only to inform the house of their arrival there, and that they had presented the several Votes to the King. But, on the 14th, the earl gave the lords a more ample Account of his commission, in hæc verba:

"On Monday the 7th of August we addressed ourselves to the King, to deliver the several Votes of both houses; and, after having read them, we told his majesty we had but ten days for going, staying, and returning. His majesty was pleased to ask, Whether the ten days were not to be accounted from the delivery of the Message? we answered, No; and that they were to be accounted from Friday, the day of our setting forth. The king replied, That he had not then five days for to consider of his Answer, which he presumed we expected in writing, adding, That he had none to help him, no not so much as a clerk to transcribe; however he would really contribute his best endeavours to a happy Peace. After a short pause the King said, He would have sent to the parliament; and desired us to take notice, that his long silence proceeded not from a dull stupid laziness, or his being insensible of his own or the kingdom's condition; but from the incapacity that was put upon him by reason of the former Votes. His majesty further said, That now there was a way opened to a Treaty, which he ever thought the only means to a durable Peace, he would cheerfully embrace it; and that none should more speedily run to it than himself; and, for his part, as being more concerned than any one in the kingdom; nay he might speak without vanity should he say more than all, and he hoped it would not be thought an hyperbolical expression, being assured whoever gained he must be a loser. His majesty then read the Votes to himself; and, as he was reading them, said, He liked them well, his Desires being included in these Votes; for that he desired no more than to treat with honour, freedom, and safety upon the Propositions, and such other things as either he or the houses should offer. His majesty then asked, If the Commissioners were named that were to treat? We answered, No. The King said, In a Treaty there were two things to be considered, some of necessity, some of conveniency. After a little pause, his majesty added, He would go to prepare his Answer, that he might not delay a minute to promote so good a work; and so dismissed us for that time.—On Thursday Aug. 10, we waited on his majesty to receive his Answer; and, upon our entrance into his presence, he said, He was sorry he was limited to so short a time, and had so little help for dispatch; yet, notwithstanding, he had prepared his Answer. Immediately before the reading thereof, he used these expressions, That the last message he sent to the houses was delivered to the Commissioners sealed, and if it had been so presented, it would have been better for him; but now he thought it fit to send this open, for he could not be in a worse condition than he was, being under so close a restraint, none being suffered to speak a word to him without suspicion. His majesty then produced his Answer, and read it aloud in the presence-chamber, being full of company; and, after it was read, his majesty said, That he had therein endeavoured to give satisfaction to his parliament, there being nothing in it but what he conceived was implied in the Votes of both houses. After a little pause his majesty further said, That there might be some that would oppose this Treaty, being gainers by the war, and therefore desired the continuance of it; and that others might think him revengeful; but for his part he was so far from seeking any revenge, that if a straw should lay in the way to hurt them, he would stoop to take it up; and prayed God to forgive them, as he did. Not long after, when we came to take our leave, the king called us apart from the company, and asked how we liked his Answer? We replied, That we hoped it might be a means to restore the Peace of the kingdom."

The King's Answer to the Votes for a Personal Treaty.] The King's Answer was as follows:

The King's Most Gracious ANSWER to the Votes of both Houses of Parliament, in order to a Personal Treaty, for the settling of a safe and well-grounded Peace. Carisbrooke-Castle, Aug. 10, 1648.

"C. R. If the peace of my dominions were not much dearer to me than any particular interest whatsoever, I had too much reason to take notice of the several Votes which passed against me, and the sad condition I have been in now above these 7 months; but since you, my two houses of parliament, have opened, as it seems to me, a fair beginning to a happy Peace, I shall heartily apply myself thereunto; and, to that end, I will, as clearly and shortly as I may, set you down those things which I conceive necessary to this blessed work, so that we together may remove all impediments that may hinder a happy conclusion of this Treaty, which, with all cheerfulness, I do embrace.—And, to this wished end, yourselves have laid most excellent grounds; for what can I reasonably expect more than to treat with honour, freedom, and safety, upon such Propositions as you have or shall present unto me, and such as I shall make to you? But withal remember, that it is the definition, not names of things which make them rightly known; and that without means to perform, no Propositions can take effect; and truly my present condition is such, that I can no more treat than a blind man judge of colours, or one run a race who hath both his feet tied fast together; wherefore my first necessary Demand is, That you will recall all such Votes and Orders, by which people are frightened from coming, writing, or speaking freely to me. Next, That such men of all professions, whom I shall send for as of necessary use to me in this Treaty, may be admitted to wait upon me.—In a word: That I may be in the same state of freedom I was in when I was last at Hampton-Court. And indeed less cannot in any reasonable measure make good those Offers which you have made me by your Votes; for how can I treat with honour so long as people are terrified with Votes and Orders against coming to speak or write to me? and am I honourably treated, so long as there is none about me (except a Barber who came now with the Commissioners) that ever I named to wait upon me? or with freedom, until I may call such unto me of whose services I shall have use in so great and difficult a work? and for safety, I speak not of my Person, having no apprehension that way, how can I judge to make a safe and well-grounded Peace, until I may know, without disguise, the true present state of all my dominions, and particularly of all those whose interests are necessarily concerned in the Peace of these kingdoms? which leads me naturally to the last necessary Demand I shall make for the bringing of this Treaty to a happy end; which is, That you alone, or you and I jointly, do invite the Scots to send some persons, authorized by them, to treat upon such Propositions as they shall make; for certainly the public and necessary interest they have in this great Settlement, is so clearly plain to all the world, that I believe no body will deny the necessity of their concurrence in this Treaty, in order to a durable Peace: wherefore I will only say, That as I am king of both nations, so will I yield to none, in either kingdom, for being truly and zealously affected for the good and honour of both; my resolution being never to be partial for either, to the prejudice of the other.—Now as to the Place, (because I conceive it to be rather a circumstantial than real part of this Treaty, I shall not much insist upon it) I name Newport in this Isle; yet the fervent zeal I have that a speedy end be put to these unhappy distractions, doth force me earnestly to desire you to consider what a great loss of time it will be to treat so far from the body of my two houses, when every small debate, of which doubtless there will be many, must be transmitted to Westminster before it be concluded. And really I think, though to some it may seem a paradox, that people's minds will be much more apt to settle, seeing me treat in or near London, than in this isle; because, so long as I am here, it will never be believed by many, that I am really so free as, before this Treaty begins, I expect to be: and so I leave and recommend this point to your serious consideration.—Thus I have not only fully accepted of the Treaty, which you have proposed to me by your Votes of the 3rd of this month; but also given it all the furtherance that lies in me, by demanding the necessary means for the effectual performance thereof: all which are so necessarily implied by, though not particularly mentioned in, your Votes, as I can no ways doubt of your ready compliance with me herein. I have now no more to say, but to conjure you by all that is dear to Christians, honest men or good patriots, that ye will make all the expedition possible to begin this happy work, by hasting down your Commissioners, fully authorized and well instructed, and by enabling me, as I have shewed you, to treat; praying the God of Peace so to bless our endeavours, that all my dominions may speedily enjoy a safe and well-grounded Peace."

The earl of Middlesex having acquainted the house that col. Hammond sent a Letter after the Commissioners, to inform them, That the King had forgot to speak to them concerning his Chaplains, and named two of them, Dr. Sheldon and Dr. Hammond, whom he desired might attend him; this the lords consented to; but the commons denied their concurrence.

Major Rolph discharged by the Commons. Then the Speaker reported the effect of a Conference with the commons concerning major Rolph: "That Mr. Serjeant Wylde said, He was committed by warrant from this house; that he was in a languishing condition in prison; and that being a person who had served the parliament very faithfully, this case was of great consequence, as being of much prejudice to him, the parliament, and the Army. That, by Order of the house of commons, he took notice of several things observable in the warrant, both in regard of the illegality of the imprisonment, in point of authority, and also of process, though he had no authority, to dispute that, in respect of keeping a fair correspondence between the houses; only he did put in a salvo, according to the Great Charter, that if their lordships should imprison by an absolute power, it would be destructive to the liberty of the subject, and be a breach of the Great Charter; that though it had been done, yet it had been disclaimed, as being done without the consent of the commons. He said, The warrant for the commitment of major Rolph was illegal, because he stood committed, being only accused of high treason, which is too general; whereby he cannot make any Answer to his accusation. The party who commits should express the cause, and likewise the traitor should know the nature of the offence. Moreover the warrant should run, 'To be continued in prison until he be delivered by due course of law;' which this warrant does not. He said, The house of commons also looked upon the small credit of the witnesses against him, one of whom had been committed for a great offence, and formerly was a servant to the earl of Holland; and also Mr. Osborne, who had forfeited his trust, and committed a great offence, in concealing this business against the king so long time after he knew it. Upon the whole matter, the commons desired that major Rolph might have his liberty, either by bail or by some other way." A committee of lords was appointed to consider what was to be said to the commons concerning the major, at another conference. But nothing further being done in this affair by their lordships, the commons ordered him to be admitted to bail. He was soon after indicted at Winchester assizes before serjeant Wylde, by whose direction the grand jury returned the bill 'Ignoramus;' upon notice of which the commons directed the major to be discharged, voted him the sum of 150*l.* as a recompence for false imprisonment, and committed Mr. Osborne and Mr. Dowcet, the witnesses against him, to the custody of the serjeant at arms. This charge of High Treason against major Rolph, for compassing and intending the Death of the King, was revived soon after the Restoration of his son, Charles II. as will appear under its proper period.

Debate on the Proceedings of the Commissioners with the King.] The same day that the earl of Middlesex reported the late transactions between the King and the parliament's Commissioners in the Isle of Wight, to the house of lords, Mr. Bulkley did the same to the commons: but the King's Answer in writing, which was delivered to their lordships, not yet being sent down to the other house, this report was confined to some particular circumstances only, which Mr. Bulkley represented to the following effect: "That the King had them welcome, as coming about a welcome business, Peace, which no man desired with more earnestness than himself; that if a peace did not ensue the fault should not lie at his door; and that he feared no obstructions but from those who were gainers by the war. That his majesty desired, immediately after the delivery of their Message, to talk with them in private, which they modestly excused; affirming that they had no commission for any private conference: that about two days before they came away, his majesty seeing them stand in the presence chamber, first called the earl of Middlesex to him, and had some discourse with him singly; next, sir John Hippesley, and had the like with him; at length, said Mr. Bulkley, he called to me, and I could not but afford him the civility of an ear, and an answer to a few inoffensive questions: But, when we were retired out of the presence-chamber, we questioned each other touching his majesty's discourse; and found that all to each of us agreed in the same, and to the same end, viz. His majesty's longing desire for a speedy Settlement; importuning us to do all good offices which might tend thereto, in a composure of the differences betwixt him and the houses of parliament. Mr. Bulkley added, That when they were to come away, his majesty delivered them his Answer in writing, and gave it them open; telling them, He doubted not of their fidelity, though an ill use had been made of the last Message which he sent open, it having been debated and canvassed in private, and a prejudice put upon it, before it was presented to the houses." — These circumstances being thus reported,

Mr. Herbert Morley stood up, and said, 'Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen have delivered all to you, save what they should deliver, that is, the King's Answer; which, it seems, they have suffered to be delivered first to the lords: but, methinks, they might have presented us a copy of it.' And then moved, 'That since the gentlemen had gone beyond their commission, by privately conferring with the king, the house might do well, either to call them to account, or give them for their good service an act of oblivion.' But this motion went no further at present. However, the next day, the lords having sent down the King's Answer to the commons, with their Votes thereupon, the Independent Party renewed their resentment against the commissioners for holding a private conference with the king.

Mr. Thomas Chaloner alledged an example of one Foscari, that was sent ambassador from the state of Venice to Savoy; who, for having a private conference with the Spanish ambassador there, Spain being then at enmity with Venice, was condemned at his return home to lose his head. To this it was answered, 'That the example would not hold water in the present case, for that gentleman argued upon a supposition of his majesty's being an enemy to the parliament; which he must first prove to be true, before the example of Foscari would square with their commissioners.' In reply to which,

Mr. Scott said, 'The King was still an enemy, because he had been the means to raise a new war, by inviting the Scots; and had not yet made satisfaction for all the blood that had been spilt in the former war, nor had he yet acknowledged his faults, nor submitted himself.—On behalf of the Commissioners it was urged by several members, ‘That the house had given them no prohibition, in their Instructions, against discourse with his majesty: that having revoked their Votes of non-address to the king, it was as lawful for the commissioners as any other to apply themselves to him: and that if the commissioners had reported, that in their private discourses with his majesty they had found an averseness in him towards peace, it is likely they would never have been questioned for any private conference; but their having testified an earnest desire and inclination in the king towards Peace, by a fair treaty, was undoubtedly their only fault.’—These arguments had so great weight in the house, that the party who first proposed to censure the commissioners, made a motion that the business might be laid aside till another time; whereupon sir John Hippesley and Mr. Bulkley stood up, and conjured the house either to acquit them presently or condemn them, that they might know what to trust to; and not have the matter now put by to be laid in their dish again half a year or 12 months hence, when faction might hope to grow strong; and, by power, over-awe the house to their ruin. Protesting, That except some present end were made, either with them or against them, they would forbear any more coming to the house.—This resolute behaviour of the Commissioners had such effect, that the question being proposed for giving them Thanks, a motion was made to add these words, ‘and for approving their Proceedings,’ which passed in the affirmative without a division: and accordingly the Speaker returned sir John Hippesley and Mr. Bulkley the Thanks of the house, and declared their Approbation of those Commissioners proceedings.

Votes of the Lords upon the King's Letter accepting of a Treaty.] Aug. 16. The lords having desired a conference with the commons, concerning the King's Letter, sir John Potts reported the following Votes, passed by their lordships, in consequence thereof; 1. “That, for opening a way to a Treaty with his majesty for a safe and well-grounded Peace, these 4 Votes, of the 15th Jan. last, be revoked and taken off. (see p. 831.) 2. That such men of all professions, whom his majesty shall send for, as of necessary use to him in this Treaty, shall be permitted to wait on him; and that his majesty shall be in the same state and freedom as he was in when he was last at Hampton Court. 3. That such Domestic Servants, as his majesty shall appoint to come to attend upon his person, shall be sent unto him. 4. That the Scots shall be invited to send some persons, authorized by them, to treat with the king upon such Propositions as were tendered to his majesty by both kingdoms at Hampton Court, at such time as shall be agreed upon by his majesty and the two houses of parliament. 5. That the town of Newport in the Isle of Wight, named by the king, shall be the place of the Treaty with his majesty. 6. That it is agreed that the king, if he please, may invite the Scots to send some persons authorized by them, to treat upon such Propositions as were tendered to his majesty by both kingdoms at Hampton Court, at such time as shall be agreed upon by his majesty and the two houses of parliament. 7. That 5 lords be appointed to join with a proportionable number of the house of commons, as Commissioners to treat with the king. And, 8. That all expedition be used in a business that requires so much dispatch.”

Aug. 17. The commons took into consideration the foregoing Resolutions: and the first of them being read, Mr. Scot urged, ‘That the four Votes of Non-address to the king were made upon good advice and judgment; and that it would reflect upon the honour of the house to be thus unsettled in their resolutions, as to vote things one day, and unvote them the next.’ To this it was answered, ‘It was no new thing for the house often to unvote matters of far less moment, than this of a Treaty for the settlement of the kingdom: and that gentleman and others had been observed to be the ringleaders in unvoting many things, which they conceived cross to their own designs; and the only sticklers in countenancing the Army heretofore, when they constrained the house to recall several Votes which had been passed with far better advice and reason, than those Votes of Non-address, or the Declaration upon them, which had filled the whole kingdom with outcries, and had been the only causes of a second war.’ To which no reply being made, it was carried, without division, to concur with the lords in the first Resolution.—But the commons put a negative upon the 4th Resolution, for inviting the Scots to the Treaty, and made several very considerable Alterations in the rest, as will shortly appear.

Answer of the Lords to the Letter from the Prince of Wales offering his Mediation for a Peace.] This day the lords agreed upon the following Letter, as an Answer to that from the Prince of Wales:

“May it please your Highness; I am commanded by the lords assembled in parliament, to return their humble acknowledgments for that Offer which your highness was pleased to make, in your Letter of the 5th instant, to interpose your Mediation with the king, your royal father, for the obtaining of all such Concessions and Acts, as, by the blessing of God, may most conduce to a firm and lasting Peace and the happiness of his majesty and all his people. The lords do take this expression as an argument of the hearty affection which you bear to your native country; and do conceive that nothing can more conduce to procure your highness an interest in the affections of all the people of England, than to steer all your motions in concurrence with those councils and resolutions that are taken in the parliament; which is, by the antient constitution of the government of this kingdom, the Great Council thereof. This being all I have in command, I take leave to subscribe myself, Your &c. NORTH, Speaker, pro tempore."

The Scots Army under the Duke of Hamilton routed by Cromwell.] Aug. 23. A Letter was received from lieut. general Cromwell, containing an Account of a complete Victory he had obtained over the Scots Army under the command of the duke of Hamilton, at and near Preston, in Lancashire. This Letter is in Rushworth, to which we refer.*—A Day of Thanksgiving was ordered throughout the whole kingdom, to Almighty God, for his wonderful great mercy and success bestowed upon the parliament's forces against the whole Scots Army, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th instant in Lancashire. The day to be the 7th of September, and that 10,000 Copies of a Paper entitled, 'The Particular occasions of the solemn Day of Thanksgiving, appointed to be kept throughout the Kingdom of England; and the Dominion of Wales, on Thursday, Sept. 7, 1648,' be printed and sent by the Members to the respective places for which they serve.

The Votes concerning the Treaty, as altered by the Commons.] Aug. 24. A Conference was held between the two houses, concerning the Votes about the Treaty with the King, when the commons said they agreed to some of them, but had made several Objections and Alterations to the others.—The Votes as altered by the Commons stood thus: 1. "That for opening a way towards a Treaty with his majesty for a safe and well-grounded Peace, the 4 Votes of Non-Address to the King be revoked and taken off. 2. That his majesty be desired to send to the houses the Names of such persons as he shall conceive to be of necessary use to be about him during this Treaty; they not being persons excepted by the houses from pardon, or under restraint, or in actual war against the parliament by sea or land, or in such numbers as may draw any just cause of suspicion; and that his majesty shall be, in the Isle of Wight, in the same state and freedom as he was in when last at Hampton-Court. 3. That the houses do agree that such Domestic Servants, not being in the former limitations, as his majesty shall appoint to come to attend upon his majesty's person, shall be sent unto him. 4. That the town of Newport in the Isle of Wight, named by the king, be the place of this Treaty with his majesty. 5. That if the king shall think fit to send for any of the Scots nation, to advise with him concerning the affairs of the kingdom of Scotland only, the houses will give them a safe conduct; they not being persons under restraint in this kingdom, or in actual war against the parliament by sea or land, or in such numbers as may draw any just cause of suspicion. 6. That 5 lords and 10 members of the house of commons be Commissioners to treat with the king. 7. That the time for beginning the Treaty be within ten days after the king's assent to treat as is agreed, and to continue 40 days after the beginning thereof."—To all these Votes the lords returned for answer: "That their lordships, out of a desire to expedite the attaining of a speedy, safe, and well-grounded Peace, had receded from their former Votes, and concurred with them in all the Votes now brought up, with the alterations; and desired that they might be speedily sent to the king by sir Peter Killigrew." This was done accordingly the next day.

Aug. 25. The commons resolved, That 40,000*l.* be employed for the service of the Fleet; 7000*l.* for providing public stores of Powder; and 3000*l.* for paying the Lancashire Forces, that went out of that county to oppose the duke of Hamilton's Army: and that all these sums be paid out of the 100,000*l.* charged upon the Receipts at Goldsmiths-Hall and remaining due to the kingdom of Scotland, according to Agreement when they delivered up the King's Person to the English Commissioners. Thus the Scots, by their second invasion, lost one moiety of the Debt then owing to them for their first.

Intercepted Letter from the King to the Scots Parliament.] Aug. 26. A Resolution passed this day in the house of commons, relative to an Intercepted Letter of the King's, which is an instance of the highest affront put upon his majesty at the very time they were settling the preliminaries of Peace with him. In order to clear up this business, it is necessary to observe, That on the 8th of this month Complaint was made to the house of lords by Mr. Haliburton, a Scots officer sent by the Committee of Estates of that kingdom with their Declaration to the king and both houses of parliament, That the commons had ordered him to depart London in 24 hours, before he had obtained any Answer to the business he came about; whereupon the lords enlarged his time of stay for one month. But this giving umbrage to the commons, they desired a conference with the lords on the 14th, at which they represented, That capt. Haliburton was a dangerous person, employed by the declared enemies to the kingdom, from whom many Letters of dangerous consequence were taken, which were decyphered and communicated to the common-council of the city; and having delivered his Letters to his majesty, they conceived it necessary he should return to his own country, and not be protected here to do ill offices to this kingdom.—But the lords not receding from the indulgence they had granted to the captain, on the 16th the commons ordered him to be forthwith sent to the lord-Admiral, and that his lordship be desired to ship him off for Scotland by the first conveyance. The captain being informed of this design, embarked on board a vessel in the river, intending to join the prince of Wales; but was stopt at Tilbury fort and searched, and a Letter of the King's taken upon him. Colonel Temple having informed the house of all these particulars, and desiring their advice therein, it was ordered, That the Governor of Tilbury fort do deliver the said capt. Haliburton to the lord-admiral, to be sent home according to their former Order. Then the Intercepted Letter from the King was read, directed, "For the Lords and Gentlemen, Committees of the Scots Parliament, together with the Officers of that Army;" and a motion being made to deliver the Letter back to the captain, it passed in the negative, by 39 against 55. This Letter was not communicated to the lords, but ordered to be sealed up in a box; which accounts for its not being entered in the Journals of either house; nor is it taken notice of by Mr. Whitlocke or Mr. Rushworth; but is printed at large by a Journalist of this time,* and agrees exactly with the copy thereof given in Royston's edition of the King's Works.

"My lords and gentlemen; It is no small comfort to me, that my native country hath so true a sense of my present condition, as I find expressed by your letter of the 8th of this month, and your Declaration, both which I received on Friday last. And the very same reason which makes you discreetly and generously at this time forbear to press any thing to me, hinders me likewise to make any particular professions unto you, lest it may be imagined that desire of liberty should now be the only secretary to my thoughts. Yet thus much I cannot but say, that as, in all human reason, nothing but a free personal Treaty with me can settle the unhappy distractions of these distressed kingdoms; so, if that could once be had, I would not doubt but that, by the grace of God, a happy Peace would soon follow: such force, I believe, true reason has in the hearts of all men, when it may be clearly and calmly heard; and I am not ashamed at all times to profess that it hath, and so shall be always want of understanding, not of will, if I do not yield to reason, whensoever and from whomsoever I hear it; and it were a strange thing, if reason should be less esteemed because it comes from me, which, truly, I do not expect from you; your Declaration seeming to me (and I hope your actions will prove that I am not deceived) to be so well grounded upon honour and justice, that albeit, by way of opinion, I cannot give a placet to every clause in it, yet I am confident upon a calm and friendly debate we shall very well agree.—To conclude: I cannot, for the present, better shew my thankfulness to you for the generous and loyal expressions of your affections to me, than by giving you my honest and sincere advice; which is, really and constantly, without seeking private ends, to pursue the public professions in your Declaration, as sincere Christians and good subjects ought to do; always remembering, that as the best foundation of loyalty is Christianity, so true Christianity teaches perfect loyalty; for without this reciprocation neither is truly what they pretend to be. But I am both confident that needs not to you, as likewise, that you will rightly understand this which is affectionately intended by Your assured Friend, CHARLES R."

Col. Wayte's Account of the taking of the Duke of Hamilton Prisoner.] Aug. 28. Colonel Wayte, a member of the house of commons, and principally concerned in the taking of duke Hamilton, and 3500 horse prisoners with him, at Utoxeter, in Staffordshire, related the Particulars of that whole proceeding; and received the Thanks and Approbation of the house, as did also the lord Grey for their services therein.—So far the Journals: but the particulars of the Colonel's Narrative are thus set down by a Writer of these times.* "Colonel Wayte being the man to whom the Duke surrendered himself, reported to the house of commons that he hung whining so fast upon his shoulders, that he could not get rid of him; beseeching him to accept of him as his prisoner, and to secure him from the fury of the soldiery: that he took his George off his own neck, and gave it up to the colonel, and also his great seal of arms, desiring him to accept of them; but that he restored them to him again: that the colonel urging to him, What an unworthy thing it was in his lordship to invade England, in arms, against the parliament, by whose power and successes he had been rescued out of prison at Pendennis, and returned home into Scotland with freedom; he replied, That he was now invited to come in by a greater party of lords and commons than those of his countrymen who came in before. Upon this col. Wayte was asked, Whether the duke had named any? to which he replied, Mr. Speaker, as for my naming of persons, that may be done more conveniently at another time; for you know that the duke is a politic subtle lord, and, when he begins to consider the danger now attending him, if he be proceeded against with severity he will discover enough to save his own head."—Lord Clarendon† confirms col. Wayte's Narrative, by observing, "That the Duke neither behaved himself like a general, nor with that courage which he was never before thought to want; but made all submissions and all excuses to those who took him." And accordingly we find, in the commons Journals of this day, that some members of that house were authorized and required to examine the duke of Hamilton, and such other persons as they should think fit, touching the information of Invitations, by persons in England, for bringing in an Army of Scots to invade this kingdom. An Ordinance was also directed to be prepared for sequestering the Estates, real and personal, of all such Scots officers or gentlemen, that had been any way engaged on this occasion.

The King's Letter to the Parliament, accepting their Offer of a Treaty.] Aug. 29. The King's Letter, declaring his Acceptance of a Treaty, was read, with a List of the Persons whom his majesty desired might come to him :

For the earl of Manchester, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore, and Wm. Lenthall, Speaker of the House of Commons.

"My lord and Mr. Speaker; I have received your Letter of the 25th of this month, with the Votes that you sent me; which though they are not so full as I could have wished for the perfecting of a Treaty, yet because I conceive by what you have done that I am in some measure fit to begin one, such is my incessant and earnest desire to give a Peace to these my now distracted dominions, as I accept the Treaty; and therefore desire that such 5 lords and 10 commoners as my two houses shall appoint, be speedily sent, fully authorized and instructed to treat with me, not doubting but what is now wanting will, at our meeting, upon debate, be fully supplied, not only to the furtherance of this Treaty, but also to the consummating of a safe and well-grounded Peace. So I rest your good friend, Charles R. Carisbrooke, Aug. 28."

"Here inclosed I have sent you a List that ye have desired. I desire, in order to one of your Votes, that ye will send me a free pass for Parsons, one of the grooms of my presence-chamber, to go into Scotland; and that you would immediately send him to me to receive the dispatch thither."

List of the Persons desired by his Majesty to attend him in the Isle of Wight, above referred to.

Duke of Richmond, marq. of Hertford, earl of Lindsey, and earl of Southampton, gentlemen of my bed-chamber: George Kirke, James Levingstone, Henry Murray, John Ashburnham, and Wm. Legge, grooms of my bed-chamber: Tho. Davis, barber: Hugh Henne, Humphry Rogers, and Wm. Levett, pages of my back-stairs: John Rives, yeoman of my robes: sir Edw. Sydenham, Robert Terwhitt, and John Houston, equeries, with 4 or 6 of my footmen, as they find fittest to wait: Mrs. Wheeler, laundress, with such maids as she will chuse: — Parsons, a groom of my presence: sir Foulke Greville, capt. Titus, capt. Burroughs, Mr. Cresset, — Hanstead, Abraham Dowcett, and — Firebrace, to wait as they did, or as I shall appoint them: bishop of London, (Dr. Juxon) bishop of Salisbury, (Dr. Duppa) Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Hammond, Dr. Holdsworth, Dr. Sanderson, Dr. Turner, and Dr. Heywood, chaplains: sir Tho. Gardiner, sir Orlando Bridgman, sir Robert Holborne, Mr. Jeffrey Palmer, Mr. Tho. Cooke, and Mr. John Vaughan, lawyers: sir Edw. Walker, Mr. Philip Warwick, Nich. Oudart, and Ch. Whittacre, clerks and writers: Peter Newton and Clemens Kenersley, to make ready the house for treating.

Surrender of Colchester.] Aug 31. This day, a Letter was received from lord Fairfax, containing an account of the Surrender of Colchester. Upon which, the lords ordered that Letter be written to the General to return him Thanks for his good service in reducing the town and garrison of Colchester; and to desire him to send the lords Goring and Capel to Windsor-Castle, there to be kept in safe custody, being taken in actual war against the parliament.

Debate in the Commons, on the Instructions for the Commissioners appointed to treat with the King.] September 1. This month begins with a Debate in the house of commons, upon the following Instructions to be sent to their Commissioners appointed to treat personally with the King, in the Isle of Wight.

I. "You shall repair to Newport in the Isle of Wight, where you, or any 8 of you, whereof two lords shall be present, are to treat with his majesty for the space of 40 days, from the beginning of the said Treaty, on the Propositions which were presented to his majesty at Hampton-Court, concerning the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and for taking away of Wards and Liveries, now delivered unto you, and such other Propositions as by both houses of parliament shall be agreed upon. II. You shall receive such Propositions as his majesty shall offer, and forthwith transmit them to both houses of parliament, that you may have further directions from them how to proceed thereupon. III. You shall proceed to treat upon the Propositions for recalling Declarations, &c. the Propositions concerning the Church, the Propositions concerning the Militia, the Propositions concerning Ireland, in the first place, in order, and receive the King's Answer to each of them; and upon the rest in the same order at they are now placed. IV. You shall use your best endeavours that the afore-mentioned Propositions may be agreed unto, without receding from the matter of them. V. You shall deliver your Demands, and receive his majesty's Answer to them, in writing. VI. You shall give frequent advertisement to both houses of your proceedings in this Treaty."

These Instructions being read,

Mr. Boys moved, 'That those Propositions which concerned the interest of the houses might be first insisted on; and that, if the king should refuse to give his positive consent unto them, there might be no further proceeding in the Treaty.' This motion was seconded by

Mr. Prideaux, who, in support thereof gave for reason, 'That if they did not take this course, the king would debate every Proposition, and then suspend his consent to the last.' To which it being answered, 'That it was contrary to the mode of all transactions of state by way of Treaty, to demand a confirmation of any one particular, till an agreement be concluded upon all in general,' the motion made by Mr. Boys was laid aside: but another was started, 'That whereas there were 40 days allowed for the Treaty, the days might be divided; and certain Propositions named to be set apart for such and such a day, proportionable to the number of days and of the Propositions. But this being apprehended to be a design to limit the debates of those particulars which were of greatest concernment, and confine them to a narrow compass of time, thereby to destroy the freedom and fruit of this Treaty, it was so resolutely opposed by all such members as were really inclined to Peace, that this motion also was over-ruled. Hereupon

Mr. Hoyle of York, stood up and said, "Mr. Speaker, I cannot but tremble to think what may be the success of this Treaty, which many gentlemen here are so willing to forward; for my part, I conceive it may be a means to destroy us all, it being utterly unsafe and dangerous for us to make any Peace with this King at all." But it being apprehended that this gentleman's principal reason for opposing a Treaty, was because he then enjoyed an Office in the Exchequer, from which the parliament had removed sir Tho. Fanshaw, which he feared might revert to the former possessor, in case of a Peace; another gentleman thereupon spoke thus: "Mr. Speaker, I, for my part, envy not those gentlemen that enjoy great offices by the favour of the house, being, I thank God, contented with my own estate, and desire nothing of others: but, because we are now upon a Treaty to give satisfaction to the people, and that I find it to be the general opinion abroad, that those members who enjoy great places, are enemies to Peace, and keep the war on foot for their own profit; and because his majesty himself, in that discourse which he had with our Commissioners who carried the first Votes to him for this Treaty, told them, 'He did not fear that Peace would be obstructed by any but such as are gainers by the war;' therefore my humble motion is, That no such gentlemen may be employed as Commissioners in this Treaty." To this it was only replied, "That the house had pitched upon their Commissioners already;" and the Speaker fearing a dangerous scuffle might grow upon this motion, if the debate was not prevented, thought meet to adjourn till the next day.

Sept. 2. Both houses agreed that all the Persons mentioned in the King's List should have leave to attend his majesty, except Mr. John Ashburnham, he standing in the first exception from pardon, Mr. Wm. Legg, Mr. Abraham Dowcett, Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Hammond, and Dr. Holdsworth, as being under restraint. They also read over and approved a List of ordinary Servants to be sent to the king, consisting of two coachmen, two grooms, one farrier, one surveyor of the stables, one purveyor, and one sumpter man of the robes.

The Parliament's Letter to the King, advising him of the appointment of Commissioners. The same day, the parliament resolved to send the following Letter to the King by sir Peter Killigrew:

"May it please your majesty; Your two houses of parliament have commanded us to acquaint your majesty that they have appointed the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Middlesex, and the lord viscount Say and Sele, members of the house of peers; Tho. lord Wenman, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Mr. Wm. Pierpoint, sir Henry Vane, jun. sir Harbottle Grimstone, sir John Potts, Mr. John Crewe, Mr. Samuel Browne, Mr. John Glynne recorder of the city of London, and Mr. John Bulkley, members of the house of commons, to treat with your majesty at Newport in the Isle of Wight; and although they cannot come within the time before appointed, yet they shall give their Attendance with all convenient speed. Your Majesty's &c. Sept. 2."

The Commons resolve to transport the Soldiers taken Prisoners in the Scots Army. Sept. 4. The number of Scots Prisoners, taken at the defeat of the duke of Hamilton, in Lancashire, being more than the country could possibly maintain, a committee of the house of commons had been appointed to consider of some method to dispose of the common Soldiers of that army; and it was proposed to engage with merchants for transporting abroad such of them as appeared not to have been forced men, which the house agreed to; and this day it was resolved, "That the Committee do take care, in the first place, to supply the English Plantations, and then dispose of the rest to Venice; taking special security that none of them be transported to other places, or return to the prejudice of this kingdom; and that the contractors, within 14 days after such contract made, do disburden the kingdom from any charge of maintaining those prisoners."

A Day of Humiliation was ordered to be observed the 12th of this month, to beg God's Blessing on the Treaty.

Ordinance for granting 3000l. to Col. Lilburne. Sept. 5. The Journals of this day take notice of a Division in the commons relative to the famous col. Lilburne. It may be remembered that, in the beginning of last month, the house took his case into consideration, and passed several Votes in his favour: in consequence of which an Ordinance was brought in for raising 3000l. out of the real estate of the late lord-keeper Coventry, towards the reparation and damages the colonel had sustained by two Sentences given against him in the late court of Star-Chamber, the one Feb. 13, 1637, and the other April 18, 1638. The Ordinance being this day read a second time, a motion for its being committed was carried in the negative by 33 against 15; and, instead of passing it, the house ordered that Lands be settled upon col. Lilburne and his heirs, to the value of 3000l. at 12 years purchase, out of the Estates of Delinquents, in the late Insurrections, not yet sequestered. Mr. Rushworth observes only, "That the commons disagreed in the manner of raising this money; but another contemporary* gives a very extraordinary reason for altering the colonel's security. "The lord Coventry's estate, his father having been one of the Star-Chamber Judges, was designed to pay Lilburne's Fine; but sir Henry Vane, sen. having consulted with the earls of Pembroke and Salisbury about this business, and fearing this precedent might in time reach their Estates too, prevailed by their friends so far, that lord Coventry's Estate might be exempted, and some other course taken to raise the money."—This Account seems no wise improbable, because sir Henry Vane and the two earls had frequently sat as Judges in the Star-Chamber Court; though since the meeting of this parliament they joined in the measures against the king.

The King's Answer to the Parliament's Letter concerning the Appointment of Commissioners.] Sept. 8. A Letter from the King to the Speakers of the two houses was read, and ordered to be communicated to the commons:

"My lord and Mr. Speaker: I have received your Letter of the 2nd of this month, containing the Names of those who are to treat with me; and though they do not come at the time appointed, I shall not wonder; at first judging it so short in respect of my two houses, not of myself, that I did not imagine it could be kept, as I then commanded sir Peter Killigrew to tell you by word of mouth: and therefore it shall be far from me to take exceptions for their having elapsed the appointed time; for God forbid that either my two houses or I should carp at circumstances to give the least impediment to this Treaty, much less to hinder the happy finishing of it: I say this the rather, because I know not how it is possible (in this I shall wish to be deceived) that, in 40 days treaty, the many distractions of these kingdoms can be settled; and, if so, it were more than strange that time enough should not be given for the perfecting of this most great and good work; which as I will not believe can be stuck on by my two houses, so I am sure it shall never be by Your good Friend CHARLES R.—P. S. I think fit to tell you, because I believe that in this Treaty there will be need of Civil Lawyers, I have sent for my Advocate Ryves, and Dr. Duck."

A Petition to the Commons against any Treaty with the King, praying that House to declare themselves to be the Supreme Authority of the Nation, &c.] Sept. 11. The following extraordinary Petition was presented to the house of commons: Mr. Henry Marten is said to have been the penman on this occasion.

To the Right Honourable the Commons of England in Parliament assembled: The Humble PETITION of Thousands of well-affected Persons inhabiting the City of London, Westminster, the Borough of Southwark, Hamlets, and Places adjacent, Sheweth, That although we are as earnestly desirous of a safe and well-grounded Peace, and that a final end were put to all the troubles and miseries of the commonwealth, as any sort of men whatsoever; yet considering upon what grounds we engaged on your part in the late and present wars, and how far, by our so doing, we apprehend ourselves concerned, give us leave, before you conclude us by the Treaty in hand, to acquaint you, 1. With the Ground and Reason which induced us to aid you against the King and his Adherents; 2. What our apprehensions are of this Treaty; 3. What we expected from you, and do still most earnestly desire.—Be pleased therefore to understand, that we had not engaged on your part, but that we judged this honourable house to be the Supreme Authority of England, as chosen by, and representing, the people; and intrusted with absolute power for redress of Grievances, and provision for Safety; and that the king was but at the most the chief public officer of this kingdom, and accountable to this house, the representative of the people, from whom all just authority is, or ought to be derived, for discharge of his office: and if we had not been confident hereof, we had not been so desperately mad as to have taken up arms, or to have been aiding and assisting in maintaining a war against him; the laws of the land making it expressly a crime, no less than treason, for any to raise war against the king.—But when we consider the manifold oppressions brought upon the nation by the king, his lords, and bishops; and that this honourable house declared their deep sense thereof: and that, for continuance of that power which had so oppressed us, it was evident the king intended to raise forces, and to make war, and that if he did set up his standard, it tended to the dissolution of the government: upon this, knowing the safety of the people to be above law, and that to judge thereof appertained to the supreme authority, and not to the supreme magistrate, and being satisfied in our consciences, that the public safety and freedom was in imminent danger, we concluded we had not only a just cause to maintain, but the supreme Authority of the Nation to justify, defend, and indemnify us in time to come, in what we should perform by direction thereof, though to the highest.—And as this our understanding was begotten in us by principles of right reason, so were we confirmed therein by your own proceedings; as by your condemning those Judges, who, in the case of Ship-Money, had declared the king to be judge of safety; and by your denying him to have a negative voice in the making of laws; where you wholly exclude the king from having any share in the supreme Authority; then by your casting the Bishops out of the house of lords, who, by tradition also, had been accounted an essential part of the supreme Authority; and by your declaring to the lords, That if they would not join with you in settling the Militia, which they long refused, you would settle it without them; which you could not justly have done, had they had any real share in the supreme Authority.—These things we took for real demonstrations that you undoubtedly knew yourselves to be the supreme Authority; ever weighing down in us all other your indulgent expressions concerning the king or lords; it being indeed impossible for us to believe that it can consist either with the safety or freedom of the nation, to be governed either by two or three supremes; especially where experience hath proved them so apt to differ in their judgments concerning Freedom or Safety, that the one hath been known to punish what the other hath judged worthy of reward; when not only the freedom of the people is directly opposite to the prerogatives of the king and lords, but the open enemies of the one have been declared friends by the other, as the Scots were by the house of lords.—And whereas most of the Oppressions of the Commonwealth have, in all times, been brought upon the people by the king and lords, who nevertheless would be so equal in the supreme Authority, as that there could be no redress of Grievances, no provision for Safety, but at their pleasure: for our parts, we profess ourselves to be so far from judging this to be consistent with freedom or safety, that we know no greater cause wherefore we assisted you in the late wars, but in hopes to be delivered by you from so intolerable, so destructive a bondage, as soon as you should, through God's blessing upon the armies raised by you, be enabled.—But, to our exceeding grief, we have observed that no sooner God vouchsafeth you victory, and blesseth you with success, and thereby enableth you to put us and the whole nation into an absolute condition of Freedom and Safety, but, according as ye have been accustomed, passing by the ruin of the nation, and all the blood that hath been spilt by the king and his party, ye betake yourselves to a Treaty with him; thereby putting him, that is but one single person, and a public officer of the common-wealth, in competition with the whole body of the people, whom ye represent, not considering that it is impossible for you to erect any authority equal to yourselves; and declared to all the world that you will not alter the ancient government from that of king, lords, and commons; not once mentioning, in case of difference, which of them is Supreme, but leaving that point, which was the chiefest cause of all our public differences, disturbances, wars, and miseries, as uncertain as ever.—Insomuch as we, who, upon these Grounds, have laid out ourselves every way to the uttermost of our abilities; and all others throughout the land, soldiers and others, who have done the like in defence of your supreme Authority, and in opposition to the king, cannot but deem ourselves in the most dangerous condition of all others, left without all plea of indemnity for what we have done; as already many have found by loss of their lives and liberties either for things done or said against the king; the law of the land frequently taking place and precedency, against and before your authority, which we esteemed supreme, and against which no law ought to be pleaded. Nor can we possibly conceive how any that have any ways assisted you can be exempt from the guilt of murderers and robbers, by the present laws in force, if you persist to disclaim the supreme Authority; though their own consciences do acquit them, as having opposed none but manifest tyrants, oppressors, and their adherents.—And whereas a Personal Treaty, or any treaty with the king, hath been long time held forth as the only means of a safe and well-grounded Peace; it is well known to have been cried up, principally by such as have been always disaffected unto you; and though you have not contradicted it, yet it is believed that you much fear the issue thereof, as you have cause sufficient, except you see greater alteration in the king and his party than is generally observed; there having never yet been any Treaty with him, but was accompanied with some under-hand dealing; and whilst the present force upon him, though seeming liberty, will in time to come be certainly pleaded against all that shall or can be agreed upon: Nay, what can you confide in, if you consider how he hath been provoked; and what former kings, upon less provocations, have done, after oaths, laws, charters, bonds, excommunications, and all ties of reconciliations, to the destruction of all those that had provoked and opposed them? Yea, when yourselves, so soon as he had signed those Bills in the beginning of this parliament, saw cause to tell him, That even in or about the time of passing those Bills, some design or other was on foot, which if it had taken effect, would not only have rendered those bills fruitless, but have reduced you to a worse condition of confusion than that wherein the parliament found you. And if you consider what new wars, risings, revoltings, invasions, and plottings have been since this last cry for a Personal Treaty, you will not blame us if we wonder at your hasty proceedings thereunto; especially considering the wonderful Victories which God hath blessed your armies withal.—We profess we cannot chuse but stand amazed to consider the inevitable danger we shall be in, though all things in the Propositions were agreed unto; the resolutions of the king and his party have been so perpetually, violently, and implacably prosecuted and manifested against us; and that with such scorn and indignation, that it must be more than such ordinary bonds that must hold them. And it is no less a wonder to us, that you can place your own security therein, or that you can ever imagine to see a free parliament any more in England.—The truth is, and we see we must either now speak it, or for ever be silent, we have long expected things of another nature from you, and such as we are confident would have given satisfaction to all serious people of all parties. As, 1. That you would have made good the supreme Authority of the people in this honourable house from all pretences of negative voices, either in the king or lords, 2. That you would have made Laws for Election of Representatives yearly, and of course, without writ or summons. 3. That you would have set express times for their meeting, continuance, and dissolution, as not to exceed 40 or 50 days at the most; and to have fixed an express time for the ending of this present parliament. 4. That you would have exempted matters of Religion and God's Worship from the compulsive or restrictive power of any authority upon earth, and reserved to the supreme Authority an uncompulsive power only of appointing a way for the public, whereby abundance of misery, persecution, and heart-burning would for ever be avoided. 5. That you would have disclaimed in yourselves, and all future representatives, a power of pressing and forcing any sort of men to serve in wars; there being nothing more opposite to freedom, nor more unreasonable in any authority impowered for raising monies on all occasions, for which, and a just cause, assistants need not be doubted, the other way serving rather to maintain injustice and corrupt parties. 6. That you would have made both kings, queens, princes, dukes, earls, lords, and all persons, alike liable to every law of the land, made or to be made; that so all persons, even the highest, might fear and stand in awe, and neither violate the public peace, nor private right of person or estate, as hath been frequent, without being liable to account as other men. 7. That you would have freed all commoners from the Jurisdiction of the Lords in all cases; and to have taken care that all Trials should be only by 12 sworn men, and no conviction but upon two or more sufficient known witnessess. 8. That you would have freed all men from being examined against themselves, and from being questioned or punished for doing of that against which no law hath been provided. 9. That you would have abbreviated the proceedings in law, mitigated and made certain the charge thereof in all particulars. 10. That you would have freed all Trade and Merchandizing from Monopolizing and Engrossing, by companies or otherwise. 11. That you would have abolished Excise, and all kind of taxes except Subsidies, the old and only just way of England. 12. That you would have laid open all late inclosures of Fens and other Commons, or having inclosed them only or chiefly to the benefit of the poor. 13. That you would have considered the many thousands that are ruined by perpetual Imprisonment for Debt, and provided for their Enlargement. 14. That you would have ordered some effectual course to keep people from begging and beggary, in so fruitful a nation as, through God's blessing, this is. 15. That you would have proportioned Punishments more equal to offences, that so men's lives and estates might not be forfeited upon trivial and slight occasions. 16. That you would have removed the tedious burthen of Tythes, satisfying all impropiators, and providing a more equal way of maintenance for the public Ministers. 17. That you would have raised a stock of money out of those many confiscated Estates you have had, for payment of those who contributed voluntarily above their abilities, before you had provided for those that had disbursed out of their superfluities. 18. That you would have bound yourselves and all future parliaments from abolishing Property, levelling men's Estates, or making all things common. 19. That you would have declared what the duty or business of the Kingly Office is, and what not; and ascertained the Revenue past increase or diminution, that so there might never be more quarrels about the same. 20. That you would have rectified the Election of public Officers of the city of London, and of every particular company therein, restoring the commonalty thereof to their just rights, most unjustly withheld from them, to the producing and maintaining of corrupt interest, opposite to common freedom, and exceedingly prejudicial to the trade and manufactures of this nation. 21. That you would have made full and ample reparations to all persons that had been oppressed by sentences in High Commission, Star-Chamber, and Council-Board, or by any kind of Monopolizers or Projectors; and that out of the Estates of those that were authors, actors, or promoters of so intolerable mischiefs; and that without much attendance or seeking, 22. That you would have abolished all Committees, and have conveyed all businesses into the true method of the usual trials of the commonwealth. 23. That you would not have followed the example of former tyrannous and superstitious parliaments, in making Orders, Ordinances, or Laws, or in appointing punishments concerning opinions or things supernatural, stiling some Blasphemies, others Heresies; when as you know yourselves easily mistaken, and that divine truths need no human helps to support them: such proceedings have been generally invented to divide the people amongst themselves, and to affright men from that liberty of discourse by which corruption and tyranny would be soon discovered. 24. That you would have declared what the business of the Lords is, and ascertain their condition, not derogating from the liberties of other men, that so there might be an end of striving about the same. 25. That you would have done justice upon the capital authors and promoters of the former or late wars, many of them being under your power; considering that mercy to the wicked is cruelty to the innocent, and that all your lenity doth but make them the more insolent and presumptuous. 26. That you would have provided constant Pay for the Army now under the command of the lord-general Fairfax, and given rules to all Judges and all other public officers throughout the land, for their indemnity, and for the saving harmless all that have any ways assisted you, or that have said or done any thing against the king, queen, or any of his party, since the beginning of this parliament; without which any of his party are in a better condition than those that have served you, nothing being more frequent with them than their reviling of you and your friends.—The things and worthy acts which have been done and achieved by this Army and their adherents, (however ingratelously suffered to be scandalized as Sectaries, and men of corrupt judgments) in defence of the just authority of this honourable house, and of the common liberties of the nation, and in opposition to all kind of tyranny and oppression; are so far from meriting an odious Act of Oblivion, that they rather deserve a most honourable act of perpetual remembrance, to be as a pattern of public virtue, fidelity, and resolution to all posterity. 27. That you would have laid to heart all the abundance of innocent blood that hath been spilt, and the infinite spoil and havock that hath been made of peaceable harmless people, by express commissions from the king; and seriously to have considered whether the justice of God be likely to be satisfied, or his yet-continuing wrath appeased by an act of oblivion.—These, and the like, we have long time hoped you would have minded; and have made such an establishment for the general Peace and contentful satisfaction of all sorts of people, as should have been to the happiness of all future generations; and which we most earnestly desire you would set yourselves speedily to effect; whereby the almost dying honour of this most honourable house would be again revived, and the hearts of your petitioners and all other well-affected people be afresh renewed unto you; the freedom of the nation, now in perpetual hazard, would be firmly established; for which you would once more be so strengthened with the love of the people, that you should not need to cast your eyes any other ways, under God, for your security; but if all this availeth nothing, God be our guide, for man sheweth us not a way for our preservation."

The Journals take no notice of any Answer being given to this Petition. Mr. Rushworth and Mr. Whitlocke both agree in saying, "That the house gave the petitioners Thanks for their great pains and care for the public good of the kingdom, and said they would speedily take their Desires into consideration." But this seems to be a mistake, for we find by a contemporary Journalist,* That on the 13th a second Petition was presented to the house from the same persons who presented the former, attended with some inferior officers of the Army, in these words:

To the Right Hon. the COMMONS of England in Parliament assembled: The Humble PETITION of the Presenters of the late large Petition, presented to this Honourable House upon Monday last, being the 11th of September, 1648, "Sheweth; That we judge ourselves, and all who have cordially assisted you in the late or present wars, so much concerned in the matters contained in our said large Petition, as that thereon depend not only the lives, liberties, and estates of all that have adhered unto you, but also the peace, freedom, and prosperity of the commonwealth. And therefore, considering the weight and necessity thereof, in this instant of time, together with our constant faithfulness to the true interest of this honourable house in your greatest extremities, we cannot but grieve that we should now, in any respect, appear so inconsiderable in ourselves, or so immaterial in the Petition, that (having received and read the same) neither it nor we should be thought worthy of the least testimony of your regard to either. The which your unaccustomed bearing towards well-affected petitioners, and the danger we conceive ourselves and the cause we have defended to be in until we know what your sense and resolutions are upon the particulars thereof, hath necessitated this our humble and speedy re-address. Earnestly praying that you will be pleased to reassume the consideration of the whole and every part of the said Petition, before you proceed with the Treaty intended; and that you would favour your petitioners, who have not preferred their lives before your preservation, so far as to let them understand your acceptation and intentions thereupon; that so we may neither become a prey nor yet a by-word to our enemies, for our affection to the common welfare of the nation. And as in duty bound we shall pray, &c."

Our Author proceeds thus: "After the delivering of this Petition, the persons who presented it finding no inclination in the house to give them any Answer, they became so bold as to clamour at the very door against such members as they conceived cross to their designs; and said they resolved to have their large Petition taken into consideration before a Treaty; that they knew no use of a King or Lords any longer; and that such distinctions were the devices of men, God having made all alike; adding further, That many thousands would spend their blood in the maintenance of these principles; and that 40,000 had subscribed the Petition, but they conceived 5000 horse would do more good in it. In the midst of these rodomontadoes, to countenance and encourage them, several of their Fraternity among the members appeared, as Mr. Scot, Mr. Blackiston, Mr. Weever, and particularly Mr. Brian Stapylton, who told a gentleman that was walking with him in the Court of Requests, 'That to his knowledge there were 40,000 hands to the Petition; and that the house must yield to them, or else it might be too hot to hold such as opposed it; and that he wondered what they meant to go on with a Treaty, seeing no safety could be expected in a Peace with this king.' This, and much more, was proclaimed likewise by the petitioners at the door, to give the world to understand, that they intended this Petition as a preamble to the ruin of his majesty and of monarchy."

The Parliament's Commissioners set out for the Isle of Wight.] The commissioners being set out for the Isle of Wight, both houses adjourned de die in diem, without doing much business to our purpose. The King, in the mean time, had sent a Letter to them, desiring a safe Conduct, with blanks, for such persons as the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland should make choice of to attend him, by whom he might be informed of the present state and condition of affairs in that kingdom. This request the commons denied, as being subject to many inconveniences; which the King understanding, he sent another Letter, and, to avoid all dispute, named the persons whom he would have to come to him; who were the lord Carnegy, sir Alex. Gibson, knt. lord clerk register, and sir James Carmichael, knt. treasurer deputy, and their attendants. The houses consented only to the last, the two former having been in arms against the parliament.

Account of some Circumstances which passed between the King and the Parliament's Commissioners previous to the Treaty.] Lord Clarendon gives a very particular Narrative of the Circumstances previous to the Treaty, which as they tend greatly to illustrate the proceedings between the King and the Commissioners, we shall copy in his own words:—"The Commissioners for the Treaty arrived in the Isle of Wight upon the 15th of September, whilst Cromwell yet remained in his Northern progress, and his Army divided into several parts for the finishing his conquest; which was the reason that all they who wished ill to the Treaty, and that it might prove ineffectual, had used and interposed all the delays they could that he might return before it begun; as they who wished it might succeed well, were as solicitous that it might be concluded before that time, which made them the less to insist upon many particulars both in the Propositions and the Instructions, which they hoped might be more capable of remedies in the Treaty than before it.—They staid three days in the Island before the Treaty begun, which was time little enough to prepare the house for the king's reception at Newport, and adjusting many circumstances of the Treaty. In that time they waited several times on the king, with great shew of outward duty and respect; and though none of them durst adventure to see the king in private, they communicated freely with some of those lords and others, who, with the parliament's leave, were come to attend the king during the time of the Treaty: and so they found means to advertise his majesty of many particulars which they thought necessary for him to know, which made different impressions upon him, as the information proceeded from persons better or worse affected to him: and many of those who had liberty to attend, were competent considerers of the truth of what they said.—The truth is, there were amongst the commissioners many who had been carried with the violence of the stream, and would be glad of those concessions which the king would very cheerfully have granted, an Act of Indemnity and Oblivion being what they were principally concerned in. And of all the rest, who were more passionate for the Militia, and against the Church, there was no man, except sir Harry Vane,* who did not desire that a peace might be established by that treaty; for as all the other lords desired, in their own natures and affections, no more than that their transgressions might never more be called to remembrance; so the lord Say himself (who was as proud of his quality, and of being distinguished from other men by his title, as any man alive) well foresaw what would become of his peerage if the Treaty proved ineffectual, and the Army should make their own Model of the government they would submit to, as undoubtedly they resolved shortly to do; and therefore he did all he could to work upon the king to yield to what was proposed to him, and afterwards upon the parliament to be content with what his majesty had yielded. But the advice they all gave, of what inclinations or affections soever they were, was the same, 'That his majesty should forthwith, and without delaying it to the expiration of the term assigned by the parliament for the Treaty, which was 40 days, yield to the full demands which were made in the Propositions.' Their only argument was, 'That if he did not, or not do it quickly, the Army would proceed their own way, and had enough declared that they would depose the king, change the government, and settle a republic by their own rules and invention.' And this advertisement was as well believed by those of the king's own party, as by the commissioners themselves.—Before the Treaty begun the commissioners made it known to the king, 'That they could not admit that any person should be present in the room where the Treaty should be in debate: that they were Commissioners sent from the parliament to treat with his majesty, and with him alone; and that they might not permit any particular and private persons to oppose, or confer with them upon, the demands of the parliament: so that albeit the parliament had given leave to several bishops and other Divines, and to many lawyers of eminency, to wait on his majesty, upon his desire, that they might instruct and inform him in all difficult cases which related to Religion or the Law of the land, they were like to be of little use to him now they were come, if they might not be present at the debate, and offer such advice to his majesty as, upon emergent occasions, he should stand in need of, or require from them. At last they were contented, and his majesty was obliged to be contented too, that they might stand behind a curtain, and hear all that was said; and when any such difficulty occurred as would require consultation, his majesty might retire to his chamber, and call those to him, with whom he would advise, to attend him; and might then return again into the room for the Treaty, and declare his own resolution. This was the unequal and unreasonable preliminary and condition to which the king was compelled to submit before the Treaty could begin.*

* Burnet says, "That Vane, Pierpoint, and some others went to the Treaty on purpose to delay matters till the Army could be brought up to London. All that wished well to the Treaty prayed the King at their first coming to dispatch the business with all possible haste, and to grant, the first day, all that he could bring himself to grant on the last. Hollis and Grimston told me, that they had both on their knees begged this of the king. They said, they knew Vane would study to draw out the Treaty to a great length; and he, who declared for an unbounded liberty of conscience would try to gain on the king's party by the offer of a toleration for the Common Prayer and the Episcopal Clergy. His design in that was to gain time, till Cromwell should settle Scotland and the North." History of His Own Times. vol. 1. p. 44.

Proceedings of the Commissioners treating with the King in the Isle of Wight.] Sept. 20. A Letter from the Commissioners in the Isle of Wight, was read in the house of lords:

"My lord; After we had received your commands and our dispatch for the journey, we were careful to make the best haste we could; and came to Southampton upon Thursday night, where sir Peter Killigrew met us with a Message from the King, that his majesty was glad we were so near arriving, and was so desirous no time should be lost upon the Treaty, that he would be ready and willing to begin it either on Saturday or Monday; but thought Monday would be the fittest day, in regard we might come too late on the Friday, and not be so settled as to begin next day;

* Sir Philip Warwick, after reciting the names of the Parliament's Commissioners, and of those whom they allowed to attend his majesty at the Treaty, of which himself was one, writes thus: "The king's lords and gentlemen only stood about his chair, but were not to speak a word in his assistance, whilst he singly disputed with all the before-mentioned able men upon the several Heads of their Propositions. But if at any time the king found himself in need to ask a question, or that any of his lords thought fit to advise him in his ear to hesitate before he answered, he himself would retire into his own chamber; or one of us penmen, who stood at his chair, prayed him from the lords to do so; but more liberty than this his attendants were not allowed." Memoirs, p. 332.

to which we returned this Answer, which he carried back next morning, That we would speed our passage the next day into the island, and hoped it would be in good time, and then should be ready to attend his majesty, and to go on with the Treaty, either on Saturday or Monday, as he would please to command us: accordingly we passed the next day, but the tide so fell out that it was very late before we got to Newport; when immediately we gave his majesty notice of our arrival, and that we waited his pleasure for our attendance on him. He sent us word, It should be the next day, being Saturday, in the morning, betwixt 9 and 10; at which time we repaired unto him, and my lord of Northumberland acquainted him, that, by Order of both houses of parliament, we were come thither to attend him upon the Treaty, and were ready to attend him and begin it, either that day or Monday; to which he replied, He was very unwilling to lose any time in it, but yet he did not think fit to begin such a business on a piece of a day; therefore desired it might begin upon Monday at 9; which being the time appointed we shall not fail to observe, or any else hereafter which may give a dispatch or furtherance to the service, and to testify our obedience to all your lordships commands. Your, &c. NORTHUMBERLAND, PEMBROKE and MONTGOMERY, SALISBURY, MIDDLESEX, SAY and SELE. Newport, September 16."*

* The following able summary, given by Mr. Hume, of the Proceedings between the King and the Commissioners, may not be unacceptable to the reader: "When the king presented himself to this company, (18th Sept.) a great and sensible alteration was remarked in his aspect, from what it appeared the year before, when he resided at Hampton-court. The moment his servants had been removed, he laid aside all care of his person, and had allowed his beard and hair to grow, and to hang dishevelled and neglected. His hair was become almost entirely grey; either from the decline of years, or from that load of sorrows under which he laboured, and which, though borne with constancy, inwardly preyed upon his sensible and tender mind. His friends beheld with compassion, and perhaps even his enemies, that grey and discrowned head, as he himself terms it, in a copy of verses, which the truth of the sentiment, rather than any elegance of expression, renders very pathetic. Having in vain endeavoured by courage to defend his throne from his armed adversaries, it now behoved him, by reasoning and persuasion, to save some fragments of it from these peaceful, and no less implacable negotiators. The vigour of the king's mind, notwithstanding the seeming decline of his body, here appeared unbroken and undecayed. The parliamentary commissioners would allow none of his counsel to be present, and refused to enter into reasoning with any but himself. He alone, during the transactions of two months,

Sept. 23. The further Proceedings of the Commissioners with the King, were read in the house of lords as follows:

“My lord; We gave your lordship an Account by our last, that, on Monday the 18th inst. the Treaty was to begin, which accordingly was observed; and for the progress made therein we refer to the several Papers herewith sent, amongst which your lordships will perceive that, in pursuance of our Commission and Instructions, we have distinguished the Propositions as they solely concern England and Ireland, for our own use and speedy dispatch of the Treaty; and did, in Answer to his majesty's Paper of the 18th inst. deliver him a Copy thereof; and although we have omitted the joint Declaration of both kingdoms, wherein the kingdom of Scotland is throughout involved, yet whether any part thereof shall be treated on, or of the Propositions for the Treaty be-

was obliged to maintain the argument against fifteen men of the greatest parts and capacity in both houses; and no advantage was ever obtained over him. This was the scene, above all others, in which he was qualified to excel. A quick conception, a cultivated understanding, a chaste elocution, a dignified manner; by these accomplishments he triumphed in all discussions of cool and temperate reasoning. ‘The king is much changed,’ said the earl of Salisbury to sir Philip Warwick: ‘he is extremely improved of late.’ ‘No,’ replied sir Philip, ‘he was always so: but you are now at last sensible of it.’ Sir Henry Vane, discoursing with his fellow-commissioners, drew an argument from the king's uncommon abilities, why the terms of pacification must be rendered more strict and rigid. But Charles's capacity shone not equally in action as in reasoning. The first point, insisted on by the parliamentary commissioners, was the king's recalling all his proclamations and declarations against the parliament, and the acknowledging that they had taken arms in their own defence. He frankly offered the former concession, but long scrupled the latter. The falsehood, as well as indignity, of that acknowledgment, begat in his breast an extreme reluctance against it. The king had, no doubt, in some particulars of moment, invaried, from a seeming necessity, the privileges of his people: but having renounced all claim to these usurped powers, having confessed his errors, and having repaired every breach in the constitution, and even erected new ramparts, in order to secure it; he could no longer, at the commencement of the war, be represented as the aggressor. However it might be pretended, that the former display of his arbitrary inclinations, or rather his monarchical principles, rendered an offensive or preventive war in the parliament prudent and reasonable; it could never, in any propriety of speech, make it be termed a defensive one. But the parliament, sensible that the letter of the law condemned them as rebels and traitors, twixt both kingdoms, wherein, as they now stand, are many particulars which concern time to come, we humbly desire to know the pleasure of both houses, how they would have us proceed therein; conceiving it might be their intention that a Proposition be made to his majesty, that both houses of parliament, and all those that have acted by their authority in reference to these several Treaties betwixt the two kingdoms, may be justified and secured. The King hath given us a Paper in answer to ours, concerning the recalling all Oaths and Declarations, and which is yet under debate, whereof by the next, we shall give you a faithful Account, and rest, &c. Newport Sept. 21.” [Signed as before.]

The COMMISSIONERS First Paper delivered to the King.

“May it please your Majesty: We having now made known unto your majesty our com-

deemed this point absolutely necessary for their future security: and the king, finding that peace could be obtained on no other terms, at last yielded to it. He only entered a protest, which was admitted; that no concession made by him should be valid, unless the whole treaty of pacification were concluded. He agreed, that the parliament should retain, during the term of twenty years, the power over the militia and army, and that of levying what money they pleased for their support. He even yielded to them the right of resuming, at any time afterwards, this authority, whenever they should declare such a resumption necessary for public safety. In effect, the important power of the sword was for ever ravished from him and his successors. He agreed, that all the great offices, during twenty years, should be filled by both houses of parliament. He relinquished to them the entire government of Ireland, and the conduct of the war there. He renounced the power of the wards, and accepted of 100,000*l.* a year in lieu of it. He acknowledged the validity of their great seal, and gave up his own. He abandoned the power of creating peers without consent of parliament. And he agreed, that all the debts contracted, in order to support the war against him, should be paid by the people. So great were the alterations made on the English constitution by this treaty, that the king said, not without reason, that he had been more an enemy to his people by these concessions, could he have prevented them, than by any other action of his life. Of all the demands of the parliament, Charles refused only two. Though he relinquished almost every power of the crown, he would neither give up his friends to punishment, nor desert what he esteemed his religious duty. The severe repentance which he had undergone, for abandoning Strafford, had, no doubt, confirmed him in the resolution never again to be guilty of a like error. His long solitude and severe afflictions had contributed to rivet him the more in those religious principles, which mission, by which we are authorized to treat with you personally upon the Propositions formerly presented at Hampton-Court, as they concern the kingdoms of England and Ireland only, and such other Propositions as are therein mentioned; do crave leave humbly to declare, That we are directed, by our Instructions, to treat upon them with your majesty for the space of 40 days, beginning this present day: And to proceed, in the first place, upon these Propositions following in order, viz. That for recalling and annulling all Oaths, Declarations, Proclamations, and other proceedings against both or either houses of parliament, or against any for adhering unto them; those concerning the Church, the Militia, and Ireland; and then upon the rest in the same order as they are now placed, and to receive your majesty's Answer in writing to each of them, being likewise enjoined to deliver all our Demands, and to receive your majesty's had ever a considerable influence over him. His desire, however, of finishing an accommodation induced him to go as far in both these particulars, as he thought any-wise consistent with his duty. The estates of the royalists being, at that time, almost entirely under sequestration, Charles, who could give them no protection, consented that they should pay such compositions as they and the parliament could agree on; and only begged that they might be made as moderate as possible. He had not the disposal of offices; and it seemed but a small sacrifice to consent, that a certain number of his friends should be rendered incapable of public employments. But when the parliament demanded a bill of attainder and banishment against seven persons, the marquis of Newcastle, lord Digby, lord Biron, sir Marmaduke Langdale, sir Richard Granville, sir Francis Doddington, and Judge Jenkins, the king absolutely refused compliance: their banishment for a limited time he was willing to agree to. Religion was the fatal point about which the differences had arisen; and of all others, it was the least susceptible of composition or moderation between the contending parties. The parliament insisted on the establishment of presbytery, the sale of the chapter lands, the abolition of all forms of prayer, and strict laws against catholics. The king offered to retrench every thing which he did not esteem of apostolical institution: he was willing to abolish archbishops, deans, prebends, canons: he offered that the chapter lands should be let at low leases during 99 years: he consented, that the present church government should continue during three years. After that time, he required not that any thing should be restored to bishops but the power of ordination, and even that power to be exercised by advice of the presbyters. If the parliament, upon the expiration of that period, still insisted on their demand, all other branches of episcopal jurisdiction were abolished, and a new form of church government must, by common consent, Answers, in writing. Wherefore we humbly pray, That nothing may be understood to be binding on either side, but what shall be set down in writing; and accordingly, we are ready to present unto your majesty a Paper concerning that first Proposition for recalling of Declarations. Sept. 18."

The KING's First Paper.

"C. R. Whereas the Commission read, refers to Propositions and Instructions thereupon, his majesty desires to have those Propositions to be delivered unto him, and Copies of the Instructions. Sept. 18."

The COMMISSIONERS Second Paper, concerning the First Proposition.

"We humbly desire of your majesty, to give your royal assent to this Proposition ensuing, 'That whereas both houses of parliament have been necessitated to undertake a war in their just and lawful defence; and the kingdom of England hath entered into a So-be established. The book of common prayer he was willing to renounce, but required the liberty of using some other liturgy in his own chapel: a demand which, though seemingly reasonable, was positively refused by the parliament. In the dispute on these articles, one is not surprised, that two of the parliamentary theologians should tell the king, 'That if he did not consent to the utter abolition of episcopacy, he would be damned.' But it is not without some indignation that we read the following votes of the lords and commons: "The houses, out of their detestation to that abominable idolatry used in the mass, do declare, that they cannot admit of, or consent unto, any such indulgence in any law, as is desired by his majesty, for exempting the queen and her family from the penalties to be enacted against the exercise of the mass." The treaty of marriage, the regard to the queen's sex and high station, even common humanity, all considerations were undervalued, in comparison of their bigoted prejudices. It was evidently the interest, both of king and parliament, to finish their treaty with all expedition; and endeavour by their combined force, to resist, if possible, the usurping fury of the army. It seemed even the interest of the parliament to leave in the king's hand a considerable share of authority, by which he might be enabled to protect them and himself from so dangerous an enemy. But the terms on which they insisted were so rigorous, that the king, fearing no worse from the most implacable enemies, was in no haste to come to a conclusion. And so great was the bigotry on both sides, that they were willing to sacrifice the greatest civil interests, rather than relinquish the most minute of their theological contentions. From these causes, assisted by the artifice of the independents, the treaty was spun out to such a length, that the invasions and insurrections were every where subdued; and the army had leisure to execute their violent and sanguinary purposes."

‘lemu League and Covenant to prosecute the same, an act of parliament may pass, whereby all Oaths, Declarations, and Proclamations, heretofore had, or hereafter to be had, against both or either of the houses of parliament, or against any for adhering unto them, or for doing or executing any office, place, or charge, by any authority derived from them; and all judgments, indictments, outlawries, attainders, and inquisitions in any of the said causes, and all grants thereupon made or had, or to be made or had, be declared null, suppressed, and forbidden: And that this be publickly intimated in all parish churches, and other places needful, within your majesty’s dominions of England and Ireland. Sept. 18.’

The KING’S Second Paper.

“C. R. His majesty declares, That according to your desire, nothing shall be understood to be binding of either side, but what shall be set down in writing: and also further declares, That no Agreement put in writing, concerning any Proposition, or part of a Proposition, be binding, until the conclusion of the whole Treaty, unless that it be otherwise especially agreed. Sept. 18.”

The COMMISSIONERS Third Paper, in Answer to the King’s First.

“Whereas your majesty is pleased in your first Paper, to desire a Copy of the Propositions, and our Instructions thereupon: we humbly answer, That the Propositions themselves were formerly presented unto your majesty at Hampton-Court, and are, as we conceive, still in your own hands; excepting that for the Court of Wards, which hath been delivered unto you here in the Isle of Wight. And as to what concerns our Instructions, we do humbly say, That we have no warrant from the houses of parliament to deliver out any copy of them. Sept. 18.”

The KING’S Third Paper.

“C. R. His majesty conceives the Answer to his Demands, for a Copy of your Propositions, not satisfactory, because you refer him to the Propositions formerly presented to him at Hampton-Court; which he having perused, finds most of those Propositions involve Scotland as well as England and Ireland; and yet your commission expresseth, that you are to treat in reference to England and Ireland only. Therefore he conceives it requisite that, before the Propositions or any of them be treated upon, he may see the Propositions intirely, and all together as they are to be treated on at this time, that thereby he may be the better able to give satisfaction in the following Treaty. Sept. 18.”

The COMMISSIONERS Fourth Paper, in Answer to the latter Part of the King’s Second.

“As to the latter part of the second Paper delivered unto us this 18th instant, we shall acquaint the houses of parliament, that your majesty hath declared, That no Agreement put in writing concerning any Proposition, or part of a Proposition, be binding until the conclusion of the whole Treaty, unless it shall be otherwise especially agreed. Sept. 18.”

The COMMISSIONERS Fifth Paper, tendering a Draught of the Propositions.

“As for your majesty’s demand of seeing the Propositions entirely and all together, as they are to be treated on at this time, before they or any of them be treated upon; we do humbly answer, That we find not ourselves warranted by our Instructions to present unto your majesty our Desires concerning all the Propositions at once, or in any sort to treat upon them, but in order one after another; yet since we have prepared for our own use, and the better expediting of this Treaty, a draught of the Propositions separated from what concerns the kingdom of Scotland, and relating only to the kingdoms of England and Ireland, according to our Commission and Instructions, by which we are authorized for this service; to the end no prejudice may befall it, by reason of any delay, we do herewith tender unto your majesty a copy of the Propositions so distinguished, but with this Declaration of our intention therein, that it is not by way of Treaty, but out of an humble and earnest desire of giving your majesty satisfaction in view of those Propositions now, which are afterwards in their order and several places to be treated on, and upon such Papers as we shall deliver in concerning each of them; we being expressly prohibited by our Instructions to treat upon, or to receive Answer unto, any subsequent Proposition before there be a conclusion of that which went before: in observance whereof, we now humbly desire your majesty’s Answer to our Paper delivered yesterday, concerning the Proposition for recalling all Declarations and other Proceedings against the parliament, or those who have acted by their authority. Sept. 19.”

Sept. 26. A Letter with another packet of Papers from the Commissioners with the King in the Isle of Wight, was read and ordered to be sent to the commons:

“My lord: We herewith present your lordships with the business of last week; and this morning your lordship will, amongst other Papers, receive one wherein his majesty doth declare that nothing that shall be put in writing, concerning any Proposition or part of a Proposition, shall be binding, prejudicial, or in any way made use of, if the Treaty break off upon any other Proposition, or part of a Proposition, unless it shall be otherwise especially agreed. We also formerly sent a Declaration of his majesty’s to the like effect, we humbly desire to know the pleasure of the house thereupon, and shall most carefully and diligently obey their directions. We remain, &c.”

The KING’S Fourth Paper, in Answer to the Commissioners Second Paper.

“C. R. In Answer to your Paper of the 18th concerning the recalling of Oaths, Declarations, &c. his majesty will consent to an act of parliament, whereby all Oaths &c. be declared null, suppressed, and forbidden: and that this be publickly intimated in all parish churches, and other places needful, within his majesty's dominions of England and Ireland. Sept. 19."

The COMMISSIONERS Sixth Paper, insisting on the first Part of their Second Paper of the 18th.

"Having considered of your majesty's Paper of the 19th, to ours of the 18th concerning the recalling Oaths, Declarations, &c. we find that your majesty hath not yet given your Answer to an essential part of the Proposition contained in our Paper, being the ground upon which the said Oaths, Declarations, &c. are desired to be recalled, and expressed in these words, viz. 'Whereas both houses of parliament have been necessitated to undertake a war in their just and lawful defence, and that the kingdom of England hath entered into a solemn League and Covenant to prosecute the same:' we do therefore crave leave to insist upon this part of our former demand, having endeavoured, by this day's debate with your majesty, to shew how necessary a foundation your consent herein will be to a firm and durable Peace, and how great an expectation both houses and the kingdom have thereof; and do humbly pray, That your majesty will please to consent that these words before recited be part of the act of parliament for the recalling of Oaths, Declarations, &c." Sept. 20."

The KING's Fifth Paper.

"C. R. His Majesty desires to know whether you have any power to consent to any Omissions, or Alterations, if, in the matter of "The lord Say, in the debate on this part of the first Proposition, twice repeated with more passion than was natural to his constitution, 'That he did tremble to think how sad the consequence would be, if what the commissioners now pressed should be denied.' And others said, that it was no more than his majesty had heretofore granted in the act of indemnity that he had passed in Scotland; and if he should now refuse to do it in England, there would be a speedy end put to the Treaty, without entering upon any other Propositions. The king was so much perplexed, and offended with this haughty way of reasoning, that he told those with whom he consulted, and writ the same to the Prince his son, 'That the long restraint he had endured in the castle of Carisbrooke, was not a greater evidence of the captivity of his person, nor was he more sensible of it, than this was of the captivity of his mind, by his being forced to decline those Answers and Arguments which were proper to the support of his cause, and which must have brought blushes over the faces of the Commissioners, and to frame others more seasonable and fit to be offered to men in that condition from him who was to receive, and not give conditions.'" Lord Clarendon, v. 5 p. 212.

this or any other debate, he shall give such reasons as shall satisfy you for any such Omission or Alteration." Sept. 20."

The COMMISSIONERS Seventh Paper, in Answer to the KING's Fifth.

"We are ready, by debate, to shew how reasonable our desires are, and that there will be no reason that we should alter or recede from them; but if in the matter of this or any other debate, your majesty give such reasons as shall satisfy us for any Omissions or Alterations in the Papers we present to your majesty, we shall then do therein as we are warranted by our Instructions, which we have not power to make known, as we have declared in a former paper of the 18th. Sept. 20."

The KING's Sixth Paper.

"C. R. Albeit his majesty did shew a different opinion from you the Commissioners in the debate yesterday, yet he believes he made his desire of a thorough and constant Peace very apparent to you; for the end of all his arguments were how that all his subjects might remain, upon the conclusion of this Treaty, not only secure in their lives and estates by law, but also that all causes of future Fears and Jealousies might be taken away from them. And because his majesty finds very great difficulties to settle the minds of all sorts of people, he conceives that you cannot think it strange, though he does not give a very present Answer to this your last Paper of yesterday's date, received this morning; assuring you that he will lose no time in the using his utmost endeavours for the securing of all his subjects, there being nothing more in his thoughts than how to give a speedy as well as an happy conclusion to this Treaty." Sept. 21."

The KING's Seventh Paper.

"C. R. His majesty, by his Paper of the 18th declared, That no Agreement put in writing, concerning any Proposition or part of a Proposition, be binding until the conclusion of the whole Treaty, unless it shall be otherwise especially agreed. His majesty doth now farther declare, That nothing that shall be put in writing, concerning any Proposition or part of a Proposition, shall be binding, prejudicial, or in any manner made use of, if the Treaty break off upon any other Proposition or part of any Proposition, unless it shall be otherwise especially agreed." Sept. 25."

The KING's Eighth Paper.

"C. R. In Answer to the first Proposition given to his majesty on the 18th instant, his majesty doth consent thereto as is desired."

The COMMISSIONERS Eighth Paper.

"Having received two Papers from your majesty, dated the 25th inst.; in the first of which your majesty declares, That nothing that shall be put in writing concerning any Proposition or part of a Proposition, shall be binding, prejudicial, or in any manner made use of, if the Treaty break off upon any other Proposition or part of any Proposition, unless it shall be otherwise especially agreed:

and the second, that in Answer to the First Proposition given to your majesty on the 13th, your majesty doth consent thereto as is desired: we shall transmit these Papers, with the other proceedings passed in writing on the First Proposition, to both houses of parliament, and speedily go on in the Treaty according to our Instructions. Sept. 25."

Debate in the Commons on the King's Desire that no one Proposition be binding, if the Treaty break off upon another.] Sept. 26. The house of commons being called over according to a former Order, and there being a full appearance upon that occasion, the foregoing Papers from the Commissioners in the Isle of Wight were read, and then the house passed the following Vote, without a division, viz. "That nothing that shall be put in writing, concerning any Proposition, or part of a Proposition, shall be binding, prejudicial, or in any manner made use of, if the Treaty break off, upon any other Proposition, or part of a Proposition, unless it shall be otherwise specially agreed." And it was ordered that the lords concurrence be desired herein.—Our Parliamentary Journalist * informs us, "That though this Vote was passed in a full house, the like number not having been present for 12 months before, yet the Independents so ordered matters, that the carrying it up to the lords was retarded," (a circumstance confirmed by the Journals) "in hopes of canvassing it over again in a thin house." And Mr. Whitlocke observes, that several members, after they were called over, left the town the same day, which gives him occasion to pray God to forgive their negligence. This desertion gave such spirits to the Independents, that, on Thursday the 28th of this month,

Mr. Nathaniel Stephens stood up and said, 'Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to offer a word against what was debated here on Tuesday last; I mean the King's Desire, wherein he hath declared, That nothing concluded in part should be binding, unless the whole be agreed on by Treaty: if this should be assented to, it will bring many inconveniences and dangers upon us.'—To which a Member answered, 'He was greatly surprized that any gentleman should presume to break the orders of parliament, so far as to stir in a business concluded by Vote of the house two days before; and therefore desired that gentleman might be silenced, else it might open a gap to every member that pleased, to call in question all the Votes passed since the beginning of this parliament; which course, if it were once admitted, would render all their proceedings vain and frivolous, when a Resolution passed one day might be questioned another.' This Answer having put a stop to Mr. Stephens,

Mr. Lisle stood up to speak in behalf of the motion for revoking the Vote of Tuesday; and though the house cried him down, as they had done Mr. Stephens, for moving irregularly and contrary to the course of parliament, yet the Speaker suffered him to proceed thus: 'I suppose it concerns us now more than ever to look about us: we know that this Personal Treaty, now on foot, had not its rise with our consent, but contrary to the wishes and desires of all the truly Godly and Well-affected in the kingdom, who conceive no use of it was or is intended, but to the destruction of them and us. It is the king's last refuge; so that we had need to be wary how we give consent to any of his Desires, whereby he may easily entrap us. I observe how eager many gentlemen are that the Tuesday's Vote may stand, whereby the King is left at liberty to debate all particulars, and, if he pleases, to conclude nothing except it be upon his own terms. I confess the Vote is passed, and that it is contrary to the custom of parliament to impugn it; but seeing so many inconveniences and mischiefs may follow from thence, I suppose the safety of the commonwealth is to be respected before any nice punctilio of parliamentary proceeding.'—To which it was answered, 'That if any of those gentlemen who had appeared friends to Peace, had made such an extravagant motion as this for recalling a Vote, and questioning the judgment of a full house, they would surely have been called to the bar for it.' Notwithstanding this Mr. Lisle proceeded and said, 'That by the Vote of Tuesday the king had such advantages, as greater could not be given him, which might destroy all the godly party in the kingdom; since if this Vote should stand, he had not yet put the parliament into a capacity to treat any other way but as rebels, and they would still remain no more than such, in case the Treaty did not take effect.' Mr. Pury forgot himself so far, as to affirm that the Vote was but once read in the house; and therefore moved that it might be debated anew, or recalled, and not sent up to the Lords. To this it was answered, 'That his majesty's desire had been thrice read in the house before they debated it; and that it became those gentlemen who had been great gainers by the war, and were bribed against Peace with rich offices and employments, to carry themselves with more modesty, and to acquiesce in the judgment and wisdom of the house.'

Mr. Cornelius Holland urged, 'That the Vote was passed after one o'clock, and so being carried at an unseasonable hour ought to be recalled.' To which it was replied, 'That if the house would recall all other Votes made after one o'clock, as done at an unseasonable hour, then consent should be given to the recalling of this, for that the committee at Derby House was voted at ten at night, and the house surprized into that Vote when they had been tired out with sitting all day and a great part of the night; and then the Speaker making an offer to rise, most of the members departed home, supposing nothing else was to be done:

but he returning to the Chair again, the motion was set on foot, and by that trick immediately carried. Besides, that most of the Votes in behalf of the Army had been passed at unreasonable hours of the night, and in a thin house, whereas this Vote of Tuesday last, was carried when there were an hundred members more in the house than now, and when every man had liberty to speak what he would against it. At length the motion for recalling the Vote of Tuesday was over-ruled, and an Order made for Mr. Wheeler's carrying it up to the lords; which was done immediately, and they gave their concurrence to it.

Transactions between Cromwell and the Scots.] This day several Dispatches from lieut. gen. Cromwell, relating to the transactions between that general and the Scots, were presented to the lords from the Committee at Derby house, together with extracts of two letters from that Committee to him. These their lordships sent down to the commons, with the following Votes: 1. "That they do approve of the actions of lieut. gen. Cromwell in pursuance of the orders he received from the Committee sitting at Derby House; which they likewise approve of. 2. That in case those noblemen and others, that dissented against the invasion of the kingdom of England, by the army under the command of duke Hamilton, shall desire the assistance of lieut. gen. Cromwell, that he be ready to afford them all seasonable relief and assistance."—To both these Votes the commons gave their immediate concurrence, and made the following Orders in consequence thereof. 1. "That the Committee at Derby House do send these Votes to lieut. gen. Cromwell. 2. That a Letter of Thanks be returned to lieut. gen. Cromwell; and that it be referred to the Committee at Derby House, to prepare this letter, to be signed by Mr. Speaker. 3. That the extracts of the letters of the Committee at Derby House to lieut. general Cromwell; and the whole dispatch from him, now reported, with the Votes thereupon, be forthwith printed and published."*

Papers which passed between the Prince of Wales and the Earl of Warwick, concerning the Mutiny in the Fleet.] Sept. 30. The earl of Denbigh reported divers Papers from the Committee at Derby House, which were read as follows. And first,

The LORD-ADMIRAL'S SUMMONS to the revolted Ships.

"Whereas I do observe a Fleet of Ships, part of the Navy Royal of the kingdom of England, to be now riding at anchor off Helvoetsluys, and to bear a standard, having been by their respective mariners carried away, contrary to their duty and the trust reposed in them by the two houses of parliament of that kingdom, who had set them forth for the immediate service thereof; as also other Ships belonging to particular owners, that have been surprised by the said ships, or otherwise adhered to them: I do therefore, by virtue of the said parliament's authority, whereby I am constituted lord high admiral of England, &c. require the admiral, or chief commander of the said fleet, to take down the said standard; as also him, and the captains and mariners belonging to the said ships, to render themselves, and the ships upon which they are respectively borne, to me as lord high admiral of England, for the use of the king and parliament, in order to the settling the Peace of his majesty's dominions: and I do hereby, by virtue of the power derived to me by the said houses of parliament, offer indemnity to such captains, officers, and mariners, belonging to the said ships as shall actually bring in any of the said ships to myself, or such as I shall appoint to receive the same, to the use aforesaid, whereof I expect a speedy Answer. WARWICK. Sept. 19."

The Prince of WALES'S ANSWER to the Lord-Admiral's Summons.

"We have seen a Paper, dated the 19th of Sept. signed by the earl of Warwick, and sent aboard our Fleet now riding at anchor off Helvoetsluys, and under our own immediate command; by which, with strange insolency, and in a manner very disagreeable to a person of honour, whose own condition so absolutely depends upon the preservation of the royal power, he requires our officers to take down the Standard, and to render themselves, and the Ships under their command, to him; who says he is constituted by authority of parliament, lord high admiral of England for the use of the king and parliament; to all which extravagant expressions and demands he will receive the most proper Answer from the disdain and courage of those faithful officers and mariners whom he would corrupt, who have with such eminent affection and loyalty, which we shall always remember, brought our royal father's Fleet to be employed under our command for his service; and who, we are confident, by God's blessing, will preserve and defend the same against any such demand or attempts whatsoever, they very well knowing that it is in the king's sole power to make a lord high admiral of England; and that though this our Fleet be now required to be delivered up to the use of the king and parliament, the king in truth is still in prison, with such circumstances of restraint, as, to say no more, are unusual in the case of the most private man; and whose delivery and freedom all his subjects are obliged to endeavour by the laws of God and man, with the utmost hazard; and that, in that most pious work, or whatever shall contribute thereunto, we have full assurance all the officers and mariners of our Fleet will vigorously perform their part, and in so doing publish to the world how much they abhor those that would seduce them. And for the encouragement of all such who have any impressions left in their consciences, of honesty, or of duty to God and the King; and who, we believe, by fears and threats, are led into this desperate and wicked combination; we do, by the authority granted to us by our royal father, and in his name, who hath the sole power to grant Pardons, and without whose consent no Act of Indemnity can secure any guilty person, offer a gracious Pardon to all those Officers and Mariners who are now aboard any of the ships under the command of the Earl of Warwick, if they shall quit that service, and betake themselves to our protection; where they shall be received into pay, and into a better condition of subsistence than they can be in the employment they now have; and if they shall bring with them any of the ships wherein they now are, or other ships, they shall continue in the same command they now have, and receive such further encouragement and reward, as, besides the satisfaction of their consciences, shall be very advantageous to them; and if that unhappy earl himself, who hath contributed so much to the destruction of that government which himself nor his posterity can ever hope to survive (upon observation of the temper and disposition of those whose commands he now executeth, and from whom we believe, in his first engagement, he did not expect or apprehend such commands) shall now, out of conscience or prudence, desire to join with us in the rescue of our royal father from his unworthy imprisonment, and in the restoring the almost ruined kingdom to peace and happiness, and the English nation to their old glory and renown, we shall, with all princely sincerity and affection, take him into our arms, and concur with him in those good and great ends which can only make the nation happy. CHARLES P. Sept. 22."

After reading these Papers, the earl of Denbigh farther reported, That the revolted Ships Companies had received 6000*l.* and were providing themselves with all necessities for putting to sea, and that the lord-admiral could not prosecute the service of parliament without a present supply of victuals for his Fleet. Hereupon the lords ordered all these papers to be communicated to the commons.

Further Proceedings of the Commissioners treating with the King in the Isle of Wight. Oct. 2. A Letter was received from the Parliament's Commissioners treating with the King in the isle of Wight: which, with the Papers inclosed, were read, in hæc verba:

"Newport, Sept. 29, 1648.

"My lord; By our last, of the 25th inst. we gave your lordships an Account of our Proceedings the last week. Since that time we, upon the same 25th, put in our Paper upon the Propositions concerning the Church, herewith sent you, which the king received; and upon Thursday, being the 28th, the king delivered us a Paper, which afterwards we returned back with the Paper here inclosed; conceiving, upon consultation had with our Commission and Instructions, we had no power to receive it: but the king, after hearing of our Paper, refused to receive it or his own back again, and left them upon the table where we sat to treat; and so we all then departed. On Friday, the 29th, we met his majesty again, who then offered us two other Papers; which being read, we discerned them to relate to the former Paper, which was left upon the table, as is before expressed; therefore conceiving, by our Commission and Instructions, we had no power to receive them, we did refuse to accept them; and afterwards we withdrew and presented his majesty with the Paper inclosed, to desire his Answer to our Propositions delivered in concerning the Church; unto which we, as yet, have received no Answer. Of this we thought it our duty to give your lordships an account, and shall further acquaint your lordships with our proceedings, as there shall be occasion, and remain, Your, &c. Northumberland, Pembroke, and Montgomery, Salisbury, Middlesex, Say and Sele."

The Commissioners Ninth Paper, concerning the Propositions for the Church.

"We humbly desire your majesty to give your royal assent to the Propositions, Bills, and Ordinances ensuing, concerning the Church. First, 'That a Bill be passed for the utter abolishing and taking away of all archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans and sub-deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, canons and prebendaries, and all chaunters, chancellors, treasurers, sub-treasurers, succentors and sacrists, and all vicars choral and choristers, old vicars and new vicars of any cathedral or collegiate church, and all other their under-officers, out of the church of England and dominion of Wales, and out of the church of Ireland. And that the several Ordinances herewith delivered, the one intituled, An Ordinance of parliament for abolishing of Archbishops and Bishops within the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, and for settling their lands and possessions upon trustees for the use of the Common-wealth.' The other intituled, An Ordinance of the lords and commons assembled in parliament, for appointing the Sale of Bishops Lands for the use of the Common-wealth,' be confirmed by act of parliament,—That the Ordinances herewith delivered, concerning the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines be confirmed by act of parliament.—That Reformation of Religion according to the Covenant, be settled by act of parliament within the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales, in such manner as both houses of parliament have agreed to, or shall agree upon, after consultation had with the Assembly of Divines. And particularly, That your majesty will confirm, by act of parliament, the Directory herewith presented for the public worship of God in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales; together with the several Ordinances herewith also delivered, of the 3d of Jan. 1644, and of the 23d of Aug. 1645, concerning the taking away of the Book of Common Prayer, and establishing and putting in execution of the said Directory.—That your majesty will likewise confirm, by act of parliament, the Form of Church-Government herewith presented to be used in the Churches of England and Ireland, and also the Articles of Christian Religion herewith delivered; and the Ordinance herewith presented, for the better Observation of the Lord's Day.—That your majesty will be pleased to swear and sign the Solemn League and Covenant herewith presented; and that acts of parliament be passed for enjoining the taking thereof by all the subjects of the kingdoms of England and Ireland; and that the Ordinances herewith delivered, concerning the manner of taking the same in both the said kingdoms, be confirmed by acts of parliament, with such penalties as shall be agreed upon by both houses.—That your majesty will give your royal assent to the Bill for suppressing Innovations in Churches and Chapels in and about the Worship of God, and for the better Advancement of the preaching of God's Holy Word in all parts of this kingdom; and to the Bill against enjoying Pluralities of Benefice, by spiritual persons and non-residence, which have been formerly delivered to your majesty; and to an act to be framed and agreed upon in both houses of parliament, for the regulating and reforming both universities, and of the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eaton.—And that for the more effectual disabling Jesuits, Priests, Papists and Popish Recusants, from disturbing the State and eluding the laws; and, for the discovering and speedy conviction of Popish Recusants, an Oath be established by act of parliament to be administered to them; wherein they shall abjure and renounce the Pope's Supremacy, the doctrine of transubstantiation, purgatory, worshipping of the consecrated host, crucifixes, images, and all other popish superstitions and errors: and refusing the said Oath, being tendered in such manner as shall be appointed by the said act, to be a sufficient conviction of Popish Recusants.—That your majesty will consent to an act or acts of parliament, for the Education of Children of Papists, by Protestants, in the Protestant religion; and to an act or acts for the true levy of the penalties against them, which penalties to be levied and disposed in such manner as both houses shall agree on, wherein to be provided that your majesty shall have no loss. And to an act or acts, whereby the practices of papists against the state may be prevented, and the laws against them duly executed; and a stricter course taken to prevent the saying or hearing of Mass in the court, or any other part of this kingdom or of the kingdom of Ireland. Sept. 25."

The King's own Propositions for Peace.
The King's Propositions delivered to the Commissioners were as follows:

The King's PROPOSITIONS delivered to the Commissioners on the 28th Sept 1648, which they refused to receive, as inconsistent with their Instructions. *

"Newport, Sept. 28, 1648.

"C. R. His majesty did use many endeavours for a Personal Treaty, which he hoped might have been obtained at Westminster between him and his two houses of parliament immediately; yet they having made choice of this way, by you their Commissioners, his majesty did gladly and chearfully accept thereof in this place, as a fit means to begin a Treaty for Peace, which might put an end to his own sad condition, and the miseries of his kingdoms; for an entrance whereunto, his majesty hath already expressed his consent to the First Proposition. But finding that you are limited by Instructions, which you have no warrant to communicate to him; and having cause, by your Paper of the 20th, to believe that you have no power to omit or alter any thing, though he shall give you such Reasons as may satisfy you so to do, without transmitting the Papers to the two houses at far distance, his majesty's reasons, where expressions, and offers upon debate cannot be fully represented, and from whence your Answers cannot be returned without much waste of the time allotted for the treaty here: and having lately received another Paper concerning the Church, containing in itself several particulars of great importance, and referring to divers Ordinances, Articles of Religion, and other things, 11 or 12 in number, of great length, and some of them very new, and never before presented to his majesty; the due consideration of many whereof will take up much time, and require his majesty's presence with his two houses before a full resolution can well be had in matters of so high a consequence: to the end, therefore, that the good work now in hand may, by God's blessing, proceed more speedily and effectually to a happy conclusion, and that his two houses of parliament may at present have farther security, and an earnest of future satisfaction, his majesty, upon consideration had of yours, makes these Propositions following:—Concerning the Church; his majesty will consent, that the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, be confirmed for 3 years by act of parliament. And will, by act of parliament, confirm for 3 years, the Directory for the public Worship of God in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales. And will likewise confirm for 3 years, by act of parliament, the Form of Church-government, which you have presented to him to be used for the Churches of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales: provided that his majesty and those of his judgment, or any others who cannot in conscience submit thereunto, be not in the mean time obliged to comply with the said government or Form of Worship, but have free practice of their own profession: and that a free consultation and debate be had with the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, (20 of his majesty's nomination being added to them) whereby it may be determined by his majesty and his two houses of parliament, how the said Church Government and Form of public Worship, after the said time, may be settled, or sooner, if differences may be agreed: and how also Reformation and Religion may be settled within the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and the dominion of Wales; and the Articles of Christian Religion now delivered to him, may in like manner be then considered of and determined, and care taken for the ease of tender consciences.—And concerning the Bishops Lands and Revenues, his majesty considering that, during these troublesome times, divers of his subjects have made Contracts and Purchases, and divers others have disbursed great sums of money upon security and engagement of those Lands; his majesty, for your satisfaction, will consent to an act or acts of parliament, whereby legal estates for lives, or for years, at their choice, not exceeding 99 years, shall be made of those Lands, towards the satisfaction of the said purchasers, contractors, and others to whom they are engaged, at the old rents, or some other moderate rents, whereby they may receive satisfaction.—And in case such Leases shall not suffice, his majesty will propound and consent to some other way for their farther satisfaction.—Provided that the property and inheritance of those Lands may still remain and continue to the Church and Churchmen respectively, according to the pious intentions of the donors and founders thereof, and the rents that shall be reserved to be for their maintenance.—His majesty will give his royal assent to an Act for the better Observation of the Lord's Day, for suppressing of Innovations, in churches and chapels, in and about the Worship of God, and for the better advancement of the preaching of God's Holy Word in all parts of this kingdom; and to an act against enjoying Pluralities of Benefices by spiritual persons, and non-residences; and to an Act for regulating and reforming both the Universities, and Colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eaton.—His majesty will consent to an Act for the better discovery and speedy conviction of Popish Recusants, as is desired in the Propositions: And also to an act for the Education of the Children of Papists by Protestants in the Protestant religion: As also to an act for the true levying of the Penalties against Papists, to be levied and disposed in such manner as both houses shall agree on, and as is proposed on his majesty's behalf: As also to an act to prevent the practices of Papists against the state, and for putting the laws in execution, and for a stricter course to prevent hearing or saying of Mass.—But as to the Covenant, his majesty is not yet therein satisfied, that he can either sign or swear it, or consent to impose it on the consciences of others, nor does conceive it proper or useful at this time to be insisted on.—Touching the Militia; his majesty conceives that your Proposition demands a far larger power over the persons and estates of his subjects, than hath ever hitherto been warranted by the laws and statutes of this realm; yet considering the present distractions require more, and trusting in his two houses of parliament, that they will make no farther use of the powers therein mentioned, after the present distempers settled, than shall be agreeable to the legal exercise thereof in times past, or just necessity shall require: his majesty will consent to an act of parliament, that the lords and commons in the parliament of England now assembled, or hereafter to be assembled, or such as they shall appoint during the space of 10 years, shall arm, train, and discipline, or cause to be armed, trained, and disciplined all the forces of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales, the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, already raised both for Sea and Land service; and shall from time to time, during the said space of 10 years, raise, levy, arm, train, discipline, or cause to be raised, levied, armed, trained, and disciplined any other forces for Land and Sea Service in the kingdoms, dominion, and places aforesaid, as, in their judgment, they shall, from time to time, during the said space of 10 years, think fit and appoint; and that neither the king, his heirs or successors, nor any other, but such as shall act by the authority, or approbation of the said lords and commons, shall, during the said space of 10 years, exercise any of the powers aforesaid.—That Monies be raised and levied for the maintenance and use of the said Forces for Land service, and of the Navy and Forces for Sea service, in such sort, and by such ways and means, as the said lords and commons shall from time to time, during the space of 10 years, think fit and appoint, and not otherwise.—And the said lords and commons, or such as they shall appoint, during the said space of 10 years, shall have power, 1. To suppress all Forces raised, or to be raised, without authority and consent of the said lords and commons, to the disturbance of the public peace of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, Dominion of Wales, the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any of them. 2. To suppress any foreign Forces who shall invade, or endeavour to invade, the kingdoms of England and Ireland, dominion of Wales, the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any of them.—And that after the expiration of the said 10 years, neither the king, his heirs or successors, or any person or persons, by colour or pretence of any commission, power, deputation, or authority to be derived from the king, his heirs or successors, or any of them, shall, without the consent of the said lords and commons, raise, arm, train, discipline, employ, order, manage, disband, or dispose, any of the Forces by Sea or Land of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, the dominion of Wales, Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed; nor exercise any of the said powers or authorities herein before-mentioned and expressed to be, during the said space of 10 years, in the said lords and commons; nor do any act or thing concerning the execution of the said powers and authorities, or any of them, without the consent of the said lords and commons first had and obtained. And with a Proviso for saving the ordinary legal power of Officers of Justice, not being military officers, as is set down in your Propositions. And with a Declaration, That if any persons shall be gathered and assembled together in a warlike manner, or otherwise, to the number of 30 persons, and shall not forthwith disperse themselves, being required thereto by the said lords and commons, or command from them, or any by them especially authorized to that purpose; then such person or persons, not so dispersing themselves, shall be guilty, and incur the pains of High Treason; being first declared guilty of such offence by the said lords and commons, any commission under the great seal, or other warrant to the contrary notwithstanding; and he or they, that shall so offend herein, to be incapable of any pardon from his majesty, his heirs or successors.—And likewise that it be provided, That the city of London shall have and enjoy all their rights, liberties, &c. in raising and employing the Forces of that city in such sort as is mentioned in the said Propositions.—With these Propositions following to be inserted in the said act: 1. That none be compelled to serve in the war against their wills, but in case of coming in of strange enemies. 2. And that the powers above-mentioned, as concerning the Land Forces, (other than for keeping up and maintenance of Forts and Garrisons, and for the keeping-up, maintaining, and pay of this present Army, so long as it shall be thought fit by both houses of parliament) be exercised to no other purposes than for suppressing of Forces raised, or to be raised, without authority and consent of the said lords and commons as aforesaid, or for suppressing of any foreign forces which shall invade, or endeavour to invade, the kingdoms, dominion, and places aforesaid. 3. And that the Monies be raised by general equal taxations; saving that Tonnage and Poundage, and such imposts as have been applied to the Navy, may be raised as hath been usual. 4. And that all Patents, Commissions, and other acts concerning the premises, be made and acted in his majesty's name, by warrant signified by the lords and commons, or such others as they shall authorize for that purpose. If it shall be more satisfactory to his two houses to have the Militia, and powers thereupon depending, during the whole time of his majesty's reign, rather than for the space of 10 years, his majesty therein gives them the election.—Touching Ireland; his majesty having in the two preceding Propositions given his consent concerning the Church, and the Militia there, in all things as in England; as to all other matters relating to that kingdom, after advice with his two houses, he will leave it to their determination, and give his consent accordingly as is herein after expressed.—Touching public Debts; his majesty will give his consent to such an act for raising Monies, by general and equal taxations, for the payment and satisfying of the Arrears of the Army, and public Debts and Engagements of the kingdom, as shall be agreed on by both houses of parliament, and shall be audited and ascertained by them, or such persons as they shall appoint, within the space of 12 months after the passing of an act for the same.—His maj. will consent to an act that, during the said space of 10 Years, the lord-chancellor or lord-keeper, commissioners of the great seal or treasury, lord-warden of the cinque ports, chancellor of the Exchequer and duchy, secretaries of state, master of the rolls, judges of both benches, and barons of the exchequer of the kingdom of England, be nominated by both houses of the parliament of England, to continue, quamdiu se bene gesserint; and in the intervals of parliament, by such others as they shall authorize for that purpose.—His majesty will consent that the Militia of the city of London and liberties thereof, during the space of 10 years, may be in the ordering and government of the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons in the common council assembled, or such as they shall from time to time appoint, (whereof the lord mayor and sheriffs for the time being to be three) to be employed and directed from time to time during the said space of 10 years, in such manner as shall be agreed on and appointed by both houses of parliament; and that no citizen of London, nor any forces of the said city, shall be drawn forth or compelled to go out of the said city or liberties thereof, for military service, without their own free consent.—That an act be passed for the granting and confirming the Charters, Customs, Liberties, and Franchises of the city of London, notwithstanding any nonuser, misuser, or abuser; and that, during the said 10 years, the tower of London may be in the government of the city of London; and the chief officer and governor thereof, from time to time, during the said space, be nominated and removable by the common-council, as are desired in your Propositions.—His majesty having thus far expressed his consent for the present satisfaction and security of his two houses of parliament, and those that have adhered unto them, touching your four first Propositions, and other the particulars before specified: as to all the rest of your Propositions delivered to him at Hampton-court, (not referring to those heads) and to that of the Court of Wards since delivered, as also to the remaining Propositions concerning Ireland, his majesty desires only, when he shall come to Westminster, personally to advise with his two houses, and to deliver his opinion and the reasons of it; which being done, he will leave the whole matter of those remaining Propositions to the determination of his two houses, which shall prevail with him for his consent accordingly. And his majesty doth, for his own particular, only propose, That he may have liberty to repair forthwith to Westminster, and be restored to a condition of absolute freedom and safety, (a thing which he shall never deny to any of his subjects) and to the possession of his lands and revenues; and that an Act of Oblivion and Indemnity may pass, to extend to all persons for all matters relating to the late unhappy differences; which being agreed by his two houses of parliament, his majesty will be ready to make these his concessions binding, by giving them the force of laws by his royal assent."

Letter from the King to the Parliament, inclosing his own Propositions, which their Commissioners had refused to accept.] The same day, the following Letter from the King was presented to the house of lords by captain Titus, who by his majesty's command, was ordered to stay for an Answer. Inclosed in this Letter were the King's own Propositions, a Copy whereof we have just given. The Letter was addressed thus:

To the SPEAKER of the House of PEERS pro tempore, to be communicated to the LORDS and COMMONS in the Parliament of England at Westminster. Newport, Sept. 29, 1648.

"C. R. Whereas both our houses of parliament, by their Votes of the 3d of August last, resolved to treat personally with us upon the Propositions presented at Hampton-court, and upon such Propositions as we should offer; and the Commissioners, upon the opening of this Treaty, acquainted us with their commission from both houses, which authorized them accordingly: hereupon we framed this inclosed Proposition, and yesterday delivered the same to your Commissioners here; wherein we have inserted divers Concessions and Agreements, thereby the better to induce our two houses to agree to this our Proposition; but finding the Commissioners of both houses here, upon several debates, alledge that they are restrained, by their Instructions, from transmitting the same to our two houses of parliament; we acquainted them that we would take notice to you of how great a prejudice it was to us, that their instructions were so limited: and therefore we have thought fit to send up to you a transcript of that Proposition, desiring the same may be communicated to our two houses: hoping that the largeness of these concessions will prevail with them to lay hold on this way, which to us seems the most speedy course of settling the distractions of these kingdoms; that so, upon these conditions, we may repair to our two houses at Westminster, where we intend to perform and make good all we have consented unto."

The lords having read this Letter and the King's Propositions, ordered them to be sent to the commons, with a desire that when that house had read them, they would return back the originals; their lordships being unwilling to delay a business of such importance, not having taken copies thereof.

Debate thereupon in the Commons.] After reading these Papers in the house of commons, a warm debate ensued, the Account of which is thus given by a Journalist of these times *:

Mr. Lisle began with urging, 'That if the Treaty were now broken off, it would be the king's own fault, since he had quitted the due course of it; and, instead of debating and passing the Propositions sent him by the parliament, had endeavoured to surprise the houses with devised Propositions of his own; which they did not expect from him, but rather that he should give his assent, or denial, to each, as they lay in order, or as they should be presented unto him by their Commissioners, to whom they had referred the due managing of this Treaty: and therefore, since they had refused to receive the King's Propositions, I suppose, said he, it becomes us likewise to lay them aside; and not only so, but to give further Instructions to our commissioners, that if the king do not proceed with them upon each Proposition, as before, they should declare against any further progress in the Treaty.'—As to the particular about Church-Government,

Mr. Knightley said, 'That if, after the expiration of the 3 years, they should admit of 20 Divines of his majesty's nomination, to join with the Assembly for the further settlement of the Church, it was likely that the episcopal men, instead of advising the settlement of the church, would rather unsettle it by their disputes: and so, perhaps, introduce a new quarrel about it.'—As concerning Bishops Lands,

Mr. Harvey alledged, 'That except episcopacy were pulled up root and branch, so that no hopes were left of ever restoring it within this kingdom, the purchasers and contractors would be left without any assurance of enjoying their purchasers; seeing that clause for the return of those Lands to the church, after so many years, may be made use of in far less time than is there mentioned, to defeat the purchasers; especially if the episcopal party should ever get ground again in the nation: whereas, if the property and inheritance of those Lands be settled by act of parliament upon them and their heirs for ever, then they might be as sure of these as of their other possessions; and it would be such an encouragement to men to lay out their money, that the state might sell them off much the sooner, and at better rates.'—This motion being seconded by alderman Pennington of London, Mr. Blackiston and others, a Member who apprehended this dispute about Bishops and their Lands to be set on foot by the Assembly of Divines, stood up and said, 'Mr. Speaker, I perceive these gentlemen are very exceptious in the matter of Church-Government, and conceive the king doth not offer so fully and fairly touching this particular as he ought to do. Whatsoever their conceit is of his majesty in that respect, I am sure he offers fair in one particular, for repressing the covetousness of our Assembly of Divines, and the well regulating of the Church, by offering to pass an act against pluralities of benefices by spiritual persons, and non-residency. I could wish some would cry him up as much for this, as they cry him down for other things; for it is a shame, and reflects much upon the honour of the house, that we are not more forward in removing of this inconveniency; and more shame is it for the Synod, that they being the men which condemned and cried out against the Pluralities of the Episcopal clergy, should enjoy far more than the corruptest of the bishops and their chaplains did ever allow of; divers of them at this time possessing two, three, yea, and four livings a-piece, which they come not at once in a twelvemonth, besides those which are not visible, wherein they have placed their deputies or journeymen, with whom they share in the profits: and therefore my humble motion is, Mr. Speaker, that our Commissioners be ordered to insist earnestly for his majesty's speedy assent unto an act for the taking away this ingrossing of Benefices.'—Upon this several members calling out for the gentleman to name particulars, and not thus to scandalize the Assembly in general terms, he answered, 'That if the house pleased to command him, he could instance particulars enough, and prove them too;' which put an end to the business. Then,

Sir John Evelyn, of Wilts, desired to speak one word to the conclusion of his majesty's Letter, wherein he desired to come to Westminster in absolute freedom, and be restored to his revenues, promising to leave other matters to the determination of the houses, and pass these concessions into acts; 'I conceive,' said he, 'if we should yield to this, it would extremely discontent our friends on all sides, and give encouragement to malignants and delinquents: the Army and well-affected abroad would think very strangely that the king should be at liberty, and no further security given for their liberties, but only his bare word; which, in case these concessions were satisfactory, as we see they are not, would be the most unreasonable and destructive course to the hopes and expectations of the Godly that can be imagined: and therefore I humbly conceive, that if the king's offers were so large as we desire, yet in no case ought we to yield that he should come hither till they are all passed into acts.'

Sir Henry Mildmay closed the debate with moving the house to declare against the Propositions from the King without delay.—And accordingly we find by the Commons Journals, that the house resolved, That they approved of the conduct of their Commissioners in refusing to receive the King's Propositions, and declared the unsatisfactoriness thereof. They also ordered the Thanks of the house to be returned them, and a Letter to be prepared accordingly by sir John Evelyn and Mr. Knightley, to be signed by their Speaker. This being sent up to the lords, they gave their concurrence, and it was sent away to the Commissioners, signed by the Speakers of both houses.

Oct. 7. A Letter from lieut. general Cromwell was read in the house of commons, giving an Account of his Proceedings in Scotland, and of the Surrender of Berwick and Carlisle to the English. Upon which that house passed a Vote in approbation of general Cromwell's proceedings, and ordered a gratuity of 100*l.* to the messenger that brought the news. Both these Resolutions they sent up to the lords for their concurrence, which was given as desired.

Petitions for Justice upon Delinquents, before a Treaty be concluded with the King. Oct. 10. Three remarkable Petitions were presented to the house of commons, all of them relating to the Treaty now on foot between the king and parliament. The first of them, brought in by Mr. Holland, was intitled 'The humble Petition of the Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, Common-Council-men, and others well-affected, of the town of Newcastle upon Tyne,' in which the petitioners desired "That the house would be pleased, before the Treaty be ended, to execute impartial and speedy Justice upon the greatest offenders and incendiaries of the kingdom, the fomentors of, and actors in, the first and second war; till when, they could not expect any blessing upon this Treaty; and that in so doing the houses could not want the assistance of God or man."

The second Petition was presented by Alderman Hoyle of York, in the name of 'the Gentlemen, Ministers, Freeholders, and other inhabitants of the county and city of York, well affected to the safety of the kingdom, and the honour of the parliament,' in which they expressed their admiration at the dissipating the desperate attempts of the parliament's subtle and malicious enemies, and defeating the numerous forces raised this summer; which design had been long in hatching before it broke forth; and complaining, "That notwithstanding all the advantages and opportunities which God hath put into the parliament's hands, by defeating all the enemies of the kingdom, yet that none of these had been improved as they ought, by executing of Justice upon Offenders, especially upon such as had polluted the land with blood; his majesty having confessed himself and his party to be guilty thereof: The petitioners therefore humbly desired, That there might not be a forfeiture made of all the great experiencies of God's mercies in destroying those treacherous and implacable enemies; but that, according to the Declaration of parliament, their Protestation and Solemn Covenant, exemplary Justice might be executed upon those offenders, without partiality or delay; and that their Estates might go towards discharging the Arrears of the soldiery and other public debts, that God might be thereby glorified, and the land cleansed from blood."

The third Petition was brought in by serjeant Wylde, (lately returned from the Western circuit, where he had acted as Judge of Assize) in the name of 'the Grand Jury of the county of Somerset.' This last ran in a much higher strain than the other two; for these petitioners declared absolutely against the Treaty itself; affirming it to be "the last refuge of the king and his party, for the ruin of God's people: that it was first set on foot by them, and none but they expected to receive any benefit by it; that though all the Propositions should be signed by the king, yet they looked for little security from thence; for that when he should be restored, the adverse party would soon find means to recover their ends, and enslave all that had engaged for the liberties of the people: they therefore demanded that Justice be executed upon all Delinquents from the highest to the lowest without exception."

Debate in the Commons thereupon.] These Petitions being read, a Member stood up and spoke to this effect; 'Mr. Speaker, I suppose we ought not to trifle away our time, and dishonour ourselves, by debating these Petitions; for it is now grown to a custom for all sorts of people to intermeddle in affairs of state, and vent their own sense and humours under the notion of a Petition. It cannot but reflect upon the honour of the house to give countenance to such courses as these, and for us to suffer ourselves to be acted and set on work by persons without doors, and to have our proceedings directed and take their rise from such extravagancies as are uttered by pragmatistical petitioners at every turn, whose duty it is rather to acquiesce in the judgment and wisdom of the house.'—This Speech gave great offence to the whole Independent party, and particularly to Mr. Gourdon, Mr. Venn, Mr. Harvey, Mr. Hoyle, and others, who had appeared in favour of the Petitions. These argued, 'That the blood of the people being shed, it would be required somewhere; and that if the house did not do justice, now it was in their power, upon their capital enemies, from the highest to the lowest, who had a hand in the former or latter wars, there was no question but all the blood would be required at their hands; and therefore, to remove the guilt of it from themselves, they desired a committee might be appointed to consider of a certain number of persons to be selected out of the old and new Delinquents, and propounded to the house to be excepted from mercy, and proceeded against as capital offenders.'—To this motion it was objected, 'That of the 38 persons formerly excepted out of mercy, in the Propositions then sent to the king, it had since been the settled resolution of the house, in these last Propositions, to proceed capitally only against 7; and now to pitch upon a greater number of Delinquents than those presented heretofore, would argue, that they neither regarded the public faith of parliament, nor had a mind to any settlement at all, if the Treaty were to be disturbed by adding new Propositions to those already presented to his majesty as a fit foundation whereon to build a safe and well-grounded Peace; which no man would conceive to be really intended, if the Treaty should be sprinkled with blood.' It was also observed, 'That the late Insurrections in Kent and Essex, and of the earl of Holland, and the holding out of Colchester and divers other places in the kingdom, were acted before the parliament sent their commissioners to treat with the king: and therefore, if they had intended to proceed capitally against any of the persons engaged in those designs, they should have sent the exception of them along with the Propositions; but that it was now too late to make new exceptions, which would be contradicting the Resolutions of the house laid down in the Propositions already sent.'—In answer to this,

Mr. Weaver alledged, 'That the house was bound by the Covenant to bring all Delinquents to punishment. To which it was replied, 'That it was true the Covenant did bind them to bring all Delinquents to punishment; but it was not meant that the punishment should extend, upon all, to blood; but that, at the discretion of the house, it might be pecuniary. Moreover, that when God did punish any nation with a war, and brought doubtful cases to the trial of the sword, he did not expect the magistrate should take an account of the blood so shed, but reserved the account of it to his own secret judgment: and therefore when Joab killed Abner, the complaint against Joab was not, that he had shed the blood of war, but that he had shed the blood of war in time of peace: whereas if the magistrate should take notice of blood shed in war, then the wives and children of all men that had been slain in this war, might have appeals of murder against those who killed them.'—Hereupon

Mr. Serjeant Wylde stood up and said, 'He denied that doctrine, which taught that the civil magistrate could not take notice of the blood shed in war: that such an assertion was destructive to the very being of the parliament, in regard men might rebel as often as they would, and then if they did but get into the field, they were out of danger of being called to account.'

Mr. Dennis Bond said, 'We have had, Mr. Speaker, many doctrines preached here by several gentlemen against the power of this house; such as, that we cannot try my lord of Norwich, but by his peers, because it is against Magna Charta; but I trust ere long to see the day when we may have power to hang the greatest lord of them all, if he deserves it, without trial by his peers; and I doubt not but we shall have honest resolute judges to do it, notwithstanding Magna Charta.'

Colonel White said, 'There was a quicker way to rid their hands of all delinquents; and that was by martial law: and therefore he moved, 'That an Ordinance might be passed to try them all that way; that so the people might be no longer deluded in their expectation of justice.'—Hereupon another Member, finding so earnest a demand for justice, stood up and said, 'Mr. Speaker, I conceive gentlemen mistake the meaning of these Petitions in demanding Justice upon all Delinquents; for I suppose the people look for no other justice, but that all members, and officers intrusted, should be brought to give up their accounts for all public monies received, and sequestered Estates and the like; which kind of justice would, in my apprehension, please the people far better than the shedding of blood.'

Sir John Evelyn, of Wilts, finding the petitioners thus warmly opposed by some gentlemen, and ridiculed by others, moved, in order to bring them off with the better grace, 'That, to prevent giving any further offence, these Petitions might be laid aside till they saw the event of the Treaty: which if it took no effect, then the house might resume the consideration of them, or not, at their discretion.' And so this matter dropped. Nevertheless, the commons ordered their Thanks to be given to Serjeant Wylde, (who brought in the last of these Petitions) for his great and good service done to the parliament, in the late circuit he rode as one of the Justices of Assize.—In that circuit the Serjeant had directed the grand jury, at Winchester, to put an Ignoramus upon a Bill of Indictment preferred against major Rolph for intending to murder the King.

Further Proceedings of the Commissioners treating with the King in the Isle of Wight.

Oct. 11. The house of lords received a Letter from their Commissioners, with several Papers inclosed, amongst which were the following:

The KING'S First ANSWER to the Proposition for the CHURCH.

"Newport, Sept. 30, 1648.

"C. R. In Answer to your Paper of the 25th Sept. wherein you desire his majesty's royal assent to the Propositions, Bills, and Ordinances therein mentioned concerning the Church: His majesty will consent that the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster be confirmed for 3 years by act of parliament: and will, by act of parliament, confirm for 3 years the Directory for the public Worship of God in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales: and will likewise confirm for 3 years, by act of parliament, the Form of Church Government which you have presented to him, to be used in the churches of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales. Provided that his majesty, and those of his judgment, or any others who cannot in conscience submit thereunto, be not in the mean time obliged to comply with the said government or form of worship, but have free practice of their own profession; and that a free consultation and debate be had with the Assembly of Divines at Westminster in the mean time, (twenty of his majesty's nomination being added unto them) whereby it may be determined by his majesty and his two houses of parliament, how the said Church Government, and Form of public Worship, after the said time, may be settled, or sooner, if differences may be agreed; and how also Reformation of Religion may be settled within the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales; and the Articles of Christian Religion now delivered unto him, may, in like manner, be then considered of and determined, and care taken for the ease of tender consciences.—And concerning the Bishops Lands and Revenues; his majesty considering that, during these troublesome times, divers of his subjects have made Contracts and Purchases, and divers others have disbursed great sums of money upon security and engagement of those Lands; his majesty for their satisfaction will consent to an act or acts of parliament, whereby legal estates for lives, or for years, at their choice, not exceeding 99 years, shall be made of those Lands, towards the satisfaction of the said purchasers, contractors, and others to whom they are engaged, at the old rents, or some other moderate rents, whereby they may receive satisfaction.—And in case such Leases shall not suffice, his majesty will propound and consent to some other way for their farther satisfaction. Provided that the property and inheritance of those Lands may still remain and continue to the Church and Churchmen respectively, according to the pious intentions of the donors and founders thereof, and the rents that shall be reserved be for their maintenance. His majesty will give his royal assent to an act for the better Observation of the Lord's Day, for suppressing of Innovations in Churches and Chapels in and about the Worship of God, and for the better advancement of the preaching of God's Holy Word in all parts of this kingdom; and to an act against enjoying Pluralities of Benefices by spiritual persons and non-residency; and to an act for regulating and reforming both the Universities, and the Colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eaton. His majesty will consent to an act for the better discovery and speedy conviction of Popish Recusants, as is desired in the Propositions: and also to an act for the Education of the Children of Papists, by protestants, in the Protestant religion: and also to an act for the true levying of the Penalties against Papists, to be levied and disposed in such manner as both houses shall agree on, and as is proposed on his majesty's behalf: and also to an act to prevent the practices of Papists against the state, and for putting the Laws in execution, and for a stricter course to prevent hearing or saying of Mass. But as to the Covenant, his majesty is not yet therein satisfied, that he can either sign or swear it, or consent to impose it on the consciences of others; nor does con-

The KING'S Second ANSWER concerning the CHURCH: "Newport, Oct. 9, 1648.

"C. R. For a farther and final Answer to you, as to your second Proposition, concerning the Church, and to your Paper of the 30th Sept. wherein you alledge there are many Omissions, Alterations, and some Denials of several particulars in his majesty's former Answer, his Majesty saith as followeth: 1. As to the Exceptions, 'That his majesty said nothing to the consenting to the bill for the utter abolishing of Archbishops, Bishops, &c. nor that the Ordinance for abolishing them be confirmed by Act of Parliament:' his majesty saith, That in his former Answer he did consent to confirm for three years, by act of parliament, the Form of Church Government, and Directory for Worship, which you presented to him; and thereby hath established the actual possession and public exercise of those Forms, and hath suspended the present government and form of Worship established by law; but desired a consultation with Divines in the mean time, for a future Settlement, as in the Paper is expressed; yet finding by your said Paper, of the 30th Sept. that not to be satisfactory, his majesty, with all clearness, will acquaint you what was his aim therein.—His majesty therefore declares, That the reason why he did not answer to that part of your Proposition in terms as it is proposed, was, because he was not satisfied in his conscience he can consent to the utter abolishing of Episcopacy, the substance whereof he conceives to consist in the power of Ordination and Jurisdiction as they were exercised by the Apostles themselves, and others by authority derived from them, superior to Presbyters and Deacons in the primitive times. But because he acknowledgeth that Bishops were to have counsel and assistance of Presbyters in Ordination and Jurisdiction, and the last were and are limitable by the civil power, his majesty desired the consultation with the Divines,* to

* "The Commissioners, who would not suffer any of the King's servants to be so much as present when any thing of the Treaty was agitated, thought fit now to let loose their own Clergy upon the King; who was much better versed in the argument than they were. They inveighed vehemently against Lords Bishops, their pride and lustre; and they all behaved themselves with that rudeness, as if they meant to be no longer subject to a King, no more than to a Bishop. And two of them very plainly and fiercely told the King, 'that if he did not consent to the utter abolishing of Episcopacy, he would be damned:' with which his majesty was not moved. The men, Jenkins and Spurstow, lived after the return of King Charles II. and, according to the modesty of that race of people, came to kiss his majesty's hand, and continued the same zeal in all seditious attempts." Lord Clarendon, vol. v. p. 216.

the end that he and his two houses might determine in what manner Ordination and Jurisdiction might be moderated and regulated for the future government of the Church; his majesty's resolution being to comply with his two houses for the Alteration and regulating of this present Hierarchy and Government, so as Episcopacy, reduced to the primitive usage, may be settled and continued in this Church: and therefore his majesty heartily desires their concurrence in the one, that he may with the more freedom give his assent to the other; and, if his two houses shall so advise, his majesty will consent to lessen the extent and multiply the number of Dioceses. And in other particulars of like nature, which upon farther consideration may arise, and cannot now be particularly declared or foreseen, his majesty will evidence his only care is for the orderly Government of the Church, and the edifying of his people. 2. As to the Exceptions, 'That his majesty hath not expressed his consent for settling the Bishops Lands upon trustees, for the use of the commonwealth, and for the appointing the sale of their Lands to the same use:' it is true that he hath not to alienate the inheritance of those Lands; and herein he believes he hath the concurrent opinions of many Divines, that in other points differ much among themselves; but his former Answer containing a large offer of satisfaction to all those that have purchased or disbursed money upon those Lands, he hopes that Answer, to which he now refers, will be satisfactory to his two houses. 3. As to that part of the Proposition, for the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines, his majesty saith, That he will, by act of parliament, confirm the calling and sitting of the said Assembly from the first of July 1643, and that they shall have such powers as are mentioned in the said Ordinance, and that they shall continue their meeting and sitting, and be dissolved in such manner as both houses of parliament shall direct. 4. His majesty will confirm the public use of the Directory in all churches and chapels, as is desired in the Proposition, and will consent to the repeal of so much of all the statutes as only concern the Book of Common Prayer; and also to the taking the same away out of all churches and chapels, provided that the use thereof may be continued in his majesty's chapel, for himself and his household; and will likewise consent that the Form of Church-Government, presented to him, be confirmed by act of parliament for 3 years; provided only, that a consultation, in the mean time, be had with the Assembly of Divines, in such manner and for the purposes as are in his former Answer expressed.—Touching the Articles of Religion; his majesty professeth he hath not had time, since they were delivered unto him, to look into them with that deliberation as is requisite, before he bind up himself and his subjects in matters of Faith and Doctrine; and therefore desires that part of your Proposition may be respited by his houses. 5. And

whereas you desire to know, 'Whether his majesty by saying, in his Paper of the 30th Sept. That he will give his royal assent to an act for the better Observation of the Lord's Day, intends the confirming of the Ordinance presented unto him.' His majesty thereunto answers, That the bill for suppressing Innovations, to which you desire his consent, which he is willing to give, contains in it full provision for the due Observation of the Lord's Day : and if that be not thought sufficient, his majesty will consent to pass an act to confirm the matter of the Ordinance, for so much as concerns the Observation of that day. But as for the Ordinance itself, and the other Ordinances before-mentioned, which have been long since drawn, his majesty hopes they will not be insisted on to be confirmed in terminis as they are penned, because that there are divers necessary Alterations to be made in most of them, in respect of some things happened since their first framing; and expressions therein that reflect on former established laws, and other matters not necessary to the Alteration desired. But if new acts be drawn according to his consent herein expressed, he will confirm them. 6. His majesty conceived he had given a full Answer to your Desire, 'That there might be a stricter course taken to prevent the saying or hearing of Mass in the court or in any other part of this kingdom, or the kingdom of Ireland.' It is well known of what profession his royal consort is, and what provision was made by the two crowns in the Articles of Marriage, for her exercise thereof. But whatever particulars shall be proposed to him for restraining it in the places aforesaid, and limiting it to her majesty and her own family, (wherein are but very few English, and not many French, of her profession) his majesty never did, nor will deny his consent thereunto. 7. Concerning the Covenant, and the Ordinances concerning the same; his majesty's Answer being, That he was not yet satisfied to take it, or impose it on others; he conceives his two houses will not insist upon it at this time; and the rather because the ends thereof will be obtained by this Agreement, if happily concluded: which God grant."

The KING'S ANSWER to the Proposition concerning the MILITIA.

"C. R. In Answer to your Paper delivered in this day concerning the Militia; his majesty conceives that your Proposition touching the Militia demands a far larger power over the persons and estates of his subjects than hath ever hitherto been warranted by the laws and statutes of this realm; yet, considering the present distractions require more, and trusting in his two houses of parliament, that they will make no further use of the powers therein mentioned after the present distempers are settled, than shall be agreeable to the legal exercise thereof in times past, and for the purposes particularly mentioned in your Proposition; and to give satisfaction to his two houses, that he intends a full security; and to express his real desire to settle the Peace of the kingdom, his majesty doth consent to this Proposition, touching the Militia, as is desired. Oct. 9."

This Answer the commissioners refusing to receive, his majesty the same day sent the following:

"C. R. In Answer to your Proposition concerning the Militia, delivered in this day, his majesty doth thereunto consent, as is desired. Oct. 9."

The King's Answer concerning the Church, voted unsatisfactory.] The lords deferred the consideration of these Papers to the 13th: but in the commons, immediately after their being read, Mr. Edward Ashe stood up and said, "He could have informed them as much as all this amounted to out of the king's former offers; and therefore moved that they might not be troubled with a second reading." And accordingly, the King's Answer was laid aside without even the compliment of a debate, and the commons came to the following resolutions thereupon. "1. That this Answer of the king to the Proposition concerning the Church is not satisfactory. 2. That after the Commissioners shall have concluded upon the Proposition that this shall find them in, they then do press the king for a full Answer to the Proposition presented by them to him, concerning the Church: and that they do proceed in the Treaty, upon the rest of the Propositions, according to their former Instructions."—These Resolutions being sent up to the lords, they gave their concurrence to them.

Oct. 13. A Letter from the Commissioners in the Isle of Wight, with the Papers concerning the Proposition touching Ireland, were read:

The PROPOSITION concerning Ireland.

"Newport, Oct. 9, 1648.

"We humbly desire your majesty to give your royal assent to the Proposition ensuing, concerning Ireland: That an act of parliament be passed, to declare and make void the cessation of Ireland, and all treaties and conclusions of peace, or any articles thereupon with the rebels, without consent of both houses of parliament; and to settle the prosecution of the war of Ireland in both houses of parliament of England, to be managed by them; and your majesty to assist, and to do no act to discountenance or molest them therein.—That the deputy, or chief governor, or other governors of Ireland, and the presidents of the several provinces of that kingdom, be nominated by both houses of the parliament of England, or, in the intervals of parliament, by such committees of both houses of parliament, as both houses of the parliament of England shall nominate and appoint for that purpose: and that the chancellor or lord keeper, lord treasurer, commissioners of the great seal or treasury, chancellor of the exchequer, secretaries of state, master of the rolls, judges of both benches, and barons of the exchequer, vice treasurer, and treasurers at war of the kingdom of Ireland, be nominated and appointed by both houses of the parliament of England, to continue quamdiu se benegesserint; and, in the intervals of parliament, by the forementioned committees, to be approved or disallowed by both houses at their next sitting. And that all Grants of offices, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, made or passed under the great seal of Ireland, unto any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, since the cessation made in Ireland the 15th Sept. 1643, shall be null and void; and that all honours and titles conferred upon any person or persons in the said kingdom of Ireland, since the said cessation, shall also be null and void."

"C.R. For a final Answer to your Proposition of the 9th Oct. concerning Ireland, his majesty doth give his consent thereunto as is desired; the time for nominating of the deputy and other officers being limited for twenty years from the first of July 1648. Oct. 11."

A Charge ordered against Mr. Dowcet for falsely accusing Major Rolph.] Oct. 13. The reader may remember a Charge preferred against Major Rolph, by Mr. Osborne, in June last, for intending to murder the King in Carisbrooke Castle; in consequence whereof the house of lords committed the major to the Gatehouse, and an Indictment was soon after preferred against him at Winchester; which not being found by the grand jury there, the commons voted him a sum of 150*l.* as a recompence for false imprisonment, and committed Mr. Osborne, and Mr. Dowcet a witness, in support of the Charge against the major, to the custody of the serjeant at arms. Mr. Osborne found means to make his escape, but Mr. Dowcet having continued two months in confinement, he, this day, petitioned the lords to be admitted to bail; this they granted; and sent a Message, recommending it to the commons to do the same. Immediately after the reading this Petition, serjeant Wylde stood up and said, "Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the draught of a Charge against this Dowcet, which, in my opinion, the house ought rather to take notice of than this Petition; for I can attest that major Rolph was sufficiently cleared upon his trial at Winchester, where I sat upon the bench; and I am sure many others in the house that were present there, can witness the same: and therefore I conceive the slanderous accusation against him having reflected exceedingly upon the honour of this house, upon the faithful colonel Hammond, and the whole Army, we can do no less than bring the scandalizers to some exemplary punishment: but Osborne being gone, and Dowcet in hold, I desire that this Charge may be preferred against him, and he brought to a speedy trial."—In consequence of this motion the commons rejected Mr. Dowcet's Petition, and ordered serjeant Wylde and Mr. Lisle to bring in a Charge against him on the 18th.

Supplies ordered for the Fleet under the Earl of Warwick.] Oct. 14. A Letter from the earl of Warwick, (dated Oct. 2, on board the St. George riding before Goree) to the Committee at Derby House, was read in the house of commons, setting forth, 'That several Dutch men of war continued to ride betwixt him and the revolted Ships, then in Helvoetsluys; and that having called a council of war to advise of the best means to reduce those ships to the parliament's obedience, the result thereof was to continue the Fleet in Goree road; that he hoped the houses would approve of his proceedings therein, and send a speedy Supply of money and provisions for the Fleet.' Upon reading this Letter Mr. Ashe said, 'It is true indeed the Holland men of war lie now betwixt the lord admiral and the Prince's Fleet, but if it had pleased him, he might have done his work before the Hollanders interposed, had the revolted ships been set upon at his first coming into that road; therefore, Mr. Speaker, you may send money and provisions; but, for my part, I believe you will never hear of any better service.'—However, this attack upon the lord admiral was carried no farther; for the house voted their approbation of his conduct; ordered money and provisions for his Fleet; and the sequestrations of delinquents in North Wales were appropriated to that purpose.

Oct. 17. This day various Letters and Papers came from the Commissioners, concerning the Treaty; amongst which were copies of the King's consent to the Proposition concerning Payment of Public Debts and Damages, and to that for making void all Honours conferred since May 21, 1642.

The Commons, at the Request of the Speaker, resolve to adjourn for 6 Days; but revoke that Resolution, by desire of the Lords.] Oct. 17. In the Commons Journals of this day, we find the first thing done was to resolve, 'That at the rising of the house they would adjourn to the next Monday; and that the lords be acquainted with that resolution. Those authorities do not assign any reason for so long an adjournment: but a Contemporary Writer,* whose account of the Debates of these times coincides very minutely with the Votes and Resolutions of the house as recorded in their Journals, informs us, "That this was a project of the Independent Party to delay the Treaty, in which the Speaker himself was to be the prime actor; and that in order thereto, presently after he had taken the chair, and the house being yet very thin, he stood up and said, 'Gentlemen, I have certain Infirmities growing upon me, for prevention whereof I desire to have some time for the taking of physic; and therefore make it my earnest desire that you would be pleased to adjourn the house till Monday next.' Most of the members then present being in the secret, there was a general cry for an adjournment: but they were stopt

a little in their career by others; who, considering that Mr. Speaker had not been much troubled with melancholy since general Cromwell comforted him by a Letter about his Victory over the Scots, pleaded, 'That Mr. Speaker, God be blessed, looked very well and healthy of late; and they hoped his maladies were not more pressing than the affairs of the public; urging, withal, How great an inconvenience an adjournment must needs be, in this instant of a Treaty, whereof all transactions were to be reported continually to the house; so that their not sitting for a week might be extremely prejudicial to the speedy progress of the Treaty, and be a means to defeat the hopes and expectations of the whole kingdom, if matters were not concluded in the 40 days allotted: and therefore they begged of Mr. Speaker to dispense a little with his own occasions, rather than bring so great a hazard upon the Treaty.' Notwithstanding which it was carried for an adjournment, and ordered that a Message be sent to the lords to desire them to adjourn to the same time.—The lords were greatly surprized at this Message, but apprehending the design, instead of giving their concurrence to this adjournment, sent to desire a present conference with the commons about it. By this time that house began to fill, and the motion for a present conference was agreed to. Soon after Mr. Swynfen reported, 'That the lords look upon the Treaty with the King to be a matter of the highest concernment to the kingdom; that their sitting at this time was absolutely necessary for the assistance of their Commissioners, by returning the sense of the houses upon such matters as should be communicated to them from the Isle of Wight; that so long an adjournment must obstruct the progress of the Treaty; and therefore they desired the commons would forbear to adjourn.' Upon this a Member stood up and objected, 'That the lords did not give this Answer of themselves, but had others to put it into their mouths.' He said further, 'Mr. Speaker, this Answer of the lords is brain of our brain, for they have plowed with our heifer; some among ourselves having instructed them what to say, and how to behave themselves touching this adjournment.' He was seconded by sir Tho. Wroth, who said, 'Mr. Speaker, I conceive we have power of adjourning our own house, without asking leave of the lords; and therefore I think we should do well to take this occasion to vindicate our own authority, as not depending upon the lords, and stand to this morning's Vote for an adjournment till Monday.'—To this a Member answered, 'I must confess, Mr. Speaker, the house hath voted this day to adjourn, and that it is contrary to the course of parliament for any member to move for the recalling of a Vote; yet I am not without a precedent for it, and that a very late one too; for, Mr. Speaker, you may remember that when the house had resolved, according to the King's desire by Letter, that nothing concluded in part should be binding, unless the whole were agreed upon by Treaty; yet, within two days after this Vote was passed, you gave leave to Mr. Nath. Stephens, Mr. Lisle, and others, (though they were cried down) to impugn it; and therefore I desire to take the same liberty to move, That this Resolution for adjourning may be recalled, it reflecting very much, in my conceit, upon the honour of the house, both in the manner of obtaining this Vote, it being passed in a thin house, before we were well come together; and also in the nature of it, which must needs disturb the Treaty, and bring a scandal upon us in the opinion of the people, as if we desired no good success of it, when we thus endeavour to hinder its progress.'—To this it was replied, 'That they had no intent, in adjourning, to hinder the progress of the Treaty, but only to satisfy the desire of Mr. Speaker, who had occasion to take physic; and God forbid but the house should yield to his request upon so necessary an occasion.'—The Speaker, now finding the whole blame of this adjournment like to fall upon himself, determined to make a handsome retreat; and thereupon stood up and said, 'That, perceiving there were many jealousies raised about his desire of adjourning the house only for his health's sake, rather than give offence he was content to run the hazard of his life, and spend it in the service of the public.'—Hereupon, it was agreed, That the Resolution of adjournment passed in the morning, be revoked.

Account of General Cromwell's Reception at Edinburgh.] About the beginning of this month the house of commons received a Letter from lieut. general Cromwell, dated Berwick, Oct. 2, signifying, inter alia, That having some things to desire of the Committee of Estates of Scotland, he intended to set out that day for Edinburgh. This he did accordingly in great pomp, attended by the lord Elchoe, Lodowick Lesley, the late governor of Berwick, and 3 regiments of horse of his own army. About 3 miles before he reached that city he was met by the earl of Leven, the lord Kirkcudbright, and major-general Holborne, who conducted him to the earl of Murray's house in the Canongate, which was provided for his reception, where he had a guard of soldiers placed at the gate night and day. He arrived there on the 4th, upon notice whereof the lord-chancellor Loudon, the marquis of Argyle, the earl of Leven, the earl of Cassils, lord Burley, lord Warriston, and many other persons of quality, came to compliment him.

A Paper presented by him to the Committee of Estates.] The next day a deputation being sent to him from the Committee of Estates, to know what he had to communicate, he delivered to them the following Paper:

"Right Honourable; I shall be ever ready to bear witness of your lordships forwardness to do right to the kingdom of England, in re-

toring the Garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle ; and having received so good a pledge of your resolutions to maintain amity and good understanding between the kingdoms of England, and Scotland, it makes me not to doubt but that your lordships will further grant what in justice and reason may be demanded.—I can assure your lordships that the kingdom of England did foresee that wicked design of the Malignants in Scotland, to break all Engagements of faith and honesty between the nations, and to take from the kingdom of England the towns of Berwick and Carlisle ; and although they could have prevented the loss of those considerable towns, without breach of the Treaty, by laying forces close unto them ; yet such was the tenderness of the parliament of England not to give the least suspicion of a breach with the kingdom of Scotland, that they did forbear to do any thing therein. It is not unknown to your lordships when the Malignants had gotten the power and possessed themselves of these towns, how they protected and employed our English Malignants, though demanded by our parliament ; and with what violence and unheard-of cruelties they raised an Army, began a war, and invaded the kingdom of England ; and endeavoured, to the utmost of their power, to engage both kingdoms in a perpetual quarrel ; and what blood they have spilt in our kingdom, and what great loss and prejudice was brought upon our nation, even to the endangering the total ruin thereof : and although God did, by a most mighty and strong hand, and that in a wonderful manner, destroy their designs, yet it is clearly apparent that the same ill-affected spirit still remains ; and that there are divers persons of great quality and power, who were either the contrivers, actors, or abettors of the late unjust war made upon the kingdom of England ; who now, in Scotland, undoubtedly do wait for all advantages and opportunities to raise dissention and division between the nations.—Now, forasmuch as I am commanded to prosecute the remaining part of the Army that invaded the kingdom of England, wheresoever it should go, to prevent the like miseries ; and considering that divers of that army are retired into Scotland, and that some of the heads of those Malignants are raising new forces in Scotland to carry on the same design, and that they will certainly be ready to do the like upon all occasions of advantage : and forasmuch as the kingdom of England hath lately received so great damage by the falling of the kingdom of Scotland, in not suppressing malignants and incendiaries as they ought to have done ; and by suffering such persons to be put into places of trust in the kingdom, who, by their interest in the parliament and countries, brought the kingdom of Scotland, so far as they could, by an unjust engagement, to invade and make war upon their brethren of England : my lords, I hold myself obliged, in prosecution of my duty and Instructions, to demand that your lordships will give assurance, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, that you will not admit or suffer any who have been active in, or consenting to, the said Engagement against England, or have lately been in arms, at Stirling or elsewhere, in the maintenance of that Engagement, to be employed in any public place or trust whatsoever ; that thereby they may be disabled from renewing or reinforcing their former Engagement. And this is the least security I can demand.—My lords, I have received an Order from both houses of the parl. of England, which I hold fit to communicate to your lordships, whereby you will understand the readiness of the kingdom of England to assist you who were dissenters from the invasion : and I doubt not but your lordships will be as ready to give such further satisfaction, as they in their wisdoms shall find cause to desire. O. CROMWELL. Oct. 5."

Their Answer.] To this Paper the same deputation brought back the following Answer :

For the Hon. Lieut. General Cromwell.

" Sir ; Having considered your Letter, of the 5th instant, we return you this Answer ; That as we did dissent from, and protest against, the taking of the towns of Berwick and Carlisle, and likewise against the late Engagement against England ; and as we did rise in arms against the contrivers and abettors of that Engagement, and have been forward in using our best endeavours for restoring your garrisons ; so, before the receipt of yours, we had passed some Acts upon the 22d of Sept. last, and the 4th of this month ; and had resolved to put forth a Declaration to the kingdom, which we do likewise communicate unto you, by which you will perceive that it hath been our earnest care, and real endeavour, to do the same things which you demand in your Letter.—In the large Treaty betwixt the kingdoms, anno 1641, we did desire that honest men of known integrity and ability might be employed in the places of greatest trust and power within this kingdom ; and sad experience hath taught us that no bonds nor ties between the kingdoms, even the strictest of covenants or treaties, can restrain men of corrupt minds and judgments ; but that, whenever they find an opportunity, they will be ready to pursue their own ends and designs, to the hazard of the peace, and breaking the union between the kingdoms.—In 1643, when some members of both houses, assembled at Oxford, had voted both kingdoms traitors, we did desire from the honourable houses, and it was granted, and mutually agreed upon in the Propositions of both kingdoms, presented to the king's majesty at Oxford, That the members of either house of parliament who had not only deserted the parliament, but also voted both kingdoms, traitors, should be removed from his majesty's councils, and be restrained from coming within the verge of the court ; and that they should not, without the advice and consent of both kingdoms, bear any office, or have any employment, concerning the state or commonwealth; and we cannot deny but your demand of assurance from this kingdom is reasonable, that those who have been active in, or consenting to, the late unlawful engagement against England, be not employed in any public place or trust whatsoever; wherefore we do accept of this your desire as a real testimony of your respect to this kingdom, and of your intentions to preserve the union betwixt the kingdoms: and we do hereby engage ourselves, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, to employ our utmost endeavours that none who have been active in, or consenting to, the said Engagement against England, or have lately been in arms, at Stirling or elsewhere, in maintenance or pursuance of that Engagement, be employed in any public place or trust whatsoever without the advice and consent of the kingdom of England; that thereby they may be disabled from renewing or reinforcing their former Engagement, or infringing the union and peace between the kingdoms. And as the kingdom of England is now careful to have this assurance from this kingdom, so we do not doubt but the honourable houses of parliament, according to their offers of assistance at this time, will be ready to assist us upon all other occasions hereafter, to make good this our undertaking.—And if it shall please God to bless these covenanted kingdoms with a settled Peace, we trust that, in any Agreement that shall be made with his majesty, the kingdom of England will be careful that this may be regarded as a necessary condition of peace; and to the end any peace, which shall be agreed upon, may be the more durable, we do also earnestly desire that those who shall be employed in public place or trust in England, may be such as love to preserve union and amity betwixt the nations.—We do hold ourselves very much obliged to the honourable houses of parliament for their kind offers of assistance, expressed in their Votes of the 28th of Sept. last; and shall communicate counsels with you concerning the same, that their affording assistance to this kingdom may be so ordered as may be most useful to us, and least prejudicial to the affairs of England: and you may rest very well assured, that we shall always be ready to give satisfaction to the honourable houses, in every thing which may conduce to the strengthening of the union, and settling the Peace of these distracted kingdoms; and to give real evidence that we are Your affectionate Friends and Servants. Signed in the name, and by the warrant of, the Committee of Estates, by LOUDON, Canc. Oct. 6."

During Cromwell's stay at Edinburgh, several commissioners from the Kirk, the lord provost, the magistrates, and principal citizens, came to visit him. By order of the committee of Estates, the charges of him and all his attendants were defrayed by the city; they were also entertained by the marquis of Argyle and the earl of Leven, at a sumptuous banquet at the castle: and, at their going away, they were saluted by the castle guns and volleys of small arms. Several lords also convoyed them out of the city, on their way back to Carlisle.

Letter from lord Fairfax, concerning the State of his Army.] This day, a Letter from the lord Fairfax, dated St. Alban's, Oct. 16, was read in the house of commons, setting forth the present State of the Army, and that many Petitions were in agitation amongst the Soldiery, to be presented to him; reciting the great hardships they had suffered this summer in defeating the parliament's enemies, and that though they were informed that the assessments for the support of the Army were generally well paid, yet they had received very little; and therefore desiring that the Army might be divided among the several counties proportionable to the share of taxes they stand respectively charged with, and that speedy care be taken for payment of their Arrears. Hereupon, the commons ordered, That all Arrears of Assessments for the Army be brought in by the 1st of Nov. next.

Petition from General Ireton's Regiment, for Justice upon the King and his Adherents.] Among the several Petitions presented at this time to the lord Fairfax, that from commissary-general Ireton's regiment, supposed to be of his own penning, was the most remarkable: they complained "That Justice hath not been executed upon the prime abettors of the late war; and therefore suspect there is a party in the parliament abetting and corresponding with, if not guilty of the same designs: that the King is guilty of all the blood shed; and for this they urged his own confession, as they called it, in his late agreeing to the Preamble of the Houses' first Proposition; and that there is yet a prevalent party of his own creatures, who, in parliament and elsewhere, act his designs, and endeavour to reinthrone him; and are, as they conceive, the authors of the present distractions: that by the aforesaid party, free Quarter is continued upon the people."—After these Complaints, they proceed with divers Desires unto his excellency, the performance whereof they require him to endeavour: 1. "That Justice may be executed speedily upon the contrivers and encouragers of the late war. 2. That Justice may be done impartially upon all criminal persons, especially upon such as have or shall endeavour to obstruct the course thereof; or have betrayed their trust or been authors of shedding that innocent blood, which calls to heaven for vengeance. 3. That the same fault may have the same punishment in the person of a king or lord, as in the person of the poorest commoner. 4. That all such may be proceeded against as Traitors, who act or speak in the king's behalf, till he shall be acquitted of the guilt of innocent blood. 5. That the Army may speedily have their Pay, or a present course be taken against those who withhold it. 6. That their Arrears being paid, and free Quarter for ever avoided, the money may return from the soldier to the country—man again." And, lastly, they close up their Desires with a Declaration, "That they shall constantly endeavour to defend magistracy and property, with their lives and fortunes*."

Further Proceedings of the Commissioners treating with the King in the Isle of Wight.

Oct. 19. The Treaty still going on, further accounts of the Proceedings of it, from the Commissioners, were this day read: amongst which were the following.

The KING'S FINAL ANSWER to the PROPOSITION concerning Delinquents.

"C. R. For a final Answer to you as to your Proposition concerning Delinquents, &c. his majesty will consent, That all persons who have had any hand in the plotting, designing, or assisting the Rebellion in Ireland, shall expect no pardon, as is expressed in the first branch of this Proposition. As to all the rest of the said Proposition, his majesty cannot consent thereunto as it is proposed, otherwise than as is hereafter expressed viz. As for all other persons comprised in the said first Branch, his majesty, for satisfaction of his two houses, will give way that they may moderately compound for their estates; and desires they may be admitted to the same. And for removing distrusts and interruptions of the public Settlement, his majesty will consent as followeth: That such of them as the houses of parliament will insist on, shall not be admitted to his councils, and be restrained from coming to the court at such distance as the two houses of parliament shall think fit; and shall not have any office or employment in the state or commonwealth, without the consent of both houses, or shall absent themselves out of the kingdom for some time, if both houses shall think fit. That all other persons, comprised in this Proposition, shall submit to moderate composition; and, for the space of 3 years, shall not sit or serve as members or assistants in either house, without consent of both houses of parliament. Oct. 17."

The KING'S PROPOSITIONS delivered in to the Commissioners, together with the precedent Answer, the 17th Oct. 1648.

I "That his majesty may be settled in a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, and have the faith of his two houses for the same.

II. That his majesty may be restored to the possession of his Lands and Revenues. III. That he may have Compensation for those revenues and profits which his majesty, for the satisfaction of his two houses in this Treaty, hath or shall consent to part withal. IV. That an Act of Oblivion and Indemnity may be passed, to extend to all persons for all matters, with such limitations and provisions as shall be agreed between his majesty and his two houses."

Motion for a Jewel of 800l. value, to be presented to General Cromwell. The Lords

put off the consideration of these Papers for two days. But the same day, upon their being read in the commons, a motion was made for taking them into immediate consideration, hereupon, sir Henry Mildmay stood up and said, 'There were other matters of far more concernment to be considered; as the necessity and merits of the Soldiery, but especially of lieut. general Cromwell, whose eminent and unparalleled services the house had not yet so far taken notice of, as to make him any return of special acknowledgment for them; and therefore he moved, That the house would order the making of a Jewel of 800l. price, to be sent to him, to remain as a testimony of their gratitude for his famous achievements.' To this unexpected motion it was answered, 'That though the lieut. general's merits were great, yet the Soldiers necessities were much greater; especially the poor Reformadoes, who had formerly done great services, and were many of them ready to starve; therefore it was desired, if the state was in a condition to part with money, the Reformadoes might not be forgotten, but that the house would be pleased either to debate the King's Answer and Proposition, or proceed upon the Ordinance for the relief of those reduced Officers. Hereupon it was carried for the latter, and the business of the Jewel was laid aside. But the house resolved that neither Sundays, nor public Fast Days, should be reckoned in the number of the 40 days allotted for the Treaty.

Oct. 20. A Letter was read in the commons from lieut. general Cromwell at Carlisle, date the 14th, advising that the Scots had delivered up that city and the citadel thereof, into his hands for the use of the parliament: Hereupon the house ordered a gratuity of 100l. to capt. Wolfe for bringing the News.

Both Houses resolve to except Sundays and Fast Days out of the Time allotted for the Treaty. After this they took into consideration the Papers last sent from the Commissioners in the Isle of Wight; when a motion was made for a further addition to the 40 days allotted for the Treaty, in regard so much time had been spent in tedious, though necessary, debates and transactions. This was warmly opposed by the Independents; who said, 'That on Thursday last the house had yielded that the Lord's Days and Fast Days should not be reckoned into the number, whereby the Treaty was now lengthened a week longer than was expected; and if that would not suffice, they desired the Vote which granted it, might be recalled.' This was further urged by Mr. Weaver, who said, 'He saw no reason but it might be recalled, as well as the Tuesday's Vote for an adjournment; because, said he, the king need not spend much more time about our Propositions, having as good as told us twice, what we should expect from him, in Propositions of his own. Besides, the time of the Treaty being limited, the house should not, but upon weighty considerations, continue it longer.' To this it was replied, 'That the time was not so limited, but the house might continue it at pleasure; and for this there could be no consideration more weighty than that the Peace of the kingdom depended thereupon, which could not be settled in so small a time after so great a rupture. Besides, the not reckoning of Sundays and Fast Days, was no more than what was allowed of at the Treaty of Uxbridge.'—So, with much ado, the Vote of the day before, for not reckoning of Fast Days and Sundays, stood unrepealed; and col. Harvey was ordered to carry it up to the lords for their concurrence, which they gave accordingly. This Vote was afterwards sent in a Letter, signed by the two Speakers, to the Commissioners, who were ordered to communicate it to the King.

Debate on the Proposition concerning Delinquents.] Next, the commons debated his majesty's Answer to the Proposition concerning Delinquents, against which the Independents urged, That these Delinquents had occasioned a world of bloodshed, which would be required somewhere; and so, of necessity upon the house, if they did not remove it by execution of justice; and therefore they moved, That 7 of those engaged in the first war, and 7 more in the last, meaning the Invasion under duke Hamilton, should be made examples. And then they fell to naming particular persons, as judge Jenkins, bishop Wren, the earl of Holland, lord Goring, and duke Hamilton; and would have proceeded with more, but that they were interrupted by a Member, who desired them to call to mind, 'That at first they voted 37 to be excepted from Pardon; but since that time it had been, and then was, the resolution of the house, to proceed only against 7 of the old Delinquents; and if they meant to have added 7 more of the new, they ought to have done it before they sent their Propositions, the last insurrections being on foot long before the 18th Sept. which was the time when the Propositions went to his majesty; that now it was too late to make any new Exceptions, and dishonourable for the house so to do, they having concluded themselves in the Propositions already sent.'—Then the question being put, That the Persons expressed and contained in that part of the first Branch of the Proposition concerning Delinquents, to which the king has not declared his consent, be proceeded with, and their estates disposed of, as both houses shall think fit or appoint; and that their Persons shall not be capable of Pardon by his majesty, without consent of both houses; the house declaring that they will not proceed as to the taking away the life of any of them to above the number of 7 persons, it passed in the affirmative, by 98 voices against 63.

The Lords agree to the King's last Propositions.] Oct. 21. The lords adjourned themselves into a committee, to take into consideration the Papers, presented to them on the 19th, concerning the Treaty; and the house being resumed, the King's Propositions were read particularly: after which it was resolved, "That his majesty be settled in a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, and have the faith of the two houses for the same: that he be restored to the possession of his Lands and Revenues: that his majesty have Compensation for the revenues and profits which, for the satisfaction of his two houses in this Treaty, he hath or shall consent to part withal: that an Act of Indemnity may be passed, to extend to all persons for all matters; with such Limitations and Provisions as shall be agreed between his majesty and his two houses: but, lastly, the lords declared, That these Votes were not to be binding, if the Treaty should break off before a conclusion."

Oct. 24. The Speaker of the house of lords acquainted them, that yesterday sir Peter Kiligrew brought a Packet from the Commissioners for the Treaty with the King in the Isle of Wight, containing, among others, the following Papers:

The King's further and final ANSWER concerning the CHURCH:

Newport, Oct. 21. 1648.

"C. R. His majesty conceives that his former Answers to your Propositions concerning the Church, would have given more satisfaction to his two houses than is expressed in your Papers of the 16th and 17th instant, as containing in them (if considered in their full extent) Concessions of the most material things desired; and therefore, as well for a Declaration of his clear intentions by those former Answers, as for a farther and final Answer to the said Propositions and Paper of the 17th, his majesty saith as followeth: That albeit, for the Reasons expressed in his former Paper, he cannot consent to a Bill and the Ordinance for abolishing Bishops; yet, for the satisfaction of his two houses, and settling the public Peace, he will consent to a bill for the taking away of all Archbishops, Chancellors, and Commissaries, Deans and Sub-Deans, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, Canons, and Prebendaries; and all Chanters, Chancellors, Treasurers, Sub-Treasurers, Succentors, and Sacrists; and all Vicars-Choral, and Choristers, Old Vicars and New Vicars of any Cathedral or Collegiate Church; and all other their Under-Officers, out of the Church of England and dominion of Wales, and out of the Church of Ireland. And farther, his majesty will consent to suspend the exercise of all Episcopal Government for the space of 3 years; and hath consented and will consent to confirm the form of Church Government, now presented to him for the said 3 years and that no other shall be used during that time: In which time, his majesty continueth his desire That a Consultation may be had with the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, (20 of his own nomination being added) to the end that his majesty and his two houses may within those 3 years inform themselves of the Practice of the Primitive Church in point of Episcopacy; and may accordingly agree in limiting the Bishops to the counsel and assistance of Presbyters, and in the exercise of their jurisdiction, and increasing their number if it be thought fit.—And his majesty will consent that in case no Settlement shall be agreed on within the said 3 years, then after the said time, the power of Ordination shall not be exercised by the Bishops without the counsel and assistance of Presbyters; and that no other Episcopal Jurisdiction shall be exercised by Bishops but such, and in such manner, as shall be agreed on by his majesty and his two houses of parliament; and his majesty doth profess, that if in that time he be convinced that the function of Bishops is not agreeable to the Word of God, or that Christ commanded any other government, he will most chearfully embrace that, and take away Episcopacy; but until he be so convinced, he believes himself bound in conscience to uphold that function, as is above expressed.—For the Ordinances for settling the Bishops Lands upon Trustees, and for the Sale of those Lands, although his majesty upon conscientious scruples, (wherein he hath the concurrent opinion of the Divines as well as of the Reformed as other Churches) hath not consented thereunto; yet he hath offered satisfaction to all such as have purchased any of those lands or disbursed money upon that security, by legal estates for lives or years, not exceeding 99 years, reserving only the property and inheritance of those Lands to the Church and Churchmen, at the old rent, or other moderate rent, for their maintenance; and if that those leases shall not suffice, his majesty would propound and consent to some other way for their farther satisfaction: and therefore other satisfaction for those Debts and Engagements (which were the motives for the Sale of those Lands) being proposed, and his majesty having therein condescended as far as possibly he can, he desires his two houses would comply with his majesty in those particulars.—His majesty hath offered, by act of parliament, to confirm the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines, as largely in the matter desired as the Ordinance itself proposed for that purpose. He hath likewise offered to confirm the public use of the Directory in all churches and chapels, as desired in your Proposition; and to consent to the repeal of so much of all statutes as concern the Book of Common Prayer, and to take the same away out of all churches and chapels, except his majesty's chapel, where he intends the use thereof may be continued for himself and his household, until another public Form of Prayer should be agreed on by his majesty and his two houses.—His majesty hath likewise consented to the Bill for suppressing of Innovations, wherein there is full provision for the due Observation of the Lord's Day; and offered (if that were not sufficient) to consent to the matter of the Ordinance for the observation thereof as fully as is desired. But for the Ordinances presented to his majesty, which concern the Assembly of Divines, the Directory, the taking away the Book of Common Prayer, and the Observation of the Lord's Day, many expressions therein require necessary Alterations, in respect of some things happened since their first framing; others reflect on former established laws, and other matters not necessary; and therefore, though he consented to the matter therein desired, yet he could not confirm those individual Ordinances, in terminis, as they were penned.—Whereas you conceive that his majesty did not give his assent to the Bill for the better Advancement of the Preaching of God's Holy Word in all parts of this kingdom; his majesty, by his former Answer, did sufficiently express his consent thereunto, by consenting to the Bill for suppressing of Innovations, (in which that for the better Advancement of Preaching is included) and his majesty doth again give his consent thereunto; as also to the Bill against enjoying Pluralities of Benefices by Spiritual Persons, and Non-Residency, formerly delivered to his majesty, as is desired in your Propositions.—Touching Reformation of Religion; whereas you say 'That his majesty's Answer comes far short of the Proposition, which desires that his majesty should consent that Reformation of Religion according to the Covenant be settled in such manner as both houses have agreed, or shall agree upon, after consultation had with the Assembly of Divines; his majesty saith, That he hath answered all the particulars which are set down as Branches of that general Proposition, and cannot think it will be expected that he should oblige himself generally to what his two houses shall hereafter agree touching matters of Religion, before he be satisfied of the nature thereof.—His majesty conceives that he hath given a full Answer to your Proposition for an Act, or Acts to be passed for a stricter course to be taken to prevent the saying or hearing of Mass in the court, or any other part of this kingdom, or the kingdom of Ireland; he having consented thereunto, with exemption only of the Queen and her family, few whereof are of her profession, according to the Articles of Marriage agreed on betwixt the two crowns, which his majesty conceives his two houses will not advise him to break; and for restraining the access of all others but her family; and in all things else his majesty consents to that Proposition as is desired.—Touching the Covenant, his majesty answers as formerly, That he remains yet unsatisfied to take it, or impose it upon others, and conceives it not proper to be insisted upon at this time; and that the ends thereof, without taking it will be obtained by this Agreement, if happily concluded.—For the Articles of Religion presented to his majesty, which are desired to be confirmed by act of parliament, his majesty hath already answered, That he hath not yet had time to peruse them with that deliberation as is requisite before he bind up himself and his subjects in matters of faith and doctrine; and conceives his two houses will think it not improper to respite the consideration of them to a farther time, considering how perilous definitions are in matters of Religion, how long time the Articles have been in framing, and that since the beginning of this Treaty, and not before, they came intirely to his majesty's view.—His majesty having so far consented to the several particulars of this Proposition, that the remaining differences are very few, doth therefore earnestly desire his two houses, that they may be no obstacle to the settlement of the blessed Peace now in hand."

The King's Answer concerning the Nomination of the CHIEF OFFICERS in the Kingdom of England.

"C. R. For a final Answer to you, as to your Paper of the 21st instant concerning the Nomination of Officers, his majesty doth consent thereunto as is desired, so as the time for nomination be limited to ten years."

The King's Answer to the PROPOSITION concerning the City of London.

"C. R. For a final Answer to you, as to your Proposition concerning the City of London, his majesty doth consent thereunto as is desired."

The King's Answer to the PROPOSITION concerning the GREAT SEAL.

"C. R. In Answer to you, as to your Proposition concerning the Great Seal, delivered in this day, his majesty doth consent thereunto as is desired."

The King's Answer to the PROPOSITION concerning WARDS and LIVERIES.

"C. R. For a final Answer to you, as to your Proposition concerning the Court of Wards, delivered in this day, his majesty doth consent thereunto as is desired, so as he may have in recompence for the same 100,000*l.* per annum assured unto him, his heirs and successors."

A Complaint made of the Propositions, &c. being printed.] The same day, the whole of the Propositions, with the King's Answers to them, being read in the house of commons, Mr. Weaver complained, 'That they were already put into print, and desired that enquiry might be made who it was that gave order for the printing of them; alledging what a dishonour and prejudice to the house it must needs be, to have things dispersed abroad in print before they had been debated there; saying farther, That surely the blame must be laid on sir Peter Killigrew, it being hardly possible that a Copy could be obtained so suddenly from any hand but his.' Another said, 'That this being a way to forestal the sense of the house in the opinion of the people, it ought not to be suffered; and unless it were prevented, things would be so represented as if they were not well-wishers to the Treaty.' To this it was added by a third, 'That he could not believe any man in the house was against the Treaty; and, for his part, rather than things should not be concluded thereby, and lest want of time should be objected hereafter, he would consent that 40 days longer might be added to the Treaty.' This last motion being supported by many of the Independent party, gave occasion to suspect that it did not proceed from any good will to Peace: whereupon a Member observed, That the happy issue of the Treaty did not consist so much in length of time, as in a desire to give and receive mutual satisfaction, to and from his majesty, and a reasonable compliance upon moderate, just, and equal grounds; alledging, That his majesty had condescended very much in the main things, and the house, as yet, in nothing at all to him: that his majesty had given satisfaction in the Militia, and several other matters sufficient for their security: that the only thing he stuck at, was the destruction of the Church and his friends. and the taking of the Covenant, concerning which he had given in his final Answer; and therefore it would be in vain to continue the Treaty any longer than the time limited, except it were desired by his majesty himself and their commissioners: besides, he urged, it would be much conducing to the obtaining a Peace by this Treaty, if the debate of his majesty's present final Answer concerning the Church might be managed with moderation: and therefore he moved the house might proceed upon it presently. But this was over-ruled: and the result was, That a Letter of thanks should be sent from both houses to their Commissioners, inclosing the Resolution of the 19th, to except Sundays and public Fasts out of the number of the 40 days allotted for the Treaty: the farther debate upon the Propositions was also put off to the 26th, and all the members strictly enjoined to attend at that time.

Debate on the King's Answer relating to Episcopacy.] Oct. 26. A motion was made in the house of commons, for taking into consideration the King's Answers to the Proposition concerning the Church. In support of this motion a Member alledged, 'That it was high time to transmit the sense of the house thereupon to their Commissioners, who must needs be at a stand, by reason of so long a delay, his majesty having given in his Answer five days before, which had now been three days depending in the house.'—The Independent party finding the consideration of the King's Answer could not be decently avoided, began the attack upon Episcopacy.

Mr. Miles Corbet affirmed, 'That Bishops were clearly Anti-christian,' and cried out, 'Down with them even to the ground.' To this

Mr. Blackiston added, 'That because Bishops were Anti-christian, therefore the king stuck so close to them; that his majesty gave no satisfaction at all concerning Bishops, for he consented to the taking away of only Archbishops; but, for his own part, he thought they were both birds of a feather.'—To this it being answered, 'That the king, in order to give satisfaction, had consented to lay aside, after 3 years end, the whole substance of Episcopacy, and abolish the jurisdiction and function of Bishops, as appeared by his last concessions; only he had left a little root in matter of Ordination:

Mr. Gourdon replied, 'That both kingdoms had covenanted and engaged to pluck up Episcopacy root and branch; and that if they left ever so little a slip of the root, it would soon grow up again, and therefore he conceived the king could not give satisfaction till Bishops were taken away, both name and thing, that there might not remain the least footsteps of that government to be taken notice of by the present age, or transmitted to posterity.'

Mr. Jesson proposed this question, 'Whether Bishops were not mentioned in the Scripture, and far more visibly than the form now endeavoured to be set up for ought that had been yet shewn to the contrary? And whether the gentlemen that were so eager for rooting up Episcopacy, had not hest root it up first out of the evidences of the Gospel, and of all antiquity?' To this no answer was given: But

Alderman Pennington further urging, 'That the house was bound by the Covenant to root out Bishops,' it was replied, 'That it was true they were bound by the Covenant to extirpate so much of the Hierarchy as should be found contrary to the Word of God, the rule by which they were to reform; and therefore till it was cleared how much of Episcopacy was contrary to the Word of God, it could not be safe to extirpate the whole Order: and the only way to find out the truth was that which the king had propounded and promised, that betwixt this and 3 years end, if upon a conference between the Assembly of Divines, and 20 of his own nomination, he should be convinced of the unlawfulness of Bishops and the lawfulness of any other government, he would most cheerfully embrace that, and take away Episcopacy: but till then it could not, in reason and conscience, be expected that his majesty should absolutely abolish it, under pretence of giving satisfaction.'—To this the Independents replied, by arguing à facto ad jus; saying, 'That the conference proposed by the king, at the end of 3 years, would perhaps be the way to undo all that hitherto the parliament had done; and might call in question the judgment and former resolutions of the houses, and the Ordinances concerning Church-Government.' In answer to which it was observed, 'That it must be an ill cause which could not endure the test of a conference; that the avoiding one would reflect much upon the reputation of the Assembly of Divines; and argue, in the opinion of most men, either a bad cause, or but weak defendants: moreover, that a business of so high a nature as Church-Government could not be debated too often, and as yet one party only had been heard to speak to that point; whereas it was unjust to conclude upon any thing without knowing, at least, what the other had to offer;

that it must be far more for the honour of the house to determine so weighty a matter, after a full hearing on both sides: and therefore it was moved, that his majesty's Concessions might be accepted of as to the matter of Episcopacy.'—But the question being put thereupon, it was resolved, "That the King's Answer to that part of the Proposition for the Church, which concerns a Bill and Ordinances for Abolishing of Bishops, is not satisfactory:" And a committee was appointed to draw up the particulars of this dissatisfaction against the next morning.

Debate on the King's Answers concerning the Church, the Covenant, &c. All which are voted unsatisfactory.] Oct 27. The commons resumed the debate upon the Proposition concerning the Church, and came to this Resolution thereupon, "That the King's Answer to that part of the Proposition concerning giving his consent to the Ordinances for settling the Lands of the Bishops upon trustees, for the use of the commonwealth, and for appointing the sale of those Lands, is not satisfactory; and that the commissioners do press his majesty to give his full consent to those Ordinances as desired by the Proposition." Then Mr. Swinfen reported to the house the particulars of their dissatisfaction in his majesty's Answer to that part of the Proposition for the Church, concerning the abolishing of Bishops, to be sent by way of Instruction to the commissioners in the Isle of Wight, which were read and approved of.

Next, it was resolved, "That the King's Answer to that part of the Proposition touching the public Use of the Directory, and the taking away of the Book of Common Prayer, wherein he desires to continue the use thereof for himself and his household, until another public Form of Prayer should be agreed on by his majesty and his two houses, is unsatisfactory." Then it was further resolved, "That his majesty's Answer to that part of the Proposition as concerns his confirming, by act of parliament, the Articles of Christian Religion, is not satisfactory; and that the Commissioners do press the king to give his full consent thereunto."—The next point was that clause of the King's Answer, wherein he promised to pass an Act for the preventing the saying of Mass in the court, or any other part of this kingdom, or the kingdom of Ireland; only he excepted the Queen and her family, that those few of them, which were of her profession, might have the free exercise of their religion, according to the Articles of Marriage agreed on betwixt the two crowns of England and France.—Upon which it was resolved, "That the house out of their detestation to that abominable idol, the Mass*, doth declare, that they cannot admit of, or consent unto, any such Exemption in any law, as is desired by his majesty, for exempting the Queen and her family out of such act or acts, as are desired by the Proposition to be passed, for a stricter course to prevent the bearing or saying of Mass in the court, or any other part of this kingdom, or the kingdom of Ireland; that his majesty's Answer thereunto is not satisfactory; and that the Commissioners do press his majesty to give his full consent to that part of the Proposition, as it is there desired."

At last they came to the Covenant, which occasioned a very hot debate, in which it was insisted upon, 'The king ought not only to take it himself, but pass an act for imposing it throughout the kingdom.' Against this it was argued, 'As a most unreasonable and unjust thing to urge the Covenant upon the king, when many members of both houses, and of the Army, who had refused to take it, and had been esteemed the better for it, judged the fittest men for public employments; and many of those who had taken it were looked upon with an evil eye, and as men averse to the public interests, and that the Oath and Covenant was not made, nor intended, for the king to take; but that it was a solemn stipulation betwixt the subjects of both kingdoms only, as appeared by the preamble of it, 'We the noblemen, knights, citizens, burgesses, &c.' To this it being answered, 'That the house could alter that, when the king would consent to the taking of it;' several members argued, 'That though the house could alter the preamble of the Covenant, yet they could not the contents and substance of it; and in them were many things contained very improper for the king to swear to; as the maintenance of his own person, honour, crown, and dignity; which would be absurd, since self love and preservation is ingrafted in every man by nature: and that if his majesty was to take the Covenant, and swear to maintain his own just rights and prerogatives, according to the tenor of it, then if he conceived any of those things demanded by the houses to be his just rights, he was bound to deny them; from whence it appeared that the Covenant was never intended for the king to take; and if he did take any it must be a new one, or the old one altered; which they ought to have done before they sent the Propositions, that his majesty might have known what part of the Covenant they intended to impose upon him, before he should make a promise to take it.'—Hereupon, Mr. Gourdon stood up, and desired leave to speak to the first of those arguments, 'How that there was not the same reason for pressing the Covenant upon the members of the houses and the Army, as upon the king, and that was because the main clause of it is against the introducing of Popery, of which none was, or is, suspected but the king;' (and in this he was supported by many of the Presbyterian party, out of their zeal for the Covenant:) But to him, who was a known champion for the Independents, it was smartly replied, 'That, on the same ground, all the members of both houses, and of the Army, ought to take the Covenant, as well as the king, because there was a special clause in it for the suppressing of all heresies and schisms.'—At last the debate ended with this Resolution, "That the King's Answer touching the Covenant was not satisfactory:" And a committee was appointed to consider how, and in what manner, the Covenant could be framed, so as that it might be presented to the king, to be taken by him.*

Oct. 28. The Resolutions of the commons on the 26th and 27th, being sent up to the lords for concurrence, they agreed to them all with some little alterations, except that concerning the Sale of Bishops Lands, which they respite to further consideration.

Debate on the seven Delinquents proposed to be excepted by the Lords. The same day, the lords sent a message to the commons, signifying, That in consequence of the vote for proceeding against only seven Persons as to the taking away life, in the first Branch of the Proposition concerning Delinquents, they had named the lord Cottington, lord Digby, sir Robert Heath, sir Francis Doddington, sir George Radcliffe, sir R. Greenville, and sir C. Dallison. Hereupon a Member said, 'The lords had acted as betrayers and deluders of the kingdom, by naming 7 of the old Delinquents who were, every man of them, out of their power;' and a debate arising whether they should name 7 more out of the new Delinquents, the lord Goring was named as one; which being objected to, serjeant Nicholas stood up and said, 'What, Mr. Speaker, shall we spare the man who raised a second war more dangerous than the first, and cudgelled us into a Treaty?' However, a motion being made, That there be an addition of names to the first Branch of the Proposition concerning Delinquents, it passed in the negative.

Letters relating to the Marquis of Ormond's landing in Ireland, to make Peace with the Rebels. At this time the parliament was alarmed with news from Ireland, bringing an account of the marquis of Ormond's landing there, and his making Peace with the rebels in that kingdom. His lordship's original Letter was sent, addressed to one of their chiefs, and inclosed in the following from colonel Jones to the Speaker of the house of commons:

"Honourable sir; In my last of the 4th inst. I represented the present wants of this your Army, both in men and money; wherein now again I most earnestly desire we may be supplied, and that with all convenient speed, [considering Ormond is now arriving here, and the designs by him driven appearing in the inclosed; which are intended principally to the disturbance of your affairs here. His lordship meeting with the Irish Commissioners, began on their Treaty on Monday the 16th present; after which, (I have it on good grounds) all their powers together are to be employed against this your small party in this province.] The timely removing hence those of Ormond's instruments, in whom he most confided, will retard him much in his design; yet will it be alike, and no less for his advantage, if he has to work on a necessitated party, such as this is, on whom large offers of plentiful subsistence (which ours have not) may be much working.—There are extraordinary and large taxes laid, by the poll, in the Irish quarters, for making up, it is said, the sum of 60,000*l.* for the Prince, who is, by the Irish, expected here with his Fleet, as soon as the Treaty is made up between them and Ormond. In this I am much confirmed, that all herein designed is principally for England.—It is therefore nearly concerning you to prevent this growing evil, and that rather here, than there, by sending hither, with all speed, what is for the work; particularly that we be supplied with horse, (the life of this service) our troops here being weakened by a strange disease, whereby sixty horses have miscarried in some troops, consisting but of 12 to the troop.—This of Ormond's arrival, and the discovery made of his designs, have, for the present, diverted my intentions for advancing in person, that thereby this place (to be principally secured) may be provided for, and other things prepared necessary for a meeting with that army, or those designs of the rebels so much spoken of. In the mean time I shall visit their quarters with strong parties, sent out on all hands, for burning and destroying of their corn, and what may be else for their subsistence or accommodation; whereof I trust e're long, by God's assistance, to give you some good account; so I rest, &c. M. JONES. Dublin, Oct. 18."

Lord ORMOND'S LETTER.

To our very loving Friend, Sir Richard Blake, Knt. Chairman to the Assembly of the Confederate Roman Catholics, now at Kilkenny.

"After our very hearty commendations, being arrived in this kingdom, qualified with power to treat and conclude a Peace with the Confederate Roman Catholics, or such as shall be deputed and authorized by them in that behalf, we have thought fit, by these our Letters, to desire you to make the same known to the Assembly of the said Confederate Roman Catholics now at Kilkenny: as also that, in pursuance of the Paper of the 13th of May last, delivered to their Commissioners at St. Germain's, we expect to receive from them, by persons fully authorized to treat and conclude, such Propositions as they shall think fit, at our house at Carrick; whither we intend to remove for the better accommodation and more speedy dispatch of this affair, as soon as we shall be advertised by you of the time when we shall expect them there, which we desire may be with all convenient expedition. We remain at Cork this 4th Oct. 1648, Your very loving friend, ORMOND."

On reading of the above-written Letters, both houses thought fit that copies of them should be sent to their Commissioners in the Isle of Wight; with Instructions to shew them to the king, and acquaint him, that the houses judge this proceeding so contrary to an act of this present parliament, and so destructive to a speedy and effectual reducement of the Rebels there, that they desire his majesty's public Declaration against any such power, and against the proceedings of the lord Ormond in this matter.

Oct. 30. At the desire of the lords a conference was held with the commons, concerning their Resolution of the 27th, relating to the Sale of Bishops Lands. The Conference being over, the lords fell into debate again upon the Resolution sent up by the commons, concerning the King's Answer touching the Ordinance for the Sale of Bishops Lands; and the question being put for agreeing thereto, it passed in the affirmative.

The Treaty continued for 14 Days longer.]

Nov. 2. The following Resolutions were agreed to: 1. "That the Treaty be continued for 14 days longer; and that in this time, the houses will consider of the Propositions that came from the king, to which there is not yet an Answer; and will consider of such other Propositions as the houses shall think necessary for the settling of a safe and well-grounded Peace. 2. That the Commissioners of both houses, now in the Isle of Wight, be written unto, that they may make their speedy repair to the houses respectively, and demand the King's final Answer according to the last Instructions, and afterwards to return back with the houses Resolution thereupon. 3. That the Commissioners do communicate these Votes to the king, and desire his consent thereunto in point of time. 4. That his majesty's Answer, contained in a Paper of the 11th Oct. to the Proposition delivered in by the Commissioners, in a Paper of the 9th Oct. concerning Ireland, is satisfactory. 5. That the King's Answer to the Proposition, concerning the Payment of the public Debts, is satisfactory. 6. That the King's Answer to the Proposition, concerning the Nomination of Officers, is not satisfactory. 7. That the house do consent to the King's Answer, as to the taking away of Wards and Liveries; and, in lieu thereof, do agree that 100,000*l.* per Annum be settled on the king, his heirs, and successors, according to the Answer of the king to this Proposition; the same to be settled by act of parliament, to be raised in such manner as shall be thought fit by both houses of parliament; and provision therein made that the same, nor any part thereof, be alienated from the crown."

Further Proceedings of the Commissioners treating with the King in the Isle of Wight.]

Nov. 3. The Speaker of the house of lords acquainted them that he had received a packet from the Commissioners in the Isle of Wight,

It contained, among other Papers, the following :

The KING'S PAPER touching the Expiration of the Treaty.

"C. R. His majesty having received your Paper of the 1st of Nov. finds thereby that the Treaty ends on Saturday next: and therefore, considering the great length and weight of your Papers now delivered, and for that his majesty hath had no Answer to his own Propositions sent to the two houses, his majesty desires to know whether you have received any Instructions concerning the same, or for any enlargement of the time of the Treaty; and the rather, because his majesty is desirous, before the giving any farther Answer concerning the business of the Church, so far pressed by his two houses, that the primate of Armagh, the bishop of Exeter, bishop of Worcester, bishop of Rochester, Dr. Ferne, and Dr. Morley, may be admitted unto him with all convenient speed; that so his majesty may receive all possible information for clearing his judgment, in a matter so nearly touching him as that of his conscience. Nov. 1."

The KING'S ANSWER to the Commissioners Desires concerning Lord Ormond.

"C. R. In answer to your Paper delivered in this day, concerning Ireland, his majesty saith, That it is well known in what place and in what condition he hath continued for many months, before the beginning of this Treaty; and he doth declare, that since the first Votes passed for the same, he hath not transacted any affairs concerning that kingdom, but with you the Commissioners in relation to the Treaty itself. And his majesty hath already consented, if this Treaty receive a happy conclusion, that his two houses of parliament shall have the sole ordering and managing of the Militia of Ireland, and the prosecution of the war there: And whatsoever his majesty hath consented unto upon these Propositions, he did it clearly, and doth fully resolve to make the same good, if this Treaty end in a Peace; but, in the mean time, his majesty thinks it not reasonable that he should be pressed to make any such public Declaration, as by your Paper is desired. Nov. 1."

The KING'S Final ANSWER concerning Ireland.

"C. R. For a final Answer to you, as to your Paper of the 1st of this month, concerning Ireland, his majesty saith, That his majesty having heard nothing in Answer to his own Propositions, and having answered all the Propositions of his two houses, hath very little encouragement to treat upon a new Proposition, being no part of the subject matter of this Treaty: but having given you an Answer to the said Paper concerning Ireland, and heard your debate thereupon, he finds it fit to adhere to his former Answer: for if this Treaty shall conclude happily, the desires of his two houses will be fully satisfied by his concessions already made concerning that kingdom. Nov. 1."

Nov. 4. Some more Votes and Resolutions, concerning the Treaty, were agreed to by both houses, viz. 1. "That the King's Answer to the desire of both houses, for his declaring against the proceedings of the lord Ormond in Ireland, is not satisfactory; and the Commissioners are hereby authorized and required to acquaint the king herewith, and to press him to a full consent thereto. 2. That Dr. Usher, Dr. Brownrigg, Dr. Prideaux, Dr. Warner, Dr. Ferne, and Dr. Morley, shall have the leave of both houses to go to the King, and have the Speaker's passes to that purpose. 3. That the Commissioners now in the Isle of Wight, have power to agree among themselves which of them shall come away and attend the houses; leaving three there, whereof one lord and two commoners. 4. That an Instruction be prepared, and sent to the Commissioners, to authorise them to present the Shorter Catechism to his majesty for his approbation."

Nov. 9. All the parliament's Commissioners were now come to London, except the earls of Northumberland and Middlesex, the lord Wenman, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pierpoint, and Mr. Crew, who staid in the Isle of Wight, in consequence of the above Resolution. When these lords and gentlemen took their seats, the Speakers of both houses respectively were ordered to give them Thanks for their great pains and industry, and faithful discharge of the trust committed to them. Upon this occasion they reported, That when they took their leave of the king, on the 4th of this month, his majesty said, "That he hoped they were now sensible that none was more desirous of a good and lasting Peace than himself; that he had gone very far to give his two houses satisfaction; that he thought, though the time for the Treaty was ended, yet the treaty itself was not, for that he expected to hear from his two houses about his own Propositions; and would be ready to make his concessions binding, by giving them the force of laws. That his majesty desired, they would put a good interpretation upon his vehement expressions in some of his debates, there being nothing in his intentions but kindness; and that as they had taken abundance of freedom, and shewed great abilities in their debates, which had taken his majesty off from some of his own opinions; so he doubted not, had they had power to recede, some of his Reasons would have prevailed with them, as he is confident, had it been with his two houses, it would have done with them: and therefore besought them to take the same freedom with his two houses, to press them to a compliance with him in those things his conscience was not yet satisfied in, which more time might do, his opinion not being like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable or infallible. That his majesty added his very hearty thanks for the pains they had taken to satisfy him, professing that he wanted eloquence to commend their abilities. He desired them candidly to represent all the transactions of this Treaty to his two houses, that they might see nothing of his own interest, how near or dear soever, but that wherein his conscience was unsatisfied, could hinder, on his part, a happy conclusion of this Treaty."

The Earl of Warwick's Vindication of himself from the Charge of his intending to join the Prince of Wales.] In the course of the foregoing debates, several insinuations had been thrown out, as if the earl of Warwick was not hearty in the interest of the parliament, in regard of his not having attempted to fight the revolted part of the Fleet commanded by the Prince of Wales: and this suspicion was now become so general, that his lordship thought it necessary to vindicate himself from the Charge, by publishing the following Declaration: dated Aboard the St. George in Helvoet-Sluis, Nov. 11, 1648.

"Having this day seen a Letter from London, dated 3rd of this instant importing, That there is a Pamphlet printed, intitled, 'A Declaration of the Earl of Warwick, shewing his resolution to join with the Prince, if the Treaty take no effect,' I thought myself bound to take notice of it, being so horrid a reflection upon my honour, and wickedly aspersing me with a supposed resolution, so repugnant to the trust which I hold under the parliament: and therefore I do hereby declare, That as both houses of parliament have been pleased to intrust me with the charge of the Fleet; so I have endeavoured to improve that authority committed to me, with a faithful and inviolable respect unto my duty.—When I first undertook this great charge, I was fully sensible how the cause of truth, the glory of God, the Settlement of my country's peace, and the preventing of the bloody and desperate designs of the enemies thereof, depended upon the management of this expedition; and how much I was obliged in conscience and honour to omit nothing that might have a tendency to those ends: that obligation I have, according to my best reason and judgment, faithfully discharged; and by the blessing of Heaven, received this fruit, notwithstanding the many obstructions and difficulties that intervened, that the honour of the parliament by sea is cleared; the Fleet committed to my charge preserved in a condition of honour and safety; the affections of the seamen settled; the design of those wicked revoltors, that perfidiously betrayed so considerable a part of the kingdom's navy, broken; and such as associated with them, either rendered or reduced, other than those few that for a while have basely sheltered themselves within the sluice at Helvoet, and one that was out of that harbour when I came into it.—As to the pretended Resolution of my joining with the Prince, in case the Treaty should not take effect, falsely charged upon me by that Pamphlet; I do profess in the presence of God, who knows my heart and ways, that it never entered into my thoughts; and that my soul abhors it, as inconsistent with my duty, prejudicial to the parliament, destructive to the kingdom's peace, and unworthy of a free-born Englishman; being confident that the parliament will omit nothing on their part to make the issue of the Treaty, by God's blessing, successful and happy: and therefore, as I have hitherto been faithful to the kingdom, and to the parliament where I have the honour to sit as a peer; so I do and shall scorn to sacrifice my conscience, and those public and dear concerns of my country, wherein I have a portion, to this misled fancy of any person, of what rank, quality, or condition soever; and while I have a heart and hand, I shall not fail, by God's assistance, to have them on all occasions lifted up for the service of the parliament, and common interest of England, with my utmost integrity, and to my highest hazard; and my actions shall confute the lies and jealousies as well of that false author, as of any others, who, either from an ignorance of my proceeding, or perhaps from a sense of their own guilt, dare take the freedom in these times, wherein the tongue and press assume so luxurious a latitude, so unjustly to bespatter my honour and intentions; to vindicate the sincerity whereof I shall commit myself to him that judgeth righteously. WARWICK."

Votes of both Houses upon the King's own Propositions.] Nov. 15. Both houses passed the following Resolutions, in Answer to the King's own Propositions: 1. "That from and immediately after the king shall have consented unto the Desires of the two houses upon the Treaty, and ratified the same by act or acts of parliament, all his houses, honours, manors, and lands, with the growing rents and profits thereof, and all other legal revenues of the crown, shall be restored unto him, liable to the maintenance of antient forts, and all other public and legal charges, which they were formerly charged withal or liable unto; with an exception of such castles and forts, as are now garrisoned, and of such places for public magazines and stores as are now made use of, for so long time as both houses shall think fit to make use of them for the necessary defence of the kingdom. 2. That the king shall have Compensation for those legal growing Revenues and profits of the crown, which he hath or shall consent to part withal for the satisfaction of both houses in this Treaty, in such manner and proportion as by the king and both houses shall be agreed upon. 3. That the king shall be settled in a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, agreeable to the laws of the land. 4. That an Act of Oblivion and Indemnity be passed, to extend to all persons for all matters, with such limitations and provisions as shall be agreed upon between his majesty and his two houses of parliament; provided that it be declared by act of parliament, that nothing in these four Propositions, nor any of them thus consented unto, is intended or shall be made use of to abrogate, weaken, or anywise impair any agreement in this Treaty, or any law, grant, or concession, agreed upon by the king, and the two houses of parliament, in pursuance thereof."

Letter from Col. Hammond relating to the King's Parole not to leave the Isle of Wight.]
Nov. 16. A Letter from col. Hammond, concerning the King's Parole, was read.

"My lords and gentlemen; Give me leave to acquaint your lordships, that the day before the time formerly limited for the Treaty ended, and before it was known here to be renewed, I thought it my duty, (in regard of the great trust the parliament put upon me, in receiving, on their behalf, the king's Parole; and because there was not any that could positively witness to the circumstances of the engagement, except sir Peter Killigrew) to move the king to confirm his parole, and acquaint the commissioners of parliament that he had so passed his word, as desired and ordered by both houses, which accordingly he did, as the said honourable commissioners will better inform your lordships; the next day, and at the commissioners taking their leave of the king, I having had intimation of a question or doubt, whether guards (as was pretended argued a distrust) being kept upon the king, his said parole was not thereby made void, I pressed the king, before them, to declare whether he made any such question; if so, that he would be pleased to declare it. He seeming somewhat surprized, desired time to consider it; professing not to have thought on it before: but I perceiving the danger of such a reserve, pressed him with greater earnestness to a clear declaration of himself in the point; telling him, that otherwise his parole signified nothing; and desired his positive answer, as the case now stood with him. His majesty avoided it long. I then told him, That if the centinels at his door (I having kept no other since the engagement of his word) were offensive to him, I would absolutely clear him in that question. He seemed to make a scruple they should be taken off, they being only set to keep people from pressing into his lodgings, and placed, at a further distance, with the guard that is kept to preserve his majesty's person from violence; assuring him I only depended on his word, which the parliament had pleased to accept, for his not removing out of the Island. I told him it would be then more clear, and that four or five several times: at length, upon my importunity, not being to be satisfied with a doubtful answer, he concluded himself to be obliged by his parole if the said centinels were taken away; which I then promised him, before the commissioners, should be done; and accordingly it was immediately observed. My lords, I thought it my duty to give your lordships an account of these passages, especially hearing there is likely to be a renewal of the king's Parole for some longer time; that if your lordships see cause it may be so put to him, upon renewal of his said parole, as may take off all such reservations, which possibly may otherwise tend to the disadvantage of the parliament. I am, Your, &c. R. HAMMOND. Carisbrooke, Nov. 9."

Upon reading this Letter both houses resolved, "That the King's Parole, given to the governor of the Isle of Wight, doth bind him to a residence in that Isle for 20 days after the Treaty shall be ended; notwithstanding any addition that hath been, or shall be, made by both houses for continuing the Treaty any longer than the 40 days first appointed."—A copy of the above Vote was sent to the King, to which he declared his full agreement.*

Nov. 18. The commons resolved that the Treaty be farther continued till the 25th instant inclusive, to which the lords gave their concurrence.

Further Proceedings of the Commissioners treating with the King in the Isle of Wight.]

Nov. 20. The following, among other Papers, from the commissioners in the Isle of Wight, were read in both houses:

The King's FINAL ANSWER concerning the Marquis of Ormond.

"C. R. For a final Answer to you, as to your Paper of the 11th instant, concerning Ireland, his majesty saith, That he doth acknowledge that, by your Paper of the 16th instant, the difference betwixt the desire of his two houses and his majesty's Answer, concerning the Proceedings of the marquis of Ormond, is truly stated and observed; for that the two houses do desire his majesty to make a present Declaration against the power and proceedings of the marquis, and his majesty doth consent to make the same at the conclusion of this Treaty in Peace; which he believes is very reasonable on his part to insist on, since the making of such Declaration at the end of this Treaty joins it with his own freedom and security; and the publishing the same, presently, separates it from that consideration. But his majesty conceives it is not rightly inferred, nor that his Answer can reasonably be interpreted to be any countenance or approbation of those proceedings, since his majesty has consented to the matter desired, and differs only in the circumstance of time, which he hopes his two houses will not make very slow. The other parts of your debate his majesty hath well considered of, as he hopes you have done of his replies thereunto; and

* "The king was exhorted to make his escape, which was conceived to be very easy: but having given his word not to attempt the recovery of his liberty during the Treaty, and three weeks after; he would not by any persuasion, be induced to hazard the reproach of violating that promise. In vain was it urged, that a promise given to the parliament could no longer be binding, since they could no longer afford him protection from violence, threatened him by other persons, to whom he was bound by no tie or engagement. The king would indulge no refinements of casuistry, however plausible, in such delicate subjects; and was resolved, that what depredations soever fortune should commit upon him, she never should bereave him of his honour." Hume.

therefore he adheres to his former Answer to this business, and desires his two houses to consider the largeness of his concessions in this Treaty; and, upon that foundation, to proceed to a speedy settlement of a blessed Peace in England, which his majesty conceives the most probable means to reduce Ireland. Nov. 17."

After reading the above-mentioned Papers, the commons resolved, That the king's Answer to the Proposition for declaring against the proceedings of the lord Ormond in Ireland, is not satisfactory.

Remonstrance presented to the House of Commons, from lord Fairfax and the General Council of the Army, demanding Justice upon the King, &c.] This day, the house of commons was alarmed with a large Remonstrance from the Army, demanding Justice upon the King as the capital delinquent, by being the occasion of all the blood shed during the war. The Entry of this astonishingly bold attempt (while a Treaty was going on between the King and Parliament in the Isle of Wight) stands thus recorded in their Journals: "The house being informed that some Officers of the Army, from the General, were at the door with a Remonstrance, they were called in; and col. Ewer informed them, That the Lord-General, and General Council of the Officers of the Army, had commanded him, and those gentlemen with him, to present this Remonstrance to that honourable house; and desired them to take it into speedy and serious consideration."—The Contemporary Writers in general agree, that lord Fairfax was, in himself, well disposed to Peace, and that he had no personal disaffection to his majesty: a circumstance confirmed by his refusing to act, soon after, as a Commissioner for the Trial of the King, though he was the first person named in the Ordinance for that purpose. It may therefore very justly be enquired what could induce his lordship to appear at the head of this Remonstrance? In order to clear up this point, it is to be observed, That Cromwell, in his triumphant march out of Scotland, had endeavoured to engage the gentry in the north of England to oppose the Treaty's going forward; and several Petitions were presented to the commons for that end, of which the house took no notice. This project failing, he formed a scheme for the several Regiments to petition the lord Fairfax, one after another, demanding Justice upon the King; which was begun by Ireton, his son-in-law's regiment, and then followed by Ingoldsby's, Fleetwood's, Whaley's, Barkstead's, Overton's, and others. The consequence of this was the calling a General Council of Officers, and agreeing upon the Remonstrance now before us; of which Ireton, who had originally been brought up to the law, was the principal penman. Whether, therefore, the General's giving way to the presentment of it was owing to his own inclinations, to his being over-reached by Cromwell's dissimulation, or to an apprehension of the resentment of the whole Army upon his non-compliance, we pretend not to determine; yet certain it is, that he wrote the following Letter to the Speaker, to enforce this Remonstrance, which is annexed to the printed copy of it:—"For the hon. Wm. Lenthall, esq. Speaker of the hon. house of commons: Mr. Speaker; The General Council of Officers, at their late meeting here, have unanimously agreed upon a Remonstrance to be presented to you, which is herewith sent by the hands of col. Ewer and other officers: and, in regard it concerns matters of highest and present importance to yourself, to us, and the whole kingdom, I do, at the desire of the Officers, and in behalf of them and myself, most humbly and earnestly intreat that it may have a present reading, and the things propounded therein may be timely considered; and that no failing in circumstances or expressions may prejudice either the reason or justice of what is tendered, or their intentions of whose good affections and constancy therein you have had so long experience. I remain, &c. FAIRFAX. St. Alban's, Nov. 16." This Remonstrance was not offered to the house of lords, nor is there any thing more of it to be found in any of the Contemporary Historians than a short abstract of about a single page: we shall therefore give the whole of it from the Original Edition.*

To the Right Hon. the Commons of England assembled in Parliament; The humble REMONSTRANCE of his Excellency the Lord General Fairfax, and his General Council of Officers, held at St. Alban's, Nov. 16. 1648.

"Our tender regard to the privileges and freedom of parliament, on which our hopes of common freedom and right do so much depend, and our late experience what offence many, even honest men, seem to have taken, and what advantage evil men have made of our least interposing in any thing of civil consideration to the parliament, hath made us for a long time hitherto, as it should always make us even to the utmost extremity, to attend in silence the counsels and determinations of parliament concerning all matters of that nature whatsoever: but finding you to have been, of late, upon those transactions of highest moment, whereupon the life or death of all our civil interest does depend; and that the public affairs in your hands (not without the influence of forcible impulsions from your enemies, and such as have been stirred up by them) are brought to the utmost crisis of danger, which calls upon every man to contribute what help he can; and seeing no effectual help from elsewhere to appear, we cannot be (because, in conscience and duty to God and men, we hold ourselves obliged in such case not to be)

altogether silent, or wanting in ought we can honestly say, or do, to hold off impending ruin from an honest people and a good cause.—We are not ignorant that that rule of 'Salus Populi suprema Lex' is of all others most apt to be abused or misapplied, and yet none more surely true. It is too ordinary, especially of late times, for men who, either from intentions of evil, or inordinate temper of spirit, would break those bonds of law and magistracy which they find to restrain them, to frame pretences of public danger, and extremity thereof; and from thence immediately to assume a liberty to break, or else neglect and fly above, the due bounds of order and government, and stir up others to the same; pleading privilege from that vast large rule of 'Salus Populi &c.' from such mis-applications, whereof great disturbances do oft arise and confusion is endangered; and yet we know the same may be justly pretended and followed, and that (where it is from honest public intentions, and upon clear grounds) with very happy effects: We have seen, in this our age, several instances in both kinds, and the hand of God bearing testimony, and giving judgment for some, and yet against others, where the pretensions have been the same, or so like as it was hard for human judgment to distinguish. And indeed since the right or wrong of such proceedings depends chiefly upon the good or ill, public or selfish, sincere or corrupt, intentions of the parties pretending, (which human judgment cannot ordinarily reach into) and partly upon the justness or causlessness, necessity or lightness, of the occasion taken from those against whom the pretence is; which again depends partly upon their carriages, and partly upon their intentions, the latter whereof is not clearly or properly under man's judgment: and the former, without a full knowledge of particulars, not easy for man to give a certain judgment of; therefore, as the engaging upon such pretences and principles does always imply, and is for most part expressly accompanied with Appeals to God for Judgment, so it is the proper Work of God to bear true witness and give righteous Judgment in such cases; and as he is always engaged to do it sooner or later, clearer or darker; so, in this age and part of the world, he hath seemed both to make haste to judgment in such cases, to give it quickly and speedily, and also to 'make bare his Arm therein,' that men may see it; and hath appeared as a severe avenger against such pretenders, where it hath been in falsehood, and with evil or corrupt intentions; so also a discountenancer thereof, even where it hath been with good intentions, if not necessary in the grounds, or from impatient temper of spirit; and yet in other cases, (where, as the ends have been public and the intentions upright, so the grounds weighty, the case necessary in relation to those ends, and the proceeding sober, temperate, and but proportionable to the ends, grounds, and necessity) a just assertor and patron of the right, and vindicator of the hidden truth and simplicity, of the pretenders, by a glorious presence with them, and success to them in such proceedings.—Neither wants there Ground for men to make some judgment therein. For certainly he that engageth upon such pretences really for public ends, and but upon public necessity or extremity, and with a sober spirit, (all which must concur to their full justification therein) will both try first all honest ways possible, with safety, in those ends, whereby he may accomplish them and avoid the danger; if possible, with due regard to, and by concurrence or with preservation of, the magistracy and Government under which God hath set him, before he will fly to ways of extremity; neither will he, when engaged therein, proceed further or longer in that way against or without the magistracy, than that first necessity, or some other emergent upon the proceedings, does justly lead, and the security of the ends require; not driving that pretence of necessity further to serve or advantage himself, or perpetuate those ways of extremity; but when the necessity or danger is over, and the public ends secured, will return to magistracy and order again; and mean while so act in all, as carefully to avoid both injury to the innocent and offence to the weak; and as subjecting or expecting, and ready to subject all to an indifferent and equal judgment, even of men, if and when it can be found, and really endeavouring to find it. For our parts, both prudential considerations, and the experience we have of the danger there is in the least breaking or letting loose or entangling the reins of Order and Government, upon such pretences, makes us most tender of it, as that which is never otherwise to be used or admitted than as a desperate cure in a desperate case and at the utmost peril, as well of them that use it, as of those for whom: and the experiences we have seen of God's righteous judgment in such cases, as it makes us not apt, without trembling and fear, to think of such proceedings, so much the more strict to observe all the aforesaid cautions concerning them; and yet where just occasion and a real public necessity calls thereunto, not to fear such appeals to God for any outward difficulties or dangers appearing to ourselves therein; but, both from divine and human considerations, as we do and ever shall avoid the occasions by all means possible, even to the utmost extremity, and do pray and hope we may never come to it; so, if ever such extremity do happen to us, we hope, through the grace of God, we shall be careful and enabled, both in the engaging and proceeding therein, so to act as before the Lord, and to approve ourselves both to God and good men, and as submitting to the judgment of both: and therefore though we are full of sad apprehensions of present dangers to the public interest, and the extremity even at hand; yet we shall first, in all humbleness and soberness of mind, and with all clearness, as God shall enable us, remonstrate to you our Apprehensions both of the Dangers at hand and of the Remedies, with our Grounds in both.—First, therefore, we must mind you of your Votes, once past, concerning no more Addresses to the King, &c. (p. 831); and our Engagement to adhere to you therein, (p. 834): concerning which, we shall not invite you to look back to any Grounds thereof, further than to what yourselves declared and published thereupon; and what we, in that our engagement, did summarily lay down as our satisfaction therein; we shall only wish it may be remembered how free you were therein, and what state you and the kingdom were in then, and how it fared with you thereupon, until you began to recede; and how upon and since your receding.—For the first; whatever evil men may slanderously suggest in relation to other matters, yet in this surely none can say you were acted beyond your own free judgments; we are sure, not by any impulsion from the Army; since nothing that ever past from us to you before did look with any aspect that way; but rather to the contrary (we may speak it with sorrow and shame, in relation to that unbelief or distrust in God, and those carnal fears of public disturbance from which we had before been acted so much the other way; so that, in that particular, the juster Resolutions of this house did not only lead us, but help to reclaim us, from thoughts too much wandering the contrary way. For the latter; you may remember, that when you took those Resolutions, discontent, even to distraction, did abound all the kingdom over, in the people, for the burden of numerous and unsettled Forces, and the oppression of free Quarter by them; and, in the Soldiers for want of Pay and satisfaction or security in point of Arrears and Indemnity, their discontents increasing with their arrears: and indeed the soldiery, (in regard thereof, and of some harsh provocations to them, and your former uncertainty in any way of settlement) something loose towards yourselves and their proper government, and disposed too much to disturbances amongst themselves: but upon those Resolutions of yours against any further Addresses to the King, &c. (which all men understood to imply some further intentions of proceeding in justice against him, and settling the kingdom without him) immediately the unsettledness of men's minds and jealousies of several parties (concerning one's compliance with and seeking advantage from the king's party against the other) were greatly allayed, and (together with his opportunities and advantages to cajole, or insinuate with, one or other) did seem to be taken away; and it pleased God instantly to lead you into such other councils and ways, whereby the burden and grievances of free Quarter were immediately taken off, supernumerary Forces disbanded, the rest put into an established way of Pay, the Arrears in some measure secured, and further growth thereof prevented; the distempers amongst the soldiery quieted, and they resettled in good order and discipline; and their hearts, with all honest and sober men, firmly knit unto you; and the whole affairs of the kingdom in an hopeful posture for a Settlement.—But when the house being called, as it were, on purpose for a Settlement, instead thereof, upon what jealousies of some amongst yourselves; what private animosities, envyings, and vindictive desires of others, giving up themselves, with a total neglect of the common and public interest, to mind particular interests and parties; and to seek and take advantages against their opposites even from hoped, if not formed, compliances of common enemies, and appearances from foreign parts on their behalf, whereby to work out revenge against those they immediately maligned; or from what crafty insinuations of corrupt Members, and always false to the public interest, or upon what other evil principles, we are unwilling to remember or imagine; when, we say, upon those, instead of a Settlement upon the former foundation, you began to entertain motions tending to the unsettling of what you had resolved; and when, by that uncertainty and unsettledness of councils appearing within yourselves, and the answerable insinuations and influences of several Members, according to their several bents and desires unto their respective correspondents and friends abroad, the minds of men, without also, became proportionably unsettled, tossed too and fro with various apprehensions and expectations which way things would bend, and all to see such vast uncertainty of any Settlement or end of troubles upon the parliamentary account alone; then, and not till then, began the generality of the people to be apt for any new motions, especially such as looked towards a Settlement any way; and then began your enemies to conceive fresh hopes and confidences, and bestirred themselves accordingly, to work your trouble and their own advantages: the most subtle and sober of them, dissembling the interest of their own party, and reserving that at the bottom as close and unseen as might be; and taking their rise even from that unsettledness, and those Grounds of Jealousies and Division they found amongst yourselves, and the several parties pretending to parliamentary interest; and from that disposition they found in one party by any means to take advantage and revenge against the other; they made pretences, partly of public interest, and partly of the very particular interests of that party which they found most discontented amongst yourselves, the foundations whereupon to raise new disturbances, and therein to engage a numerous and mixt party; but upon such Grounds and in such a way, wherein the interest of the king and his party were so incorporated throughout, as that the prosecution of all the other interests pretended, in the way that was laid, should carry on, and at last set up, that of the king's and their own above all others.—Thus the Army, which, after all possible trials and temptations, they found would never be won to be their friends, so as to desert the parliamentary and public interest to serve their turns, being therefore industriously by them, with the furtherance of discontented parties amongst your friends, rendered the only common enemy; and they themselves, as it were, friends to all but it, and that supposed party in parliament and kingdom that cordially upheld it; they, and their busy promoters of Petitions (stirred up by their emissaries or agents in all counties, for the engaging and cementing of this new-formed and intended general Party) being all taught the same language, at first profess fair for the parliament, or nothing against it; but to be for a full and free parliament, and to deliver it from the force of an army, pretend for the liberty of the subject also, to free them from the oppression and tyranny of an Army; to be for the law of the land against the arbitrary power of a faction in parliament, setting up and supporting themselves above law by the power of an Army; whereas, in truth, their great and latest quarrel against the Army was, That it would not force the parliament to comply with the will and interest of the king, to the prejudice of the kingdom's liberties, and of the power of law therein, nor desert the parliament in their adherence to these against the king.—They pretended likewise to be much for the ease of the people; to free them from Taxes and Contributions to an Army; to be for the Settlement of Peace in the kingdom, that there might be no need of an army; whereas, it was indeed their restless workings, and watching all advantages, by parties within this kingdom or foreign aids, to set up their own and the king's interest, to the ruin of the parliament and enslaving of the kingdom, that did necessitate the parliament to continue an Army and Taxes to maintain it.—They pretended for Religion too, and for Reformation and the Covenant, against an army of sectaries and opposers thereof; yea, they yet pretended even for the Army itself, as to the body of it, and all but a faction of officers in it, supporting themselves in power and dominion by it, that the Army might be satisfied their Arrears, and go home. And, for all these fair ends, presuming upon the parliament's unsettledness and weakness, as not able, or not knowing how, to provide for any of these things of themselves without the king, a Personal Treaty with the King must be held forth as the only sovereign salve.—Thus the people being made to depend mainly upon the king for all, and his interest made necessary to all, the other pretences were but made use of to serve his ends, and an easy way made to set up him and his interest above all.—As to the Hypocrisy of these pretences we need say nothing more; the Lord himself in our silence (even when by such pretexts, and their quick proceedings upon them, they had made such engaging work for us in all parts, as gave us no leisure to say any thing for the undeceiving of men, or vindicating ourselves, or so much as to make any public verbal Appeal to him for it) hath yet from Heaven judged them, and borne a clear testimony against them in defeating, with a small handful, the numerous parties they had thus engaged within the kingdom, and drawn from elsewhere, under the very same pretexts, to invade it; and breaking the force of those designs, so cunningly and takingly laid, and so strongly backed with advantages, as it was scarce imaginable, in human reason, all things considered, how to avoid them.—But however, working upon that unsettledness in the people's minds, which the uncertainty and divisions in your own councils had occasioned; and having the advantage of that general disposition, in a burthened and troubled people, to entertain any motions, and follow any party, pretending to end their troubles and ease their burthens against the present party in power, from whom immediately they apprehend them, they made a shift to engage multitudes to petition for these things; and thence, under the pretence of freeing the parliament from force, to raise arms and levy war against it, at best, to inforce their Petitions; and, under the notion of freeing the people from Taxes to the parliament and quarter to the Army, to make them incur greater charges and burthens for the king and his party and, by with-holding their Taxes from the parliament, to necessitate Free-Quarter again upon themselves, which before they were delivered from; and, under the notion of settling Peace and the Liberties of the kingdom, to break that we had; and engage the people in an other war on the king's behalf against the parliament and their own liberties, and to get his party, with commissions derived from him, into the conduct and management of it.—But whilst therein, with open force, they do their utmost to destroy and subdue you, they omit not the driving on of that surer part in their design, a Personal Treaty, to deceive you. To promote which they had, besides numerous and daily petitioners from all parts, deluded and drawn in, by the aforesaid specious pretences, the deluded multitude and rabble about the city, with the old Malignants, new Apostates, and late discontented party, both in the city and parliament itself; the one at your elbows, the other in your bosoms, pressing you incessantly. The lords, in every thing relating to the Treaty, closing readily with the Desires of the city Malignants, the Prince, and all your enemies; and, in their Votes for the same, going before you, and haling you after; although in things concerning the prosecution of the war in your own and the kingdom's necessary defence, especially in declaring with you against those visible enemies and actors therein, the Scots Army and others, they would neither lead nor follow. And when at any thing propounded towards the Treaty, wherein you found the very life of your cause and the kingdom's to be concerned, you were loath to give up that; and thereupon made some stick, then clamorous Petitions for a concurrence came thick from the city, with menaces insinuated; many debauched Reformadoes, the desperate Cavaliers, and rude multitude about the city, ring in your ears with railings and threats; many faithful members particularly frightened or driven out of town; Forces listed and gathering daily about you, and this the city neither taking course to restrain, nor suffering their major-general to do it; but opposing and incountering his and your authority in what he, by it, attempted for your safety and freedom; and these courses never ceased until you had fully agreed to a Personal Treaty, on such terms as his majesty himself was pleased to entertain.—By these means, and such continued usage from the city, and those in and about it, (at whose mercy you were while your Army was engaged at a distance against your enemies in arms) by that time God had broke all their forces, delivered most of them into your hands, and crushed all their hopes of availing that way, we find them at last drawn into this miserable inconvenience of a Personal Treaty with him and his adherents, who had so long and incessantly tried all interests, and wearied all friends in this and many foreign nations, by force to destroy or subdue you. In which, though we see more utter and less avoidable danger to the kingdom's cause, and to all the godly and honest people engaged with you, than before, in your lowest or worst conditions, we ever yet apprehended; yet considering the premises, and how great the change is from the Votes of no more Addresses, to (not your wonted positive sending of Propositions anew, but) a Treaty, a Personal Treaty, without any previous satisfaction or security; and a Treaty upon what Propositions he should make, as well as your own; all which both houses, yea, both kingdoms, have so often, and always before, declined, voted, and declared against, as delusive and dangerous, yea destructive, while the parliament was unquestionably most free.—We cannot but conceive that at that time, and in those Resolutions for such a Treaty, the judgment of parliament was not with due and former freedom: and, therefore, not despairing but that, as men drawn or driven into dangerous straits, you may readily entertain, or at least favourably resent, any thing of light or encouragement that may be offered towards the saving or extricating of yourselves and those you are intrusted for; we shall, with all plainness and faithfulness, represent to you our conceptions where the main Danger seems to lie, and where any way to escape; and, we hope, it will be thought no arrogance in us, or disparagement to your wisdoms, since lookers on may possibly see something the gamesters do not.—For the Evils and Dangers of this Personal Treaty: Had it been admitted to be indeed with the king's person in parliament, especially at London, and in a full condition of honour, freedom, and safety, (which had implied, that after all the trouble, loss, hazard, and the expence of blood and treasure he had put the kingdom unto, he should be admitted to his throne and office, without any satisfaction before given for what was past, or security against the like in future) the evil and danger thereof had been so visible, as nothing had need to have been said to unfold it. As it is now admitted and qualified for circumstances, (the case being as it has pleased God to make it, that the king has no power in the field, whereby to take advantages during the Treaty) we shall say nothing to any dangers of that kind, supposing no Agreement, save to wish you to consider the opportunities of laying designs for his Escape, or otherwise, and of settling future correspondences, which the company and confluence of such persons about him does afford; but we shall chiefly consider the great Evil or Danger of seeking to him by Treaty, in your present case, and of an Agreement or Accommodation to be thereby made with him, including his impunity and restitution to his freedom, revenue, dignity, office, or government.—Now, as to that, the great Questions will be, 1st, 'Whether, as your and this kingdom's case stands, such an Accommodation would be, 1. Just or good, and so desirable; or, if not, where the injustice or evil lies? 2. Whether safe, and to be admitted; or, if not, where the Danger lies? 2dly, Admitting that, upon some suppositions, it might be good or safe, Whether yet it can be so, or such a one can be had in the way and conditions of this Treaty, as the case stands? If either in the general, or in respect of your and the kingdom's present case, and of the way and conditions of this Treaty, it cannot be safe, then it concerns the parliament not to admit such an Accommodation or Agreement upon this Treaty; and, though it may be safe, yet, if it be otherwise evil or not good, then you have no reason but to use any freedom or just grounds remaining to decline it. To these Questions therefore, because the safety or danger, good or evil, in question, is chiefly in relation to the public interest of the kingdom, and not so much to particular men's, (though even the particular safety of such as have engaged for the public is not to be neglected) to lead ourselves and others to the clearer judgment in the point, we shall premise a stating of the public interest in question, in opposition to the king's, and of his particular interest opposed thereto.—The sum of the public interest of a nation, in relation to common right and freedom, which has been the chief subject of our contest, and in opposition to tyranny and injustice of kings or others, we take to lie in these things following: 1st, That for all matters of supreme trust, or concernment to the safety and welfare of the whole, they have a common and supreme council or parliament; and that as to the common behalf, who cannot all meet together themselves, to consist of deputies or representatives, freely chosen by them, with as much equality as may be, and those elections to be successive and renewed, either at times

certain and stated, or at the call of some subordinate standing officer or council intrusted by them for that purpose, in the intervals of the supreme, or else at both. 2dly, 'That the power of making laws, constitutions, and offices, for the preservation and government of the whole, and of altering or repealing and abolishing the same, for the removal of any public Grievance therein, and the power of final Judgment concerning war or peace, the safety and welfare of the people, and all civil things whatsoever, without further appeal to any created standing power, and the supreme trust in relation to all such things, may rest in that Supreme Council: so as, 1. That the ordinary ordering and government of the people may be by such offices and administrations, and according to such laws and rules, as, by that council, or the representative body of the people therein, have been prescribed or allowed, and not otherwise. 2. That none of those extraordinary or arbitrary powers aforementioned may be exercised towards the people by any, as of right, but by that Supreme Council, or the representative body of the people therein; nor without their advice and consent may any thing be imposed upon, or taken from, the people; or if it be otherwise attempted by any, that the people be not bound thereby but free, and the attempters punishable. 3. That those extraordinary powers, or any of them, may be exercised by that Supreme Council, or by the representative body of the people therein; and where they shall see cause to assume and exercise the same, in a matter which they find necessary for the safety or well-being of the people, their proceedings and determinations therein may be binding and conclusive to the people, and to all officers of justice and ministers of state whatsoever; and that it may not be left in the will of the king, or any particular persons standing in their own interest, to oppose, make void, or render ineffectual such their determinations or proceedings; and especially, since the having of good constitutions, and making of good laws, were of little security or avail, without power to punish those that break or go about to overthrow them, and many such cases may happen, wherein the former laws have not prescribed or provided sufficiently for that purpose, or the ordinary officers intrusted therewith may not be faithful, or not able, duly to execute such punishments on many offenders in that kind; that therefore the same council or representative body therein, having the supreme trust, in all such cases where the offence or default is in public officers, abusing or failing their trust, or in any person whatsoever, if the offence extend to the prejudice of the public, may call such offenders to account, and distribute punishments to them, either according to the law, where it has provided, or their own judgment where it has not; and they find the offence, though not particularly provided against by particular laws, yet against the general law of reason or nations, and the vindication of the public interest, to require justice; and that, in such case, no person whatsoever may be exempt from such account or punishment, or have power to protect others from their judgment, or, without their consent, to pardon whom they have judged.—These things contain the sum or main of public interest; and as they are the ordinary subject of civil contests in all mixed states, where they happen betwixt the people and those that have assumed or claimed a standing privilege or prerogative over them, so they have been in this of ours. And against these matters of public interest, this king hath, all along his reign, opposed, and given himself up to uphold and advance the interest of his and his posterity's will and power; first, That there might be no such Common Council, no parliaments at all to restrain or check him; but that all these matters of supreme trust, concerning Safety and all things else, might rest in him and his breast alone, without limit from, or account to, any on earth; and that all those extraordinary and arbitrary powers over the people, their laws, liberties, properties, yea, their persons and consciences too, might be exercised at pleasure by himself, and such as he pleased to derive the same unto: and as they were assumed, so how vastly and sadly ill they were exercised by him; to the prejudice and oppression of the people in general, and the ruin or persecution of all the godly of the land; yea, even of those that were but sober and honest to civil interest; surely, (unless the greater pressures he hath since wrought himself or brought upon us, by necessitating the parliament thereunto, have swallowed up the former in oblivion) we need not yet make any verbal remembrance.—To support himself in that state or height of Tyranny, and make it absolute, he raised his first and second Armies against his people in both kingdoms; when he found he could not keep up to that height to have all those extraordinary powers and matters of supreme absolute trust in himself alone, then he fell to play lower; that at least none of them might be exercised by any other without him, no not by all the trustees of the land, nor in any case, though ever so necessary for the relief or saving of the people; that if, according to his former claim, his people and parliament would not admit him positively to oppress or destroy them at his will, yet, by this latter, they should have no power to redress a Grievance, to provide for the freedom, welfare, or so much as immediate safety, of themselves or the kingdom, but at and according to his pleasure; and for this, when the parliament did otherwise assume in point of immediate safety and punishment of Delinquents without him, he raised his third Army, and held them up so long and so much, to the spoil and near desolation of the kingdom, till God wholly broke them, and brought himself captive into your hands. And in this, though he raised them with the pretence only of opposing the exercise of those extraordinary and arbitrary powers by yourselves, or any other without him, which would not be allowed himself to exercise alone; yet, in the raising and having raised that force, he did by it assume and exercise all kinds of absolute and arbitrary powers at his own will alone without parliament; and how much further he would have gone in exercise of the same, had he prevailed as you, we may easily imagine.—But as to that part of his claim against the public interest, viz. That there might be no power in parliament to provide for immediate Safety, or do ought else for the people, but at and according to his will, how obstinately, even since God gave him and his party wholly into your hands, hath he maintained and persisted in it? even so long as from foreign parts or allies, from Irish, Scots, from your own divisions, or discontents of the people at the burthens he necessitated you to continue upon them, he had any hopes, by force, to prevail against you, or avoid any concession against that claim: and of this his so many denials to the Propositions of Peace, which both houses and both kingdoms have so often tendered and renewed, yea, of those 4 only Bills, concerning purely that public interest, and but a small part of it, together with essential precautions for a Treaty, do afford abundant evidence: as to which last tender it is apparent he had no pretext left for refusal, from either scruple of conscience, matter of harshness to his party, or ought else, but the mere interest of will and power to himself and his, which some Scots and other correspondences, it seems, then gave him hopes yet, by force, to uphold; insomuch as upon that refusal, added to all the former, you found it necessary at last to take up those resolutions of no further Addresses to him, but to settle the Peace of the kingdom without him, and secure it and yourselves against him, and, in order thereto, to keep his person in safe custody at Carisbrooke Castle.—But when, his other claims so far failing, it came to this, he that before would not have allowed the parliament or kingdom a power for safety but at his will, would, at least, make you know that neither you nor the kingdom should have any peace or quiet without him; and that neither parliament nor any power on earth, whatever ills he had done, might, for it, attach or meddle with his sacred person; no not so much as to secure him from opportunities of doing more: and for this last part of his interest his fourth Army, the last war, was raised by commissions from himself to the Prince, and, from him, to as many more as would take any; and for the same the Scots Invasion was procured.—The pretext or quarrel in this last Engagement seemed, as it were, to reach no higher than only to rescue his privileged person, and force the parliament yet, in a Personal Treaty, to seek Peace at his will, and to let them see they could not otherwise have it, nor might do ought against his person, no not to secure him from doing further mischief, though he make war and refuse peace never so long.—And for this last piece of his interest, as opposite and destructive to that of the public as any of the former, though a Divine Testimony has been borne against it, as full and more glorious, if possible, than before against any of the rest; as if God would thereby declare his designing of that person to justice; yet the parliament, after all this, restoring him, without any pre-satisfaction or security, unto a kind of liberty and state, only that he might appear in a capacity to treat; and then, by treaty, seeking their Peace, and all their matters, before contended for, and, through God, gained against him, to come now as concessions from his will, do clearly yield back that last piece of his claimed interest into his hands again; and indeed, therewith, seem to render a more real acknowledgment and yielding to him, both against parliament and kingdom, as to the precedent just Right of whatever is now demanded, or granted, as from him, than all his verbal wrested Concessions or Confessions will be understood to be, unto parliament or kingdom, as to any future clearing or assurance of those things.—But, to return to our purpose. The matters aforementioned being the main parts of public interest originally contended for on your parts, and theirs that engaged with you, and thus opposed by the king for the interest of his will and power, many other more particular or special interests have occasionally fallen into the contest of each party; as first, on the Parliament's part, to protect and countenance religious men and Godliness in the power of it; to give freedom and enlargement to the Gospel, for the increasing and spreading of light amongst men; to take away those corrupted Forms of an outside Religion and Church-Government, whether imposed without law, or rooted in the law in times of popish ignorance or idolatry, or of the Gospel's dimmer light; by means whereof snares and chains were laid upon conscientious and zealous men, and the generality of people held in darkness, superstition, and a blind reverence of persons and outward things, fit for Popery and Slavery; and also to take away or loosen that dependence of the Clergy and Ecclesiastical affairs upon the king, and that interest of the Clergy in the laws and civil affairs, which the craft of both in length of time had wrought for each other; which several things were the proper subject of the Reformation endeavoured by the parliament.—Contrarywise, on the King's Party, their interest was to discountenance and suppress the power of Godliness, or any thing of conscience obliging above or against human and outward constitutions; to restrain or lessen the Preaching of the Gospel and growth of Light amongst men; to hold the Community of men, as much as might be, in a darksome ignorance and superstition, or formality in Religion, with only an awful reverence of persons, offices, and outward dispensations, rendering them fit subjects for ecclesiastical and civil tyranny; and, for these ends, to advance and set up further forms of superstition, or at least hold fast the old which had any foundation in the laws, whereby chains and fetters might be held upon, and advantages taken against, such in whom a zeal or conscience to any thing above man should break forth; and to uphold and maintain the dependance of the Clergy and Church matters upon the king, and the greatness of the clergy under him; and, in all these things, to oppose the Reformation endeavoured by the parliament.—Also, on the Parliament's Party, their interest, as well as duty, was to discountenance irreligion, profaneness, debauchery, vanity, ambition, and time-serving; and to prefer such especially as were otherwise given, viz. conscientious, strict in manners, sober, serious, and of plain and public spirits.—Contrary to these, on the King's Party, it was to countenance or connive at profaneness, looseness of manners, vanity and luxury of life; and prefer especially such as had a mixture of ambition and vain glory with the servile spirit, rendering them fit to serve another's power and greatness, for the enjoying of some share therein to themselves; in all or most of which respects, it has been the great happiness and advantage to parliamentary and public interest, that it hath been made one with the interest of the Godly, or, for the name whereof it has been so much derided, the Saints; as on the other side, the king's hath been made one with their greatest opposites; by occasion whereof God hath been doubly engaged in the cause, viz. For that, and for the righteousness of it. And to this indeed, through the favour and presence of God therewith, the parliament hath cause to own and refer the blessing and success that hath accompanied their affairs; which, accordingly as they have held square, and been kept close to this, have prospered gloriously; and, (wherein, or so oft as this hath been thwarted, swerved from, or neglected in their manage) have suffered miserable blastings.—Thus have we endeavoured to give a just and plain state of the Parliamentary or Public Interest, and the several parts of it, and of the King's in opposition thereto, which have been the ground or subject of contests all along this king's reign; and especially since this parliament began, as may appear in the beginnings, progress, and several steps of the contest: and, by what hath been occasionally said herein, some judgment may be made, how far safe or good the Accommodation is like to be that can be expected by the present Treaty. But the several and opposite interests being thus stated, we shall proceed more clearly to speak a little to the Questions stated before:—First, therefore, as to the Goodness (which first implies the Justness) of such an Accommodation we cannot but suppose, 1. That where a person, trusted with a limited power to rule according to laws, and by his trust, with express Covenant and Oath also, obliged to preserve and protect the Rights and Liberties of the people, for and by whom he is intrusted, shall not only pervert that trust, and abuse that power to the hurt and prejudice of the generality, and to the oppression, if not destruction, of many of them; but also, by the advantage of that trust and power he hath, shall rise to the assuming of hurtful powers which he never had committed to him; and indeed take away all those foundations of Right and Liberty, and of redress or remedy too which the people had reserved from him; and to swallow up all into his own absolute will and power; to impose or take away, yea, to destroy at pleasure; and declining all appeal herein to the established equal judgment, agreed upon as it were betwixt him and his people in all emergent matters of difference betwixt them, or to any judgment of men at all, shall fly to the way of force upon his trusting people; and attempt by it to uphold and establish himself in that absolute tyrannical power so assumed over them, and in the exercise thereof at pleasure; such a person, in so doing, does forfeit all that trust and power he had; and, absolving the people from the Bonds of Covenant and Peace betwixt him and them, does set them free to take their best advantage; and, if he fall within their power, to proceed in judgment against him, even for that alone, if there were no more. 2. That if after he is foiled in such an attempt, brought to quit that claim, to confess his offence therein, and give them some verbal and legal assurances of Remedy, and future Security; and his parliament and people thereupon remitting or willing to forbear that advantage against him, the same person, so soon as he finds himself a little freed from the advantage which drew those confessions and concessions from him, shall go about to avoid or overthrow all again; shall deny them necessary Redresses or Security; stop or oppose them in going thereabout; deny them all power either of Redress or immediate safety, but at and according to his will; and assume the power to avoid and oppose any thing they should do without him, who had so lately forfeited all the power he had unto them; and for all this fly to force again; raise it without limit, by it protect Delinquents from judicial proceeding; and resume and exercise again alone, even sitting a parliament, all the exorbitant and unlimited powers he had so lately disclaimed; proclaim that Supreme Council, by which he ought to govern himself and the kingdom, traitors and rebels, who had indeed so lately indulged him his first treason and forfeiture; and, on these terms, maintain a war many years against them, to the spilling of much blood, and desolation or spoil of a great part of the kingdom; try all means and interests, by divisions and parties stirred up within, and invasions from abroad, to lengthen it out longer; and after he was subdued, wholly in their power and at their mercy, to revive and renew it; multiplying disturbances, and never ceasing till he had wearied all friends in his own and neighbour nations, or so long as any hopes were left whereby possibly to prolong it; and all this merely to uphold the interest of his will and power against the common interest of his people; such a person in so doing (we may justly say is guilty of the highest treason against the highest law among men, but however) must needs be the author of that unjust war; and therein guilty of all the innocent blood spilt thereby, and of all the evils consequent or concomitant thereunto.—Now, to assume hereupon, whether the king has not, in the same case, acted all these things and more, we dare appeal to the Story and Evidence: if he has not, or can justly alledge and make it appear, that what he has acted thereof has not been for the interest of his will or power, or not against the public interest of his people; or that the parliament, or any particular party in the kingdom, have raised or continued the war for private interests of their own, and not for that public interest of the kingdom, which we have before stated; but that they might have had all that cleared and assured to the kingdom with quietness, and would not accept it; let him then be acquitted in judgment, and the guilt and blame be laid where else it is due. But if indeed he hath acted such things, and in such case, as before expressed, and all for the particular interest of his will and power against the public interest of the kingdom; then, (without mention or consideration of ought he has done against God and Godliness, or godly men; and though we have touched but a few of those many moral or civil evils acted by him, which have been judged capital in several of his predecessors from whom he claims, yet) from that alone which is before spoken of, we may, without need of his late implicit confession, conclude that he has been the author and continuer of a most unjust war; and is consequently guilty of all the treason it contains, and of all the innocent blood, rapine, spoil, and mischief to the kingdom acted or occasioned thereby; and if so, how far the public justice of the kingdom can be satisfied, the blood, rapine, &c. avenged or expiated, and the wrath of God for the same appeased, without judgment executed against him; and consequently, how far an Accommodation with him, implying a restitution of him, when God hath given him so clearly into your power to do justice, can be just before God, or good men, (without so much as a judicial trial, or evident remorse appearing in him proportionable to the offence) we thus recommend to your saddest and most serious consideration, who must one day be accountable for your judgments here on earth, to that which is the highest and most just.—Indeed both as to the justness and public benefit of such an Accommodation, we shall confess, (if there were good evidence of a proportionable remorse in him, and that his coming in again were with a new or changed heart, as to these things he hath formerly fought against, and from those he hath contended for, his offence being first judged according to righteousness) his person might be capable of pity, mercy, and pardon; and an Accommodation with him, with a full and free yielding, on his part, to all the aforesaid parts of public and religious interest in contest, might, in charitable construction, be just, possibly safe and beneficial: or if in the heat of war, before God had so clearly given his double judgment against him in the cause, or delivered him into your hands for yours; and while affairs stood in some equal balance, you then in love of Peace, which it is good to seek with all men, and for saving a further bloodshed and misery to the kingdom, (which in that case you could not otherwise avoid) had, upon a full provision for the matters in question, and good security for the future against him, made a Peace, by Accommodation with him, as by your many Addresses you endeavoured, it might have been excusable in point of prudence; though you had incurred a more remote future hazard, because thereby you had avoided another more immediate and present; yea the hazard had been less, because to what he had then agreed, all men would have accounted him bound, being then unquestionably free; and the point of justice had not then been so clearly required at your hands, because not yet altogether in your power.—But as this whole latter supposition is, by time and the good hand of God towards you, excluded the case, so neither is there any colourable Ground for the former, but evidence of the contrary: for, as to that only colour of any change of heart in him, which his implicit confession of a fault, in yielding to your first Proposition, does import; first, how slight and slender that confession is, the tenor of that Proposition may shew; and yet, had he timely, freely and clearly, confessed but so much, as from conviction or remorse, or from a sense of the hand of God against him, or had left us but a ground of charity to believe it so, we should have thought ourselves bound to regard it with proportionable tenderness towards him; or at least, should have thought it not ingenuous nor Christian to take advantage, from such confession, the more to prosecute him for it; but having so long and obstinately, both in word and practice, till now, denied it; and never confessed it, until all his other ways of force, policy, or fraud, whereby he hath attempted to justify himself, had failed him; and no other shift left, but by this forced, yet seeming yielding, acknowledgment to save himself and delude the people, until he can find or work out some new advantage; and confessing it now but conditionally, viz. So as you agree with and satisfy him in other things; which kind of confession, where the matter in question is concerning true or false, just or unjust, and extending to innocency or horrid sin, does seem to imply such hypocrisy as, we think, was never yet so proclaimed before God and the world: and when, at the same time, while thus in words he confesseth it, yet in practice he denies it still, by his continuing and not recalling his commissions to the Prince and other English rebels and revolvers; yea to Ormond and his associated Irish rebels also, all which are so contrary to that verbal confession; and by his trying all interests still to make a party against it; in this case, it were stupidity, rather than charity, nay indeed we think a wrong to his intentions, to understand that confession as from inward remorse or conviction: so that as the case stands, it goes only so far as may serve for further ground of condemnation against him; but not at all of satisfaction from him.—And admitting no such Change or Conviction, even when there are verbal confessions and concessions carrying a semblance thereof, but that his restitution would be with the same principles and affections, both as to civil and religious interests, from which he hath acted the past evils; and, after some former like acknowledgments and agreement, hath returned to the same bias upon his next advantages; then, besides the unrighteousness of the Accommodation and readmission, which is before already cleared; and besides matter of danger, which we shall shew in its place, we desire all good men to consider it as to the other point, the Public Benefit.—And here, what Fruits can be hoped from such a re-union or renewed communion betwixt those contraries God hath once so separated, viz. Of Principles or Affections of Liberty, with principles of Tyranny; principles of public Interest, with principles of Prerogative and particular Interest; principles of Zeal and the power of Godliness, with principles of Formality and Superstition in Religion; we might say indeed, of light with darkness, of good with evil, as would be implied in his restitution; to be, as it were, your head, your King again, and to have that high trust and influence in relation to our Peace, Rights, and Liberties, civil and religious, with the same principles and affections from which he hath so much and so long opposed them? for, if his Kingly Office be not of use or trust in relation to them, what needs his restitution? if it be, then this doubt holds just.—Next, to the other part of the preceding question, viz. Concerning the Safety of an Agreement for his Restitution, especially supposing no real remorse or change, but still the same principles and affections; although in the terms of the Accommodation and Restitution, you had a more ample concession of the public interest in question than you are like to have when he hath granted all you have demanded, and as full security for future observance of the Agreement as words or letters, yea oaths, can give; and though we might suppose him as true and just in the observance of such an Agreement as other kings or princes (once given up unto, and engaged upon, such principles and ways of tyranny or self-interest) use to be; yet, first in general, we might make a just appeal to the experience of ages and nations, what Danger there is in any such Accommodations, both to the public interest in contest, and to the persons or parties that have engaged for it; and we might challenge all story for one instance in the like case, viz. Where any such king, claiming and assuming such powers and prerogatives over a people beyond his bounds; and, upon opposition from the people therein, flying to force; and, in a war upon them, endeavouring to gain the same by conquest; but instead thereof losing both what he so claimed, and all he had before in a full conquest, on their parts, over him; we say, in such case, we would fain see an instance where ever, after so long a war, so much blood spilt, and such spoil made, the people having at last wholly subdued him, and gained their own cause in that way of force and conquest, to which he had so appealed, and having him and his party captivated and in their power, did either willingly subject all to question again in a Treaty with him of their own tendering; or by it seek both that public interest, (or rather but a slender portion of that which God had so wholly and freely, by his righteous judgment, given unto them) and even their own safety and indemnity therewith, to be all had as concessions from that their enemy's hand; and deeming him as a person not punishable or accountable for whatever evil he had endeavoured or done, to restore him upon such concessions to his throne again; we say, we would gladly have a parallel instance, where ever indeed any people, before this, were in the like case given up to such a preposterous and self defeating way; or an instance of almost any Accommodation of the like kind at all, with a readmission of such a person to the same office, state, and revenue, with the least shadow of the same power, or to the least footing therein, upon the same account or claim of Right, on the foundation whereof he had before assumed such powers; where such Accommodations ever proved safe either to the public interest in contest, or to the persons engaged therein; or did not prove ruinous to the one and the other, or at least end in the irruptions of new and more bloody and bitter contests about the same things, either in the same or succeeding age, and those with more hazard and disadvantage to the public interest and party adhering thereto, than the former; or where indeed any people contending, and once engaging in war against a tyrant for their liberties, did ever fully redeem and hold the same with a re-admission of him; or without, first or last, disclaiming and renouncing all dependance on him, or accord with him for the same; and an utter rejection, expulsion, and deposeure, either of his whole race, and all that claimed upon the same account of Right, or, at least, of his particular person; and execution of justice upon him, if he fell within their power.—With this latter way of proceeding we have heard of many instances of people fully recovering their Liberties, and happily retaining the same; but, without it, or in the former way of Accommodation and Restitution, we have not heard, or read, of any so succeeding. There is abundant experience to teach us how ordinary, yea, we may say constant, a thing it has been for Kings and Princes in such cases, when they could not prevail in the way of force, to leave that, and apply themselves by fraud to accomplish their ends and wills upon the people; and when, in such contests with them by the sword, they have been brought into straits, then to cry up Peace; and, under that glorious Golden Bait, which the people, wearied with war, and the troublesome and chargeable concomitants thereof, are most apt to catch at, having drawn them into ways of Accommodation, to make some feigned yielding-up of those prerogatives and advantages they find they cannot hold; and, by large promises, concessions, and assurances on any terms, to make Agreements with them, whereby to quiet the people, and get themselves into the throne again; and yet afterwards, upon their next advantage, to break and make void all again and prosecute such advantages, to the overthrow both of the public interest, and those that had engaged for it, without regard of faith or oath, further than necessity hath held them thereto, where any advantage for the accomplishing of their ends hath led them to a breach. How apt first such princes are to this, and next how easy it is for them, when they find advantages, to find occasions also, and pick quarrels to make a breach, even with a colourable saving to their faith and honour, engaged in such Agreements; and lastly, how easy also, after they are so got into the saddle again, and the people, by their fair concessions, promises, and engagements, lulled into a security, to find or work out such advantages to themselves; and prosecute them to greater prejudice both of the public and the particular persons engaged for it, than before such contests begun, or without such accord thereupon, they could have done; as experiences do abound, so there wants not reason enough to teach us.—For the first: Where a Prince is once given up to that Self-interest of his will and power, so as to make it his highest end, or, at least, to prefer it above the public interest and welfare, yea above the safety and peace of his people, (as, when he makes war against them for it, it is apparent he does) and to prefer it above Religion too, (as is evident, when he attempts the moulding and forming of Religion to subserve that end) such a person sure cannot want any principles of falsehood, cruelty, or revenge, suitable to such an end; neither in reason is it like that he will regard any engagements of faith or oath, or stop or boggle at any thing of that kind, further than necessity does hold him thereto, or where a necessity or advantage, for the accomplishing of that his highest end, does lead to a breach. And indeed, when the bonds once accepted by him with unquestionable freedom, at his admission to the throne, the bonds of law, yea the fundamental bonds of trust betwixt him and his people, the very Covenant of Peace, yea the Oath of God betwixt them, would not hold him; but of his own mind, without occasion before given, have been all violated by him: and, to justify himself, and protect his instruments in that, the law of force, admitting no bounds but power, hath been chosen and set up by him, and prosecuted to the utmost in a long and bloody war; how can it be expected that the bonds of new Concessions and Agreements, with whatever assurances, that are but verbal or literal, being imposed by force upon him, or yielded to from nothing but an invincible or powerful necessity, can be of more awe or regard with him, or power to hold him, when any advantage to gain what he sought, or recover what he lost, does offer itself? and as for Revenge; how natural it is for a prince, so given up to that self-interest of will and power, and how necessary to his interest to seek and prosecute revenge against all eminent opposers, and much more the oppugners thereof, we wish your own reason, and the experience of others, may rather warn you, than that you should put it to trial in your own cases.—And hath your and our experience of the king, with whom we have to do, given Cause to hope better things from him, in these respects, than other ages or nations ever found from other princes in the like case? First, for point of Faith-keeping, besides his first numerous breaches of his original faith to his kingdoms in the whole manage of his government and trust before the wars, witness his accords with the Scots nation, and how he kept them; his seeming compliances in part with this parliament, in the time of his straits, and feigned acknowledgments of past errors, with promises of redress and future amendment, until your bounty, in paying off the Scots and English armies, at that time, had delivered him from those straits; and then, so soon as you came to those particulars which should have effectuated that redress and assured future Remedy, by tying his hands, and deterring others from the like exorbitances, immediately flying out again to higher and greater; and, first by policy, then by force, going about to overthrow those foundations of Remedy which he had granted in the ascertaining of this parliament, &c. And let those many particulars of hypocrisy, dissimulation, and treachery, couched under his fairest overtures, professions, and protestations, which yourselves in several Declarations have observed and recorded, bespeak what cause there is to confide in his promises or engagements.—As to his Innocency in point of Revenge, witness those petty revenges, after several parliaments, and yet some of them extending to death through hardship of imprisonment, which were sought and taken against such patriots as had, in them, appeared but to assert the common liberties against his interest. Witness his attempts of higher, in the proceedings against the Members he impeached; and let the several designations of some to the slaughter, some to exile, others to prisons, all to misery of one sort or other, which, upon any hopes of prevailing in the former or latter war, have been made against his eminent opposers amongst you, suffice to teach you and your adherents, what mercies might be expected from him and his party, if he ever had, or yet shall gain, the advantage over you.—Next, for the Facility of a Prince's finding occasion and quarrel after such an agreement to make a Breach, when he finds his advantage, and yet with some colourable saving to his honour: we know, in all mutual Agreements, where each party grants and takes, and something is to be made good by each party towards the other, how easy it is to find, or pretend a failure of full performance, and thence to avoid the obligation to the Agreement; and especially in agreements of state, if all matters of power, trust, and right are not fully cleared and determined, so as to state the Supreme Trust and conclusive judgment, to all intents and purposes, fully and absolutely in one party or other, but that something be left divided, or at least suspended, betwixt them; in such case, how easy is it for the party that is loser by the Agreement to find, or feign, an intrenchment of the other beyond the stated bounds, and thence to make a new breach when he sees his advantage for it? but however, when any thing within the compass of what was so left suspended does, in practice, come to question and difference, and neither party trusted singly to conclude, there is a clear foundation for a breach; unless they either agree to lay the matter aside, which perhaps the gaining party cannot do, and so, by the loser's mere standing off, may be necessitated to appear the first actor in a breach, or else come to a new agreement upon every such particular.—We know, besides, what Court Maxims there are amongst the King's Party concerning some Fundamental Rights of a Crown, which the king cannot give away; and their common scruple whether a king, granting away such or any other hereditary crown rights, can oblige his heirs or successors, or exclude their claim: but if all other pretexts fail, their non-obligation to what is wrested from them by force, in a powerful rebellion, as they count it, will serve such a king's conscience for a shift to make a Breach, where he finds his advantage. And are not all these occasions or pretexts obvious in our case? To say nothing of the matters of Supreme Power and trust, which, though all your Propositions be granted, will yet be left divided or suspended, not only betwixt the several houses, but betwixt them both and the king; nor yet of the imperfect bargaining for several parts of it, which, by the tenor of the Propositions, are taken, some, as it were, by lease, all by grant, from the king, so as to confirm rather than weaken his claim of the original Right to be in him and his; from both which kinds of defect or uncertainty in the Agreement there will be left many apt occasions, and particular grounds, for a breach when time shall serve. It is not apparent that, from that more general consideration of the condition of the king in this treaty, and the force or necessity lying upon him, a ground of evasion or exception lies to the whole agreement, as not obliging on the king's part, whatever concessions or assurances are so drawn from him? what account the king and his party do upon that ground make of the Treaty, besides the common voice of them all in all corners, That the king, good man, is merely forced to what he grants, we may see it publicly and authentically, avowed by the Prince and his Council, in his Declaration in Answer to the earl of Warwick's Summons of the revolted Fleet at Goree; where, besides other passages hinting the same thing, the Prince clearly says, 'The king, in truth, is still in prison, with such circumstances of restraint, as, to say no more, are not usual in the case of the most private person; and whose delivery and freedom therefrom all his subjects are obliged to endeavour, by the laws of God and man, to their utmost hazard (p. 1028); and afterwards invites the earl of Warwick to join with his highness, in the rescue of his royal father from his unworthy imprisonment. This being in Answer to that Summons, wherein the earl of Warwick invited the Ships to come in upon that very ground, that the king and parliament were in treaty for Peace, we can take to intend no less than a plain disavowal of this Treaty, and a disclaimer of whatever shall be concluded thereupon; and, coming from the Prince and his council, consider him as heir-apparent, it serves at least to acquit himself and posterity from being concluded by what his father in such case shall consent unto, to the prejudice of the crown; and, consider him as having, by his unlimited commission as generalissimo, the highest power of the kingdom which the king could devise to give; and so he and his council, while the king is in durance, being the next visible head of the king's party; and having the highest trust in relation to the interest of the king, his crown, and party; it is also, on the king's and their behalf, the most authentic Declaration of their sense of the Treaty, which could well be expected in the case, while the king and his council here, being supposed under force as to all things else, cannot be supposed free in that point to declare his real judgment; and so it may serve in behalf of the king, his heirs, and whole party, as a Protestation against any conclusion by this Treaty, or whatever shall therein be drawn from him to his own or their prejudice. And, indeed, the king himself, in divers of his Papers that have come from him to you in relation to this Treaty, has, in such soft language as might befit the condition of your prisoner, insinuated the same sense of the Treaty, and his condition therein, and of the validity or repute of any conclusions thereupon, while his condition should remain the same, and not more free. And these several Declarations and Insinuations hereof being sent, those from the king, immediately to yourselves; that from the prince, his general, to your admiral, and from him to your own hands; and both being sent you during the Treaty, before any conclusion upon it, will remain upon record before you perpetual witnesses against the validity thereof, or any obligingness as to them. Nor is it his or their sense alone, or without grounds to gain belief, but, (considering he is but so small a step removed from the Castle, where he was your absolute prisoner, and still confined within the town or island, which is your garrison; and so remaining under the power of your guards, and even in that condition being but upon his parole) we doubt the same sense and judgment thereupon will be aptly made and received, by intelligent spectators both of this and neighbour nations, and by ages to come; and that the degree of enlargement you have afforded him, with the petty state added, will be understood but as a mock-liberty and counterfeit of state, intended only to set him up in some colourable posture and equipage to be the more handsomely treated with; but not as a setting him free from your force, or leaving him free in what he grants, so as to render it obliging when granted: and though, as to the reality of the case, there might be freedom enough to make his concessions in honesty obliging, or his absolution therefrom at least disputable, yet he, and the Prince in his behalf, having, as is before expressed, in the best way they could, declared to you beforehand their sense to the contrary, as to his and their part, his condition in the Treaty standing as it was; if you, after such fair and timely warning, would needs yet proceed in Treaty, without alteration of his condition or the terms of it, and come to conclusions therein to bind up yourselves, who will not say he and his party had reason so far to comply with your proceeding upon it; and yet account that, as to any obliging on their part (whether he were really under duress or not, yet) their timely precaution to you concerning their contrary sense of it, was a sufficient acquittal of them, not only from being bound by any agreement upon it, but from any imputation of deceitful dealing with you, though they observe not what shall be so agreed upon; since, after such precaution from them, it was your own fault, and at your own peril, if you proceed with them upon so rotten a foundation; so as if you be cozened, you cozen yourselves, and cannot blame them or any body else for it.—And truly this consideration, as (when we first took notice of those Passages in that Declaration from the Prince, and the King's Papers) it did more awaken us to consider your hazards in this Treaty than before; so it serves most clearly to set forth the miserable straits and snares you are thereby intangled in: To look no further into particulars, that great and dangerous evil, of old so much declined and abhorred by you and our Brethren of Scotland, and more lately so much struggled against by yourselves in the previous debates concerning this Treaty, viz. the King's Return to London, and to his parliament and throne again, without Satisfaction and Security before given, is thus at last like to come upon you; and that upon worse terms, if you proceed in this Treaty to conclude yourselves and re-admit him, than if you had let him come without any foregoing Agreement at all; for had you let him come so, both yourselves and he being free, if then he had granted any thing of Satisfaction or Security, all men would have accounted him bound by it, and the concession valid; or if he had denied you necessary things in that kind, your further proceeding in other ways to secure yourselves and the kingdom against him, would have been thought more necessary, just, and clear: and though, being at liberty, he had personally headed his party in the City and elsewhere, with greater advantages than ever, to assert once more his old quarrel in a new war, yet you had known the worst of it, viz. to fight it over again only so much the sooner; but in the way you are now engaged in, the king has the advantage to yield to any thing at last which he cannot get you to abate; and yet when, having granted all, he gets, upon your own terms, to his beloved seat and throne again, behold he is free, as if he had granted nothing, to take the best advantage against you when he sees his time; and mean while may rest secure in a good condition and wait his advantage, having got your hands bound; till he, finding it, shall strike the first stroke again, which it is like he will make a sure one, if he can, to disable you from a return.—We proceed to the next consideration, viz. How easy it is for a Prince, after such Accommodation, admitting him either not bound, or not conscientious of his bonds, or having occasions or pretexts for a breach, to find or work out advantages, whereby to overthrow all he has granted to the public interests; and, in the ruin of those that engaged against him for it, to set up his own above all; which, for brevity, we shall not so much consider generally in the common advantages which princes in such case usually have, as particularly in those which this king clearly has, or is like to have, in this of yours.—The king comes in with the reputation, among the people, of having long graciously sought Peace, although indeed ever since he found you in condition to oppose his force, it was his interest and his best play; and especially since you had beaten his force, it was his necessary and only play. He comes with the reputation of having long sought it by a Personal Treaty, which at last has proved, as he prophesied, the only effectual means; and so you having so long denied that, and only plied him with peremptory Propositions, and yet at last granting it, are, in that self-condemnation, rendered by his friends, as having deceitfully or unnecessarily continued burthens, and refused Peace so long, in refusing that the king's way, in which you might as well have had it sooner as now; although the truth is, neither the Treaty, nor the personality of it, have advanced the business one jot; since the king grants now the same things, and in the same terms, which he has so oft in particular denied, yea, protested and sworn he would not; and the alteration is far enough from conviction by Treaty, as is before demonstrated, and visibly from a greater necessity or advantage found now to induce the yielding than formerly. He comes also with the reputation of having granted, for peace sake, all that you, as unwilling to peace, have rigidly stood upon; although, when it is summed up, it will appear of very little advantage or security to public interest; and, by a trick or reserve that he has, of none at all, as before is shewed: however, with the people, he carries these and the like points of reputation before him, and wants not trumpets every where to blaze them sufficiently to his renown, and your own reproach. Under such banners of love and honour, he comes in the only true Father of his People, you being proved their cruel foster-fathers; he the Repairer of their Breaches which you had made; he the Restorer of their beloved Peace, Ease, and Freedoms, which you, as his creatures render it, had ravished or cheated them of thus long; he the Restorer of their Trade and Plenty too, which you had thus long obstructed; he, as a Conqueror in sufferings and patience, a Denyer of himself for the good of his people, and what not that is glorious and endearing. And thus would the people be lulled, and indeed cheated, into a security, as to any further apprehensions of evil from him, yea, possessed with acknowledgments and expectations of all their good from him, and their jealousies awakened against you and your adherents only. And yet, to heighten the same more into perfect hatred, you (as wise, yea as honest men, for their safety and interest, though they see it not) must continue an Army and Garrison still; and that not the less, but much more for his coming in again, than if you had taken another course utterly to shut him out, as we shall shew anon; and so you will be necessitated, notwithstanding the Accommodation, to continue Taxes and Impositions for maintenance of that force, to the burden and grievance of the people, and the greater increase of their discontents and hate towards you: for if after this Accommodation, to ease and satisfy them, you shall ever disband your forces, while the king is at his liberty, and in his throne again, you give him his end or wished opportunity, in laying yourselves, your adherents, and the public interest, all level again with him and his, as if you had never prevailed, nor had any advantage over them; and so, for all your Satisfaction and Security, you are at the king's courtesy still; and, if he will break, you are but where you were at first, and the public interest nothing advantaged or secured by ought obtained or done in the war; but the king in the same, or much fairer possibility to revive the old quarrel, renew his force with greater advantage, and put you to fight it over again, or rather may carry it without fighting; since, after so much blood, and cost; and trouble for nothing, it is not like you will find a competent party for the opposing of him ready to engage again on the same terms; and if he gain any strength to appear for him, which who can doubt when your forces are disbanded, considering what a numerous party he has engaged to it in interest and necessity; some inclined to it by principles and temper, others in humour and discontent against the present government; the generality of the people (wearied with the former war, whereof they have found so great misery, and so little fruit) if they see a strength on his part threatening a new war, and none ready on your part to balance it, which might hold them at least in neutrality, will surely be more apt to join unanimously with him, or let him have what he will, that there may be no war, than join with you to maintain another war, to so much prejudice and so little purpose as they have found the former. And if, to appease the king and his enraged party, a sacrifice of those that opposed him in the former will serve the turn, the people, it is like, will be so far from sticking at that, as it is some question to whom it would be more acceptable, the king or them; the people, by the cavaliers clamorous and cunning suggestions, and the advantages you have given thereto, through the unsettled, endless, and fruitless ways of trouble you have held them in, being already pretty well possessed, and by that time like to be further persuaded against you, as if in all this war you had merely cozened them, so as you are like to have their hate no less, as for abusing them, than the king's for opposing him.—If to secure that little Advantage to Public Interest, which in the present way you will have gained, or rather to prevent a total loss of all thereupon, you continue a sufficient strength, and therewith Taxes and Impositions to maintain it; these, as they are always grievous to the people, so they will, after the Peace supposed to be settled, be so much the more discontenting, by how much they may be then deemed unnecessary; for the king, having in the terms of Accommodation, granted what yourselves did ask; and therein such supposed Security, as that you need not fear new troubles, though few will consider wherein that little security does lie; or at least (by his yielding as it were for peace sake, to all your demands) having given, in the people's apprehensions, such assurances of his love to peace, as that no danger of new war or trouble seems to be feared from him; in this case the continuance of forces and taxes will surely be thought no further needful for any public end; for, in common judgment, if war made soldiers needful, then surely peace must render them needless; and therefore it will be aptly thought, if yet soldiers be kept up, and taxes continued, it is surely either for the gain, or advantage, or some private design of those that continue them; and upon these grounds, with unwillingness and backwardness to pay taxes, and discontents at the burden of them, there must naturally grow up jealousies and heart-burnings against those that require them. These to foment and inflame to the height, and thereby to sweeten and endear the king with the people, will be his and the Cavaliers surest play; and otherwise to sit that while, if they have but the patience, as still as lambs. How colourable and plausible will it be for them to suggest, and how apt for the people to receive, That the king is no way to be blamed for any of those burdens; he, good man, has yielded to any thing, and done what he could, that there might be no need of them, and now he gives no consent to them, but the parliament does them without him, and have bound up and excluded him from his wonted negative voice therein, otherwise he would refuse and hinder them: but being not in power to help the people, he can only pity them in these Things; and now they may see what they gain by their parliaments, or how much it is to their common prejudice, as well as the king's, to have the king in any particular excluded from his Negative Voice, and the parliament free to proceed in aught without him. And thus easily may the people, from their common unwillingness to part with money, although for their real safety, be at once inflamed into a refusal and opposition therein; and deluded into a resentment of that which is the king's interest, as if it were their own, and so engaged with and for him and his party, as having one common cause with themselves. And if thus they be once heightened but into a resolved withholding of payments for the maintenance of that necessary strength you keep for the common safety and peace, you must then either give the king his end and advantage, as is before expressed, in dissolving your forces, or else use extraordinary ways of power and rigour towards the people, to enforce such necessary payments; this will still enrage them higher against you, and serve to endear and engage them more to the king and his interest, colourably in point of their liberties then, as well as their ease before; until at last the people, for both, being raised against you, and therein joining with, and being headed by, the King and his Party, whose interest so far seems one with theirs, you, unless you will give up all, must come to make a war against the poor deceived people for that which is really their own cause: and the king by the people, as it were for their proper liberties and interest, may make war against you, to the erecting of his own, and the overthrow of the common interest, both yours and theirs. For solution of which seeming riddle, much needs not to be said, since what you contend for is their general, fundamental, and perpetual Liberties; for the preservation whereof you will be forced to press upon them in particular matters, against their present ease and freedoms; and the people being ordinarily more affected with the latter, as more immediate and sensible, and less with the former, which are more remote and to them less intelligible, the king closing with them under pretence of the latter, which they can feel, may easily engage them to the prejudice of the former,

which they hardly discern.—By what we have here said it may, by the way, appear how much it is for the king's interest and advantage, since he cannot carry all by force or war, to make a Peace on any terms, though in words never so much to the diminution of his power, if thereby he can but secure himself, and get into his seat again; and consequently we may the better guess how far conversion, or conviction, hath place in his present yielding to things he hath so often said and sworn he never would; and in his granting now, at the motion of his English parliament, what he hath so often denied at the pressing instance of both kingdoms: for having sufficient proof of your present forces, that they will neither be drawn to serve his turn themselves, nor easily suffer others that would; and having found, in the last summer's design, that it would not perfectly take with the body of the people, to cry down your Army, though with decrying of Taxes to boot, while no seeming Peace was settled; no, though with the cry for their Disbanding, they cried up Peace, and a Treaty in order to it: he therefore now sees he must clap up a Peace on what terms soever; and, that done, his way is clear. The Parliament then may easily and soon be put to it, to denude themselves of their strength in a Disbanding, and so set him even with themselves again; or else, if they refuse, the people may be wrought to undo all for him, whatever he hath granted, without his appearing to make any breach for his own interest. And as, upon this single Ground, many nations before us, by like Accommodations with their beaten tyrants, have, from the fairest attempts and hopes of liberty, fallen to an utter loss of it, yea to an absolute bondage, and been made the instruments thereof themselves; so by this one consideration, though there were no more, it may appear how easy it is for any Prince, and particularly for ours, after such an Accommodation made, and himself restored, to find or work out advantages, whereby to overthrow what he hath granted, raise his own interest higher, and depress the public lower than ever before: and yet we have touched but one of those many Advantages that, in such case, lie clear before him. We might reflect upon that of his numerous party, engaged by interest, necessity, and otherwise, to serve him so long as he remains in a possibility to head them; towards whom proceedings have been such, as have served to embitter and enrage them unto, and yet not disable or discourage them from further attempts against you; and towards whom, by his continuing king, you will be the more necessitated to proceed still upon the same strain in both respects. We might mention also their great families and relations, and their interest or influences within the kingdom; and we might enlarge upon the consideration of the two other kingdoms he hath to work by, from which we have found such powerful parties ready to serve his interest; the one to make prize and advantage of this kingdom; the other at least to deliver themselves from your yoke, by helping to put his upon your and our necks: all which, if they were to be feared, when he hath been in no capacity to head them, as in the last Summer's War, then much more when he shall so be; and though they be much to be feared in relation to his heading of them, while he by his supposed impunity, whatever he does, hath encouragement to make all possible trial of them; and they hope, that if ever he prevail, he may make them amends, or procure their impunity at last; yet, that being once confuted by an example of Justice upon him for such attempts, they would not then be, in divine considerations, at all to be feared, or, in prudential considerations, not so much, in relation to his posterity's heading of them.—Besides these, we cannot but consider much more the vast possibilities, after his restitution, to make Parties, Factions, and Divisions amongst yourselves, and your now adherents; and to set one against another, to make one betray another, so by one to ruin another; and, by making use of all interests, to set up his own above all. Have not you found him at this play all along? And do not all men acknowledge him most exquisite at it? If he has had the faculty to avail much in this kind when at a distance from you, will he not much more when so near you, amongst you, in your bosoms and councils?—For Divisions, we speak it with depth of sadness, he needs not come to make any amongst you, but to use them; they abound wofully already; and for his opportunities of advantage by them, they are great beyond conception. 1. From the Jealousies which each party is apt to have of the others strengthening themselves, to the prejudice of the other, by conjunction with him and his; and which he and his creatures have a faculty to feed in each of them, it is more than probable that each party will be apt to strive which shall most and first comply with him: Have not you and we seen sad experiences of this already? Give us leave to be more affectionately sensible of this, as having had some experience of temptations towards it amongst ourselves: We say temptations towards it from the King and his Party, as strong and subtle as are imaginable, though we bless God, by whom we were preserved in our integrity, and not given up to, but delivered from, such wretched apostacy. And we can truly say, That although, (through the example of others, partly necessitating us for the present prevention of that mischief to the public they were running into in that kind, as we apprehended) we were drawn into some negative compliances, tending to moderation, which we thought to be, and in its place is, a real good; yet first, we never sought, but were sought unto; and notwithstanding all overtures and temptations, we did abhor the thought of, and still professedly refused any thing of conjunction with him or his, in relation to the affairs of that time, or aught of private contract or trust with them. 2. What we declared of Moderation was but hypothetical, with careful caution and a saving for the public interest according to our then understanding of it. And, 3. We aimed not at the strengthening of ourselves thereby, to the ruin of any persons or party opposed, nor did drive at any such end; but merely to prevent any such from strengthening themselves in that kind, as we feared, to the prejudice of the public; as may appear by the tenor of the City's Engagement, with the concomitants and consequents thereof, and by our carriage both in relation thereto, and since that danger was over: and yet, however, in that degree of compliance admitted in that kind, we find matter of acknowledgment before the lord, concerning our error, frailty, unbelief, and carnal councils therein, and we bless him that preserved us from worse: yet, on the other side give us leave to fear, (and we heartily wish, as to any honest soul, that it may be a causeless and mistaken fear) that from such private Jealousies, and the animosities or hate of one party against another, who once seemed to be engaged in one common cause against a common enemy, there have been on the part of others evil compliances, negative and positive; yea, we doubt, contracts and conjunctions too, by some sought, by others entertained with him and his party, (even while an acknowledged enemy) to the neglect or depending of the common public interest, merely for the upholding or strengthening of their own, and the ruin of the party particularly opposed.—We cannot but be sensible of this, because we have felt the effects of it in the loss of many of our dear innocent friends lives, with the hazard of our own, in the last Summer's War: for even from this root, as we have more than conjectural grounds to understand, the Revolt in Wales had its rise and growth; the Scots Invasion had its foundation and invitation; the Revolt of the Ships; the Rebellion in Kent, Essex, &c. and the several Tumults, Risings, and Disturbances in and about London, and the Southern parts, had their instigation and encouragement; and, from the same, this miserable ensnaring Treaty, its conception and birth: and if from the divisions we have, such destructive compliances and conjunctions have been entertained with, and such advantages given to, him and his party, while professed and acknowledged enemies; what worse may we not expect of that kind, when, by a Peace made, they shall have the reputation of friends to give countenance and confidence thereunto?—To conclude this point, concerning his Advantages after Accommodation and Restitution, to overthrow or prejudice the public interest: we will confess our greatest fears are, from the consideration of the Act for this Parliament's unlimited Continuance; wherein, besides divisions amongst those that are, or profess to be, for the public, if he shall ever be able, by particular successions of new burgesses, according to the present constitution, or any other way, to form a prevailing or balancing party for his interest in the house of commons, which even there he seems to have bid fair for already, (for as to the Lords, we will move no question) we may then justly yield England's liberties for defunct, when that which should be the conservative, shall be turned indeed the bane; and yet, it being in the place and repute of the only conservative, we shall, through that act, be debarred from change of medicine, or use of other remedy; yea, from the renewing or taking fresh choice of medicine in the same kind, but must keep to that old mass, which such putrefaction will have rendered deadly, and will probably vitiate all particular additions of fresh ingredients that shall be made, while the old leaven shall remain predominant.—Neither can we see any possible help in the case after his Restitution, though you should be willing to lay down your power: for, indeed, to set a period to this parliament, and not therewith provide for a certain Succession of Parliaments, and the certainty of their sitting also, without dependence on the king's will, were to leave the kingdom without assurance of any remedy; or, at least, of power therein to help at all, and so in like condition as before this parliament: and to make provision for such a Succession, and certainty of sitting of future parliaments, without like provision for a more due constitution, by more equal elections; freed from such dependence on prerogative grants, or from being so subject to prerogative commands, as now by the number and nature of burgess-ships they stand, were to render the Succession less hopeful or safe, or at least subject to no less corruption in the same kind, than the constitution of the present is; and you having not in this Treaty propounded any provision for any of these things, which we dare boldly affirm are of the highest concernment to the vindication and preservation of public interest in the very fundamentals of it; if you go on to make a Peace upon such terms, as if this parliament were to continue for ever, and set the rest of all our hopes upon that basis, we may justly presume, that when a Peace is made, and the king restored, if afterwards you would come to considerations of laying down your power, and making such provisions for Succession, as is before expressed; the king, whose consent you still seem to make necessary to such things, though it is like he would readily consent to be rid of this parliament, so as to have no more but at his call for their meeting, and his will for their continuance; or perhaps so as to have no better provision for the one, or larger for the other, than the Triennial Bill; yet, as to full certainty in the one, or sufficient enlargement in the other, without relation to his will; and much less as to the taking away of Burgess-ships dependent on his grant, and subject to his and his great men's command; and the reducing of Elections to full equality and freedom: we say, on such terms we may well presume, from the reason and nature of the king's interest, he will not willingly, when after Peace made he needs not, give up his hopes of or against this parliament; but rather than he will make, or bring upon himself and posterity, such an entail of parliaments as he can never hope to avoid, and those to be so independent on his will for their meeting or sitting as he can never hope to avoid, and constituted so equally according to the interest of the people, as he can never hope, or cannot design how, to pack to his own, he will prefer and stand to his fairer hopes of making his party good with this parliament one way or other, viz. either in and by it, by making a party in it as before expressed, or else against it, by making use of discontents and impatience in the people towards it, and of divisions within itself, at last to destroy and overthrow it; and so to deliver his crown, once for all, from Wardship, as he counts it, to parliamentary power; which, by the other conditions might have been perpetual: and if, either in the one kind or the other, he prevail upon this parliament, his monarchy and our slavery will be absolute, and probably for ever; in the one, by seeming authority of parliament made immortally the same; in the other, by the utter extinction of it.—But to proceed from Probabilities of Danger, to shew the certain Insecurity and perpetual Prejudice to Public Interest, that an Accommodation with him, and Restitution of him, in the present case does imply: suppose the best constitutions and strictest laws imaginable in any state, yet their insufficiency and impotency, as to the preserving of public interest, without a power to punish those that violate it and them; or where persons in power to prejudice the same, especially if in fixt and lasting power, shall stand privileged from being punishable, whatever they do, is obvious to each considering man; the power of punishment, and the having of it in the most trusty hands, and no particular persons to be exempt from their justice, being that essential part of public interest, which is the fence and guard of all the rest in the depraved state of mankind: now, in our present case, after so many, so great and lasting violations thereof, committed by the king, and by his procurement; and after his so long and obstinate maintenance thereof, and persistence therein, and so many refusals of that poor Satisfaction and Security you now desire, in so much as you once resolved against any more Addresses; we say, after all this for you, the Supreme Judicatory of the Kingdom, when he is, through the just Hand of God, in your power to do justice upon, yet still to decline that way; and, instead thereof, to seek again to him your prisoner in the way of Treaty, to receive what Satisfaction and Security you can get as concessions from him; and thereupon, having only some few instruments submitted to Justice, and that by his concession too, to re-admit himself to the throne with safety, freedom, and honour; what can this be understood to speak less than that, as himself and his party for him have still expressly assumed, and as the pretence and ways of your proceedings towards him heretofore have too much implied, he is indeed above any human Justice, and not accountable to, or punishable by any power on earth, whatever he does; and so, besides the bar to any present proceeding of Justice against himself, whose one example in that kind made, and not afterwards made ineffectual again, as others of that kind have been, by the flattery or degeneration of succeeding ages, would be of more terror and avail than the execution of his whole party; yea, than all the Satisfaction and Security, verbal or literal, that you can obtain or imagine without it: you would also, by such Exemption of him, and in such a case, proclaim the like perpetual Exemption to him and his posterity, whatever they shall do, or in whatever case, since none can be imagined more pregnant or ripe for Justice than this already is; and would therein give the most authentic testimony and seal that ever was, to all these destructive Court Maxims concerning the absolute Impunity of Kings, their accountableness to none on earth, and that they cannot err, do Wrong, &c. which principles, in the sense to which they are applied, as they were begot by the blasphemous arrogance of tyrants upon servile parasites, and fostered only by slavish or ignorant people, and remain in our law-books as heir-looms only of the Conquest; so they serve for nothing but to establish that which begot them, Tyranny; and to give kings, (who, so far as they claim otherwise than by Conquest, are but ministers intrusted for righteousness and peace) the highest privilege, encouragement, and invitation to do wrong and make war, even upon their own people, as their corrupt wills or lusts shall prompt them. If therefore our kings claim by right of conquest, God hath given you the same against them; and more righteous, by how much that, on their parts, was extended to a forcible dominion over the people, which originally or naturally they had not; and ours but to a deliverance from that bondage, into that state of Right and Freedom which was naturally and morally due to us before: if they claim from immediate Divine Designation, let them shew it: if from neither, but as by consent intrusted by and for the people, let them then embrace and partake the conditions of such; and not, as if the whole people were made only for them, and to serve their lusts; or had, if not their being, yet, all their civil endowments by and from them.—But to return to our purpose: If you, by such proceedings as you are about towards the king in the present case, shall confirm and harden him and his posterity in their assumed Privileges of Impunity, &c. whatever is or shall be done by them, what new agreement, or other bond of man's framing, can you suppose to hold them, and especially himself that has broke the strongest of that kind already; and we appeal to your consciences upon the Reasons before given, what inward change

you find in him, to be trusted, but that he and they, upon the same confidence of Impunity to themselves, whatever they do, or however they succeed, will still be ready to take all advantages, and try all means, so long as they can find any instruments that will serve them, to set up their own interest, to the prejudice of the public, as heretofore; and especially to avenge or vindicate themselves and it against the supposed wrong of enforced concessions?—And why shall we not think they will find instruments still to venture for them, notwithstanding your punishing of some in that kind, since while your own proceedings admit themselves unpunishable? such instruments may hope that, at the worst of success, they will save all, or most of them, as now; and, themselves still surviving to renew the quarrel, it may well be hoped, that if ever they prevail, the instruments that shall survive, and heirs of the rest, will be repaired with honour to boot; so that the adventure of each Instrument in that kind, being but as of one amongst a multitude, where the most are sure to escape, is of far less hazard than a soldier's venture in a field battle; and the hazard that is, especially to necessitous or ambitious men, is abundantly recompenced by those hopes which the certain Impunity, besides probable advantages, of their head does give. We are sure that, as to any Instruments venturing again for you and the public, the hazard is infinitely greater; and, in human considerations, no encouragements comparable to those which, after all your Proposition-Justice against his Instruments, will yet, upon this ground, remain to them for any further Engagements in behalf of their great and unpunishable master. And therefore, as in all cases of like rebellions or civil wars, the prudence of most nations and ages, as well as the justice of the thing, has led to fix the exemplary punishment, first upon the capital leader, and upon others as nearest to him, and not to punish the inferiors and exempt the chief; so in this your case it is most clear, that to fix your justice first upon the head, and thereby let his successors see what themselves may expect, if they attempt the like, may hopefully discourage them from heading any more what instruments they might find in the like quarrel; and so is like to be a real Security, when such Instruments cannot find an head: but to punish only Instruments, and let the head, by whose power, and in whose interest, all has been done, not only go free, but stand in perpetual privilege and impunity to head such Instruments again, as oft as he can find opportunity, and get any to serve him, is a way so far from security, as it leads indeed to endless trouble and hazard, or the perfect loss of all. And besides, in point of Justice, with what conscience inferior ministers can be punished, and the principal set free, yea, restored to dignity and honour, for whose only interest, in whose only quarrel, and by whose commissions and commands, they have acted, which they might perhaps conceive to oblige, or at least to excuse them, for our parts, since we have seriously weighed it, we cannot understand: we are sure it seems a most unequal and partial way of justice, suitable to those aforesaid corrupt or abused Court Maxims, whereon alone it has been grounded; as, That the king can do no Wrong, &c. And indeed, whatever Grounds or Reasons can be imagined to exempt kings from human Justice, or to excuse them when they wilfully give commissions and commands unto their inferior ministers to do evil, (which we are sure can be no less than something of Divinity, and absolute Independency, as to men, supposed to be in them) the same principles, if admitted and fully weighed, would equally extend to absolve and indemnify those ministers for what they do in pursuance of such Commission and Commands; yea, and bring those under condemnation too that should forcibly oppose him or them therein. We would at least fain hear one principle sufficient for the one, which would not, by rational deduction, extend to both the other. And if there be none such, then we beseech you consider, whether your re-admission of the king, in the present case and manner, without so much as his subjecting to Judgment or Trial, will not be so far from Security, as that it will not only enervate the best fence of public interest, the power of punishing violators of it, but, in consequence, shake the foundations of all you have done in the war, and overturn or invalidate all you seem to obtain in the peace.—Upon this, and the rest of the considerations aforegoing, we crave leave to believe that an Accommodation with the King, in the way and terms you are upon, or any at all, as the case now stands, that shall imply his Restitution, or shall not provide for his subjection to Trial and Judgment, would, 1. Not be just before God or man, nor hopefully good; but many ways evil, and so not desirable by any honest heart that well considers it. 2. Would not be safe, but full of hazard and danger; yea, certain prejudice, disadvantage, and destruction, both to the public interest in question, and to the persons that have engaged for it, except such as, by base apostacy from it, and treacherous services for the king against it, have, or shall have, merited their pardons. And, 3. If in another way or case it possibly could be safe, which we see not, yet in the present Treaty and condition the king is in, it cannot.—Now if any observe and object, That the Grounds aforegoing, upon which we conclude thus, would extend as well against any Accommodation with him since his person came into the parliament's power, or at least against any Restitution of him thereupon, without his first submitting to Judgment, and a change of heart and principles; and consequently would have served as well against that Accommodation with him, and Restitution of him, which the Army seemed once to plead for; we shall confess it as to the main, and we have only this to say, 1st, That your whole pretence and way of proceeding towards him before, and at that time; the state you have kept him in; your particular Engagement to the kingdom of Scotland for another Address to him; and your preparation towards the same at that time, had wholly led us on in the supposition of an Accommodation to be still endeavoured with him, and to that supposition only our then overtures to you were framed; and you had not then, as since, by your Votes of No farther Addresses, and your Reasons for them, cleared our judgments from that former mist, and led us out to the thoughts of other ways of Security against him; nor had pointed towards the way, as thereupon you have done, in taking off his state, and close imprisoning his person. And we confess that, since our thoughts have been thus set free, and led out that way, besides the good Reasons you gave, and what they further discovered or implied, and besides what other pens have enlarged thereupon, the more we our selves have considered, the more and further it hath pleased God to let us see beyond what we did before: so that your bare retracting of Votes, or changing your course, without better or any Reasons given, cannot put out the light which your former Votes with Reasons have let in, and God hath given his seal and increase unto. 2dly, Your then councils, and, with them, our thoughts, being so fixed upon that way of Addresses to him, we thought it lawful for us to tender to your consideration some things to be provided for therein, which were of highest and most fundamental concernment to the public interest, and not thought or not touched on in your former Addresses or then preparations; as, concerning the Succession, Constitution, and clearing the Power of Parliaments in future, &c. which accordingly we propounded to be taken in with most of your former Propositions; and whatever we expressed exclusively, as our private opinions at that time, yet our whole overtures being but as Proposals to you, and not immediately to the king, it was far from our intentions, as it was apparently from our practice, to prejudice or preclude your councils from any farther or better provision for the public interest, or in any surer or better way. 3dly, Since you had so far engaged in the way of Addresses, we had some apprehensions then, as from the Covenant and other considerations, that, to acquit yourselves and adherents before God and the world, in relation to the snare you seemed to be in, it did something lie upon you to make one Address for all, upon things concerning purely the public interest, and only essentials thereunto, without mixture of any bye matters; from which either you, with safety to the public, could possibly recede, or against which he might have colour to boggle, as it were, from conscience or other specious pretences, and not his own interest only; that so you might at once make a full and clear trial whether you could, with and by his consent, have such security to the public interest, as that you might, with the preservation and safety thereof, preserve also his person and honour, as in your Covenant; or whether he would refuse that Security to public interest, merely for the upholding of his own in opposition thereto, without other cavils, pretexts, or evasions: and accordingly though, we may truly say, we never pressed you so far in point of Address to him, as that you did ever actually make any, at our instance, or according to our overtures; yet, after that, he had escaped from the Army, and quitted any pretext of obligation upon it, in relation to their desire of any such Address, you did of yourselves make such an address, in the tender only of four Bills, concerning singly the public interest, and but a small part of it, merely for necessary Security to it and yourselves, in order to a Treaty for all the rest; in which tender of yours we found clear satisfaction in our reasons and consciences, as to our aforesaid scrupulous apprehensions: and answerably (when you, upon his refusal, resolved against any more Addresses to him, and began to take another course with him) we did upon that very Ground declare our acquiescence in your Votes, and our resolutions of adherence to you therein, as may appear in the Paper then presented to you from the Army: and yet when we have said all this, or whatever might more be said in our excuse, we will, upon the Grounds here before laid down, which have since been more clearly made out to us, acknowledge it our weakness, our error, and our fault, both as to the matter and terms we propounded for an Address to him, in respect of deficiency or insufficiency therein; and also as to our desire of any such Address at all, as the case then stood, in respect of the needlessness and insecurity thereof, and want of justice therein; although we see and own the providence of God, who ordered it for the best, that you did make such a one.—Now, if yet any shall object the Covenant, as perpetually obliging to endeavour the preservation of the king's person and authority; and consequently not allowing any such way of Security against him, as would be to the hurt of his person, or prejudice of his authority; and so concluding us under a necessity of perpetual Addresses to him for security, until he give it, as being the only way consistent with the preservation of his person and authority: to this we answer, That indeed the Covenant, heaping together several distinct interests, which are, or possibly may come to be, inconsistent, or one destructive to the other, or at least may be so made use of; and yet engaging positively for them all, without expressing clearly and unquestionably which is chief and perpetual; and for the rest, how far, and upon what conditions the Covenant shall be obliged to them, and what shall disoblige him, we find it is, as other promissory Oaths of that kind, apt to be made a very snare; serving to draw in many of several judgments and affections, each in respect to that interest therein engaged for, which himself does most affect; and so those that make least conscience of the oath, make but an advantage of it upon all occasions, to cry up that interest which themselves prefer, though to the destruction and prejudice of the rest, yea of that which is really the main and best; while those that make most conscience of the Oath, and affect the principal and honestest part in it, are often with-held from what is just and necessary in relation thereunto, being staggered in regard to the prejudice it may be to the rest, to which jointly they seem obliged. But this Covenant, as it is drawn, though it have something of that ensnaring nature, yet, as to this point, has not left the takers without an honest way out; or if it had, yet, through the Providence of God, the snare is broken, and they may escape.—For, First, The Covenant engaging to the matters of Religion and Public Interest, primarily and absolutely, without any limitation; and, after that, to the Preservation of the King's Person and Authority; but with this restriction, viz. 'In the preservation of the true Religion and Liberties of the kingdoms?' In this case, though a Cavalier might make it a question, yet who will not rationally resolve it, That the preceding matters of Religion and the Public Interest are to be understood as the principal and supreme matters engaged for, and that of the king's Person and Authority as inferior and subordinate to the other? And if so, then we appeal to all reasonable men, whether those words, 'in the Preservation of the true Religion and Liberties,' can be understood as a restriction of our endeavours for preservation of Religion and Liberties, so as the same may not be endeavoured in any way that would be to the prejudice of his Person or Authority; or not, surely, as a restriction to the Engagement for preservation of his Person and Authority, so as to oblige thereto no further, nor in any other way, than shall be consistent with the preservation and defence of the true Religion and Liberties of the kingdoms? Yea, might it not justly be so understood, that the obligation to preserve his Person and Authority, should be fulfilled in (as well as not extended further than) the Preservation of Religion and Liberties? In some of these senses those words must be understood, or else they have none; but are vain words, making a vain Oath. If they were to be understood in the first sense, then, we are sure, the whole proceedings of both kingdoms, in making and maintaining war against him for Preservation either of Religion or Liberties, were questionable for breach of the Covenant; since that way of preserving them did tend probably to the destruction, and was without any safe provision for the defence either of his Person, or of that authority that can properly be called his, or understood in conjunction with his person; but that therein his person might probably have been destroyed under the sword, or by a bullet; yea, was ordinarily endeavoured to be so, as well as the persons of others in arms with him; and that authority of his was certainly opposed and endeavoured to be destroyed thereby, instead of being defended.—If these words be to be understood in either of the latter senses, then it follows, 1. That if, by reason or experience, the ordinary lights men are in human things to walk by, we find that the making of Peace with him, and therein the preserving or restoring of his Person or Authority, is, as the case happens, either an unrighteous thing (in respect of the blood and spoil he hath caused in opposing that Covenant ever since it was made and tendered; and of his never coming in or ceasing that mischief, till by force reduced, and by the hand of God delivered into the power of your justice) and, in these and other respects, not consistent with true religion; or else that no inward conviction, remorse, or change of heart and principles rationally appearing in him, it be not safe, but full of visible danger, if not certainly destructive, to religious or public interest, or to the persons that have entered into that Covenant, or engaged in the common-cause; then surely, by the Covenant itself, the preservation of his Person and Authority is not to be endeavoured so far, or such a way; and consequently such a Peace with him, in such a case, is not to be sought or admitted, or at least the Covenant obligeth not to it, but against it; and whether the present case and consequences be not such, we refer to our several Reasons before given. 2. From that sense it also follows, that if, by the same light we find that, supposing no Peace to be made with him, the continued preservation of his Person in your hands, though close in Carisbrooke-Castle, or the letting him go whither he will to preserve himself, and your forbearing to bring him to account or Judgment for ought he has done, (when God has so given him into your power, and given you so clear Grounds of proceeding against him) would be either an unrighteous thing, and so inconsistent with true Religion; or so far inconsistent with the Preservation and Defence of Religion and liberties, or with your covenanted utmost endeavour to preserve them, as that it would visibly expose them, and those that have engaged in Covenant for them, to perpetual danger; give perpetual occasion and advantage for new wars and designs, to the destruction of them, or to the multiplying of blood and oppression upon the kingdoms; give the king and his posterity a perpetual privilege of impunity, and therein an invitation or encouragement to multiply attempts of the like or greater mischiefs, though to the overthrow of all Religion and Liberties; yea, would give encouragement also to instruments to serve them in such attempts; and thus would harden the hearts both of them and their instruments in such things, to the ruin and perpetual prejudice and danger of those higher things covenanted for, and persons covenanting; and, lastly, would in consequence debar you from that which is the best fence, yea, essential to the defence of Public Liberties, and positively covenanted so, viz. the punishment of any the violaters thereof, if his ministers, and by his commission; or would render your necessary proceeding against such, unequal or scandalous; then surely to the exempting of him from Justice, and a continued preservation of his Person, so far, or in such a way, and in such a case, the Covenant cannot be understood to oblige, but rather to the contrary: or, if it might be so understood, doth it not call for explanation to clear it from being understood in so wicked a sense? yea, if it did, by the advantage of words, extend to such a sense past explanation; and if so, through error, inconsideration, or deceit in the framing of it; or through flattery, evil custom, or unbelief and carnal policy in the passing of it, you had literally engaged yourselves, and drawn in others to be engaged unto so wicked and mischievous a thing, did it not call for repentance when you find such wickedness in it? and rather than unnecessarily to continue yourselves, and hold others, under but a colour of obligation to a thing so evil, so full of prejudice and danger unto, and so inconsistent with, the Security of so many other unquestionably good things; to which in the same Covenant, as well as by immutable duty, you stand obliged, would it not call for your utmost consideration and endeavour, so far as providence has left you any occasion, without sin or wrong, to extricate and clear yourselves and others from such a snare?—In order to which we proceed and say, Secondly, That whatever, or how expressly soever, the Covenant may seem to have engaged unto, or possibly might have said or purported any thing in the king's behalf, or to his only benefit, yet, as God has ordered the business, it does not now oblige you at all before God or man, in that matter. For, 1. Considering it only as a Covenant betwixt man and man, as for the civil parts, it is, where many or several persons joining to make a mutual covenant or agreement, do therein covenant for some things to the good and union of themselves amongst themselves, who are present and parties to it; and, withal, do make a covenanting clause therein for something else to the good or benefit of another person, not present, nor party to the agreement; but whom and whose interest, in regard of some concernment of his in their business, or from good affection to him and desire of Peace with him, they would willingly provide for as well as for their own, to the end he might join with them in the Agreement, and partake the benefit thereof as well as themselves; we say, in such case, if the absent party, as he never required it, so when it is tendered to him for his conjunction, shall not accept the agreement, but refuse to join it; and, conceiving his interest prejudiced thereby, shall oppose it, and begin, prosecute, and multiply contests with all the Covenanters about the matters contained in it; surely that person in so doing, as he keeps himself free and no way obliged thereby, as to what concerns the rest, who concluded it of their own heads, so he excludes himself from any claim to any benefit therefrom at their hands as to what concerns himself, while he continues so refusing and opposing; and by his once refusing upon a fair and full tender, though he had done no worse, sets the other Covenanters free from any further obligation, by virtue of that Covenant, as to what concerns his interest or benefit therein, although the Covenant, as to other matters concerning the right and benefit of the Covenanters one from another, stands still obliging and in Force; and whatever they shall afterwards do to him, though indeed contrary to the letter or intention of such clause in their Covenant on his behalf, yet it cannot, by virtue of that Covenant, be understood as a wrong to him; and, consequently, not a wrong to any other, before God or man, since none but he, though it had been made or accepted as mutual, could challenge the benefit of it. Now whether this be not your case in relation to the King in this Covenant, witness your making and taking of it without and against his consent; witness his oft and continued refusals to accept or join in it; his opposing and fighting against yourselves and others, both in and for the taking and prosecuting of it; and as for the intention of putting that clause concerning him into the Covenant, though made in his absence, and without his consent, it cannot, by the general nature of such Covenants, be understood to be that by it yourselves should be obliged to that of his interest absolutely, whether he would accept or join in the Covenant, or refuse and oppose it; but only to exhibit your care, and shew how willing you were, really to go as far as you could therein, that he and his interest, so far as just, might be provided for therein as well as your own and the kingdom's; and that you had no design to exclude or prejudice his, if he would accept and join in the Agreement as to the other; and even so the words added to, and closing up that clause in the Covenant do import, viz. 'That the world may bear witness with our consciences, of our loyalty, and that we have no thoughts or intentions to diminish his majesty's just power and greatness.' 2. Considering it as an Oath, the form of an oath added to that of a Covenant, makes it no other than a Covenant still, but taken as in the presence of God, and only adds the calling of God to witness, as to the truth of your intentions and faithfulness of your endeavours to perform what it, as a Covenant, obligeth unto; and look how far it, in the nature of a Covenant, as to any particular matter obligeth: so far, and no further or otherwise, doth that calling of God to witness engage him the more to avenge any falsehood in your intentions, or unfaithfulness in your endeavours to perform it. And this is all the enforcement which that Form of an Oath addeth to that of a Covenant, without obliging to any further matter, or for any longer or more absolute continuance than it, as a Covenant doth oblige; and therefore wherein, and upon what supposition soever, the obligation ceaseth as a Covenant, that enforcement also ceaseth as an Oath; so that if, as a Covenant, it oblige not to his benefit, upon supposition of his refusal or opposal, upon the same, it inforceth nought to his benefit as an oath. If any object, That in what we have here said we, who profess to dislike the imposing of the Covenant with any penalty or prosecution against refusers, do seem to take advantage against his majesty for refusals; we answer, We say not for, but upon; and if no other penalty be ever put upon Covenant Refusers, save not to claim benefit by it, we shall ever acknowledge that to be most just and reasonable against ourselves, if refusers.— Having thus endeavoured to remonstrate the Danger and Evil of the way you are in, and cleared the way unto what we have to propose, we shall, with the same plainness and faithfulness, give you our apprehensions of the Remedies; for which purpose upon all the reasons and considerations aforegoing, we proceed to offer as followeth. First. We conceive and hope that, from what hath before been said, you may find abundant cause to forbear any further proceeding in this evil and most dangerous Treaty, and to return to your former Grounds in the Votes of Non-addresses, and thereupon proceed to the settling and securing of the kingdom without and against the king, upon such foundations as hereafter are tendered; but if, notwithstanding all the Evils and Dangers remonstrated to lie even in the Treaty itself, you will yet proceed in such an evil way, we shall at least desire that you make sure to avoid that main venom and mischief attending it, viz. The King's Restitution with impunity, &c. and that imperfect bargaining for partial justice against inferior offenders; and for the avoidance of these we propound, 1. That you would reject those Demands of the King, sent to you on his and his party's behalf, and especially in relation to that concerning his Restitution or Return to London with Freedom, &c. that it may be expressly declared and provided by you, that, notwithstanding any thing concluded or to be concluded in this Treaty, the Person of the King may and shall be proceeded against in a way of Justice, for the blood spilt, and the other evils and mischiefs done by him, or by his commission, command, or procurement: and, in order thereto, that he be kept in safe custody as formerly. 2. That for other Delinquents you would lay aside that particular bargaining Proposition, which as we understand, the king hath refused in the terms you offered; and whereby all your justice and mercy too would be rendered, both for the matter, qualifications, and circumstances thereof, to be dependent upon particular contract with and grant from the king, and not upon the judicial power of the kingdom in parliament; and that instead thereof it may be declared and provided by you, that all Delinquents shall subject and submit to the aforesaid judicial power, to be thereby proceeded against according to justice, or with mercy, as cause shall appear, and that none shall be exempt or protected therefrom, nor pardonable by any other power than that of the kingdom in parliament, by which they shall be judged. This we propound, to the end that public justice and the interest of the kingdom therein, may be vindicated, salved, and satisfied; and yet, when that is so provided for, and in some fittest examples of justice upon chief offenders shall be effectuated, we wish as much mercy and moderation to the generality, upon their submission, as formerly we have both desired and used, or as can consist with the public interest and safety, and with competent satisfaction to those that have engaged and suffered for it. If, in relation to the former of these provisions, viz. concerning the Person of the King, it be thought an unreasonable or unbecoming Demand in a Personal Treaty, that one party, after concessions to the other in all the matters of right, and other things in question, should agree, besides, to be punished himself for having made the past contest about them; we confess it might be thought so in a Treaty betwixt parties standing both free, and in an equal balance of power or possibilities to obtain the cause; but so far as a Treaty can rationally or properly be with a party wholly subdued, captivated, and imprisoned, or in the power of the other, to such a treaty such Demands, if otherwise just, are very suitable and proportionable; and, in any Treaty, it seems surely no less suitable to demand the principal to justice than the accessories, that were but his necessary and proper agents in the contest, especially where he is as much, if not more, within the other party's power as they, and where it is not so much a demanding him to justice, as a proviso that, being already in the power of their justice, they will not exempt him from it.—Thus, therefore, the power of Justice and Mercy being saved or reserved: we proceed in order to the actual dispensing thereof, in relation to the late Wars; and, thereby, to peace with God, and present quiet amongst men, to propound as followeth: 1. That the capital and grand author of our troubles, the Person of the King, by whose commissions, commands, or procurement, and in whose behalf, and for whose interest only, of will and power, all our wars and troubles have been, with all the miseries attending them, may be speedily brought to Justice for the treason, blood, and mischief he is therein guilty of. 2. That a timely and peremptory day may be set for the Prince of Wales and the duke of York to come in and render themselves; by which time, if they do not, that then they may be immediately declared incapable of any government or trust in this kingdom, or the dominions thereunto belonging, or of any kind of right within the same; and thence to stand exiled for ever, as enemies and traitors to die without mercy, if ever after found and taken therein; or if by the time limited, they, or either of them, do render themselves, that then the Prince for his capital delinquency, being in appearance next unto his father's, may either be proceeded against in Justice, or remitted, according as upon his appearance he shall give satisfaction or not, concerning his being drawn into the rebellious Engagements he has appeared to head. And the Duke, as he shall give satisfaction or not concerning his carriage in and since his going out of the kingdom, being without leave, and in opposition or contempt of the parliament, and to the prejudice of the public peace, may accordingly be considered as to future trust, or not: but, however, that the Estate and Revenue of the Crown may be sequestered, and all the matter of costly pomp or state suspended for a good number of years, while the desolations and spoils of the poor people made, by and in behalf of that family, and for that vain interest, the state and greatness thereof, may be in good measure repaired or recovered; and that the Revenue, saving necessary allowances for the Children's maintenance, and to old servants and creditors of the crown, not Delinquents, and also the 100,000*l.* per Annum, voted to the Crown in lieu of the Court of Wards, may, for those years, be disposed towards public Charges, Debts, and Damages, for the easing and lessening of the people's contributions towards the same; so as the Estates, neither of the friends to the public interest, nor alone of the inferior enemies thereto, may bear wholly the burden of that loss and charge, which, by and for that family, the kingdom or the good people thereof have been, or, for future Security, shall be put unto. 3. That, for further satisfaction to Public Justice, capital Punishment may be speedily executed upon a competent number of his chief Instruments also, both in the former and latter war; and, for that purpose, that some such, of both sorts, may be pitched upon to be made examples of Justice in that kind, as are really in your hands or reach, so as their exception from Pardon may not be a mockery of Justice in the face of God and men. 4. That exemplary Justice being done in capital punishment upon the principal author and some prime instruments of our late wars, and thereby the blood thereof expiated, and others deterred from future attempts of the like in either capacity, the rest of the Delinquents, English, in relation to the wars, may, upon their submission and rendering themselves to justice, have mercy extended to them for their lives; and that only fines may be set upon them, with reasonable moderation, but with respect to public damages, and their persons further censured, and declared to be incapable of any office or place of power or public trust in the kingdom; or of having any voice in elections thereto, at least for a competent number of years; that also a short and peremptory day may be set, by which time all such Delinquents may have final warning to come in and render themselves to Justice, and to tender their submissions to such fines and censures as aforesaid; and that such of them as shall so do by the day assigned, and shall, withal, pay in or secure their fine, according to reasonable time given, may have their Sequestrations taken off, and be restored to their Estates; and that to all such, as also to all those that have already submitted to Fines or Compositions, and paid in or secured the same, a general Pardon may be granted, made, and published by parliament, extending to absolve them from any further censure, damage, trouble, or question, either in the behalf of the public, or at the suit of any private person, for any thing said or done in prosecution of, or in relation to, the late War or Troubles; and to restore them to all privileges, benefits, and immunities equally with other people, excepting only the capacity to places of power or public trust, or to voices in election thereunto as aforesaid; that so they may not, as heretofore, after fines or compositions to the state for their delinquency, remain subject to any man's action for any particular act of their delinquency, to their endless trouble or undoing, or the driving of them to desperate ways of public disturbance for their own preservation; but that such of them as will, for future, live in peace and subjection to the laws and government of the nation, may enjoy the benefit thereof, and have quiet and protection under the same; and their posterities, yea, or themselves, in time, partake fully and equally with others of the common interest contended for, and obtained. But as for such Delinquents, who, having mercy tendered to them for life, as aforesaid, shall not, by the day to be set, come in and render themselves, submit, and pay, or secure their Fines as aforesaid, that it be declared their Estates shall from that day be absolutely confiscated, and sold or disposed of wholly to the public use; and their persons to stand perpetually exiled as enemies and traitors, and to die without mercy, if ever after found and taken within the kingdom, or the dominions thereto belonging; and upon their default of appearance, &c. as before, or at the said day, that they be from thenceforth proceeded against accordingly. 5. That the Satisfaction of Arrears to the Soldiery, with other public debts, and the competent reparation of public damages, especially and primarily of such as voluntarily engaged for, and have constantly adhered to, the common cause, and suffered for the same, may be put into some orderly and equal, or proportionable way; wherein, as to Debts and Damages, care may be taken for some precedency of satisfaction to such whose loans or losses appear to have been great, and livelihoods small, so as they can worst bear the want or delay. And towards these things, not impairing any other security already given for Arrears to the Soldiery, in an equal way, or for just Debts of other Kinds, we propound, That the Fines or Compositions of Delinquents may be disposed of, and employed to those uses only, as also the confiscations and proceed of their Estates who shall be excluded from Pardon, or not come in by the day to be assigned, as in the last precedent Article.—Now, after public Justice, and therewith the present quieting of the kingdom thus far provided for, we proceed in order to the general Satisfaction and Settling of the Kingdom as followeth: 1. That you would set some reasonable and certain period to your own power, by which time that great and supreme trust reposed in you shall be returned into the hands of the people, for and from whom you received it, that so you may give them satisfaction and assurance, that what you have contended for, against the king, for which they have been put to so much trouble, cost, and loss of blood, hath been only for their liberties and common interest, and not for your own personal interest or power. 2. That, with a period to this parliament, to be assigned as short as may be with safety to the kingdom and public interest thereof, there may be a sound Settlement of the Peace and future Government of the kingdom, upon grounds of common right, freedom, and safety, to the effect here following: First, That, from the end of this, there may be a certain Succession of future Parliaments, annual or biennial, with secure provision: 1. For the certainty of their meeting, sitting, and ending. 2. For the equal distribution of Elections thereunto, to render the house of commons, as near as may be, an equal representative of the whole people electing. 3. For the certainty of the people's meeting, according to such distributions, to elect, and for their full freedom in Elections: provided, That none who have engaged, or shall engage, in war, against the Right of the parliament, and Interest of the kingdom therein, or have adhered to the enemies thereof, may be capable of electing, or being elected, at least during a competent number of years, nor any other who shall oppose, or not join in agreement to this Settlement. 4. For future clearing and ascertaining the power of the said Representatives; in order to which, that it be declared, That, as to the whole interest of the people of England, such representatives have, and shall have, the Supreme Power and Trust as to the making of laws, constitutions, and offices, for the ordering, preservation, and government of the whole; and as to the altering, repealing, or abolishing of the same, the making of war or Peace; and as to the highest and final judgment in all civil things, without further appeal to any created standing power; and that all the people of this nation, and all officers of justice, and ministers of state, as such, shall in all such things be accountable and subject thereunto, and bound and concluded thereby: Provided that, 1. They may not censure or question any man after the end of this parliament, for any thing said or done in reference to the late Wars, or public differences, saving in execution of such determinations of this parliament, as shall be left in force at the ending thereof, in relation to such as have served the king against the parliament. 2. They may not render up, or give, or take away, any the foundations of common Right, Liberty, or Safety contained in this Settlement and Agreement; but that the power of these two things last mentioned shall be always understood to be reserved from, and not entrusted to, the said representatives. 5. For Liberty of entering Dissents in the said Representatives: That, in case of corruption or abuse in these matters of highest trust, the people may be in capacity to know who are free thereof, and who guilty; to the end only they may avoid the further trusting of such; but without further penalty to any for their free judgments there.—Secondly, That no King be hereafter admitted, but upon the election of, and as upon trust from the people, by such their representatives; nor without first disclaiming and disavowing all pretence to a negative voice, against the determinations of the said representatives or commons in parliament; and that to be done in some certain Form, more clear than heretofore in the Coronation Oath.—These matters of general Settlement, viz. That concerning a Period to this Parliament, and the other particulars thence following hitherto, we propound to be declared and provided by this parliament, or by authority of the commons therein, and to be further established by a general Contract or Agreement of the People, with their subscriptions thereunto; and that, withal, it may be provided, That none may be capable of any benefit by the Agreement, who shall not consent and subscribe thereunto; nor any king be admitted to the crown, or other person to any office or place of public trust, without express accord and subscription to the same.—We have thus plainly and faithfully propounded our Apprehensions, how the Evil and Danger of the present Treaty may in good measure be avoided, and our farther conceptions of a way, wherein hopefully, through the blessing of God, if most men be not given up, some to unjust domination or particular interest, the rest to servitude, the kingdom may be quieted, future disturbances prevented, the common Rights and Liberties provided for, and the Peace and Government of the Kingdom settled to a just public interest; and this we have set forth in such Heads and Particulars, which, if you will but set aside, for the time, less important matters, may most of them be brought to effect, and the rest assured and put into a good way of effect within a few months; so as you might then ease the kingdom from the burden of the greatest part of that force, which otherwise, in case of Accommodation with the King, you will be necessitated for a much longer time, probably for many years, to keep on upon the public charge, unless, upon the Accommodation, you would give up all to the king's power again, and expose those that have engaged against him, as sacrifices to his and the Cavaliers revenge: and, for our parts, let but that way of Justice be effectually prosecuted, and the settlement of the Public Interest, upon such foundations as are afore propounded, be assured to us and the kingdom, and put into a course of effect, (which, as we said before, might well be in a few months) and we shall not only embrace with cheerfulness, but shall, with eagerness, desire a discharge from our present service; and shall be most ready to disband all, or part, as shall be thought fit, the Arrears of the Soldiery being satisfied. We shall therefore earnestly desire, that these things may be minded and prosecuted effectually; and that nothing may interrupt them, save what shall be for immediate and necessary safety: and that, to avoid interruption from such things as are not necessary, or less proper for parliamentary considerations or debates, you will leave all private matters, and things of ordinary justice and right, to the laws and present proper officers and administrations thereof, until better can be provided; and commit all ordinary matters of state to the management of a fit Council of State, sufficiently empowered for that purpose, and assisted with the addition of some merchants in relation to the balancing, security, and advance of Trade, so as you may be the more free, for the present, to attend those aforesaid considerations of Public Justice, and the Settlement of the Kingdom upon just and safe foundations of Public Interest; and that when you have effectuated them, or put them into a way of effect, you may, for the aftertime of this parliament's continuance, more entirely apply your councils to such other things as are the most proper work of Parliaments, and by and for which parliaments have had their esteem in this nation, and the kingdom most benefit by them, viz. the Reformation of Evils or Inconveniences in the present laws and administrations thereof; the Redress of Abuses and supplying of Defects therein, and the making of better constitutions for the well government and prosperity of the nation; as also the due proportioning of Rates, and providing of Monies, in the most equal and least grievous ways, for all necessary uses of the public, and the like: and, in order to such things, that you would, in due time and place, viz. after public Justice and the general Settlement, consider such special Overtures of that kind, as have been tendered to you in the Petitions of Well-wishers to Public Good; and particularly in that large Petition from many about London, dated the 11th of Sept. last, and also what shall be tendered of the like kind from others; that so what is really for the Remedy of common Grievances, or the Advancement of common Good, may not be slighted or neglected; but that evils in that kind being removed, and good things ordained and provided by you, for the ease, benefit and prosperity of the people, in all things possible, you may, when you come to lay down your trust, leave a good savour behind you, both to the name of Parliaments, and also of men professing Godliness, so much as this house hath done, and therein chiefly to the honour of Almighty God, who hath, in his rich grace and mercy, done such wonders for you and us. And for furtherance to all these ends, since the heart of man is deceitful and corrupt above all things, and most apt to answerable councils and actings, where it can hope to walk in the dark, undiscerned or undistinguished, though but to the eye of man, we must again desire, that even from henceforth the aforesaid liberty of entering Dissents, as it is in the Scots Parliament, where lately there hath appeared a most useful effect of it, so also may be admitted amongst you; or at least that in these transactions, of such high moment to the public and all honest interests, and in times so apt to deceit, defection, and apostacy, that liberty may be taken by all honest faithful Members, that desire to appear, as their hearts to God, so their ways to good men: yet still we wish not, whoever should by that means be detected for corrupt counsels, that, for his judgment there, any advantage should be taken without doors; but only that men may avoid the further trusting of such persons, and that the innocent may not be unjustly prejudiced or suspected.—Thus as the exigence of the case and nature of the business requires, being of such vast importance to all public, religious, and honest interest, not in this kingdom only, but in neighbour nations, we have dealt with all plainness and clearness as God hath enabled us; and now, to conclude, we hope that, in an age of so much light mere will or resolution will not be held forth or pursued against it; but that, what reason or righteousness there is in the things we have said, will be considered and followed: nor let it find prejudice with you from any disdain towards those from whom it comes, being in the condition of an Army, looked upon as servants under you, since servants may speak to their masters, and ought to be heard and regarded, even when they speak for their own right only, and rather when they speak for the good and safety of them they serve; but much more when they speak of that wherein they have some joint interest with them; and yet more when, those their immediate masters being themselves also servants and trustees for the benefit of others, they speak for the interest of those for whom both are employed.—By the Appointment of his Excellency the Lord-General, and his General Council of Officers

JOHN RUSHWORTH."

Debate upon the foregoing Remonstrance from the Army.] This long Remonstrance occasioned very high debates. Mr. Whitlocke writes*, "That some members inveighed sharply against the insolency of it; others palliated or excused the matters in it; and some did not stick to justify it; but that most were silent because it came from the Army, who, they feared, would do as they had done formerly." Another Contemporary Writer is much more particular*: he informs us, "That this Remonstrance was no sooner read in the house of commons, but the Independents began to applaud it highly; of which the principal were sir Peter Wentworth, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Holland: the latter of whom having moved, That the Thanks of the house might be returned to the Army, for this their so seasonable Remonstrance, Mr. Prynne answered, 'That it was so far from being seasonable, that it was subversive of the law of the land, and the fundamental constitutions of the kingdom; and that the effects of it could be nothing but desolation and confusion.' Mr. Maynard argued as if he had taken fees on both sides; one while magnifying the gallant deeds of the Army, and observing that, under God, they had saved the kingdom; then, firking them for their Remonstrance, and shewing how it tended to the destruction of the kingdom and the dissolution of government: yet others wanted not courage to lay the case open very plainly; saying, 'That it became not the house of commons, who are a part of the Supreme Council of the nation, to be prescribed to, or regulated and baffled by, a Council of Sectaries in Arms.' A city-member said, 'That the house ought not to be discouraged, but proceed in the Treaty to an agreement with the king, if possible; for that, upon so just and righteous a cause, they would not want the hands, hearts, and purses, of many thousands to back them.'—The Independents perceiving by these speeches, and the discontents and frowns of many in the house, that the Army was like to reap small thanks for their Remonstrance, moved, 'That it might be debated presently, or put off no longer than the morrow at farthest, that so the sense of the house upon it might be returned speedily by way of answer.' To which it was replied, 'That the Remonstrance in itself was tedious; and the particulars in it very many, and of too great moment to be debated, with sufficient caution and discretion, upon so short warning;' and thereupon a motion was made for putting off the debate for a week; which we find, by the Journals, was agreed to without a division.—But this delay gave so great disgust to the Officers who had brought up the Remonstrance, and attended in the lobby in hopes of a different Resolution thereupon, that they followed several of the Members down stairs with menacing speeches; saying, 'They must and would have their Remonstrance debated out of hand, or the house might take what followed.' A threat which they fully made good, as will shortly appear.

The Seven Delinquents to be excepted from Pardon.] Nov. 21. This day both houses agreed, That the seven persons excepted from Pardon should be Wm. earl of Newcastle, George lord Digby, sir Marmaduke Langdale, sir Rd. Greenville, David Jenkins, esq. sir Francis Doddington, and sir John Byron.

An Additional Proposition touching Scotland.]
Nov. 22. The lords agreed to the following Additional Proposition, voted by the commons the day before, "That such Agreements as shall be made by both houses with the kingdom of Scotland, for the Security of all those of that kingdom who have assisted or adhered to the parliament of England; and for the settling and preserving an happy and durable Peace between the two nations; and for the mutual defence of each other, be confirmed by act of parliament."

Further Proceedings of the Commissioners treating with the King in the Isle of Wight.]
Nov. 24. This day came a Letter from the Commissioners for the Treaty, enclosing several Papers, and, amongst others,

The KING'S ANSWER concerning the votes of both Houses, which declare Part of his Majesty's Answer concerning the Church to be unsatisfactory.

"Newport, Nov. 18, 1648.

"C. R. In Answer to your Paper of the 17th inst. whereby you have acquainted his majesty with the Votes and Resolutions of both houses of the 11th, and thereupon desired his full consent to the several parts of the Proposition mentioned in those Votes, according to your former Desires, contained in your Paper of the 25th of Sept. concerning the Church; his majesty saith, That he hath well weighed and examined his concessions to that Proposition, and is very sorry to find that, notwithstanding all his care and endeavours to give his two houses satisfaction, manifested in four Answers already given in to you upon that subject, by which he hath consented to whatsoever he dare with a good conscience grant, yet his Answers are still returned back unsatisfactory.—But his majesty, upon perusal of your former Papers, finds that the main dissatisfaction of his two houses rests in the matters concerning the Abolition of Bishops, Sale of their Lands, and his majesty's intention to use a Form of Divine Service in his Chapel.—As to these particulars his majesty doth again clearly profess, That he cannot, with a good conscience, consent to the total abolition of the function and power of Bishops, nor to the entire and absolute alienation of their Lands, as is desired, because he is yet persuaded in his judgment, that the former is of Apostolical institution, and that to take away the latter is sacrilege. Neither can his majesty communicate in a public Form of Divine Service, and administration of the Sacraments, where it is wholly uncertain what the minister will offer to God; and therefore he cannot recede from his former Answers in any of those particulars. And if his two houses shall seriously consider how that his majesty, by his former Answers, hath totally suspended Episcopal Government for 3 years: and, after the said time, limited the same in the powers of Ordination and Jurisdiction; and that the primitive office of a Bishop only is by him endeavoured to be preserved; and that the Bishops Lands are heavily charged with leases for 99 years; and that Deans and Chapters, and other their dependents, are taken away; his majesty is confident his two houses cannot think it reasonable, in a matter of this nature, to offer any violence to the conscience of their sovereign, nor to suffer those differences, which rest in so narrow a compass, to hinder the Settlement of so blessed a Peace in this kingdom. And if his two houses shall not think fit to recede from the strictness of their demands in these particulars, his majesty can with more comfort cast himself upon his Saviour's goodness, to support him in, and defend him from, all afflictions, how great soever, that may befall him, than for any politic consideration, which may seem to be a means to restore him, deprive himself of the inward tranquillity of a quiet mind: wherefore, as to these particulars before-mentioned, as also concerning the Articles of Religion, and what else remains in difference, upon this Proposition, his majesty adheres to his former Answers; and hopes that his two houses, upon a review and farther consideration of his Reasons, will therewith rest fully satisfied."

The KING'S Final ANSWER to the Commissioners Papers about the Church.

"C. R. For a final Answer to you, as to your Paper of the 17th, concerning the Church, and to your last Paper of the 20th inst. his majesty saith, That he is well pleased with the expression both in the preface and conclusion of the said last Paper, 'That his two houses intend not to force or offer violence to, but inform and rectify, his conscience;' and therefore, notwithstanding the necessity which is urged upon him through your whole Paper for his present concessions, (which otherwise might seem to contradict those expressions which so well pleased his majesty) yet he hopes his ensuing Answers will satisfy his two houses since he is thereunto enforced by his conscience, which fully concurs with the sense of all other parliaments, but this, since the Reformation.—First, As for the Abolition of Episcopacy; if what you desire of his majesty would not, being granted, absolutely remove, nay abolish, the exercise of the Apostolical Bishop, this point would be soon agreed betwixt his majesty and his two houses; for all the additional power and jurisdiction which his majesty's predecessors have bestowed upon that apostolical function, he hath consented shall be taken away, as Archbishops, Deans and Chapters, &c. leaving nothing but what (as his majesty believes to have proved by his Papers to your Divines) was clearly instituted by the Apostles themselves; and if he should give way to remove all ecclesiastical functions, which by law are exercised, by that rule even the presbyters themselves might be taken away; for questionless the civil sanction gives the legal acting power to all divine institutions, otherwise the Christian clergy would now be in little better case than they were before there were Christian emperors. As for those Aposttolical practices which have, or may (for the avoidance of greater evils) be altered, his majesty denies not but that circumstances may change the nature of moral actions; and may perhaps make that which is a fault at one time, singly considered in itself, become a duty at another; yet, if the particulars now demanded be not fit to be done, or perhaps a fault if done, his majesty conceives (the good end being the same on both sides, to wit, the Peace of the kingdom) that the consideration of extraordinary circumstances ought rather, in this case, to have a powerful operation with his two houses to recede from their Demands, (which cannot be thought a fault in them) than to be made use of as an argument to press his majesty to do a thing against his conscience, which appears to him to be unlawful; since the same good end may as well be obtained by relaxing on the one side, as by pressing on the other. Besides, his majesty conceives not this to be of that number, it being not only a bare practice, but an institution for continual use in the church.—Secondly, As for the Sale of Bishops Land; his majesty conceives that precedents in cases of conscience, cannot satisfy, they only proving that such things were done, not the lawfulness of them. Now, that the total alienation of Church Lands (which is the true state of the question) is sacrilege, divines of all sorts, and of all times, though otherwise differing in opinion, yet herein agree with his majesty's judgment; which being well weighed, he hopes may satisfy as to this particular. Nor can the practices under the Ceremonial law make any thing for this case, because in those days full compensation was always intended and ordinarily followed, though absolute necessity, and not such as might be otherwise avoided, dispensed sundry times with employing of sacred things.—Upon the whole matter, his majesty hopes that his two houses, after a more serious consideration of these and his former Reasons, will clearly discern that they are not pretended, but real points of conscience upon which he now sticks; and since, by the suspension of Episcopacy for 3 years, his majesty hath fully, for that time, granted his two houses Desires; since he hath reduced the Office of a Bishop, not only to the Apostolical Institution, which you say is not desired to be removed, but likewise taken away all those additional powers and jurisdictions which can make them liable to the imputation of those grievances and inconveniences mentioned in your Paper; for as for the Negative Voice in Ordination, his majesty much wonders that any can question that power to have been in the Apostolical Bishop, it being evident by 1 Tim. v. 22, and Titus i. 5. that sole Ordination was practised by them; and since it is more than likely that, upon a solemn debate had with the Divines, according to his majesty's former Desires, his majesty and the two houses will agree upon a settled Form of Church Government long before the end of 3 years, whereby all those distractions, feared after that time, will be prevented.—And, lastly, as for Church Lands; since by the heavy charging of them, his majesty hath satisfied those burthens for which they were engaged, he cannot but hope that his two houses will rest satisfied with these and his former Answers; especially considering that if the Treaty should break off upon this, which God forbid, the violence offered to his majesty's conscience, against which you protest, would be too apparent to all the world. Besides, the confusion that must necessarily follow in all these his dominions, which is no ways in his majesty's power to help; for you know who says, 'What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world, if he lose his own soul?' Whereas, on the contrary, the compliance with his majesty in these particulars puts him in a right way for the better information of his conscience, and in the mean time settles a happy Peace in these distracted kingdoms.—Concerning his majesty's Declaration for a set Form of Divine Service, in his Answer of the 4th inst. his majesty having now observed the latitude of the Directory, is willing that that expression shall not be taken as any part of his Answer. As to all other particulars, his majesty adheres to his former Answers."

"Newport, Nov. 21, 1643.

"C. R; His majesty having received the Votes of both houses of the 15th inst. in Answer to his own Propositions, formerly sent to both houses, is well pleased, 1. That, from and after such time as the Agreements of this Treaty be ratified by act or acts of parliament, all his houses, manors, lands, with the growing rents and profits thereof, and all other legal revenues of the crown, shall be restored unto him, liable to the maintenance of antient forts, and all other public and legal charges which they were formerly charged withal, or liable unto; with an exception of such castles and forts as are now garrisoned, and of such places for public magazines and stores as are now made use of, for so long time as both houses shall think fit to make use of them for the necessary defence of the kingdom. 2. His majesty doth likewise accept of such Compensation for those legal growing Revenues and Profits of the Crown which he hath or shall consent to part withal, for the satisfaction of both houses in this Treaty, in such manner and proportion as shall be agreed upon between his majesty and his two houses. 3. His majesty is well pleased that he be settled in a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, agreeable to the laws of the land. 4. And he doth consent to an Act of Oblivion and Indemnity to be passed, to extend to all persons for all matters, with such limitations and provisions as shall be agreed between him and his two houses of parliament. 5. And his majesty will farther consent, that it be declared by act of parliament, that nothing in his majesty's Propositions shall be made use of to abrogate, weaken, or anywise impair any Agreement in this Treaty, or any law, grant, or concession, agreed upon by his majesty and his two houses in pursuance thereof."

The King's last Answer concerning the Church voted unsatisfactory, and the Treaty farther continued.] After reading these Papers the commons passed the following Votes: 1. "That the king's Answer, contained in a Paper of the 21st inst. to the late Proposition concerning the Church, in all the parts, except wherein he has declared his consent, is not satisfactory. 2. That the Treaty be continued to Monday night, the 27th inst, and that the Commissioners be enjoined to come away the next day, with such final Answer as they shall receive from the king to what remains."—The first of these Resolutions passed without a division. The second was carried by a majority of 94 against 60; and the lords having agreed to them both, they were ordered to be sent away to the Commissioners with all speed.

General Lord Fairfax orders col. Hammond to give up the Charge of the King's Person.] Nov. 27. A Letter was received from col. Hammond, governor of the Isle of Wight, enclosing another from lord Fairfax requiring the colonel's presence at St. Albans. When these Letters were read in the house of commons, several members took great offence at the Lord-General's behaviour, declaring they would by no means consent that col. Hammond should leave the Isle of Wight. To which it was answered by the Independents, 'That this was not a time to give the Army any cause of distaste or jealousy: that, since the General had sent for col. Hammond to consult with him, it would be taken as an affront, if the house should lay any contrary commands upon him, and seem to be done on purpose to exasperate the Army, by obstructing their proceedings, and as it were to abridge the General of exercising command over his inferior officer.' To this it was replied, 'That the giving the charge of the king, at this time, to any new person, would prove a greater cause of jealousy to the people, concerning his majesty's safety: that the requiring col. Hammond to continue his command, and not to give up his charge to another, could not be interpreted an affront to the Army, or an intent to abridge the General in point of command, because col. Hammond, as guardian of the king's person, was intrusted not only by the houses, and by Ordinance of parliament, but also by patent under the Great Seal; and therefore he ought not to give up his charge to any other, but by consent of parliament.' To this nothing was answered; and the result was to send away, with all expedition, the following Answers to the Letters from col. Hammond and the Lord-General, signed by the Speakers of both houses. And first that to the Colonel:

"Sir; Your Letter of the 26th inst, hath been read in both houses; whereby you intimate you have received a Letter from the lord-general Fairfax, importing his desire for your speedy repair unto him, and that col. Ewer was by him appointed to take the charge of the Island in your absence; the houses of parliament have taken into serious consideration the matter of the lord-general's Letter, and your Letter thereupon, and finding the affairs of that Island, in relation to the Treaty and their Instructions given unto you concerning the same, in such a posture as that they cannot possibly dispense with your personal attendance upon that charge, have commanded us to let you know, that it is their pleasure, and they do accordingly enjoin you to reside there, and to demean yourself according to the trust reposed in you by the said houses, and their Instructions formerly given unto you, until you shall receive further order from the said houses; and they have signified their pleasure therein to the General. Your &c. Nov. 27."

The Answer of both Houses to the Lord Fairfax.

"My lord; The houses being acquainted, by a Letter from col. Hammond, of your excellency's desire that he should speedily repair unto you, have commanded us to let you know that they cannot possibly dispense with his absence from his charge in the Island, in regard of the Instructions he hath received from both houses concerning the safety of the king's person, and the security of that place; and therefore they desire you not to expect his sudden repair to you, nor to appoint col. Ewer, or any other, to take the charge of the Island until the pleasure of both houses be further signified unto you; and so we remain, Your &c. Nov. 27."

Nov. 29. Several Papers, relating to an intended Removal of the King's Person from Newport, were read in the house of lords, inclosed in the following Letter from col. Hammond, addressed to their Speaker.

"Newport, Nov. 28, 1648.

"My lord; Since my last to you, colonel Ewer is come into this island. At his coming, I demanded of him to know what Instructions he had, and from whom; because, though I held myself obliged to obey the General's commands in going to him, yet I had a trust upon me from the parliament, no ways, as I conceived, relating to the General or the Army, which I must be faithful unto, to the utmost of my power, and careful, as much as in me lies, that the parliament and kingdom's services might not be prejudiced in my absence. He produced a Letter, signed by John Rushworth, in the name and behalf of the General Council of the Army, ordering him to come hither; and if in case I should, according to the commands of the General, repair to the head-quarters, then he to secure the Person of the king in Carisbrooke Castle, or otherwise as he should think fit; and in case I should refuse, then to do as God should direct him, giving him power to raise other forces; and if he should so secure him, if he found any hazard in being here, to give them notice, and to bring the king over the water. This was the substance

(to the best of my remembrance) of his said Instructions, to which I gave him Answer to this effect, That I knew none whatever had authority over me as a soldier but the General, except the parliament; neither did I hold myself obliged, or would I give obedience to any other authority or person whatsoever: but that to the matter of his directions, as I conceived, I ought not to give obedience to any save the parliament alone, who had intrusted me, and only had power so to do; but rather plainly told him, that if he, or any other, should so proceed to violate my Instructions from the parliament, whilst I continued so in trust, I held myself bound in conscience, honour, and duty to oppose them to my utmost; and accordingly, God assisting me, I resolved to do. This was the substance of my Answer, upon which he is resolved forthwith to go along with me to the head-quarters. This I hold my duty to acquaint your lordship with, and also what order I have taken in my absence for the preventing of such practices as you will perceive, by the inclosed directions and Instructions, which (I assure your lordship is the all in my power to do) that upon the consideration of it, your lordship may take such further order in an affair of such high concernment as to your wisdom shall seem best. Whatever the event be, I can say with the testimony of a good conscience, that in this whole weighty business, which hath now more than 12 months lain upon me, I have, as in the presence of God, faithfully and honestly discharged my trust to the best advantage of your service, and not more in any thing than in this; and if for a reward for it, and all other hazards, labour, and blood I have undergone and spent in your service, I may now receive a discharge from you of that burthen, so much too heavy for me, I shall rest fully satisfied, bless my God, thank your lordship, and be further obliged to be, what I must ever be, my lord, Your &c. R. HAMMOND." "P. S. Since the writing hereof I received the original to these two Copies inclosed."

To Col. HAMMOND, Governor of the Isle of Wight, or to Col. EWER, or to the Chief Commander of the Forces there.

"Whereas his excellency the Lord-General, and the General Council of Officers, have presented a Remonstrance to the house of commons, setting forth the Danger and Evil of the present Treaty; and desiring amongst other things, that the Person of the King may be proceeded against in a due way of Justice; and the house having as yet given no Answer or Resolution thereupon; to the end therefore that, by his escape in the mean time, the consideration of the said Desires, or any reasons thereof, may not be frustrated, you are hereby desired and required, upon the receipt hereof, immediately to secure the Person of the King in Carisbrooke Castle, in such condition as before the Treaty; and that you continue him so secured until some Resolution from the parliament in Answer to the said Remonstrance, or otherwise as you shall receive further orders from his excellency the Lord-General. By the Appointment of his Excellency the Lord-General and Council of Officers, held at Windsor, Nov. 25, 1648. JOHN RUSHWORTH, Sec."

For Colonel HAMMOND, Governor of the Isle of Wight.

"Sir; The Providence of God, together with the sense he hath been pleased to set upon our hearts concerning the condition of affairs in the kingdom, in relation to the Treaty, hath led us to prepare and present a Remonstrance to the house of commons, which we send herewith to you: we have found a general concurrence of the same things throughout the Army, and several counties; and we desire, as the Remonstrance, and the things contained therein, shall close with what God hath set upon your hearts, which we doubt not of, that you will, in a public way, express to the General you and your forces approbation thereof, and concurrence therein. By the Appointment of the General Council of Officers, held at Windsor, Nov. 25, 1648. J. RUSHWORTH, Sec."

The foregoing Papers were presented to the commons; and after a conference both houses agreed, "That a Letter be written to the General, to acquaint him, that his Orders to col. Ewer are contrary to the Resolutions of parliament, and the Instructions given to col. Hammond by both houses; and to require him to recall the said Orders, and to command col. Hammond presently to return back to his charge in the Isle of Wight."

Nov. 30. A Letter from major Cromwell, who had been sent to col. Hammond with the Orders of both houses, forbidding him to leave the Isle of Wight, inclosing another from the colonel himself, were read: both these were addressed to the Speaker of the house of lords.

"Windsor, Nov. 28, 1648.

"My lord; Col. Hammond, when I came from him, resolved to be at the head quarters as last night or this morning, and appointed me to meet him there; upon which consideration, having received your Orders to be conveyed unto him, I thought that to come this way by the head quarters was the surest way not to miss him, in case he should, according to his purpose, be come away from the island. Before I could get hither it was somewhat late last night; when I found col. Hammond not come, I went hence, intending to have got again into the post-road, and so to have hasted on; but having forgot to get the General's pass, which I did not know before-hand to be so needful, I was, for want of a pass, stayed and brought back, by the centries about the head quarters; and the castle gates being shut, and the bridge drawn and locked and the keys gone up to the governor, so as I could not send unto the General, was stayed here till this morning. I am now going with what speed I can, and hope the time for your Orders is not lost, col. Hammond being not yet come hither as he appointed, so I presume he has already altered his purpose since my coming from him. Your, &c. H. CROMWELL."

My lord; Being at Farnham, on my Journey to the head quarters in obedience to the General's commands, I there met with your lordship's Orders brought to me by major Cromwell, enjoining me to reside in the Isle of Wight, which I shall yield immediate obedience to, by making my present return thither; though I must needs say with very great sadness of heart, because I had hoped and expected that, according to my most earnest desires, you would have been pleased to have freed me from the grievous burthen I have been so long pressed under; my unfitness for which is such for many reasons, that I yet hope, upon your further consideration of me, you will please to set me at liberty, it being so much for the advantage of your lordship's affairs: this therefore I must still leave with your lordships as the most desire of Your, &c. R. HAMMOND."

"Bagshot, Nov. 29, 1648.

P. S. "My lord, this being written before my restraint, should, with the last night's letter, have gone towards you; but those under whose custody I now am, did not, it seems, think fit to let it pass until now. I have given you an account of my imprisonment in a letter by another hand, which I hope is before this time come unto you."

The Lord Fairfax demands Money for his Forces.] The same day, a Letter from the lord Fairfax, which Mr. Whitlocke says "was deemed very high and unbeseeming," was reported to the house of commons from the Committee of the Army; wherein his lordship took notice, That they intended not to furnish him with any Money for contingencies, which of necessity must be had for pay of messengers, and other daily and incident charges of the Army; and therefore he must be forced to take money for this purpose out of the collectors and receivers hands, where he could find it, if speedy course were not taken to supply him: Hereupon it was ordered, That the Committee of the Army do take such course for the pay of their Arrears as they shall think fit, for their Satisfaction.

The Commons defer the Consideration of the Army's large Remonstrance.] Both houses of parliament and the city of London were now alarmed with the Report of another visit from the Army; notwithstanding which the commons were so resolute as to put the negative upon a motion for taking into consideration the late Remonstrance from the General and his Council of war, by a majority of 125 against 53.

Declaration of the Army on their resolving to march up to London.] When this last mentioned Remonstrance was presented to the house of Commons on the 20th of this month, the consideration of it was appointed for the 27th, on which day it was ordered to be put off to the 1st of December. These repeated delays gave great disgust to the Army, and occasioned the following Declaration, by way of Appeal from the house of commons to the people.

The DECLARATION of his Excellency the Lord General Fairfax and his General Council of Officers, showing the Grounds of the Army's Advance towards the City of London. Nov. 29, 1648.

"Being full of sad apprehensions concerning the danger and evil of the Treaty with the king, and of any Accommodation with him, or restitution of him thereupon, we did, by our late Remonstrance, upon the reasons and grounds therein expressed, make our application thereby unto the present house of commons, that the dangerous evil of that way might be avoided, and the peace of the kingdom settled upon more righteous, safe, and hopeful grounds, viz. a more equal dispensing of justice and mercy, in relation to things done or suffered in the late wars, and the establishing of the future government of this kingdom upon a safe succession and equal constitution of parliaments; and that for the ending of present, and avoiding of future differences, to be ratified by an Agreement and Subscription of the people thereunto.—This course we took out of our tender care and earnest desire that all ways of extremity might be avoided, and that those matters of highest concernment to the public interest of this nation might be pursued and provided for if possible, by those whose proper work and trust it was; and herein we are willing to hope, that the persons so trusted, or the majority of them, might possibly have been either driven into that destructive way by forcible impulsions, or lapsed therein through some inconsideration, or misapprehensions and conceived jealousies, and therefore we did carefully decline the insisting upon any thing that might continue or renew any former jealousies or animosities, and keep only to such things as were of necessity or advantage to the common cause, and of common and equal concernment to those that have engaged in it; which things we pressed in the way of reason and persuasion only, that they might be duly and timely considered: but, to our grief, we find, instead of any satisfaction or reasonable Answer thereto, they are wholly rejected without any consideration of them, whatever reason or justice might be in the things set forth or propounded therein: for what less can be understood, when the things propounded were mainly for the avoidance of evil appearing in the Treaty with the king? and yet they put off the consideration of them, till there should be no place for any consideration at all. First, laying it aside till Monday last, by which time the Treaty, as then supposed would have been concluded; but that failing, and two days more being added to the Treaty, the consideration of our Remonstrance on the day appointed, was waved and laid aside; the Treaty, in the mean while, going on in the former way and terms, and like to be concluded the very next day.—Now, though we are far from that presumption, that the things should therefore be answered and considered, because propounded by us, save for the reason, justice, or public concernment therein, yet having no Answer, or any thing shewed us to the contrary, we cannot but, upon the grounds remonstrated, and many more which might be added, remain confident in our former apprehensions concerning them; and seeing the prevailing part of those to whom we did apply, have, as it were, their eyes wilfully shut, and ears stopt against any thing of light or reason offered to them, we find no place left for our former charitable or hopeful apprehensions concerning their error in such evil ways; but remain fully assured of the danger and destructiveness thereof, as to all those public ends for which they were entrusted, and also of the just advantage and necessity which lie in the things we have propounded and insist on. We now see nothing left to which their engaging and persisting in such ways, and rejection of these better things propounded, can rationally be attributed, less than a treacherous or corrupt neglect of, and apostacy from, the public trust reposed in them; although we could wish from our souls we might yet find the contrary; nevertheless we do not in these things assume a standing power of judgment, as of right or trust, to conclude others thereby; acknowledging that to lie most properly in those whom the people duly chuse and trust to judge for them; but on the consideration that such power, where it is committed, is but in trust, and that neither this nor any other people did ever give up their natural capacities of common sense or reason as to the ends and fundamentals of that trust; and that, as to the breach of such trust, there is no higher formal power of man in being to appeal unto for judgment. In such case, as all others concerned in such breaches of trust will, so we cannot but, exercise that common judgment which in our natural capacities, is left to us:

and though, in smaller failures of such trust, which might be borne without hazard of destruction to that interest and those people for which especially the trust is; or where the trustees were of an indifferent equal constitution in reference to the whole; or where we had an orderly and open way left for a just succession of another formal and proper judicature to be appealed unto in due time, we should not oppose or hold forth our private judgments to the least disturbance of that orderly and peaceable course of judgment so established; yet, in our present case, we are so fully convinced of the greatness and destructiveness of those evils we have declared against, and of the necessity and essentiality of those better things we have desired and propounded, and how inconsistent it is with the public trust and fundamental ends of it, still to pursue the one and reject the other, as that we dare, with confidence, appeal therein to the common judgments of indifferent and uncorrupted men, and to the more righteous judgment of God above all.—And as the incompetency of this parliament, in its present constitution, to give an absolute and conclusive judgment for the whole, especially to be the sole judges of their own performance of breach of trust, doth make the juster way for such an appeal; so indeed we see no other way left for Remedy, in regard the present unlimited continuance of this parliament doth exclude the orderly succession of any other more equal formal judicature of men, to which we might hope, in due time, otherwise to appeal.—Thus, when we apprehend ourselves in the present case both necessitated to, and justified in, an Appeal from this parliament, in the present constitution as it stands, unto the extraordinary judgment of God and good people; and yet, in the prosecution of this Appeal, as we shall drive it on but to the speedy obtaining of a more orderly and equal judicature of men in a just representative, according to our Remonstrance; wherein to acquiesce so in the present procuring of justice with the people's ease and quiet, and in the settling of the kingdom upon a due, safe, and hopeful succession of parliaments, it is our hearts desire, and shall be our endeavour, that so much, both of the matter and form, of the present parliamentary authority may be preserved, as can be safe, or will be useful to those ends, until a just and full constitution thereof, both for matter and form, suitable to the Public ends it serves for, can be introduced.—And therefore, 1. it should be our great rejoicing, if God saw it good, that the majority of the present house of commons were become sensible of the evil and destructiveness of their late way, and would resolutely and vigorously apply themselves to the speedy execution of justice, with the righting and easing of the oppressed people, and to a just and safe Settlement of the kingdom upon such foundations as have been propounded by us and others for that purpose; and would, for the speedier and surer prosecution of these things, exclude from communication in their councils, all such corrupt and apostatized members as have appeared hitherto but to obstruct and hinder such matter of justice, safety, and public interest, and to pervert their councils a contrary way, and have therein so shamefully both falsified and forfeited their trust.—But, however, if God shall not see it good to vouchsafe that mercy to them and the kingdom, we shall, 2. desire, That so many of them as God hath kept upright, and shall touch with a just sense of those things, would, by Protestation, acquit themselves from such breach of trust, and approve their faithfulness, by withdrawing from those that persist in the guilt thereof; and would apply themselves to such a posture, whereby they may speedily prosecute those necessary and public ends, without such interruptions, and depravations of their Councils from the rest, to their endless trouble, oppression, and hazard of the kingdom, as formerly; and for so many of them, whose hearts God shall stir up thus to do, we shall therein, in this case of extremity, look upon them as persons having materially the chief trust of the kingdom remaining in them; and though not a formal standing power to be continued in them, or drawn into ordinary precedents, yet the best and most rightful that can be had, as the present state and exigence of affairs now stand; and we shall accordingly own them, adhere to them, and be guided by them in their faithful prosecution of that trust, in order unto, and until the introducing of, a more full and formal power in a just representative to be speedily endeavoured.—Now, yet further, to take away all jealousies in relation to ourselves, which might withhold any honest members from this courage, as we have the Witness of God in our hearts, that, in these proceedings, we do not seek, but even resolve we will not take, advantages to ourselves, either in point of profit or power; and that if God did open unto us a way, wherein, with honesty and faithfulness to the public interest and good people engaged for us, we might presently be discharged, so as we might not, in our present employments, look on, and be accessory to, yea supporters of, the parliament in the present corrupt, oppressive, and destructive proceedings, we should, with rejoicing, and without more ado, embrace such a discharge, rather than interpose in these things to our own vast trouble and hazard; so if we could but obtain a rational assurance for the effectual prosecution of these things, we shall give you any proportionable assurance on our parts, concerning our laying down of arms, when, and as we should be required: but for the present, as the case stands, we apprehend ourselves obliged in duty to God, this kingdom and good men therein, to improve our utmost abilities, in all honest ways, for the avoiding these great evils we have remonstrated, and for prosecution of the good things, we have propounded; and also that such persons who were the inviters of the late invasion from Scotland, the instigators and encouragers of the late insurrections within this kingdom, and, those forcible ways failing, have still pursued the same wicked designs, by treacherous and corrupt counsel, may be brought to public Justice, according to their several demerits. For all these ends we are now drawing up with the Army to London, there to follow Providence as God shall clear our way. By the appointment of his Excellency the Lord-General and Council of Officers. J. RUSHWORTH."

The Commissioners return home, and present to the Parliament the rest of the Papers relating to the Treaty.] Dec. 1. The Commissioners being now come back from the Isle of Wight, this day the earl of Northumberland delivered in to the house of lords divers Papers concerning the Treaty. Amongst them were,

The KING'S Final ANSWER concerning the Marquis of ORMOND.

"Newport, Nov. 25, 1643.

"C. R. For a final Answer as to your Paper of the 25th inst. concerning the Proceedings of the lord Ormond in Ireland, his majesty saith, That he well hoped that by this time such a happy conclusion of this Treaty would have been made, that, by his former Answers, his two houses might have obtained what they desired in this particular: but assuring himself that his large concessions in this Treaty will, ere long, be the foundation of a blessed Peace, his majesty, to manifest the clearness of his intentions in that matter, and to give his two houses satisfaction, hath written, and delivers herewith unto you, his Letter to the marquis of Ormond, acquainting him with such informations as he hath received from the two houses concerning his proceedings in that kingdom, and requiring him to desist from any further prosecution of the same; and, in case he shall refuse, his majesty will then make such public Declaration, against his power and proceedings as is desired."

The KING'S LETTER to the Marquis of ORMOND, requiring him to desist from any further Proceedings in Ireland.

"C. R. Whereas we have received several informations from our two houses of parliament, concerning your proceedings with the Confederate Roman Catholics in the kingdom of Ireland, the several Votes and Extracts whereof we do herewith transmit to you: and forasmuch as we are now engaged in a Treaty of Peace with our two houses, wherein we have made such large Concessions as we hope will prove the foundation of a blessed Peace; and having by one Article, if the said Treaty take effect, promised to intrust the prosecution and management of the Irish War in Ireland to the guidance and advice of our two houses, we have therefore thought fit hereby to require you to desist from any farther proceedings upon the matters contained in the said Papers; and we expect such obedience unto this our command, that our two houses desire may be fully satisfied. Given at Newport in the Isle of Wight, the 25th of Nov."

The King's Speech to the Commissioners at their taking Leave of him.] In Royston's Edition of the King's Works we meet with the following Speech made by his majesty, at taking Leave of the Commissioners:

"My lords; You are come to take your leave of me, and I believe we shall scarce ever see each other again; but God's will be done. I thank God, I have made my peace with him, and shall, without fear, undergo what he shall be pleased to suffer men to do unto me. My lords, you cannot but know that, in my fall and ruin, you see your own, and that also near to you. I pray God send you better friends than I have found. I am fully informed of the whole carriage of the Plot against me and mine; and nothing so much afflicts me, as the sense and feeling I have of the sufferings of my subjects, and the miseries that hang over my three kingdoms, drawn upon them by those who, upon pretences of public good, violently pursue their own interests and ends."

Debate in the Commons, whether the King's Answers were satisfactory.] This day Mr. Denzil Hollis reported the result of the Treaty to the Commons. The first step was, that the house ordered their Speaker to return their Thanks to lord Wenman, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pierpoint, and Mr. Crew, then present, for their great, good, and very faithful services to the parliament and kingdom in that employment. After which, the house proceeded to take into consideration the king's Answers, which being exclaimed against by some members as unsatisfactory, Mr. Fiennes argued, 'That the king had done enough to secure religion, laws, and liberties, in granting the Militia, resigning up himself and all affairs of state to the discretion of both houses, and yielding to abolish whatsoever was offensive in the government of the Church; and that these things being provided for, which were the only things which the parliament had so often declared to be the ground of their quarrel, his majesty must needs have given sufficient satisfaction. As for Delinquents, he said, his majesty had offered reasonably, that they might be left to the law; and not himself pressed to such a dishonourable inconvenience as to condemn them by his consent in an illegal, extraordinary, arbitrary way; forasmuch, as in ordinary construction, it must be presumed, that when the houses engaged to bring Delinquents to punishment, it was not meant in an arbitrary way, but according to the laws of the land, against which they had offended. As concerning the Bishops, he said, the king had granted all in effect that was desired, and intended not to set up bishops again, except his houses, at the 3 years end, did agree to it, which amounted to as much as putting them down for ever; and to refuse so fair an offer, were to betray the weakness of the Presbyterian cause, in the opinion of the world, as if it would not endure the test of a 3 years trial.' Mr. Fiennes being about to proceed to other particulars, Mr. Harvey interrupted him, saying, 'That the purchasers and contractors would not be contented with leases for 99 years, and therefore the king had not given satisfaction about Bishops Lands.' To which another member immediately replied, 'That he hoped Mr. Harvey's interest in Fulham*, and that of such others as himself, should not be respected before the public peace and welfare of the kingdom, which could not be effected but by an accord with his majesty.'—After this it was resolved by a majority of 133 against 102, upon the previous question, to adjourn the consideration, "How far the king's Answers to the Propositions of Peace were satisfactory or not," till the next morning.

Letter from lord Fairfax, giving Notice of the Army's Advance towards the City, and de*manding 40,000*l.* immediately.*] This day, the Sheriffs of London attended both houses to inform them, That the lord mayor, having called a common council that morning, did communicate a Letter to them, which he received from the Lord-General the night before, by a trumpeter, as he was going about the city according to usual course, to view the watches, which they thought of so great concernment as to have both houses acquainted therewith. The Letter was as follows:

To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London.

"My lord and gentlemen; Being upon an immediate Advance with the Army towards London, we thought good hereby to give you notice thereof. For the ground and necessity leading us hereunto, we refer you to our late Remonstrance, and to our later Declaration, concerning the same. We have only this further to add, that as we are far from the least thoughts of plunder, or other wrong, to your city, or any other places adjoining, which we hope your former experience of us will give you cause enough to credit us in; so, for the better prevention of any disorder in the soldiery, or of any abuse or inconvenience to the inhabitants in quartering of the soldiery at private houses, we earnestly desire that you would take a present course for the Supply of Money to pay those forces while we shall be necessitated to stay there, upon which, we assure you, we shall so dispose of them into great and void houses about the city, as much as may be possible, as that few or none of the inhabitants shall be troubled with quartering of any soldiers at all; and for this purpose we desire that 40,000*l.* may be forthwith provided upon the security of our Arrears, to be ready to be paid out to the forces to-morrow night, if possible; and we shall be ready to receive from you any intimation for the further prevention of hurt or inconvenience to the city in this business. I remain Your &c, FAIRFAX."

The following Answer was given by the lords to the Sheriffs: "The lords return Thanks to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council, for their respect shewed to that house; and as to the 40,000*l.* mentioned to be secured upon Arrears to the Army from the city, the lords leave it to themselves to do therein as they shall think most fit for preventing of inconveniences."—The Answer of the commons was much more explicit: viz. "Mr. Sheriff, and the rest of you gentleman of the City; The house has taken your business into serious consideration, and have had long debate thereupon; and have resolved to send a Letter to the General from this house: and that you forthwith provide 40,000*l.* of the Arrears, due by the city to the Army, upon security of the said Arrears, and the residue with all the speed you can: and the house doth give you leave to address yourselves to the General, by committee, letter, or otherwise, as you shall think fit."

In consequence of these Answers from the parliament, the city ordered a Committee from the common council to wait upon the Lord-General with a Letter, promising payment of the sum demanded, or the most part of it, the next day; and desiring that, in the mean time, no violence or injury might be done to the citizens.

The Commons write to the General to stop his March; to which he pays no Regard.] The house of commons also ordered a Letter to be written to the General on this occasion, which is not entered in the Journals; yet, by the Contemporary Writers, it appears that the purport of it was to forbid his lordship's nearer approach towards London: but, while the committee were preparing this Letter, the house was informed that the Army were advanced within a mile of Westminster; that they had planted guards at Hyde-Park Corner, cut down trees, levelled the inclosure, and laid it in common. Hereupon, a motion was made for adding a Clause to the Letter, "That the Army's Approach was derogatory to the Freedom of Parliament;" but it passed in the negative by 44 against 33.

The Commons resume the Consideration of the King's Answers.] Dec. 2. The commons resumed the consideration of the question, "How far the king's Answers to the Propositions were, or were not, satisfactory." The debate hereon was opened by Sir Henry Vane, jun, who said, 'Mr. Speaker; We may do well now to consider the king's last Answer upon the Treaty; for, by the debate, we shall soon guess who are our friends, and who our enemies; or, to speak more plainly, we shall understand by the carriage of this business, who are the king's party in the house, and who for the people.' He then proceeded to put them in mind, 'That they had been diverted from their old settled Resolution and Declaration, of making no more Addresses to the king, since which the kingdom had been governed in great peace, and begun to taste the sweets of that Republican Government which they intended and begun to establish; when, by a combination between the city of London and an ill-affected party in Scotland, with some small contemptible insurrections in England, all which were fomented by the city, the houses had, by clamour and noise, been compelled to reverse their former votes and Resolutions, and enter into a Personal Treaty with the king; with whom they had not been able to prevail, notwithstanding the low condition he was in, to give them any security; but he had still reserved a power in himself, or at least to his posterity, to exercise as tyrannical a government as he had formerly done: that all the Insurrections which had so terrified them were now totally subdued, and the principal authors and abettors of them in their custody, and ready to be brought to justice, if they pleased to direct and appoint it: that their enemies in Scotland were reduced, and that kingdom entirely devoted to a firm and good correspondence with their Brethren, the parliament of England; so that there was nothing wanting but their own consent and resolution, to make themselves the happiest nation and people in the world; and to that purpose he desired they might, without any more loss of time, return to their former Resolution of making no more Addresses to the king; but proceed to the settling the government without him, and to the severe punishment of those who had disturbed their peace and quiet, in such an exemplary manner as might terrify all other men for the future from making the like bold attempts; which, he told them, they might see would be most grateful to their Army, which had merited so much from them by the Remonstrance they had so lately published.—To this it was replied by another Gentleman, 'Mr. Speaker; Since this gentleman hath had the presumption to deal thus by way of prevention in a threatening manner, and forejudged and divided the house into two parts, I hope it is as lawful for me to take the same liberty in dividing the house likewise into two parts upon this debate. Mr. Speaker, you will find some that are desirous of a Peace and Settlement, and those are such as have lost by the war; others you will find that are against Peace, and those are such as have gained by the war: My humble motion therefore is, That the gainers may contribute to the losers, that we may all be brought to an equal degree; for, till then, the balance of the commonwealth will never stand right toward a Settlement.*—The debate continuing till 4 in the afternoon, it was pressed very earnestly by Mr. Prideaux, sir Tho. Wroth, sir Peter Wentworth, and others of the Independent party, that the house would come to some speedy Resolution upon the king's last Answers: But

Mr. Prynne insisted, 'That the consideration thereof ought to be laid aside till they were a free parliament; for that their debates could not be with due liberty, now that they were environed by the Army.' To which

* Mr. Walker in his History of Independency, and Needham in his Mercurius Pragmaticus, observe that this reflection silenced sir Henry Vane, which they account for thus: 'True Jests bite sore: The two Vanes opposed Peace, lest, the king's revenue being restored, they should lose a good trade there; the father being chairman of that committee, the son treasurer; they get constantly above 6000*l.* per Annum between them, besides private cheats, by paying half debts and taking acquittances for the whole, and then discounting for the whole; buying in old sleeping pensions for trifles, that have not been paid in many years, and paying themselves all arrears.' Lord Clarendon's Account of the Debates in parliament, about this time, seem to have been taken from one or both of these authors; and are, in several instances, the same in terminis.

Mr. Richard Norton answered, 'Take heed what you say against the Army, for they are resolved to have a free parliament to debate the king's Answer, if we refuse; and therefore my motion is, Mr. Speaker, that candles may be lighted, and that we proceed to debate it.' Upon which another Member said, Mr. Speaker, I perceive very well that the drift of some gentlemen is to take advantage not only of the terror now brought on us by the present approach of the Army, but also to spin out the debate of this business to an unseasonable time of night, by which means the more ancient members of the house (whom they look upon as most inclined to Peace) will be tired out, and forced to depart, before we can come to a Resolution; and therefore I hope the house will not agree to this last proposal.'—Then the question being put upon the motion for Candles, it was carried in the Negative, by 132 against 102; and the house adjourned till Monday without coming to any Resolution upon the Treaty.

Lord Fairfax and his Army march up to Westminster.] This day, also, the Lord-General Fairfax took up his lodgings at Whitehall, attended by 6 regiments of horse and 4 of foot, which were quartered at St. James's, the Mews, York-House, and other great vacant houses in the skirts of the city, and in the adjacent villages.

The King removed to Hurst-Castle, by an Order from the Council of War.] Dec. 4. The commons having met according to adjournment, they received intelligence of the King's being removed from Newport to Hurst-Castle*, the particulars of which appeared in the following Letter to the Speaker of the house of commons, from major Rolph, capt. Bowerman, and capt. Howes, whom col. Hammond had deputed to take the charge of the King's Person in the Isle of Wight, whilst he was gone to wait upon the lord Fairfax at Windsor.

"Carisbrooke-Castle, Dec. 1, 1648.

"Right honourable; Yesterday there came into the Isle some officers of the Army, viz. lieut. col. Cobbett and capt. Merryman, with Instructions from the General and Council of War, directed to themselves and the commander in chief here, forthwith to secure the Person of the King in Carisbrooke-Castle, as before the Treaty, until they should receive some resolution from the house upon their late Remonstrance: and they understanding the management of the affairs of this Island was committed by col. Hammond to ourselves, or any two of us, they acquainted us with their Instructions, desiring our concurrence with them, that so the present work, intended by them, might with less difficulty be accomplished.—While we were in debate of these things, there came in a messenger from the General, with an Order under his hand and seal, directed to the gentlemen, commanding them immediately to take the Person of the King into their charge, and to remove him forthwith into Hurst-Castle; requiring us by name, with all other officers and soldiers in the Isle, to be aiding and assisting to them therein; two of us, viz. major Rolph, and capt. Howes, upon sight of that Order, declared ourselves obliged not to disobey the General's commands, but conceived ourselves bound to yield obedience thereunto by our commissions; the other of us, viz. capt. Bowerman, declared his judgment, That his duty lay immediately to the governor himself, who had entrusted him; and that contrary to those Instructions he could not act; neither was he of himself in a capacity to oppose them in that service. Cap. Howes being dissatisfied in the action, manifested his unwillingness to join in it, and his resolution neither directly nor indirectly to oppose it; but the gentlemen, with the concurrence of the Army Forces here, and the assistance of a fresh troop of horse and one company of foot, which landed in the night, in pursuance of their commands, very civilly made their addresses to the king, according to another order from the lord-general, for his usage with all civility and due respect to his person.—Between 5 and 6 this morning, some of the gentlemen, who by the parliament were appointed to attend on the king, acquainted his majesty with the Orders and Instructions they had in charge from his excellency the lord-general concerning him; who presently and quietly consented thereunto, and set forward in his coach from Newport at 8 this morning, towards Hurst-Castle, with Mr. Harrington, col. Herbert, and capt. Mildmay, and others of his servants to attend him. And we do assure you that, in the whole transaction of this great affair, there neither was nor is the least disturbance in this Isle. Thus we have, with all clearness and faithfulness, given you a full and impartial account of these late Proceedings here; and having so done, we subscribe ourselves Your, &c. E. ROLPH, T. BOWERMAN, F. HOWES; P. S. 'Since the writing hereof, we have intelligence that his majesty is safely arrived at Hurst-Castle.'

This letter being read, many members spake against the insolency of this fact, as being committed against the Life of the king, and the honour and public faith of the parliament, who had voted, he should treat in honour, freedom, and safety, in Newport in the isle of Wight: and had accepted his word not to withdraw out of the island during the treaty, nor in 20 days after, which were not yet expired; and that now to have the houses debates forestalled, and the Treaty frustrated by such an act of violence and prevention committed upon the person of the king, was a presumptuous and rebellious act. It was therefore proposed to resolve, That the Removal of the King out of the Isle of Wight was without the knowledge of the house; and a motion being made to add, 'or Consent,' after the word 'Knowledge,' it passed in the affirmative, by 136 against 102.

The King's Declaration when carried away from Newport.] On the King's being carried away from Newport, he delivered to one of his servants the following Declaration concerning the Treaty, and his dislike of the Army's proceedings, which he commanded to be published for the satisfaction of his subjects. It was accordingly printed, and we give it from the original edition*.

"When large pretences prove but the shadow of weak performances, then the greatest labours produce the smallest effects; and when a period is put to a work of great concernment, all mens ears do, as it it were, hunger till they are satisfied in their expectations. Hath not this distracted nation groaned a long time under the burden of tyranny and oppression? And hath not all the blood that hath been spilt these seven years been cast upon my head, who am the greatest sufferer, though the least guilty? And was it not requisite to endeavour the stopping of that flux, which, if not stopt, will bring an absolute destruction on this nation? And what more speedy way was there to compose those distractions than by a Personal Treaty, being agreed upon by my two houses of Parliament, and condescended to by me? and I might declare, that I conceive it had been the best phisic, had not the operation been hindered by the interposition of this imperious Army, who were so audacious as to style me in their unparalleled Remonstrance, their 'Capital Enemy.' But let the world judge whether mine endeavours have not been attended with reality in this late Treaty; and whether I was not as ready to grant as they were to ask: and yet all this is not satisfaction to them that pursue their own ambitious ends more than the welfare of a miserable land.—Were not the dying hearts of my poor distressed people much revived with the hopes of a happiness from this Treaty? And how suddenly are they frustrated in their expectations! Have not I formerly been condemned for yielding too little to my two houses of parliament? And shall I now be condemned for yielding too much? Have I not formerly been imprisoned for making war; and shall I now be condemned for making Peace? Have I not formerly ruled like a King; and shall I now be ruled like a Slave? Have I not formerly enjoyed the society of my dear wife and children in peace and quietness; and shall I now neither enjoy them nor peace? Have not my Subjects formerly obeyed me; and shall I now be obedient to my Subjects? Have I not been condemned for evil Counsellors; and shall I now be condemned for having no Counsel but God? These are unutterable miseries, that the more I endeavour for Peace, the less my endeavours are respected: and how shall I know hereafter what to grant, when yourselves know not what to ask? I refer it to your consciences, whether I have not satisfied your Desires in every particular since this Treaty: if you find I have not, then let me bear the burden of the fault; but if I have given you ample satisfaction, as I am sure I have, then you are bound to vindicate me from the fury of those whose thoughts are filled with blood; though they pretend zeal, yet they are but wolves in sheep clothing.—I must further declare, that I conceive there is nothing can more obstruct the long-hoped for Peace of this nation, than the illegal proceedings of them that presume from servants to become masters, and labour to bring in democracy, and to abolish monarchy. Needs must the total alteration of fundamentals be not only destructive to others but, in conclusion to themselves; for they that endeavour to rule by the sword, shall at last fall by it: for Faction is the mother of Ruin; and it is the humour of those that are of this weathercock-like disposition, to love nothing but Mutabilities, neither will that please them but only pro tempore; for too much variety doth but confound the senses and makes them still hate one folly and fall in love with another.—Time is the best cure for Faction; for it will at length, like a spreading leprosy, infect the whole body of the kingdom, and make it so odious that at last they will hate themselves for love of that, and like the fish, for love of the bait, be caught with the hook.—I once more declare to all my loving subjects, and God knows whether or no this may be my last, that I have earnestly laboured for Peace, and that my thoughts were sincere and absolute, without any sinister ends, and there was nothing left undone by me that my conscience would permit me to do. And I call God to witness, that I do firmly conceive that the interposition of the Army, that Cloud of Malice, hath altogether eclipsed the glory of that Peace which began again to shine in this land. And let the world judge whether it be expedient for an Army to contradict the Votes of a kingdom, endeavouring, by pretending for laws and liberties, to subvert both. Such actions as these must produce strange consequences, and set open the flood-gates of ruin to overflow this kingdom in a moment.—Had this Treaty been only mine own seeking, then they might have had fairer pretences to have stopt the course of it; but I being importuned by my two houses, and they by most part of the kingdom, could not but with a great deal of alacrity concur with them in their desires, for the performance of so commodious a work; and I hope by this time that the hearts and eyes of my people are opened so much, that they plainly discover who are the underminers of this Treaty.—For mine own part, I here protest before the face of heaven, that mine own afflictions, though they need no addition, afflict me not so much as my people's sufferings; for I know what to trust to already, and they know not: God comfort both them and me, and proportion our patience to our sufferings.—And when the malice of mine enemies is spun out to the smallest thread, let them know, that I will, by the grace of God, be as contented to suffer, as they are active to advance my sufferings; and mine own soul tells me, that the time will come, when the very clouds shall drop down vengeance upon the heads of those that barricade themselves against the proceedings of Peace; for if God hath proclaimed a blessing to the Peace-makers, needs must the Peace-breakers draw down curses upon their heads.—I thank my God I have armed myself against their fury; and now let the arrows of their envy fly at me, I have a breast to receive them, and a heart possessed with patience to sustain them: 'For God is my rock and my shield, therefore I will not fear what man can do unto me.' I will expect the worst, and if any thing happen beyond my expectation, I will give God the glory, for vain is the help of Man! C. R."

Further Debate in the Commons on the King's Answers.] Immediately after the commons had voted the Removal of the king to Hurst-Castle to have been done without their knowledge or consent, they renewed the Debate upon the Commissioners Report of the Treaty; and the question was propounded, Whether the king's Answers to the Propositions of both houses be satisfactory? The Affirmative was maintained by sir Robert Harley, sir Benj. Rudyard, sir Symonds D'Ewes, Mr. Ed. Stephens, sir Harbottle Grimstone, Mr. Walker, and others; who argued, 'That the King's Concessions were sufficient for securing all the main ends, to attain which the parliament first engaged against him; and therefore his majesty had given sufficient Satisfaction.' For the Negative there appeared Mr. Prideaux, sir Tho. Wroth, sir Henry Vane, sen. and jun. Mr. Harvey, Mr. Edw. Ash, Mr. Venn, Mr. Blackiston, Mr. Scot, Mr. Hoyle, Mr. Corbot, Mr. Gourdon, and others: these urged, 'That unless the parliament would comply with the Desires of the Army, there could be no hope of a Settlement; and therefore they must look for it some other way than towards the king; who, sir Henry Mildmay said, was no more to be trusted than a lion that had been raged, and let loose again at his liberty.'—At length, the previous question being put, That the question, Whether the king's Answers to the Propositions of both houses are satisfactory, be now put? it was carried in the Negative by 144 voices against 93. This resolution was owing to many of those members, who were inclined to Peace, being apprehensive that they could hardly be able to carry a Vote, 'That the king's Concessions were satisfactory; and therefore they put the negative upon the previous Question, in order to frame a new one, viz. "That the Answers of the King to the Propositions of both houses are a Ground for the house to proceed upon for the Settlement of the Peace of the kingdom." And this occasioned another debate, which continued all night, and till nine next morning.

Mr. Prynne's Speech in Defence of the King's Answers to the Propositions.] The person who distinguished himself most upon this occasion, was the famous Mr. Prynne, who maintained the affirmative in a set Speech of several hours; which, though considered merely as such, may be deemed very long, is nevertheless a short and authentic Summary of all the transactions between the King, the Houses, and the Army, from the beginning of this parliament.—It is remarkable that neither lord Clarendon, Mr. Whitlocke, Mr. Rushworth, sir Philip Warwick, colonel Ludlow, nor any of the Contemporary Writers, except Mr. Walker, in his History of Independency, make the least mention of this Speech, although it was published the latter end of Jan. following by Mr. Prynne himself; and was then the subject of so much enquiry, that the following copy is taken from the 4th edition of it printed at that time*.

Mr. Prynne introduces his arguments in the following pathetic manner:—"Mr. Speaker; Being called to be a member of this house (without my privity or seeking, and against my judgment, having formerly refused many places freely tendered to me) by the unanimous election, without one dissenting voice, of that borough for which I serve; and, by a Divine Providence, entering within these doors in this great conjuncture of the highest public affairs that ever came within these walls,† wherein the very life or death, the weal or ruin of this kingdom, if not of Scotland and Ireland too, consist in our Aye or No upon the question now debating, I shall, with the greater boldness crave liberty to discharge my conscience towards God, and duty to my dying country, which now lies at stake; and so much the rather because, for ought I know, it may be the last time I shall have freedom to speak my mind within this house.—That I may, in this great debate, more sincerely speak my very heart and soul without any prejudice, I shall humbly crave leave, briefly, to remove two seeming prejudices, which may, perchance, in some members opinions, enervate the strength of those reasons I shall humbly represent unto you, to make good my conclusion touching the Satisfactoriness of the King's Answers to the houses Propositions.—The first is that where-with some members have, upon another occasion last week, and now again, tacitly aspersed me, 'That I am a Royal Favourite,' alluding to the Title of one of my Books, out of which some have collected an abstract, in the nature of a charge against the king, and this day published it in my name; and I am now termed 'An Apostate to the King's Party and Interest.' To which I shall return this short Answer, I hope without any vain glory or boasting, being thus provoked thereunto, That I have opposed and written against the king and his prelates arbitrary power and illegal proceedings more than any man; that I have suffered from the king and prelates for this my opposition, more than any man; that if the king and prelates be ever restored to their pristine arbitrary power and illegal prerogatives, I must expect to suffer from them as much, if not more, than any man.—That all the royal favour I ever yet received from his majesty or his party, was the cutting off my ears, at two several times, one after another, in a most barbarous manner; the setting me upon three several pillories at Westminster and in Cheapside, in a disgraceful manner, each time for two hours space together; the burning of my licensed Books before my face by the hand of the hangman,* the imposing of two fines upon me of 5000*l.* a-piece; Expulsion out of the Inns of Court and University of Oxford, and degradation in both; the loss of my calling almost 9 years space; the seizure of my Books and Estate; above 8 years imprisonment in several prisons, at least 4 of these years spent in close imprisonment and exile at Caernarvon in North Wales, and in the Isle of Jersey; where I was debarred the use of pen, ink, paper, and all books almost but the Bible, without the least access of any friend, or any allowance of diet for my support; and all this for my good Service to the State in opposing Popery and Regal tyranny: for all which sufferings and losses I never yet received one farthing recompence from the king, or any other, though I have waited above 8 years at your doors for justice and reparations; and, neglecting my own private calling and affairs, employed most of my time and study, and expended many hundred pounds out of my purse, since my enlargement, to maintain your cause against the king, his Popish and Prelatical party: for all which cost and labour I never yet demanded nor received one farthing from the houses, nor the least office or preferment whatsoever, though they have bestowed divers places of honour upon persons of less, or no desert; nor did I ever yet receive so much as your public thanks for any public service done you, which every preacher usually receives for every sermon preached before you, and most others have received for the meanest services; though I have brought you off with honour in the cases of Canterbury and Macguire, when you were at a loss in both; and cleared the justness of your cause, when it was at the lowest ebb, to most Reformed Churches abroad, who received such satisfaction from my Book, that they translated it into two several languages; and engaged many thousands for you at home by my writings, who were formerly dubious and unsatisfied. Now, if any member, or old courtier, whatsoever shall envy my happiness for being only such a royal or state favourite as this, I wish he may receive no other badges of royal favour from his majesty, nor greater reward or honour from the houses than I have done, and then I believe he will no more causelessly asperse or suspect me for being now a royal favourite, or apostate from the public cause.—True it is, which it behoves now to touch, that about 4 years since, I published a Book, intitled, 'The Royal Popish Favourite;' wherein, as likewise in my 'Hidden Works of Darkness brought to public Light,' published a year after it, I did, with no little labour and expence, discover to the world the several plots and proceedings of the Jesuits, Papists, and their foreign and domestic confederates, to introduce and set up Popery throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland; and how far they had inveigled the king not only to connive at, but to countenance and assist them in a great measure, more fully and evidently than any else had done. And those worthy members of this house who drew up that Declaration, whereupon they voted no more Addresses to the King, plowed but with my heifer, borrowing all or most of their real materials from my writings: a convincing evidence that I am yet no more a royal favourite than themselves. Yet this I must add withal, to take off that aspersion of being an apostate from my first principles, that I never published those Books, as I then professed in them, and now again protest, to scandalize or defame the king, or alienate the people's affections from him; much less to depose or lay him quite aside; though I am clear of opinion, that kings are accountable for their actions to their parliaments and whole kingdoms; and in case of absolute necessity, where religion, laws, liberties, and their kingdoms will else be inevitably destroyed by their tyrannical and flagitious practices, be deposed by them, if there be no special oaths nor obligations upon their consciences to the contrary; which is our present case: much less did I it out of any malice or revenge for the injustice I received from him in the executions done upon my person and estate, which I have long since cordially forgiven, and do now again forgive him from my soul, beseeching God to forgive him likewise; but merely to discover his former errors in this kind unto himself, that he might seriously repent of them for the present, and more carefully avoid and detest them for time to come; and that the parliament and whole kingdom might more clearly discern the great danger our Religion was in, before we publickly discerned it, and the several ways and stratagems by which Popery got such head and growth among us, that they might thereby the better prevent the like plots and dangers for the future by wholesome laws and edicts, as I have more largely declared in the Books themselves.—This grand prejudice against me being thus removed, I proceed to the second, to wit, That I am an enemy to the Army; and therefore what I shall speak, may be interpreted to proceed only from opposition against them and their Remonstrance, concerning which I freely uttered my sudden thoughts immediately after its reading in the house. To this I answer, That I have always been a real friend and well-wisher to this Army from their first modelling till now, in whatever they have acted in their sphere, as soldiers, for the public safety. When they were first formed into a body, the Committee of Accounts, whereof I was a member, and those they engaged, advanced about 30,000*l.* of the four-score thousand, to set them out. Since that, I have freely contributed towards their Pay; prayed constantly for their good success; joined in all public Thanksgivings for the Victories obtained by them; made honourable mention of them and their heroic actions in some of my writings; and particularly dedicated one Book, I since compiled, to the General himself, as I had done former Books to others of your generals, for to do him all the honour that possibly I could for his renowned actions. Besides, I have lately signed warrants to get in their Arrears, and promoted an Ordinance for that purpose all I could, since my entrance into this house. All which considered, with this addition, that some of them have been my antient intimate friends, and never did me the least injury, I hope no member can be so partial, as to repute me such a professed enemy to them, as, in this grand debate, to go against my judgment or conscience in opposition only unto their Desires. True it is, when the Army have forgot their duty, or offered any violence to the Privileges, members, freedom, or proceedings of parliament, or endeavoured to engage them to break their public faith to the king or kingdom, in breaking off the Treaty, contrary to their Votes and Engagement, or to infringe their Solemn League and Covenant, or to inforce them to subvert the fundamental government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, or the very freedom and being of parliament, as they have done in their late Remonstrance and Declaration, and some other printed papers since and heretofore, I have then, in discharge of my Covenant, conscience, and duty, opposed, and spoken against these their exorbitances, as much as any; not out of malice, but only out of love, to reclaim them from their evil destructive courses and councils, according to God's own precept, Leviticus xix. 17. 'Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; but shall in any-wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him.' And seeing I have always, with like freedom, opposed and written against the exorbitances and errors of the king, court, prelates, parliament, committees, presbyterians, independents, lawyers, and all other sorts of men in reference to the public good, the Army and their friends have no cause at all to censure me as their enemy; but rather to esteem me as their friend, for using the like freedom towards them, and their exorbitances, especially in this house.

"Having removed these two Prejudices, I shall now address myself to the Question in Debate, which hath been thus propounded: 'Whether the King's Answers to the Propositions of both houses, taken altogether upon the whole Treaty, be satisfactory or unsatisfactory?' This being an equivocal question, not hitherto clearly stated and debated by those who have spoken to it, most of them being much mistaken in it, I must crave leave to give you the true state of it, before I shall debate it; for which purpose I must distinguish in what sense it is not satisfactory to any in this house, and yet in what respect it will appear satisfactory to all or most of us who are not blinded with passion or prejudice against the king, or misled by affection merely to please the Army; which many have made their principal argument wherefore it is not satisfactory.—If the question be propounded and intended in this sense, Whether the King's Answers to all the Propositions be satisfactory? that is, Whether the king hath granted all the Propositions sent unto him in as large and ample manner as both houses did propound them? then it is certain his Answers are not satisfactory in that which concerns Delinquents, Bishops, and Bishops Lands, and the Covenant, though they are voted satisfactory as to all the rest by both houses. And, in this sense only, those who have concluded them not satisfactory, have stated and disputed the question. But this, under favour, neither is nor can be the state or sense of the Question, for these reasons: 1. Because these Propositions were sent by the houses to the king, not as Bills of parliament, to be granted in terminis, without debate or alteration; but only as Propositions to be debated and treated upon personally with the king, as the Votes of both houses, and Instructions to the Commissioners sent to the Isle of Wight, resolve past all dispute. Now it is directly contrary to the nature of all Treaties, especially such as are personal, to tie up the parties of either side so precisely that they shall have no liberty to vary from their first Proposals in any particular; or if they condescend not to whatever was at first demanded by the stronger party, that the condescensions should not be satisfactory, though they yield to all just things, and fall short only in some few of least concernment. This is evident by all Treaties heretofore between England, France, Spain, and other foreign nations, if you peruse their first Demands, which were never condescended to, but always receded from and qualified in some particulars on either side; iniquum petas, ut justum feras, being a rule in Treaties among statesmen. There have been many treaties during these wars, between the officers of the parliament and the king's party, about surrenders of divers cities and garrisons, wherein the first Propositions on either side have been moderated or changed, and yet agreed and accepted at last as satisfactory to both sides. In all ordinary treaties concerning marriages, purchases, and ordinary bargains in fairs, markets, or shops, there are usually greater sums of money demanded at first on the one, and less proffered on the other side than is accepted and given at last; and yet both parties close, agree, and are well satisfied: so may we do now with the king upon the whole Treaty, though the king grants not fully all that we at first proposed. 2. Because the houses have already voted the King's Concessions of the Great Offices of England and Ireland to be at their disposal for twenty years, to be satisfactory, though their demand was for perpetuity; which they would not have done, had the satisfactoriness of the king's Answers depended upon the full concession of that Proposition as amply as it is penned. 3. Because the houses in their last Propositions demand far more than ever they did in most former Treaties, and the king hath granted them more now in this than they have demanded heretofore; and therefore having granted more than what would have fully satisfied them in former Treaties, his concessions in this may be fully satisfactory to us, so far as to close with him, to settle a firm Peace in the kingdom, now at the brink of ruin, though they fall short in some things which we now propounded, which do not so much concern our Security, as I shall prove anon. The true state then and sense of this Question must be this and no other: 'Whether the king's final Answers to the Propositions of both houses in this Treaty, considered and weighed all together, be not so full and satisfactory in themselves, that this house may and ought to accept of and proceed upon them for the speedy settlement of a safe and well-grounded Peace, both in Church and Commonwealth, rather than reject them as unsatisfactory, and so hazard the loss of all and the perpetuating of our wars and miseries?' In this sense I humbly conceive and hope to evidence them so clearly and fully satisfactory, that we can neither, in point of duty, prudence, justice, honour or conscience, reject them as unsatisfactory, but ought to embrace them as the only safe and ready way to our Peace and Settlement, though they come not up so fully to some of our Propositions, as I could have heartily desired for the avoiding of this hazardous debate.—For my clearer progress in this grand debate, I shall observe this method: 1. I shall clearly manifest, That the king, in this Treaty, hath granted us whatsoever we can well desire for the present Settlement and future security of the commonwealth or state, when ratified by acts and a regal oath, as is intended; yea, far more than ever our ancestors, or any subjects in the Christian world, enjoyed or desired of their kings, for their security and preservation against their armed power, or legal Prerogatives. 2. That the king hath granted as much, in this Treaty, as will settle and secure the Peace and Government of our Church and Religion against Popery and Prelacy on the one hand, and profaneness on the other hand; and more than we or any Protestant churches ever enjoyed, or demanded heretofore, for their security and settlement. When I have made good these particulars, and answered the Objections made against them, I hope every one of us, who have any ingenuity, reason, or conscience in their breasts, and are not transported with passion, or private engagements to the contrary, will, and must of necessity, vote these Answers satisfactory in the sense forestated.

"I shall begin with the first of these, namely, The King's Answers to all those Propositions which concern the present Settlement and future Security of the State and Republic, against any armed force or invasions of the regal prerogative, to the enslaving or prejudicing of the subject; which, in my poor judgment, are so full and satisfactory, that little or nothing can be added to them; and if we well consider them we have cause to say, 'O fortunati nimium bona si sua norint.' I shall give you a full view of them all, because many of them have not been so much as once remembered in this debate, and apply them to our present Settlement and future Safety, as I mention them.—The first Proposition, for the Settlement of a safe and well-grounded Peace, is that which concerns the justification of the parliament's war, declaring it by an act of parliament to be passed, to be in their just and lawful defence; justifying the Solemn League and Covenant in prosecution thereof; and repealing all Oaths, Declarations and Proclamations heretofore had, or hereafter to be had, against both or either houses of parliament, their ordinances, or proceedings; or against any for adhering unto, or executing any office, place, or charge under them; and all judgments, indictments, outlawries, attainders, and inquisitions in any of the said causes; and all grants thereupon made, had, or to be made or had, to be declared null, suppressed, forbidden, and never put into execution: and this to be published in all parish churches, and all other places needful, within his majesty's dominions.—To this proemial and advantageous Proposition, the king hath full and readily condescended at first, in every tittle, as was desired. By this concession the parliament hath gained sundry considerable advantages, tending to their present honour and future security. 1. A full, public, acknowledgment of the justness of their war and cause, to be ratified and perpetuated to posterity by the highest record that can be, an act of parliament; and that to be read in all parish churches throughout England, Ireland, and other the king's dominions; and proclaimed in all counties, cities, corporations, and at assizes and sessions of the peace, that so all men may take public notice of it ; which is such an honour to, and justification of, them and their cause, as was never condescended to by any king, that took up arms against his subjects, since the creation to this present ; and so low a humiliation and legal disclaimer, in the king, of his war against the parliament and disavowal of his cause and party, as could possibly be imagined or expected.

2. It secures the lives, liberties, and estates of all the members of both houses engaged in these wars ; and of all persons whatsoever that have adhered to, or acted for them, against all former, present, and future impeachments, prosecutions, and judgments whatsoever ; and makes void and null whatever hath been, is, or may be objected against them ; which, coupled with the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, proposed by the king and agreed to by the houses, will extraordinarily secure, pacify, and content all well-affected members and persons who have adhered to them in this cause, and preserve them from the danger of 25 Ed. III. and other laws concerning Treasons ; which otherwise, upon any revolution of times and affairs, might, by corrupt judges and instruments, be extended and wrested to their prejudice and undoing. 3. It lays a foundation for the lawfulness of a defensive war by authority of both houses, upon the like occasion, in all future ages, without incurring the guilt of Treason or Rebellion ; which will be a great encouragement and security to the subjects, and engagement to them to adhere unto the parliament in after times. 4. It will very much discourage and deter all kind of men from taking up arms in the king's, his heirs and successors, behalf, against the houses of parliament, when they shall cast their eyes upon this act, and behold the king himself passing such a censure upon all his own proceedings, and retracting his own oaths, proclamations, commissions, indictments, and grants, against such members and all others who have now taken up arms against him, for the houses and kingdom's defence.—So as this very first Proposition only, if well weighed, without any others added thereunto, being so fully and freely consented unto by the king, tends very far towards our present Settlement and future safety ; being more than was ever thought of or desired in the Treaty of Peace, in Feb. and March 1642.

“The Second Proposition fully granted by the king, for the settling and security of the state, and religion too, against the king's armed power, is the settling of the whole Militia by sea and land, and Navy of England, Ireland, and the Isles and dominions thereunto belonging, by act of parliament, in the hands and disposal of both houses, and such as they shall appoint, for the space of 20 years ; with power to raise monies for all forces raised by them for land or sea service, during that space of time ; which forces are authorized to suppress all forces raised, or to be raised in, or any foreign forces which shall invade, the realms of, England, Ireland, or the dominions and Isles thereunto belonging, without authority and consent of the lords and commons in parliament. And it further provides, That after the expiration of the said 20 years, neither the king, his heirs or successors, nor any person or persons, by colour or pretence of any commission, power, deputation, or authority to be derived from the king, his heirs or successors, or any of them, shall raise, array, train, employ, or dispose of any of the forces by sea or land of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, the dominion of Wales, Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, or of Berwick upon Tweed ; nor execute any power or authority touching the same, invested in the two houses during the space of 20 years ; nor do any act or thing concerning the execution thereof, without the consent of the lords and commons first had and obtained. And that after the expiration of the said 20 years, in all cases wherein the lords and commons shall declare the Safety of the Kingdom to be concerned, and shall thereupon pass any Bill for the raising, arming, training, and disposing of the Forces by sea and land of the kingdoms, dominions, Isles, and places aforesaid, or concerning the levying of monies for the same, if the king, his heirs or successors, shall not give the royal assent thereto, within such time as both houses should think convenient, that then such Bill or Bills, after declaration made by the lords and commons in that behalf, shall have the force and strength of an act or acts of Parliament, and be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if the royal assent had been given thereunto. After which it disables any sheriff, justice of the peace, mayors, or other officers of justice, to levy, conduct, or employ any forces whatsoever, by colour or pretence of any Commission of Array, or extraordinary command from the king, his heirs or successors, without consent of both houses : and concludes, That if any persons, to the number of 30 shall be gathered together in warlike manner, or otherwise, and not forthwith disband themselves, being thereunto required by the lords and commons, or command from them, or any other specially authorized by them, that then such person or persons, not so disbanding, shall be guilty and incur the pains of High Treason ; any commission under the Great Seal, or other warrant to the contrary notwithstanding, and be incapable of any Pardon from his majesty, his heirs and successors, and their estates disposed of as the lords and commons shall think fit.—To all this new, grand, principal Security of our present and future Peace and Settlement, the king hath given his full and free consent in terminis. And what greater Security than this we can imagine or demand against the king's armed power and sword of war, transcends my capacity to imagine. Therefore, if we have not lost both our brains and consciences too, we cannot but vote and conclude it satisfactory, and rest abundantly contented with, yea exceeding thankful for, it ; and that upon all these ensuing considerations: 1. Both houses, in their Treaty with the king in Feb. and March 1642, demanded only the Militia of England, not of Ireland; yet so, as they did 'leave the 'Nomination and Disposition of the chief commanders, officers and governors of the Militia, 'Forts and Navy of the kingdom, to the king; 'provided only they might be such persons of honour and trust as both houses might confide in; 'and likewise promise restitution of all Monies, 'Forts, Garrisons, Arms, and Ammunition of the 'king, which they had seized upon, or to give him 'present satisfaction for the same; which being 'granted and performed, they professed it should 'be their hopeful endeavour that his majesty and 'his people might enjoy the blessing of Peace, ' &c. to be derived to him and to his royal posterity, and the future generations in this kingdom, for ever.' Whereas, in this Treaty, the king denudeth himself of the Militia of England and Ireland too, and of the nomination and approbation of all officers, commanders, governors of the Militia, or forces by sea or land; and leaves all the Forts, Navy, and Magazines to the houses disposal only, without any Compensation for his Magazines or Arms formerly seized by them. And if far less was deemed sufficient for our Settlement and Security then, much more will all this be thought so now. 2. Because the king hath wholly stript himself, his heirs and successors for ever, of all that power and interest which his predecessors always enjoyed in the Militia, Forces, Forts, Navy, not only of England, but Ireland, Wales, Jersey, Guernsey, and Berwick too, so as he and they can neither raise nor arm one man, nor introduce any foreign forces into any of them, by virtue of any commission, deputation, or authority, without consent of both houses of parliament: and hath vested the sole power and disposal of the Militia, Forts, and Navy of all these in both houses, in such ample manner, that they shall never part with it to any king of England, unless they please themselves: so as the king and his heirs have no military power or authority at all left, to injure or oppress the meanest subject, much less the whole kingdom, or houses of parliament, had they wills to do it; and the houses having all the Militia by land and sea, not only of England, but even of Ireland, Wales, Guernsey, Jersey, and Berwick, to assist and secure them, in case he or his heirs should attempt to raise any domestic, or introduce any foreign force, against them, is so grand, so firm a Security, in all human probability, for insuring and preserving of our peace, religion, laws, liberties, lives, and estates, against regal force and tyranny, that none of our ancestors ever demanded or enjoyed the like, nor no other kingdom whatsoever, since the creation, for ought that I can find in Histories or Republics, who have perused most now extant to do you service; and such a self-denying condescension in the king to his people, in this particular, as no age can yield a precedent.—In the 16th year of king John, the Barons having, by force of arms, compelled him to confirm the Great Charter* at Runningmead, near Windsor, thought this their greatest Security, that 25 of the eminentest Barons should be made Conservators of Magna Charta, and that all the rest of the barons and people should take an Oath to be aiding and assisting to them in the preservation thereof; and the king should surrender into their hands his four principal Castles, that so, if he infringed this Charter, they might compel him to observe it. This was the highest Militia and Security of that kind our ancestors ever demanded or enjoyed, (which is nothing comparable unto that now granted us by the king) who rested satisfied therewith. 3. Because the king and his successors are hereby not only totally disabled to raise any Forces to oppress the people, or disturb their Peace and Settlement, but all persons discouraged from aiding or assisting them by any commission or authority whatsoever, under pain of High Treason, and loss both of life and estate, at the pleasure of both houses, without any benefit of pardon from the king, disabled for to grant it. So great a discouragement for any persons of fortune or quality, to appear for the king or his party in the field, for time to come, that, in all human probability, none ever will or dare appear in arms hereafter for the king, against the parliament, being sure to forfeit all without any hopes of Pardon. And if this act had been passed as a law before our wars, I dare presume not any one English lord or gentleman durst once to have appeared in the field for the king, and we had never felt the miseries of a Civil War. 4. Because the Militia of Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, and Wales as well as England, is wholly transferred from the king to the houses; so as we need fear no danger thence: and the Militia of Scotland being in the parliament's disposal, if we hold a brotherly correspondency with them, I know no other enemies we need to fear; for the Navy being in the houses power, we need not fear any foreign invasion that can hurt us, if we can agree at home.

"All which considered, I dare assert, we have now the greatest Security of any people under Heaven, against all armed regal force or power; the king having given up all his Military Power into the houses actual possession, and resigned his sword and arms into their hands. And if we refuse to accept it, now he so freely resigns it, we may fight till Doomsday, but never win nor hope for the like Security or Advantage; yea the present age and all posterity will curse and abhor us, for not embracing and resting satisfied with such an unparalleled Security.—But is this all the Security the king hath granted us in this Treaty? No, verily, there is yet much more behind which hath not yet been opened. The kings of England have always held two Swords in their hands; which, when ill managed, have hurt and destroyed their subjects: the first is the Sword of Mars in times of war, which is already sheathed, and resigned into the houses hands by the precedent concessions, so as it can never wound them more: the other is the Sword of Justice, in times of peace; and this likewise the king hath wholly given up into the houses power, for 20 years, as he hath the Militia; so that it can never hurt them, nor any Englishman or other subject hereafter, at least for 20 years.—This Sword was formerly intrusted by the king in the Judges and the great officers hands; had they been so courageous, so upright as they should, the king could never have wounded or ruined the meanest of his subjects with this Sword. Ship-money, Knight-hood, with other Grievances and Monopolies, neither would nor could have been imposed on the people by the king's prerogative or power, had the Judges, according to law and duty, declared them illegal. The king can do no injustice to any, if his Judges be so just and stout as to do justice. Whereupon this house impeached only the Judges, not blaming the king for the project of Ship-money, to which their Opinions in Mr. Hampden's Case, gave life and vigor. Now the king, in this Treaty, hath for 20 years at least, granted to both houses the nomination and appointment of all the great Officers, Civil or Military, and of all the Judges and Barons of his Courts and Exchequers within England and Ireland, to continue in their places only quam diu bene se gesserint. So as these great Officers and Judges having now no dependance at all upon the king, who can neither place nor displace any of them, but wholly upon the houses of parliament, and such as they shall appoint to nominate them in the intervals of parliament; if the houses have a care to make good Officers and Judges in all courts at first, and to displace and punish them, as they may and ought to do, when they degenerate or misdeemean themselves, the king, with all his legal power now left him, can neither injure nor oppress the poorest subject in body, goods, or estate, nor protect the greatest malefactor from Justice. And what more can we desire or expect for the Security of our Lives, Liberties, or Estates than this?—Besides, as the king hath intrusted you with the Sword and Courts of Justice and Revenue, so hath he with his conscience and Courts of Equity too: you have the nomination of the lord-chancellors, lord-keepers, and commissioners of his great seals of England and Ireland, of the chancellors of the exchequer and duchy, and masters of the rolls, as well in Ireland as England, who are the Dispensers of his Equity and Conscience to his subjects; the issuers of all his commissions, writs, patents; and Keepers of all his public Records. If this be not enough, you have the disposal of his Purse and Treasure too; the Nomination of the lord treasurers, both of England and Ireland; of the chancellors and barons of the Exchequers in both, and of the vice-treasurer and treasurer of the Wars in Ireland: would you have yet more? You have the nomination of the lord-deputy and chief governor of Ireland, and of all the presidents of the several provinces of that kingdom for 20 years; and of all other the before-named great Officers, Judges, and treasurers there; a great strength and real addition to the Militia of that kingdom, which can never do us harm, if we accept of these Concessions, which invest us in such power there, as no parliament of England ever yet expected nor laid claim to. What is there yet remaining for your Safety? perchance you will suspect the king may have many secret designs and intercourses with foreign enemies and states, and grand Malignants at home, to undo all, which we shall never discover without some further provisions than yet we have made. Truly no; you have a Remedy already provided and granted for this: the nomination and appointing of the Lord-Warden of the Cinque Ports, the principal gates to let in, or keep out, foreign enemies or spies; and of the Secretaries of State, who will be privy to all his majesty's secrets and transactions of public concernment; receive all Letters of Intelligence directed to him, and most commonly return all Answers to them. There is now but one thing more wanting to make this Security compleat and firm, the king's Great Seals of England and Ireland, the greatest regal assurance and confirmation he can give you: and of these you have both the custody and disposal, having the Nomination and Appointment both of the Lord-Chancellors, Lord-Keepers, and Commissioners of the Great Seal in England and Ireland. To sum up all these Grants together: some parliaments, in former times, have had the Nomination of the Lord-Chancellor, some of the Lord-Treasurer, some of the Great Justiciar, or some few Judges of England only; but never any parliament of England claimed, or enjoyed, the nomination and appointment of any of the great Officers, Barons, Judges, or Treasurers places in Ireland, nor yet of the Lord-Warden of the Cinque Ports, chancellors of the exchequer and duchy, secretaries of state, master of the rolls, or barons of the exchequer of England; and yet all these the king, for peace sake, hath parted with to us; and shall we be yet so froward and peevish, as not to be satisfied with all these offices? We have a long time mocked and abused the world with a Self-denying Ordinance*, disabling any Member to retain or receive any Civil or Military Office by grant from the houses, whilst he continues a member, though there is scarce one day, or week at least, doth pass, but we are still bestowing some place or office upon members, for which we are weekly censured and reviled in printed pamphlets, and are become odious to the kingdom: but here is a Self-denying Act and Ordinance in good earnest, in the king, in parting with so many Offices (of which he and his predecessors have had the sole disposal for some ages without interruption) to the houses; and shall we not yet rest satisfied? if not, what will the whole kingdom, what will all foreign kingdoms and nations, report of us, but that we are so foolish, so unreasonable, that nothing can or will content us, because we are resolved not to be content with any thing that the king shall grant us, be it ever so advantageous for our present or future Safety and Settlement? but seeing we have the disposal of all these officers in England and Ireland, both military and civil, of his Sword of war and peace, his Justice, his Conscience, his Purse, his Treasury, his Papers, his public Records, his Cabinet, his Great Seal, more than ever we at first expected or desired, I must really, for my own part, profess myself abundantly satisfied with these Concessions, and so must every one who hath so much judgment as to understand the latitude and consequences of them for the whole kingdom's and dying Ireland's Safety and Settlement, especially at this season when they are so near their ruin.

"To this I shall add another Grant of great concernment for the Peace and Safety of this nation which the king hath fully consented to in this Treaty; and I presume no member of this house will rest unsatisfied therewith, when he fully understands it.—Both houses of parliament, upon the Lord Keeper Littleton's deserting of the house,* and conveying away the Great Seal, were pleased, for the better distribution of Justice, and transaction of the great affairs of the realm, to appoint a new Great Seal to be made; the Ordinance for its approbation and use sticking long in the Lords House, who were somewhat doubtful in point of law, I thereupon compiled and published a Treatise, intituled, 'The Opening of the Great Seal of England,' which fully satisfied them, and opened the doors to let it out for public use; though some who have had the custody of it, as you, Mr. Speaker, know, have but ill requited me for this my pains and good Service. Many Grants, Commissions, Presentations, Writs, Process, Proceedings, and other things, have passed under this Great Seal, and some Patents for Offices and Bishops Lands to Members of this house, who differ in opinion from me, and yet would be glad to have their Patents confirmed by an Act of Parliament: the King, in this Treaty hath not only consented to ratify all the Grants, &c. that have passed under this new Great Seal, by Act of Parliament, and to enact them to be as effectual, to all intents and purposes, as if they had passed under any other Great Seal of England heretofore used; but to continue it to be used hereafter for the Great Seal of England: and hath likewise so far disclaimed his old great seal, from the day it was carried from the parliament, that he is content to make and declare all grants, commissions, presentations, writs, process, proceedings, and other things whatsoever, passed under or by any authority of any other great seal, since the 22d of May 1642, to be invalid and of no effect, to all intents and purposes, except one grant to Mr. Justice Bacon to be Judge of the King's Bench, and some other writs, process, and commissions mentioned in that Proposition: and he hath further yielded, That all grants of offices, lands, and tenements, or hereditaments, made or passed under the Great Seal of Ireland, unto any person or persons, or body politic, since the Cessation in Ireland, the 15th Sept. 1642, shall be null and void, with all Honours and Titles conferred on any person and persons in that realm since that Cessation.—By this Concession the houses of parliament, and their adherents, have gained these extraordinary Advantages, most of them not to be paralleled in any age or king, from Adam to this present. 1. An Acknowledgment of both houses authority to make and use a new Great Seal of England, without the king, in cases of extraordinary necessity; 2. A power in the houses to null and void the king's usual Great Seal upon the making of their new, and conveying the old seal from the houses without their consent; 3. A Ratification of all judicial and ministerial acts, writs, process, presentations, grants, decrees, commissions, and other things which have passed under the new Great Seal, since its making till this present; which tends much to the quiet and settlement of many men's estates; to the confirmation and justification of all legal proceedings in all courts of Justice, and at all assizes and sessions of peace, held by virtue of commissions under this seal, and of Justices appointed by it (whose authority and proceedings might else hereafter prove disputable, and be drawn into question); and to the right constitution of the parliament itself, many members of this house being elected, and some members and assistants of the lords house being called thither, by writs under this new Seal; 4. An absolute disavowal and repeal of all Commissions whatsoever, or other things passed under the old Great Seal, against the parliament or its proceedings; and an exposing of all those of the King's party, who have acted any thing by any commission or authority under that Seal against the parliament, to public justice, who cannot plead it in bar or excuse in any court, after it shall be null and repealed by an act; 5. A great disparagement, dishonour, and disadvantage to the English Cavaliers, Irish Rebels, and their cause and proceedings; with a future disengaging of them, and all their party, from the king and his interest, who hath so far dishonoured, deserted, and disclaimed them, as thus to null and repeal all honours, titles, grants of offices, lands, or tenements bestowed on any of them, for any services done, or assistance given by them, to the king in his wars against the parliament: a very high point of humiliation and self-denial in the king, and such a blow to his popish and Malignant party, that I dare presume they will never engage in his behalf, nor trust him for the future; which will much conduce to the Settlement of a firm and lasting Peace, and prevent new wars, if accepted of; 6. Indemnity and Security for all the commissioners of the new Great Seal, against all Scruples which may arise upon the statute of 25 Edward III. for using and sealing with it, if ever the Times alter; which every prudent man will readily embrace, where it freely offered, and not peevishly reject, in such an age of danger and uncertainty as this, in which no man is secure of his life, liberty or estate on either side.

“The next Concession of the king in this Treaty is this, ‘That, by act of parliament, all peers made since Edward lord Littleton deserted the parliament, and conveyed away the Great Seal on the 21st of May, 1642, shall be unpeered and set by; and all other Titles of Honour and Precedency, as lordship, knighthood, and the like, conferred on any without consent of both houses of parliament, since the 20th of May, 1642, shall be revoked, and declared null and void, to all intents, and never hereafter put in use; and that no peer who shall be hereafter made by the king, his heirs or successors, shall sit or vote in the parliament of England, without consent of both houses of parliament.’ This Concession of the king’s is of great concernment to the kingdom, and I conceive, without precedent or example in any age or king in the Christian world: 1. It secures us from our formerly feared danger of a design in the king, by new created peers, to make an over-ruling party, at any time, in the lords house, wherein the judicatory of the parliament principally consists; which danger and inconvenience, by secluding the Bishops out of that house by an act already passed, and by this disabling all new peers hereafter to be made to sit in that house, without consent of both houses, is for ever totally prevented: 2. It gives such an extraordinary new power to the house of commons, as they never formerly enjoyed or pretended to, to wit, That no Peer created by the king himself, or by the king or lords in parliament, (who usually created peers in parliament without the commons privity or consent in former times) shall be henceforth enabled to sit or vote as peers of parliament, but by consent of the house of commons as well as of the king and lords: by which provision the commons are made not only, in some sense, the judges of peers themselves, (which they could not try or judge before by the express letter of Magna Charta, and the Common Law) but even their very creators too: 3. It puts an extraordinary prejudice and blemish on the king’s Cause, and an extreme dishonour, dissatisfaction, and disparagement upon his own party, than which a greater cannot be imagined: for what higher affront and disgrace could the king put upon those nobles, gentlemen, and others, who have spent their estates, lost their blood and limbs, and adventured their very lives, in his cause against the parliament, and received no other reward but an empty Title of Honour, (perchance a knightship, a lordship, or the bare title of a marquis, earl, or viscount which they have enjoyed but a year or two, with little benefit and less content) to be thus (by act of parliament with the king’s own royal assent, who conferred those Titles on them for their gallant services in his behalf) suddenly degraded and divested of them all, as if they had never been? A perpetual brand to them and their posterity, who must be enforced to give place to such of whom they had precedency and place by virtue of these dignities: which high affront and scorn, I am verily persuaded, will pierce and break many of their own, at least their ladies, hearts, and for ever disoblige them in the highest degree: 4. It will make all the antient and new nobility and peers of England less dependent on the king, and less complying to serve his ends upon all occasions; being never able to gratify or reward them, though ever so ambitious, with any new honours or peerships, without consent of both houses of parliament; whom they dare not displease or disoblige, for fear of crossing them in their desired dignities and titles, as well as in their great offices, which are both now in their disposal, not in the king’s alone.—In brief: the king, in this Concession, hath manifested the greatest humiliation and self-denial that any king, since there was a kingdom in the world, hath done. It is and hath been the antient and undoubted prerogative of all kings in the world, but especially of the kings of England to confer Honours and Dignities of all sorts, especially knighthood, on whom they shall think meet, and more principally on those who have merited it by their gallantry in the field, as Mr. Selden proves at large in his ‘Titles of Honour,’ and others who have written on that subject. Now for the king, out of a desire only of a happy Peace and Settlement, not only to part with much of the royal prerogative, which all other kings in the world enjoy, for the future; but to repeal the Honours and Titles conferred by him on his adherents, for reward of their services in times past, during all these wars, is such a miracle and high degree of self-denial, as no age hath produced the like; and that which most of this house, had the king prevailed, would have rather lost their lives (had they conferred any such titles on their generals and commanders) than have condescended to, had the king required it; and therefore I cannot agree with those over-censorious gentlemen, who so oft inculcate this, That they can see no humiliation at all or change of heart in the king, when I find so great a change and deep a humiliation in him in this, and all other aforementioned free Concessions, without any or little hesitation; and I heartily wish their own hearts were as much humbled as his; and then I doubt not but they would thankfully embrace, and rest fully satisfied with, his Concessions for their own and the kingdom's benefit.

"The next Proposition, tending to the Peace and Settlement of the Kingdom, is this, That the King do give his royal assent to such Act or Acts for the raising of Monies for the payment and satisfying of the public Debts and Damages of the kingdom, and other public uses, as shall hereafter be agreed on by both houses; and if the king do not give his assent thereto, then it being done by both houses, the same shall be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if the royal assent had been given thereunto. To this Proposition the king hath condescended, so as those Acts be passed within 2 years after the Treaty ended; which the houses have voted to be satisfactory. This Proposition secures all Monies lent upon the public faith; all Arrears due to officers and soldiers; yea, all monies advanced by any who have purchased Bishops Lands, for their losses by reversions after 99 years, or any present rents, to be reserved to the crown for the use of the Church, (with which those members who have purchased such lands, or advanced monies upon them, declare themselves most unsatisfied) and all those who have sustained public losses: yea, if the king denies his royal assent thereto, it enables both houses to make a valid act of parliament without the king in this case, and in the case of the Militia likewise; which was never challenged by, nor granted to, both houses in any king's reign before; and takes away the king's negative voice as to these particulars, which those, who conclude the king's Answers unsatisfactory, have so much contended for; yet now stand in their own light, in not accepting of these Concessions as satisfactory, which strike at the negative voice.

"The next Concession of the king's for the Settlement of the state, is the taking away of the Court of Wards, and of all Wardships and Tenures in capite, or by Knights Service, which draw on wardships, premier seisins, liveries, and such like incumbrances, to the intolerable vassalage and prejudice of the nobility and gentry of England, and great landed persons; and that only upon giving the king and his successors 100,000*l.* yearly for compensation, being one principal part of his royal revenue. This Concession is of so vast consequence to the kingdom, to enfranchise the subjects from the Norman yoke of bondage (as some stile Wardships and Tenures in capite, though others deem them more ancient than William the Conqueror) that our ancestors never enjoyed the like: it exempts men's heirs under age, and their estates, from being made a prey to hungry courtiers, or committees, over-reaching them and their estates: it exempts them from being married to any against their free consents, without any single or double forfeiture of the values of their marriages, to which they were formerly liable; from marriages to persons of small, or none, or broken fortunes, and different dispositions, which have ruined many families; from many chargeable suits, expences, and excessive fees and gratuities to escheators, feodaries, and all sorts of griping officers in the Court of Wards; and from vast expences and extraordinary vexation in finding and traversing offices, suing out liveries, &c. and many suits and questions arising thereupon, which have undone too many: and it deprives the king of such an over-awing prerogative over the persons and estates of the nobility and gentry, which usually fell into his custody after every tenant's decease, as will very much weaken his interest in, and their over-much dependance on him; and make them less subject to engage for or with him against the parliament's or kingdom's common interest.

"The next Proposition relating to the kingdom's Safety and Settlement, not so immediately and directly as any of the former, is that which concerns Delinquents, in which alone, as to the state, the king's Answers are pretended unsatisfactory; not in all, but only in some particulars, of no extraordinary concernment, in my apprehension, though so much insisted on by many, as to vote all the Treaty unsatisfactory. In opening the state of the king's Answers to this Proposition, I shall do these three things: 1. I shall shew how far the king and you are both agreed; 2. In what particulars you really or seemingly differ; 3. I shall examine whether these differences herein be of any such moment, as to induce the house to vote the Answers to this and the other Propositions upon the whole Treaty unsatisfactory; and so reject and lose whatever the king hath granted in the rest, because he hath not satisfied our demands in this one, and two others concerning the Church.—For the First, Both houses, by their Votes, have thought this Proposition touching Delinquents so needless to be insisted on, in every punctilio, for the Public Settlement, which will certainly more obstruct than promote it, mercy and moderation being the nearest way to peace and union) that you have reduced, since the Treaty, the persons excepted in the first Qualification both from life and composition, from 37 to 7 only; 6 of those are beyond the seas quite out of your power*, the seventh, aged, scarce worth your execution†. The king consents that they should be banished during the pleasure of both houses, which is a civil death; banishment being, next to death, the severest punishment, and, to some men, more grievous than present execution: but if that will not satisfy, then he leaves them wholly to your justice, to proceed against them, if you please, according to law; and promiseth 'not to interpose nor pardon any of them if legally condemned; only he adds, ex abundanti, 'That he cannot, in justice or honour, assent to any act to take away their lives by a mere legislative power, ex post facto,' if they have done nothing that was formerly capital by the known laws of the land, by which he leaves them to be tried. This Answer many gentlemen, who have spoken, have concluded very unsatisfactory, and made many large descants on it, because they did not rightly weigh nor understand it; when as, in truth, it answers the very Proposition in terminis, as I shall clearly manifest to all who understand what law is.—1st, It is apparent, that one of the first quarrels and cause of taking up arms, on our parts, was to bring Delinquents to condign punishment, according to the laws and statutes of the realm, as you have declared to the kingdom in many printed Declarations; and in your Petitions to the king you always desired him to leave Delinquents to the course of justice, not to cut them off by a mere legislative power, when as you could not do it by any known law. 2dly, You have professed to all the world, and to the king and Delinquents themselves, that you have taken up arms to defend and preserve the antient fundamental laws and liberties of the kingdom, and to oppose the introduction of any arbitrary and tyrannical power; yea, yourselves and the Army likewise have declared against all extraordinary proceedings and trials in the lords house to fine or imprison, without any indictment, or legal trial by jury or verdict, according to Magna Charta and the Common Law: therefore your bringing Delinquents to punishment for life and estates, which is the first Branch of this Proposition, must be intended only of a just and legal trial, as yourselves have always professed, not by a new law in the postea: and if so, then the king, in case you will not rest satisfied with the seven excepted persons banishment, is content to leave them to your justice, even for life and estate, according to the known laws of the realm; and will no ways interrupt your proceedings therein, nor pardon them: therefore in this he fully consents to the Proposition.—But it hath been objected, 1st, That the king denies to yield them up to justice, or to have any hand in their prosecution; and therefore his Answer is unsatisfactory: 2dly, That this expression, 'That he can neither in justice nor honour consent to any act for to take away their lives or estates,' is as high a justification of them, and his own cause, as possible, and contradictory to the first Proposition; and declares the King's heart to be still the same and unchanged.—To which I answer, 1st, Both these are such gross mistakes and inconsequences, that I wonder how any intelligent man can insist upon them: for the king, in positive terms, if you will not accept of their banishment, yields them up to a legal trial, in which himself must be the prosecutor; the indictment being in his name, the prosecution at his suit by his counsel at law, and the witnesses produced on his behalf, as all men know, who understand what belongs to a legal trial. Therefore, to infer from the king's Answer, that he disclaims all prosecution of them, is a direct contradiction and falsehood. 2dly, The king's very condescension to their banishment, and forfeiture of their estates, for adhering to his cause, and putting them upon their legal trial, is an express disavowal of his own cause as just, and an acknowledgment of its badness and illegality; and if the parliament should yield up those, who have acted for and adhered to them, to banishment, confiscation of estate, and a legal trial for their lives, I am certain the objectors themselves would protest that therein they had betrayed their righteous cause, and deserted their best affected friends. 3dly, 'Expressum facit cessare tacitum;' the king having, in direct terms, justified your cause and war as just, in the first Proposition; acknowledged those persons exempted in this, and treated for, under the very name and notion of Delinquents, to be such, in this very Proposition; and consented to their banishment and loss of estate, cannot, without apparent absurdity, be averred to justify them and their cause in this his Answer, which yields them up to the strictest legal justice, as Delinquents. 4thly, Those words of the king, so much excepted against, used and intended by him only in relation to his regal consent to a new law to condemn them ex post facto, where there was no law before, are so far from any exception, that for my part, I should have held him neither just nor honourable had he omitted this expression. For can it be just or honourable for a king to engage men in his service by special commission or command, when there is no known law to make their obedience criminal; and yet afterwards to give his royal assent to a subsequent law to take away their lives, and forfeit their estates, for obeying his own royal commands? suppose we were now in the king's condition and he in ours, and he should press you to consent to a new law to make all those who have acted for you, and by your commissions, in this war, traitors, and to lose their lives and estates for it, when there was no former law to punish them; would you not all give the self same Answer as he doth, that you could neither in honour nor justice, nor yet in point of conscience, consent to such a law? and would not yourselves and all others protest, you had neither justice nor honesty in you, should you be so base and perfidious as to condescend unto it, to betray all those you had engaged and to give them such a requital for their services? would any persons ever after honour, serve, or trust you, should you do it? or could you, or any other, honour, trust, or serve the king in any dubious employment after this, if he should thus unworthily, ex post facto, betray his own party now? This Answer therefore of his clearly discovers to us, that there is yet so much justice and honour in him, as for no fear or danger to consent to such an unjust and unworthy act, as by a new law to cut off the heads of those himself engaged in his service, when there was no law extant then to do it; and makes it more satisfactory unto me, than otherwise, and shews he doth not dissemble, but is real in his Answers; and I shall sooner trust and believe him now, than if he had consented to such an unworthy act. 5thly, This Answer is both just and honourable; because if the king should assent to a new act to forfeit their lives and estates, he would condemn them rashly and unjustly without hearing their defence or evidence; and for the king to condemn any for traitors by a bill, without hearing the cause or evidence against them, or to make men traitors by a law subsequent to their offences, is neither just nor honourable, in every just man's judgment; and of very dangerous precedent as sir Edw. Coke informs us, the lord Cromwell, the inventor of such Acts of Attainder, being the first that lost his head by this new invention.—All which considered, there is no rational man but must conclude the king's Answer unto this Branch touching Delinquents, to be fully satisfactory even to your own Demands, as well in words as substance, notwithstanding the objections against it. But admit the Answer as bad as any have made it, shall we therefore conclude it so unsatisfactory as to break off the Treaty upon it, and involve the kingdom in another war, of which no man can know the end or issue? God forbid we should ever be so unadvised. The persons whose lives you desire for a sacrifice to public justice, are but 7 in number; 6 of them out of your power in foreign parts, where a new war will not reach them; the seventh an aged man, who may chance to die before judgment or execution pass against him; you have all their whole estates at your disposal already, and their persons too by way of banishment, during both houses pleasure; and will you adventure another 7 years war, and the loss perchance of 70,000 men's lives, and as many millions of treasure, to the ruin of the kingdom, for the bare lives of 7 Delinquents only; or in truth, of one alone, who is fully in your power, which you may take away by a legal trial without a war? Will not all the kingdom, nay all the three kingdoms and the whole world, cry out upon you for such a frantic unadvised act as this? Yea, and for such an unjust and wicked Resolution, to hazard the lives, and shed the blood, of many thousand innocent and gallant men to take away the head of one, or only of 7 vile Delinquents; the sparing of whose lives will more conduce to Settlement, and real unity, than their deaths by the Axe of Justice? For shame, then, let us not vote the king's Answer to this Branch of Delinquents so unsatisfactory, as to break off and lose all upon it, since I have proved it fully satisfactory in all things to your own last Demands.—As to the Delinquents specified in the second and third Qualification, the king and you are fully agreed. Besides, the king consents to the exclusion of the Delinquents, specified in the first Qualification, from sitting in parliament, being of his councils, coming within the verge of his court, bearing any office, or having any employment in the state, during the pleasure of both houses. Thus far you are both agreed; only he desires this mitigation of their penalty, in case they shall offend herein, that they may not be guilty of High Treason, and incapable of any Pardon, and forfeit all their estates; nor that those who shall return from banishment without leave, may incur so high a penalty, but a more moderate, suitable to the law they shall offend. And, to break only upon this excess and extremity of punishment, (too high even in many wise men's opinions for such offences, and of dangerous precedent to posterity, it being the wisdom of our ancestors, to make as few new Treasons as possible, as being only for the king's advantage and people's prejudice) when a lesser penalty may as well, and sooner too, prevent the mischief, is neither safe nor prudent.—As for the Compositions of such persons; the king only desires their being moderated, if you think fit, even to such proportions as the Army itself, in their Proposals made in Aug. 1647, thought reasonable; and if you please not to grant it, then he leaves them to compound at such rates as you and they shall agree; and those are only such as you have already fixed on in former Compositions, from which you will not vary; and in case they will not compound at your rates, you have then the benefit of all their sequestered estates till their Compositions be made, which is your benefit and their loss. Therefore, in this, though some have been pleased, without any colour of reason, to assert the contrary, you are both fully accorded.—To the Delinquents in the fifth Qualification; the king consents to all your Desires, with this exception only, that such delinquent ministers, who are not scandalous in their lives or doctrine, and are already sequestered, may enjoy the third part of the profits of their livings, for the support of them and their families, and be capable of future preferments, if they be thought fit to enjoy them. This some have concluded very unsatisfactory, because it craves some little favour for malignant ministers: but I beseech you consider how inconsiderable the difference is, and how just and charitable the king's request is in their behalf. Yourselves, both by Ordinance and common practice, grant the full fifth part of the profits of sequestered livings to the wives and children of sequestered ministers, as well in case of scandal and insufficiency, as malignity: the king desires only that such who have been sequestered merely for malignancy, and are not scandalous, may receive a third part instead of a fifth; and, for their future encouragement, having spent their time in fitting themselves for the ministry, and being fit for no other calling, and having lost their former livings, he requests only that, in this scarcity of able ministers, they may be capable merely of future preferments, for which they shall be adjudged meet, in such a way as you shall appoint, not he or they: a just, a charitable request, and that which yourselves have done, there being many able godly ministers of eminent parts and exemplary lives, who have not been so clearly convinced in point of conscience, as to concur with you in the late wars, for which they have been sequestered, and have since been better satisfied; and God forbid that such should be made utterly incapable of the ministry, and they and their families starve for want of bread. I beseech you therefore, of all other things, let us not break with the king upon this act of charity, of piety, lest all the world condemn us for uncharitableness, and judge the king to be more pious and charitable than we. And no doubt it will be the greatest charity to ourselves, to our Church, our religion, our kingdom, at this time, rather to close with the king in this particular, than hazard all for a few third parts, and to be as charitable as his majesty. The more charity we shew, the greater unity, peace, amity, and better Settlement we may expect.

“But the greatest Dissatisfaction of all, referred to this head of Delinquents, is in the king's Answers concerning his present recalling of the marquis of Ormond's Commission to treat with, and unite, the Irish Rebels. To which I answer, 1st, That this was no part of the Propositions first sent, but a collateral emergent, discovered since the Treaty, upon colonel Jones's Letter; and so the unsatisfactoriness of the king's Answer, as to this alone, can be no just cause or ground to vote the other Answers unsatisfactory, or to break off the Treaty. 2dly, The king's granting of this Commission to Ormond, at the time he did it, is no such heinous thing as many have made it, all circumstances considered. The king, when the Army would not close with him upon their own terms the last year, (who treated with him without your privacy, and against your orders, even then when they unjustly impeached the 11 Members for holding secret intelligence with him and his party, of which themselves were only culpable) was shut up close prisoner in Carsbrook Castle, in the Isle of Wight, by their procurement; and by the Votes of both houses (proceeding originally from the Officers and the Army's projection, promoted by their Declaration and Engagement to join with the houses in settling the kingdom without and against the king, and forcibly passed the lords house by the Army's garrisoning Whitehall, and billeting a regiment of horse in the Mews, to terrify them to a concurrence with the commons) quite laid aside like a dead man out of mind, and no more Addresses to be made to him by the houses, or from him to them; and no access of any to him under pain of high treason, without both houses license: the king, in these extremities, the better to procure his own enlargement and the kingdom's Settlement by a Treaty, grants a commission to the marquis of

Ormond to unite the Irish forces, then divided, for the foresaid ends. Extremities certainly put honest and wise men too, as the Army's friends grant, upon hard shifts for self-preservation; and such extremity put the king upon this of Ormond.—The king is flesh and blood as well as we, and nature teacheth him to use the best means he may for his own preservation and deliverance in such a strait: the Army, the last summer, refused to disband or suffer any of their forces to go for Ireland, to preserve and secure that kingdom, only from this ground of self-preservation, upon which they would now enforce you, by their Remonstrance and marching up to your doors with their forces, to break off the Treaty, or vote it wholly unsatisfactory; whence most gentlemen that differ in opinion from me have made this their sole or chief argument that the king's Answers are unsatisfactory, because the Army would else not be satisfied. If then your own Army may thus disobey your Votes, and force your consents, only upon a pretence of self-preservation and defence, when they are in no visible danger, the king, by as good or better reason, in this extremity of danger, might justly make use of Ormond's endeavours for his better safety and enlargement. And if some members have affirmed in this house, as hath been alledged in this debate, That they would join with Turks or the worst of nations, and call them in to their assistance, rather than the king should come in by conquest; then the king, by like reason, might join with Ormond and the Irish, rather than be thus laid aside and destroyed. And what we ourselves would do in his or the like condition, we cannot justly blame in him. 3dly, The king did never absolutely deny the recalling of Ormond's Commission, but only suspended it till the Treaty ended; and if you then close with him, you have his engagement presently to revoke it; if then you agree with him upon this Treaty, your demand in this is granted, and the danger prevented; but if you will not agree at all, it is very hard measure to press the king to a present disadvantage, who is like to receive no advantage by you; nothing being obligatory on either side till all be concluded.—In fine: The king hath so far condescended to satisfy you in his final Answer, as to write a Letter to Ormond, to suspend the execution of his Commission for the present, and engaged to revoke it so soon as you and he agree in future; and more than this, as the case stands, we cannot well in justice require, and we should hardly grant so much were it our own case as it is the king's: and seeing all our dangers may be prevented by our agreement with the king, and this demand then fully granted, there is no reason to vote this unsatisfactory, when we may have all we desire, if we please ourselves. However, I see no such difference between the king and us, in this of Ormond and that of Delinquents, as to vote the final Answers to them and all the rest unsatisfactory; and so to lose England, dis-

“The last Proposition relating to the Security of the state, is, ‘That the City of London shall enjoy all their Rights,’ &c. (see p. 1068) To all which the king hath fully consented, so as his Answer thereto cannot be voted unsatisfactory by any, but such who envy the City’s weal and security, that themselves may the better seize and trample on it, to its enslaving and ruin. This Concession is, 1. A great honour to, and justification of, your cause; the City having been more cordial to, active for, and bountiful towards, you upon all occasions and exigencies than all other parts of the kingdom; the harbourers, the relievers of all who have fled from the enemies tyranny thither for safety or relief; yea, the only treasury to advance monies upon all exigencies, and those to whom, under God, you principally owe your victories and preservation. Now, for the king to honour the city with such Concessions as these, which hath been most hurtful to, and deepest engaged against, him in this war, is almost as high and full, if not a greater, justification of, and countenance to, your cause, as his consent to the first Proposition: 2. A great satisfaction to the City for all their services and expences, and a firm security against all future fears and sufferings for engaging so deeply in your Cause: 3. An extraordinary engagement to the City, faithfully to adhere to you and all succeeding parliaments, upon the like cause and occasion, and to other corporations to do the like: 4. A great security and advantage to the whole kingdom, whose weal and safety principally consist in London’s welfare, its principal magazine, mart, bulwark, refuge, and military security both by sea and land; wherewith the whole kingdom stands or falls. Had the king once gained London in these wars, the parliament and all England had been quickly lost, without hopes of recovery; which will be in a secure or recoverable condition at all times, if it be safe and true to the public interest, from which some have studied of late to disengage it; to ruin it and the parliament too, which were always free from imminent danger whilst cordially united, and near to both their ruins being now disjointed.

“Mr. Speaker, I have thus, as briefly as I could, with discharge of my conscience and duty, run through all the Propositions which concern the Security and Settlement of our state against the king’s armed violence, or exorbitant civil sword or prerogative, and other particulars relating to its peace and safety, with the king’s respective Answers thereunto; and, for mine own opinion, I humbly conceive them so fully satisfactory, and abundantly sufficient for our weal and safety against all future dangers and encroachments on our liberties, that, if we conjoin them with those other acts the king hath already consented to this parliament, we can neither desire nor expect any additions to make us more compleatly happy and secure than any people or kingdom under Heaven. The king hath already, by acts of parliament, condemned and suppressed Ship-Money; his own monopoly of making Gunpowder and Saltpetre; fines for Knight-hood; impositions upon Merchants Goods, Tonnage and Poundage, without grant by parliament; Coat and Conduct Money; Forest Bounds and Laws, the grand Grievances, under which we groaned heretofore; so as we need never fear their revival, nor any others of that nature; especially since we have the nomination of all great officers and judges, the chief promoters of them. Besides, by act of parliament, he hath for ever suppressed the Bishops sitting and voting in parliament, a great disadvantage to him, they commonly voting what he pleased, and being wholly at his devotion; together with the three grand oppressive courts and shops of tyranny, oppression, and injustice in the kingdom, (the great terrors of men’s spirits, the invaders of their rights, members, liberties; the chief enlargers and maintainers of an unlimited prerogative, and authors of all our late illegal projects, and pressures) the Star-Chamber, the High Commission, and Council Table; the king’s chief engines to screw up his prerogative to the highest, and lay his subjects lowest; to which a fourth is since added in this Treaty, the Court of Wards: all which being totally abolished, the king hath now no court nor instrument left that I can think of, whereby to injure or oppress his people as in former times. The oppressions likewise and extortions of the Stannary Courts, and of the Clerks of the Market, are rectified by acts this session; yea this parliament, by act perpetuated, without any power in the king to adjourn and dissolve it, till all concur to dissolve it by an act of parliament; and, when this shall be so determined for our future security, and redress of all growing mischiefs which may endanger us, there is a provision by another law for a Triennial Parliament; with power to summon it, in case of the king’s refusal, without him or his writ, and authority for the houses to sit for a convenient time, (sufficient to redress all Grievances, punish all public offenders, and settle useful laws) without dissolution or adjournment.—To which I may add the Act of Oblivion, Pacification, and Union, with our brethren of Scotland: upon granting of four of which acts alone, the house of commons, in their Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom*, Dec. 1, 1641, ‘did, with much thankfulness, acknowledge, ‘that his majesty had passed more good Bills ‘at that time, to the advantage of the subjects, ‘than have been passed in many ages.’ And if he shall now accumulate all the fore-mentioned Propositions, turned into acts, to those already enacted, with some few laws more for the regulating of some grievances and corruptions in the common law; the punishing and restraining of some public mischiefs and crimes, and punishment of extortions, (which will be readily assented to, there being no loss nor prejudice to the crown in passing them) we may, through God's blessing, in all human probability, if our sins deprive us not of so great a felicity, be the freest, happiest, securest, most flourishing, and best ordered kingdom and people in the world; and enjoy such privileges and immunities as our ancestors never so much as once imagined, much less aspired after. And if we will not now rest satisfied, and thankfully contented, with all these large extraordinary Concessions, and bless God for this tender of them to our hands, the present, and all future ages, will chronicle us for the most unreasonable and ungrateful creatures that ever sat within these walls, or the world produced since the creation.

"Mr. Speaker, having now at large demonstrated, I hope to every rational and honest man's conviction, the satisfactoriness of the king's Answers to all our Propositions relating to the Safety and Settlement of our State, I shall, in the next place, proceed to those Propositions and Concessions which concern the Peace, Settlement, and Security of our Church and Religion, wherein there appears the greatest difficulty; the most whereof I shall dispatch with greater brevity than the former. There are 3 things especially which may endanger and disturb the Peace and Settlement of our Church and Religion; 1. Popery, Popish Corruptions and Innovations, introduced by Jesuits, Papists and superstitious clergymen popishly addicted; 2. Profaneness; 3. Prelacy: and one chief thing to promote religion and the church's happiness, the propagation of the Gospel, by settling preaching ministers throughout the kingdom, and establishing the public Worship and Church-Government in such sort as is most agreeable to God's Word. For all these there is sufficient ground in the king's Answers to our Propositions concerning them, to vote them satisfactory, as I humbly apprehend, and hope to manifest. For the first of these dangers to our Church and Religion: there is as good security and Provision granted us by the King, as we did or could desire even in our own terms. 1st, He hath fully consented to pass an Act, 'For the more effectual disabling of Jesuits, Papists, and Popish Recusants, from disturbing the State and eluding the laws; 2. For the Education of the children of Papists, by Protestants, in the Protestant Religion: 3. For the due levying of the Penalties against Recusants. 4. Whereby the practices of the Papists against the state may be prevented:' whereby it is made Treason for any priest to say Mass in the Court or Queen's own chapel; and so no place left for the saying of mass throughout the kingdom, no not in the Queen's own chamber: 5. 'For abolishing all Innovations, Popish Superstitions, Ceremonies, Altars, &c.' By all which acts, added to our former laws against Recusants, I dare affirm we have now far better provision and security against Papists, Jesuits, Popish Recusants, their Popish Pictures, Innovations, Superstitions and Ceremonies, both for our Church's and Religion's safety, and states too, than any Protestant Church, state or kingdom whatsoever; so as we need not fear any future danger from Papists and Popery, if we be careful to see those Concessions duly put into Execution, when turned into acts, and our former laws.

Secondly, Against the Growth and Danger of Profaneness; his majesty hath condescended to an act of parliament, as large as can be drawn, 'against all Profanations whatsoever of the Lord's Day, with severe punishments for the profaners of it in any kind; and against all such as shall write or preach against its morality and due observation:' and likewise to an act, to be framed and agreed upon by both houses 'For the reforming and regulating both Universities, and of the Colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eaton, the seminaries of learning and education of youth to serve and rule in our church and state. By which two grants, if duly executed, all impiety and profaneness which can endanger our Church and Religion, will easily be suppressed for the present, and prevented for the future.

"Thirdly, Against the Danger and Revival of Episcopacy, and the Appendages thereunto belonging; the king hath clearly condescended to these particulars, in terminis: 1. To an Act, 'For the Abolition of all Archbishops, Chancellors, Commissaries, Deans and Sub-Deans, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, Canons, Prebendaries, &c. and all other Episcopal, Cathedral, or Collegiate Officers both in England, Wales, and Ireland; and to the disposal of all their lands and possessions for such uses as the houses shall think meet.' So as there is no fear at all of their resurrection to disturb our Church. All the question and difference now between the king and houses is only concerning the office and power of Bishops, and their lands and possessions; in which two I find most members declare themselves to be unsatisfied; especially those who have purchased Bishops Lands, who are very zealous in that point for their own interests.—For the clearing of these two scruples, I shall examine and debate these two Particulars: 1. How far the king hath consented to the houses Propositions for the abolishing of the office and jurisdiction of Bishops in the Church: 2. How far he hath condescended to the sale and disposal of their Lands and Possessions; and whether his Concessions in both these be not sufficiently satisfactory, in the sense I have stated the question in the beginning of this debate.—To the first of these; it is clear that the king, in his two last Papers, hath abolished and extirpated that Episcopacy and Prelacy which we intended, and have so earnestly contested against; and contends now for no other but an Apostolical Bishop, which is but the same in all things with an ordinary minister or Presbyter; which Bishop, being Apostolical and of Divine institution, we neither may, nor can, nor ever intended to abolish by our Covenant. To make this evident to all men's consciences: The king hath yielded to take away all the power and jurisdiction whatsoever exercised by our Bishops, in point of censure or discipline, in his former Answer; and contends for nothing now but their power of Ordination only; and that not solely vested in the bishop, but in him and other Presbyters jointly; yet so, as the bishop should have a negative voice in Ordinations; but the houses voting this unsatisfactory, because that the bishops, for 3 years during the continuance of the Presbyterian government, should have the chief power of Ordination, and after those 3 years the sole power, there being no others vested or intrusted with that power after the 3 years expired, so as Bishops might by this means creep in, and get up again by degrees as high as ever: thereupon the king, in his final Answer hereunto, though not fully satisfied in point of conscience but that the power of Ordination is principally vested only in Bishops by divine authority, hath yet, for our Satisfaction, thus far condescended to us: 1. That for 3 years next ensuing, during the Presbyterian government, no Bishops shall at all exercise this power of Ordination in the Church: 2. That if he can be satisfied in point of conscience within that time, upon conference with divines, that this power of Ordination, so far as to have a negative voice in it, belongs not unto Apostolical Bishops by a divine right, then he will fully consent to the utter abolition, even of this power of Ordination in the Bishops. 3. That after the 3 years are expired, if the king can neither satisfy his houses in point of conscience, nor they him upon debate, that this power of Ordination belongs, jure divino, to Bishops; that yet the exercise of that power shall be totally suspended in them, till he and both houses shall agree upon a government, and by act of parliament settle a Form of Ordination; so as if both houses never consent that Bishops shall hereafter have a hand or negative voice in Ordination, this power of Bishops is perpetually suspended, and, as to the exercise of it, perpetually abolished, even by this Concession, so as it can never be revived again without both houses concurring assents. And by this means Episcopacy is totally extirpated, root and branch according to the Covenant, which hath been so much pressed in this debate; though the words of it have been somewhat mistaken, that we therein absolutely covenant to extirpate Episcopacy; when as the words are only, 'That we shall endeavour the Extirpation of Prelacy' That is, 'of Archbishops and Bishops,' &c. And that certainly we have done, and in a great measure accomplished, so far as to satisfy both the words and intention of the Covenant, though a concurrent power of Ordination be left in Bishops, which yet is now totally suspended: For, as we covenant in the same clause, 'to endeavour to root out popery, superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever

'shall be found to be contrary to sound doctrine, and the power of godliness,' in the extirpation of which I am certain we have not proceeded, by an hundred degrees, so far as we have actually done in the extirpation of Episcopacy (there being no Proposition at all in the Treaty for the extirpation of heresy, schism, and errors, as there is of Episcopacy); and yet the gentlemen, who are so zealous for the Covenant, persuade themselves they and we have not violated it in these particulars; therefore much less in the point of Prelacy and Bishops, since we have left them nothing at all but a mere power of Ordination, actually suspended from any future execution, but by both houses assents: 4. The king, by abolishing Archbishops, and Deans and Chapters, hath also therein actually abolished all Bishops too for the future, except those who are already made: for, by the laws and custom of the realm, no bishop can be consecrated but by an archbishop, or some deputation from him, in case of sickness; nor any bishop made or consecrated, unless he be first elected by the dean and chapter, upon a congé d'élire issued out to them to choose one. Now, there being no deans and chapters left to elect, nor archbishop to consecrate any bishop for the future, there can be no bishop at all hereafter made in England or Ireland; and so the bishop being thereby abolished and extirpated, his power of Ordination must be destroyed with his function, as well as suspended. All which considered, I cannot but conclude the king's final Answer, as to the office of, and Ordination by, bishops, to be completely satisfactory to our demands: and so much the rather, because the king, in this particular of Ordination, pleads only dissatisfaction in point of conscience for closing with us in this seeming punctilio; and if it were not merely conscience, (though some have over rashly censured it for a mere pretence to keep up bishops still) he that hath granted and yielded us the greater, would never contest with us for the lesser, nor go so far in the abolition of Episcopacy as he hath done. And truly, I doubt not, but his majesty, by conference, may soon be satisfied in this point: nay, had his own Divines dealt faithfully with him in the Isle of Wight, he might have been easily satisfied in this particular: in which, I doubt not, by God's blessing, to undertake to satisfy him, both in point of Episcopacy, that it is in all things the same with Presbytery; and that the Ordination of Presbyters and Ministers, by divine right, belongs only to Presbyters as such, and not to bishops as bishops; who, for above a thousand years after Christ, claimed the chief, but not the sole interest in it; not by divine right and authority, but merely by canons and custom long after the Apostle's times; which I have proved at large long since in my "Unbishopsing of Timothy and Titus;" which none of the bishops or their patrons, ever yet attempted to answer, though I particularly challenged them to do it.—Only this I shall now say, in brief, for some satisfaction in the point, to other members: 1. That there is no one text of Scripture to prove that Bishops, jure divino, are distinct from Presbyters in any thing, much less in this particular of having a negative voice, or sole or principal interest, as bishops so distinguished in the power of Ordination; but a direct text to the contrary, 1 Tim. iv. 14. to omit others. 2. That the pretence of appropriating Ordination to Bishops, distinct from Presbyters, by divine right, is grounded upon these two gross mistakes, that Timothy and Titus were bishops properly so called, the one of Ephesus, the other of Crete; and that this power of ordaining Elders was vested in them, quatenus bishops only, and not otherwise, by divine institution. For proof of the first, the Postscripts of Paul's Epistles to them (and not one text of Scripture) are cited; and the 1 Tim. v. 22. Tit. i. 5. relating only to Ordination, for the latter. But it is as clear as the noon-day sun, by Scripture, that Timothy was never a Bishop properly so called, much less the first or sole bishop of Ephesus, as is evident by sundry texts, especially by Acts xx. 4, 5, 6, 15, 17, 18, 28, 19, 30, 31, compared together; nor Titus a Bishop, properly so termed, distinct from a Presbyter; much less the first or sole bishop of Crete: nor do either of those texts prove that they had the power of Ordination by divine right vested in them two, merely as Bishops distinct from, or superior to, Presbyters, as I have undeniably manifested in my "Unbishopsing of Timothy and Titus." And as for the Postscripts to these Epistles, terming 'Timothy ordained first Bishop of Ephesus, and 'Titus of Crete,' they are no part of the text; but first extant in, and invented by, Oecumenius* (not the most authentic author) above 1050 years after Christ, and annexed only to the end of his Commentary on those Epistles, not adjoined to the text; and they are not only omitted in most manuscripts and printed editions and translations of these Epistles, but apparently false in themselves, as I have at large demonstrated in some printed Books: therefore this point of conscience may soon be satisfied. 3. That no Bishops, for 1200 years after Christ, did ever claim the chief power in Ordination by any divine right, as bishops, but merely by canons or custom long after the Apostles: and that in the primitive times, before any restriction by councils, presbyters in many places did not only ordain ministers and deacons without Bishops, and bishops never but jointly with presbyters; but likewise ordain bishops themselves, as Jerom, Epiphanius, Augustine, and others assure us: and sometimes joined in the consecration and instalment even of Popes themselves and Archbishops, for defect of Bishops. 4. That it is the constant tenet of all the eminentest Protestant

Divines, and some learned Papists too, and the practice of all the Reformed Churches, that the Divine Right of Ordination belongs originally to the whole Church, but ministerially to Presbyters, as such; not to Bishops as Bishops; and that which undeniably clears it up to me, is this, That, in the New Testament, we find both Apostles, some of the 70 Disciples, Evangelists, and Presbyters equally ordaining Elders or Presbyters; but not any one who is once in Scripture styled a Bishop, either conferring Orders upon any, much less eo nomine & jure, as a Bishop: and, since the Apostles times, we find, in point of use and practice, popes, patriarchs, archbishops, metropolitans, cardinals, abbots, in some places (who are not jure divino, nor bishops properly so called, but distinguished from them in degree) ordaining presbyters and ministers, as well as bishops, quatenus bishops; and that never by themselves, but all by the presbyters joint concurrence then present; who, by the fourth Council of Carthage, the Canon Law, the very Canons of Trent also, and our own Book of Ordination and our Canons, ought also to join with them in the Ordination: now, all these distinct orders and degrees claiming and exercising this power by a divine right, and many of their functions being confessed not to be of divine right, as popes, patriarchs, archbishops, metropolitans, abbots, and choral bishops, who yet ordain; and these always necessarily calling presbyters, who are clearly of divine right, to join with them in their ordination, and not doing it alone, is an unanswerable proof to me, that they all concur in this action in no other right or notion at all, but merely as they are presbyters, in which they all accord, and have one and the same authority; not in their own capacities, wherein they are all discriminated, and are not all of divine, but only of human institution; presbyters, quatenus presbyters, being the properest persons to ordain others of their own degree and function, as doctors of divinity, law, and physic, in the universities, create doctors of their several professions, and bishops consecrate bishops and archbishops; even as a man begets a man of his own quality and degree, and all other creatures generate those of their own kind, without the concurrence of any other distinct species paramount to them.—As for the Angel of the Church of Ephesus, much insisted upon in the Isle of Wight, to prove an Episcopacy, jure divino, distinct from Presbytery, I never read that this Angel ordained any presbyters, either quatenus angel or bishop; nor find I the name of a bishop in any of St. John's writings, but the title of a Presbyter or Elder very frequent, by which himself is styled; and I wonder much the king or his bishops should now so much insist upon this Angel, and assert him to be a lord bishop, not an ordinary minister. For, 1st, king James* himself, and all the bishops of England, with those learned men employed by them in the last translation of the Bible, in the very contents prefixed to this chapter, Rev. ii. resolve the angels of those Churches to be ministers, in these very words, 'What is commanded to be written to the Angels, that is, the ministers (not bishops) of the Churches of Ephesus, Smyrna, &c.' If then the angels, by their joint concessions, when these contents were first composed and prefixed, were only the ministers, not bishops, of these churches; and this hath ever since been constantly admitted, confessed, and published to be so even in our authorized Bibles, used in all churches, chapels, families, and printed cum privilegio, five or six times every year, without any alteration or disallowance of this exposition, I marvel much how the bishops now dare inform the king that these angels certainly were only bishops, but not ministers, diametrically contrary to these authorized contents of their own or predecessors affixing, with learned King James's approbation, or how his majesty, when he knows it, can believe them, though they should aver it, against his own father's, and the whole Church of England's resolution, which hath so long received and approved this translation, excluding all others in public, and these contents thereto prefixed. 2dly, Admit this Angel of Ephesus to be a diocesan Bishop, distinct from an ordinary presbyter, yet he was but an Apostate, 'who had left his first Love,' ver. 4. And if Timothy, as they affirm, was sole Bishop of Ephesus, he must be the Apostate, being at that time living, unless he resigned his office to some other; which is improbable. And for our Bishops to father that divine right of their prelacy upon an apostate Angel, is no good divinity, and less policy at this instant. And this their rotten foundation upon an Apostate, may probably be the ground why so many prelates, in this and former ages, have turned apostates after they were created bishops. 3dly, 'If those Angels in the Revelations were really lord bishops, then certainly the Elders therein mentioned can be no other than presbyters, not bishops, as the prelates themselves will grant: and, if so, then verily the presbyter is the supreme of the two both in point of dignity, ministry, and precedency, which is very observable: For, 1, I find the 24 Elders, there mentioned, sitting upon 24 seats round about Christ's throne, and nearest to it, but the Angels standing, not sitting, round about it and them, without any seats at all provided for them, as inferior attendants. 2. I find these Elders not only sitting on seats next Christ's throne; but likewise clothed with white raiment, and having on their heads crowns of gold, the (emblem of supreme authority, power, and honour) whereas the Angels had neither white raiment nor crowns; so it seems Bishops had no lawn sleeves, nor rochets, nor mitres then, though they have since usurped and robbed the presbyters of them. 4thly, 'These Elders, not the Angels, are there always introduced worshipping and falling down before Christ's throne, holding harps and golden viols in their hands full of odours, representing the prayers of the saints, and singing the new song to him, as the principal officers and ministers of Christ; when as the Angels standing by, act or speak little in these kinds, like our late dumb, unpreaching, and rarely-praying prelates. 5thly, 'The 24 Elders, not the Angels, sing this new Song of Praise to Christ, 'Worthy art thou to take the Book, &c. and 'hast made us kings and priests,' not Angels or Bishops, 'to God the Father; and we,' not the Angels, 'that reign on the Earth.' Therefore, in all these respects, if the Angels, in the Apocalypse, be Bishops, as our prelates dream, the Elders must of necessity, jure divino, be their superiors and lords paramount in point of dignity, honour, sovereignty, and ministry; and they inferior in jurisdiction and power unto presbyters, not superior, as they would really make themselves. When his majesty shall be informed of these, and many other particulars of this kind, I doubt not but his conscience will be so much satisfied, as wholly to forego and lay aside his pretended Apostolical Bishops, both in point of function and Ordination too, as being the same with presbyters: and since, in his last Paper but one, he hath professed to retain no other bishops, but such as are apostolical, he must presently quit all those about him, and their possessions too, since neither of them are apostolical; the Apostolical Bishops being always many over one Church or congregation, not one over many churches, or a whole diocese, as ours are; and having no palaces, manors, lands, and possessions, as I shall prove in the next particular, which comes to be now debated, having fully cleared this to be satisfactory.

* This I have fully proved in my "Unbishopsing of Timothy and Titus." And, "The Antipathy of English Prelacy to Unity and Monarchy," part ii. cap. 9.

"For the second Question, concerning the Sale of Bishops Lands, How far the king hath condescended to it, and whether the king's Answers to the first Branch of that Proposition be satisfactory in the premised sense? I confess I find this the grand and most swaying argument of all others, used by those who differ from me in the Treaty as not satisfactory, because the king absolutely refuseth to agree to the Sale of Bishops Lands, for the satisfaction of those public debts for which they are engaged by both houses; whereby purchasers and lenders upon that assurance will not be only defrauded, but cheated out of their debts and purchases, many of them quite undone and ruined, and the honour and public faith of both houses for ever forfeited and laid in the dust. And indeed this is a very sensible argument, especially to such members who have either purchased Bishops Lands, or advanced monies upon their security, very fit to be fully answered; which I shall endeavour to do, I hope, to their full satisfaction and content.—I confess it to be most just and equal, that all who have purchased Bishops Lands, or advanced monies to the state upon them, should receive full satisfaction, and be no losers by it, but rather gainers. And I could have as heartily desired as any member of this house, that the king, in this particular of Bishops Lands, had given us plenary satisfaction; the rather, because I was employed by the houses as one of the contractors; though without my seeking, and to my prejudice, by neglecting my calling; and receiving, as yet, not one farthing salary for it, though I have spent and lost some hundreds of pounds in and by that employment; and had the king really done it, I presume few members of this house, now of a different opinion, would have voted his Answers to the whole Treaty unsatisfactory:—But to take them as they are, 1. 'The King hath so far condescended to their Sale and Disposal, made or to be made, as that the purchasers shall, by act of parliament, enjoy a lease of them, not from the Bishops themselves, but from the crown, for 99 years space; reserving only the reversions afterwards to the crown, and that for the use of the Church in general terms: 2. The king will be content with the reservation only of the old or some other moderate rent, to him and his heirs, to be employed only for the Church's use and benefit. 3. That, for the absolute Sale or Alienation of them, he cannot, in point of conscience, consent unto it, as being sacrilege, and an unlawful act in the opinion of all Divines, as well as in foreign reformed Churches as domestic.' This, as I remember and conceive, is the sum of his majesty's final Answer to this Proposition. To examine these particulars a little in the general, and then by parts. 1. I must make bold to inform you in the general, that the king, and his predecessors kings of this realm, were the original founders of all our bishopricks, and patrons of them; that all their lands, rents, and revenues whatsoever, originally proceeded from the crown and kings of England, of whom they are holden; and that, in times of vacancy, the king enjoys the profits of their temporalities as a part of his royal revenue, and receives both tenths and first fruits out of them upon every death or translation of the bishops; and therefore there is very great reason, and justice too, they should be still held of the crown, and not totally translated out of it; and that the king and his successors should receive some reasonable revenue or compensation out of them, parting with such an interest, in recompence for them. 2. That in the several Treaties with the king, in Feb. 1642, and July, 1646, all the lands, possessions, rents, and reversions, both of archbishops and bishops, and likewise of deans and chapters, and other officers of cathedral and collegiate churches, were by act of parliament, to be settled in the very real and actual possession of the king, his heirs and successors, for ever, to their own proper use; except only their impropriations, advowsons, tythes, and pensions, which are not now to be sold: and that the Ordinances for settling of Bishops Lands, rents, and possessions in feoffees, and engaging and selling them for the monies lent upon the public faith, and also for raising 200,000*l.* for disbanding of the Scots Army, passed not the houses till Oct. and Nov. 1646; till which time there was no thought nor intent at all to sell or alienate them from the crown. If then the king, in two or three former Treaties, by both houses full and free consent, and a Bill passed by them for that purpose, was to enjoy to himself, his heirs and successors, all the demesne lands, manors, possessions, reversions, rents, inheritances, and revenues of archbishops and bishops, and likewise of deans and chapters, prebends, and the like, it seems to me very just and reasonable that he should demand and enjoy the reversions of them after 99 years, and such a moderate rent as he and both houses shall agree on; and that this Answer of the king's, wherein he demands so little now, only for the Church's use and benefit, not his own, should be fully satisfactory, because we were very well content, in former Treaties, that he and his heirs should enjoy the whole, to their own use only. 3. That near one moiety of the archbishops and bishops possessions and revenues consists in impropriations, tythes, pensions, and the like; which the king is content wholly to part with for the increase of ministers means, and benefit of the Church, without any reservation or recompence; and with all deans and chapters lands and revenues to boot: therefore it should be unsatisfactory or unreasonable in no man's judgment, for the king to reserve some interest in the reversions and rents only of their demesne lands. 4. The king demands the Reversions of the Lands after 99 years, and some present moderate rent, not for the use and support of the Bishops, and to keep a root for them to grow up again in our Church, as hath been mistaken by some, (archbishops, and bishops too, being extirpated, root and branch, by the king's former Answers, as I have manifested) but only for the use of the Church, in such manner as the king and we shall agree to settle them; who shall take care that no Bishop shall be a sharer in them, all being to be settled in the crown alone, and nothing in reversion, or possession, in or upon the Bishops. 5. The king consents, That the purchasers of Bishops Lands shall, by act of parliament, have a lease of them for 99 years, reserving the reversion only after that term; which I conceive is no ill, but a very good, bargain for the purchasers; such a lease by act of parliament, being far better than the whole inheritance by a bare Ordinance of both houses; which, for aught I know, if not confirmed by a subsequent act of parliament, will prove little better than a tenancy at will, or a lease so long only as this parliament continues; Ordinances of both houses only, without the king's royal assent thereto, being a new device of this present parliament, to supply some present necessities for our necessary defence and preservation during the king's absence and hostility, never known or used in any former parliaments, whatever hath been conceived to the contrary: therefore this offer of the king's is no prejudice at all, but a great advantage, to the purchasers, wherewith they should rest fully satisfied. But admit it be any loss at all to them, and not rather a gain, as things now stand in our tottering condition, yet it is only of the reversion of these Lands after 99 years, worth not above one quarter or half a year's purchase at the utmost; which, considering the low values at which Bishops Lands were sold, and the cheap rates that most purchasers gave for bills of public faith, with which they bought them, they may be well content to lose, to secure their purchases for 99 years in these tumultuous and fluctuating times; when some wise men, who have made such purchases, would very gladly give 2 or 3 years purchase, if not more, at the Assurance Office, to any who will insure their estates in Bishops Lands for so long a term, and think they had a good bargain too; at least-wise far better than the Bishops, in case they should revive again, as some fear, who must be kept starving for 99 years in expectation of a dry reversion. All which considered, the king's Answers touching such Reversions, I humbly conceive, will be very satisfactory to the purchasers of Bishops Lands themselves, who are most displeased with it.—As to that which hath been objected, That some have purchased reversions of Bishops Lands after 99 years in being, who must absolutely lose their purchase-money after this rate; which is neither just nor honourable for the parliament: I answer, That this is but the case of 3 or 4 only; that their purchases are of no considerable value, nor bought singly by themselves, but jointly with lands or rents in possession of good value; in which they had the cheaper purchase to take off the reversion after so long a term; which loss in the reversion they may contentedly undergo to purchase their own and the kingdom's Peace, and enjoy what they have purchased, with these reversions, in possession, without trouble or eviction by act of parliament for 99 years space; or receive other satisfaction from the king and parliament to their contentment, in such manner as I shall presently inform you.

6. To that concerning the present Rents which the king demands out of Bishops Lands, which sticks most with purchasers, many of them having purchased nothing but rents, and others more rents than lands in possession, which rents must all be lost, if they must pay the old rents over to the king to their undoing; which would be both unjust, unconscionable, and dishonourable to the houses, upon whose assurance and engagement to enjoy their bargains, they were induced both to lend money on, and to purchase these Lands afterwards; and would be no better than plain cheating, and render them odious to all the world, as some have objected: I will not answer this with caveat emptor, but desire them to observe that the king, in his Answer, doth not peremptorily require the Bishops old Rents during the 99 years; but only disjunctively, either the old rents, or some other moderate rent to be agreed on; and if only a moderate proportion of the old rent be paid to the king, the purchaser is sure to enjoy the residue during the 99 years; and so his purchase-money not totally lost, as is objected. Besides, the king will not reserve these rents to the use of himself or the crown; but only to the Church and maintenance of the ministers, in such manner as he and his houses shall agree in the Bill for settling these Lands in the way propounded by him; which offer opens this just and honourable way for the houses to give all purchasers of Bishops Lands and Rents full satisfaction, both for the loss of their reversions after 99 years, and for the present Rents which shall be reserved to the Crown, out of Bishops Lands, to the Church's use; which I believe the king and houses will readily consent to; and that is, to settle, by act of parliament, so much of the Dean and Chapters demesne Lands and Rents upon the purchasers, as the loss of their reversions, after 99 years, and present rent to the crown, shall amount unto upon a just computation: by which means the purchasers, by way of exchange of Deans and Chapters Lands and Rents for those of Bishops, shall have such full and satisfactory content, even in kind, as will clear the honour, justice, and reputation of the houses fair dealings, in this particular, throughout all the world; and give the ministers full satisfaction likewise, for the augmentation of whose livings and maintenance the deans and chapters lands and rents are designed, by settling the reversion and rents reserved to the crown out of the Bishops Lands, for the Church's use, upon those who should have enjoyed Deans and Chapters Lands, thus settled on the purchasers by exchange; which being of equal value, can be no loss nor prejudice to any.—This is such a visible and real satisfaction to all purchasers, as none of them can justly open their mouths against, being both for their own security and advantage, and the kingdom's Settlement: but if any of them dislike this real satisfaction, which the king no doubt, will yield to, there is another means provided by this very Treaty for their satisfaction; and that is, by ready money for whatever they shall lose by Bishops Lands in possession or reversion, by this reservation to the crown; which I am sure they neither will nor can refuse in justice or equity; they having the Bishops Lands conveyed to them only by way of mortgage or security, for monies lent upon the public faith; and the houses, by the Tenth Article of this Treaty, have time, within 2 years space, by act or acts, to raise any sums of money for the payment of the public debts of the kingdom, whereof the monies lent upon Bishops Lands and the public faith are a principal part; and the same justice of the houses, which hath already provided, by several Ordinances, a sufficient recompence and satisfaction for purchasers of Bishops Lands in cases of eviction, or of emergent charges and incumbrances discovered after the purchases made, may be a sufficient assurance to them of the houses justice, that they will give them as good or better satisfaction by one of these two ways I have here propounded, for any thing they shall part with to the king or Church for the Settlement of the kingdom's Peace. 7. It hath been the solemn Protestation and Declaration of both houses, in all their Remonstrances to the king, kingdom, and foreign states, 'That they have taken up defensive arms against the king's party only for the maintenance of Religion, Laws, Liberties, &c. and to bring Delinquents to condign punishment.' Now Bishops Lands and Rents, I am certain, are neither our religion, laws, nor liberties, and I think they are no Delinquents, though most bishops are. And shall we now, after 7 years war, and 60 days Treaty, make Bishops Lands, which for 5 years time or more of our wars were never thought of, the sole or principal cause at least of our present breach with the king, and the only ground of a new war? God forbid. Will not all the world then justly censure us for notorious hypocrites and impostors, pretending one thing and intending another? Will they not then say, that Bishops Palaces and Lands were the only religion and liberty we have fought for, the only Delinquents we have brought to public justice and execution? That we would never have suppressed archbishops and bishops, nor entered into a Solemn League and Covenant, with hands lifted up to Heaven, to endeavour to extirpate them as Antichristian, but only to gain and retain all their lands and revenues; and never condemned their functions, but only to seize on their possessions? And that we must now maintain an Army upon their exhausted purses and estates, only to defend these purchasers titles to the bishops inheritances? If so, for shame, let us never break off this Treaty, nor ruin two or three kingdoms, upon such an absurd dissatisfaction as this. And if our purchasers of Bishops Lands shall still refuse to rest satisfied with that twofold recompence I have formerly mentioned, and keep up an army to maintain their purchases, rather than yield to any reason, I shall humbly move, That not the whole kingdom, but themselves alone, may defray the Army's taxes and quarters; and then I am certain they will have a dearer bargain than what the king or I have proposed for their satisfaction.—And, the better to persuade them to embrace this Compensation, I have only this more to offer both to them and you, 'That if you break off with the king upon this point, or close with the Army, they are most certain to lose all; for a bare Ordinance of both houses is no legal title, nor good security against king or bishops, without the king's concurrence and royal assent unto it; and valid no longer than maintained by the sword, the worst and most hazardous title of all others, which will quickly cost the purchasers and kingdom treble the value of all the

Bishops Revenues; and if they close with the Army to break the Treaty, they tell them in direct terms in print, in 'The Case of the Army truly stated,' presented to the General by the Agitators of the Army, at Hampstead, Oct. 15, 1647, p. 16, 'That whereas the times were wholly corrupt, when persons were appointed to make sale of Bishops Lands; and whereas parliament-men, committee-men, and kinsfolks were the only buyers, and much is sold, and yet it is pretended that little or no money is received. And whereas lords, parliament-men, and some other rich men, have vast sums of Arrears allowed them in their purchase, and all their monies lent to the state paid them, while others are left in necessity, to whom the state is much indebted; and so present money, that might be for the equal advantage of all, is not brought into the public treasury by those Sales: it is therefore to be insisted on, that the Sale of Bishops Lands be reviewed, and that they may be sold to their worth, and for present monies for the public use; and that the Sale of all such be recalled as have not been sold to their worth, or for present money.' This particular, among others, they profess they have entered into a Solemn Engagement to prosecute, and are now marched up to London accordingly to pursue it, as their late Remonstrance and Declaration intimates, and themselves professed by word of mouth; which I desire the members who have purchased Bishops lands, who are generally most unsatisfied with the king's Answers, especially in this particular, seriously to consider; and then to make their election, Whether they will now close with the king's Concessions, and what I have here propounded for satisfaction of their reversions after 99 years, and present rents they may chance to part with, and so secure their purchases for this term by act of parliament; and have full compensation for what they part with, either in ready money, or cleans and chapters lands and rents, and so be no losers, but great gainers, by the bargain; or else break with the king to please the Army, and so be certain to lose all between them; not only once but twice over: for the Agitators in the Army tell them plainly, 'That all their purchases shall be reviewed; and if they have purchased them at an under rate or not for ready money,' (which not one of them hath done, but by tickets of their own, or bought at very low values of others, which it is like they will also examine) 'then their Sales shall be absolutely recalled, and sold to others, at full values for ready money;' and so all is lost in good earnest, or else they must re-purchase them for ready monies at higher values, without any assurance from the king by act of parliament; and so lose them again the second time, if ever he or his prelatial party should prevail, and yet be enforced to answer and restore all the mesne profits they have taken to boot. A very hard chapter and bargain to digest, if they advisedly consider it; which, by accepting the king's offer, is most certainly prevented; who, perchance, in short time, upon second thoughts, and conference with learned men for the satisfaction of his conscience in the point of sacrilege, if he should consent to the total alienation of these Lands from the Church, may come up fully to our Desires, and part with the very inheritance to the purchasers, as amply as they have purchased it, rather than leave his own and the kingdom's interest wholly unsettled.—And, for my part, I make little question, that had the prelates and clergymen with the king, at the Isle of Wight, dealt so candidly and clearly with him in this particular of the Sale of Bishops Lands, they might have easily satisfied his Conscience in this very thing, as well as in others, from these grounds and matters of fact, which I shall but point at to satisfy others, who perchance are scrupulous herein, even in point of Conscience, as well as the king: 1. The king, in his last Paper but one, in express terms professeth, 'That he hath abolished all but the Apostolical Bishops, invested with a negative voice or power in point of Ordination:' and, if so, then I am certain he hath likewise abolished all bishops palaces, lordships, revenues, rents, and possessions; it being most certain that neither the Apostles themselves nor any Apostolical Bishops of their Ordination in their days, or for above 300 years, after, had any lands or possessions annexed to their apostleships, or bishopricks; but lived merely upon the alms and voluntary contributions of the people, as Christ himself, Paul, and the other Apostles did, as all Historians accord. If then his majesty will retain none but Apostolical Bishops, he must necessarily take away their temporal lands and possessions annexed to their bishopricks to make them such, if he hath not already done it by his final Answer to this Proposition, as I conceive he hath. 2. It is generally agreed by Historians, that Constantine the Great (our own countryman born, and first crowned Emperor at York, to the eternal honour of our island, he being the first Christian Emperor, and greatest advancer of the Christian Religion, and Destroyer of Paganism) was the first who endowed the Church and Bishops with any temporal possessions, about 350 years after Christ; though his pretended donation to the Pope be but a mere fable, as Dr. Crackenthorp, and others have manifested at large. Now Joannes Parisiensis, Nauclerus's Polychronicon; our English Apostle, John Wickliffe; our noble Martyr, the lord Cobham; John Frith, a Martyr; learned bishop Jewell, and others out of them, record, That when Constantine endowed the Church and Bishops with temporal lands and possessions, the Voice of an Angel was heard in the air, crying out, 'Hodie venenum infunditur in Ecclesiam,' this day is poison poured into the whole Church of God: and from that time, say they, because of the great riches the Church had, she was made the more secular; and had more worldly business than spiritual devotion, and more pomp and boast outward than holiness inward; 'Religio perit divitias & filia devoravit matrem;' which our Bishops and Translators of the Bible likewise mention in their Epistle prefixed to it. And Oakham saith, and others observe, That whereas all or most of the bishops of Rome before that time were martyrs, scarce one of them proved a martyr afterwards; but, instead of being martyrs, fell a persecuting and making martyrs. And if this voice of the Angel (perchance a Bishop, since our prelates will needs have the angels in Rev. ii. to be bishops) was true, and subsequent experience hath found it so, that bishops and churchmen's temporal lands, possessions, and endowments, are no other but poison to the Church; and his majesty be convinced of the truth of this story, I hope he will be satisfied in point of conscience that it is no sacrilege, but wholesome physic, to take away this poison from the Church, which hath so much infected and corrupted it; and would, in fine, destroy it and the bishops too, and eat out all their piety and devotion.—3. Most Bishops, long after Constantine's time, had very small or no revenues, or lands, and no other palaces to reside in, but poor little cottages; it being all men's opinion in those days, That stately palaces belonged only unto emperors and princes, and cottages and churches unto bishops. The fourth Council of Carthage, about the year of our Lord 390, decreed, That the Bishops should have Hospitolum, a little cottage or hospital to dwell in near the Church, not a palace. And in the Excerptions of Egbert, Archbishop of York, An. 750, I find the same Canon renewed among us, as the canon law of this realm; That bishops and presbyters should have Hospitolum, a small cottage near the Church, to live in; not a stately mansion: so as our Bishops, in those days, had no great palaces, manors, temporalities; and their very cathedrals were built only with wattle, or a few boards pieced together, and covered but with reed; stone churches covered over with slate or lead, not being in use among the Britons, Scots or Irish, for many hundred years, as bishop Usher himself asserts out of Bede, and Bernard in his Life of Malachi. And if their Cathedral Churches were so mean, their palaces certainly were but answerable, poor little cottages, and their revenues little or nothing but the peoples alms. St. Augustine, that renowned bishop of Hippo, had but a mean house to live in, his dishes and trenchers were all earthen, stone, or wood; his table furnished with pulse, herbs, and a little pottage only, for the most part, seldom with flesh; he had no plate but five or six spoons; and when he died he made no will at all, because the poor saint of Christ had nothing to bequeath, as Possedonius records in his life. St. Chrysostom, the great famous patriarch of Constantinople, and Gregory Nazianzen, his predecessor, had no stately palace, furniture, household-stuff, or train of attendants, nor any goods or revenues at all; nor John the almoner that succeeded them, nor that famous Spiridion, who kept a flock as a mean shepherd, though a bishop: and eminent St. Hierom, though no bishop, yet the learnedest and most famous scholar in his age, or any after, and of great repute, writes of himself, that he lived in pauperi tuguriolo, in a poor little cottage, having scarce cloaths to cover his nakedness: so St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, was very poor; brake the chalices in pieces to relieve the poor people, and used this maxim, 'Gloriosa in Sacerdotibus Domini paupertas.' And if these great lights, Bishops and Fathers of the Church, in whose names our prelates so much triumph, were so poor, that they had no palaces, houses, and temporal possessions, as our archbishops and bishops had, I can yet discern no matter of conscience in it, why our bishops should have more than these pillars of the Church either enjoyed or desired; they being content with food and raiment, as Paul was, and desiring no more. It is storied of our ancientest Bishops that I read of, present at the Council of Ariminum, An. Dom. 379, that they were so poor that, 'Inopia proprii, publico usi sunt,' they were maintained at the Emperor's public cost, for want of private maintenance of their own; yet they were eminent both for piety and learning. And if their predecessors were antiently so poor, it is no point of conscience to deprive our Lord Bishops not only of their lands, but function too, for the Peace and Settlement of three kingdoms, now at the point of ruin. When the Church of Christ was miserably rent and torn in Africa by the schismatical Donatists, who would have no prelates and bishops, that eminent bishop of Hippo, St. Augustine, and almost 300 African bishops more, were content to lay down their bishoprics wholly for that Church's peace. They had no Bishops Lands then to part with; but yet, for peace and unity's sake, they were content to part with their very bishopdoms themselves. And will not the king then, in point of conscience, part with the Bishops Lands for our present Peace, when he shall know, or be truly informed of all this?—4. For the Judgment of Divines; I could produce divers against the great possessions of bishops in all ages, as making them secular, proud, vicious, lazy, which I have formerly published at large*; but I shall only at present inform you, that our famous John Wickliffe professedly maintained, That the king and temporal lords grievously sinned, in endowing the bishops with large temporal possessions, which had reversed Christ's Ordinances, and procreated Antichrist; and that they were bound in conscience to take away their lands and temporalities from them, which they had abused to pride, ambition, discord, &c. His disciples, our noble martyrs, William Swinnderby, John Purvey, sir John Oldecastle; and, after them, Pierce Plowman, Geoffrey Chaucer, Mr. Tindall, Dr. Barnes, John Frith, sir John Borthwick, a martyr, and author of 'A Supplication to Henry 8,' the author of 'The Image of a very Christian Bishop, and a counterfeit Bishop;' W. Wraughton, in his 'Hunting of the Romish Fox;' Mr. Fish in his 'Supplication of Beggars;' Henry Stalbridge, in his 'Exhortatory Epistle;' and others were of the like judgment; and Roderick Morse, in his 'Supplication to the Parliament,' in Henry 8's reign, to omit Penry, and others, in queen Elizabeth's reign. And why there should be more sacrilege in taking away Bishops Lands in England than in Scotland, or Abby Lands heretofore from abbies and priories, I cannot yet discern. All which considered, I hope his majesty's conscience may and will be rectified in this particular, before the Treaty be absolutely confirmed by acts of parliament, so as this of Bishops Lands shall make no breach between us; in clearing of which I have been the more prolix, because it is most insisted on of any thing, in point of dissatisfaction, both by the king and us.

"As for all our other Propositions, relating to the Peace and Settlement of the Church, the king hath fully assented to them in terminis; as, namely, to the bill 'For the better Advancement of the preaching of God's Word, and settling godly Ministers in all parts of the kingdom,' to the bill against 'Pluralities and Non-residency'; to an act 'For Confirmation of the calling and settling of the Assembly of Divines'; to an act 'For the Confirmation of the Directory, and abolishing the Book of Common Prayer throughout the kingdom,' and in the King's own Chapel too, yielded unto in the king's final Answer, though formerly stuck upon; to an act 'For taking the Covenant throughout the realm'; only the king sticks at it, as yet unsatisfied in conscience as to the taking of it himself without some qualifications in it, which a committee were appointed to consider of, but have not yet reported aught to the house. Besides, he hath approved the Lesser Catechism as far as you desired, who rest satisfied with his Answer concerning it: and as for the Presbyterian government, he hath absolutely consented to settle it for 3 years.—But it hath been much insisted on by many, That the king's grant of the Presbyterian government is nowise satisfactory, because only for 3 years; and therefore they will break off the Treaty for this reason, and vote the king's Answers upon the whole unsatisfactory, because too short in this particular: to which I answer, 1. That the king, in terminis, hath granted as much as we desired. We desired its Settlement but for 3 years; and many, who most pretend dissatisfaction in this point now, did, and do indeed, desire no settled government at all, no not for 3 years space: therefore, if there be any default in this, it was in the houses Proposition only, not in the king's Answer; who was not obliged to grant us in this particular, or any other, more than we desired. 2. After the 3 years expiration, the Presbyterian government must remain till a new be agreed upon by the consent of the king and both houses, upon conference and advice with the Assembly of Divines; or that further established, if found best and most suitable, in the interim. So as now, upon all the Branches of this Treaty, and the king's Answers thereunto, I conceive the king's Answers to be completely satisfactory in that sense I have stated and debated the question, as well for the Safety and Settlement of our Church and Religion as kingdom, though the king's Answers come not fully up to the Propositions in some two or three particulars only. It is storied of Alexander the Great, That one demanding of him to give him a penny, he returned him this Answer, 'That it was too little for Alexander to give': whereupon he demanded a talent of him; whereto he replied, 'It was too much for a beggar to receive.' We have demanded of the king, in our own and the kingdom's behalf, in former treaties, but a penny in comparison, and then the king refused to grant it, though we would have been heartily contented with it, or less; but now we have, in this Treaty, demanded a talent, and the king hath not thought it over much for him to grant, or for us to receive; and if we shall now ungratefully reject it, we know not why ourselves, unless it be that God hath infatuated and designed us unto speedy ruin for our sins, I must needs take up our Saviour's lamentation over dying Jerusalem, in relation unto England, 'Oh that thou hadst known, in this thy day, the things that belong unto thy peace; but now they are hid from thine eyes!' And I pray God they be not so far hid, that we shall never live to see any Peace or Settlement at all in church or state, if we embrace not these concessions now; the best, the largest, the honourablest, the safest, and most beneficial, that ever were tendered to any people by a king; which if we now reject, we shall never have the moiety of them granted to us again, no, though 'we seek them carefully with tears,' as Esau did his last blessing; when he had overslipt his time but a very little.

"Mr. Speaker; For my part, I value no men's bare opinions in this debate, but their reasons which inforce them; and, if I have not quite lost my reason and senses too, I have not heard one solid reason given by any gentleman that differs from me, why the king's Concessions upon the whole Treaty should be thought so unsatisfactory as utterly to reject them, and proceed no further. Most of the reasons to the contrary have been either clear mistakes, both of the question and king's Answers, or our own Propositions, (and mistakes are no reasons, but irrational) or a fear in some purchasers of Bishops Lands of an ill bargain, which I presume I have fully satisfied; or, that which is to me the most unreasonable, though many gentlemen's chief and only reason, the Army's discontent and dissatisfaction, in case we vote the Treaty satisfactory; to which I shall give this Answer: That though I honour the Army for their good services heretofore in the field and wars, and should as readily gratify all their just Desires, as soldiers, as any man; yet I must, with just disdain and censure, look upon their magisterial encroachments upon our councils, and prescriptions to us what to vote in our debates, or else they will be incensed, as the highest violation to the freedom, honour, and privileges of parliament, not to be preceeded in former times, nor now to be endured. We all sit here, freely to speak our own minds, not the Army's pleasure; to follow our own consciences and judgments, not their imperious dictates; to satisfy the whole kingdom, and those who have intrusted and sent us hither, whose representatives and servants we are, not the Army's, by pitching upon that which is most conducing to their welfare and our own too; not to satisfy the Army in all their unreasonable extravagant demands, who are but ours and the kingdom's servants, not masters, to the kingdom's, people's, our own ruin and the Army's too: and so much the rather, because I have observed a dangerous practice in some officers and members only of the Army, to make use of the whole Army's name, without their privity or consent, forcibly to drive on their own private pernicious designs in the house, and to fright and cudgel us into Votes, as some say we were cudgelled into a Treaty, with the very name of the Army, without any reason at all; and if that will not do the feat, then they presently mutiny and bring up the Army itself to or near the houses doors, against us, contrary to our express commands, as heretofore and now they have done, to force us to vote against our judgments, consciences, reason, and the public safety, whatever they shall dictate, be it never so absurd, dishonourable to ourselves, or destructive to the kingdom; and though the Army, and those who usurp their name, be not present at our debates, (as they seldom are, though some of them are members) yet if they suit not with their fore-plotted designs, they will presently censure them, and those that pass them, without hearing or weighing of their reasons: and though they contend most earnestly for liberty of conscience for themselves, and all others of their confederacy out of the house, and for a liberty for their own party to enter their particular Protestations and Dissents in the house to any Vote they like not, yet they will admit no liberty of conscience, nor freedom of dissenting, to us, nor us to be masters of our own reason, votes or discretion in the house itself, where we should have most freedom, as is evident by sundry magisterial, over-ruling, censorious passages in their late Remonstrance, Nov. 20; and if we vote not fully with them, they presently take us for apostates and violaters of our trust, fit not only to be secluded the house for the present, but not to be intrusted for the future; to such an height of insolency are they grown: therefore, for any members to make their pleasing or displeasing of the Army, who thus abuse them, the sole or principal reason of their Aye or No, is such a solecism and breach of privilege as ought not now to be named, much less pressed as a reason, without some severe censure or exclusion from the house; especially in this instant debate for the Settlement of our Peace, to which those who make a trade of war will certainly be most averse, having little else to live on or support their present greatness, if the wars be ended.—Yea, but they further object, That if we discontent the Army, by voting the king's Answers satisfactory, we are undone; they will all lay down their arms, as one commander of eminency hath here openly told you he must do, and serve us no longer; and then what will become of us and all our faithful friends? I answer, That I hope the Army will not be so sullen as to desert or turn against us, for voting what our consciences and judgments prompt us is most for theirs, ours, and the kingdom's safety; and that without hearing or scanning our debates: if they be, I shall not much value the protection of such unconstant, mutinous, and unreasonable servants; and I doubt not but, if they desert us on so slight a ground, God himself and the whole kingdom will stand by us, who else, I fear, will both unanimously rise up against us, to ours and the Army's destruction: and if the king and we shall happily close upon this Treaty, I hope we shall have no great need of their future service: however, fiat justitia, ruat cælum, let us do our duty and leave the issue to God. It is better for us to perish doing our own duties, than to be justly destroyed by following other men's wills against our duties and consciences too. He that thinks to save himself, or the kingdom, by such a sinful and unworthy compliance, shall be certain to lose both himself and it in the conclusion.—However, both the arguments of displeasing the Army, and the ill consequences of it, are altogether extraneous and impertinent to the question, and amount but to this non sequitur. The Army will not have us proceed further upon the Treaty to settle Peace; ergo, the king's Answers are unsatisfactory. What will all wise men, what will the kingdom, what will Scotland, Ireland, and our friends abroad (whose eyes are all intent upon the result of the Treaty, and must be satisfied in the reasons of our breach upon it, lest they all fall foul upon us) think of such absurd nonsense as this? Had the Treaty been only between the king and the army, not him and the houses, this reason might have contented some men, without expressing any grounds of their dissatisfaction, of which they think the Army might be more competent judges than the parliament; but the Treaty being only between the king and both houses, not the Army, that we, who are the only parties to the Treaty, and judges of the satisfactoriness thereof, should set aside our own reasons, consciences, and judgments, and make the Army's absolute peremptory will the only principal reason of our dissatisfaction with the king's concessions, (which I am confident not ten men in the Army ever heard of, but by report alone, and never seriously scanned as we have done) is such an absurdity as will render us for ever both ridiculous and odious to all our friends and foes, to the present, and to future ages. For shame, therefore, let us no more insist upon such extravagancies!

“ Having answered these two Iron Arguments against the Unsatisfactoriness of the king's Answers, and all others hitherto insisted on, I humbly conceive I have fully satisfied every rational man's conscience, that the king hath granted us all we have demanded, that is really necessary or conducing to the speedy settlement of a lasting and well-grounded Peace, and the future security of our state, kingdom, church, religion, against all feared danger from the king or any others; and I shall challenge, and put it to the conscience of, any gentleman dissenting from me, whether he can propound any one thing more (except an Oath which is intended when all is concluded) essential, for the fuller and firmer settling of our laws, liberties, privileges, lives, estates, religion, kingdoms, parliaments, army, and satisfying of all public interests, than what have been already propounded, and the king compleatly granted in this Treaty. If then the king hath granted us every thing ourselves, during 7 years advice and consultation, could possibly think of for our security and settlement, far more than we ourselves demanded in two or three former treaties, and would have been glad with the moiety of it within these few months, and ten thousand times more than we can gain by a breach with the king upon such disadvantages, why should we not all rest thankfully contented; and bless our God that he hath at last inclined the king's heart to grant so much, whereas heretofore he refused to condescend to the tythe of that he hath granted now? doubtless we can never answer such a peevish ad-surb ingratitude either to God or man; and those counties, cities, and boroughs, who have sent us hither in their steads, will conn us little thanks for refusing Peace upon such honourable, beneficial, and safe Concessions, as neither they nor we can ever hereafter hope for, if rejected now, upon no grounds of reason, but only upon peevishness and will.—If any object, as some have done, That the king indeed hath granted all we can desire; yet he is so perfidious in his oaths and promises, as we have found by sad experience in all his reign, that we cannot trust him; and therefore all he hath granted us is to little purpose: I answer, That if all he hath granted were still in his own power to dissolve or recall at pleasure, this argument were material; but since he hath put all our desired security into our hands alone, and such as ourselves shall appoint, and left nothing unto his sole or whole disposal without us, the objection is but weak, and recoils upon ourselves, that we dare not trust ourselves with our own safety. If a shark come to borrow money of a usurer, whose word and bond he dares not take; yet if he gives him a pawn or mortgage of his lands in hand, he will then trust him without any scruple: the king hath given us such a sufficient pawn, or mortgage, and put it into our own hands, therefore we need not doubt him now.—Besides, if we cannot trust him for what he hath granted, it was a mockery of him and the kingdom to treat with him to grant it; and, if so, the kingdom will say they have as little cause hereafter to trust us, for such palpable dissimulation, as the king. For my part, I have seen so much experience in the world, that I dare trust none with my own or the kingdom's safety but God alone. 'Put not your trust in princes, nor in any son of man, in whom there is no help. It is better to trust in the Lord, than to put confidence in men or Princes', have been my maxims; and we have seen strange mutabilities and perfidiousness in men of all sorts since our troubles, that we can trust neither the king nor prince, city nor country, this general nor that general, this army nor those that were before it, nor yet ourselves, who are jealous of one another, treacherous one to another, distrustful of all, and now distrusted by all, ever since we began to confide in men, and found out a new generation of confiding men. Let us begin to trust in God alone in the first place, and then we need not distrust the king for time to come any more than others, or ourselves, whose dear-bought experience of breach of former trusts and promises, will make him more careful of violating his present concessions for the future; especially having put such security into our own hands to bind him to an exact performance.

"But it hath been objected by the General and Officers of the Army, in their late Remonstrance (p. 1078) and by some who have spoken in this debate, who would teach the king before-hand how to elude and vacate all his grants and promises, 'That all the king's Concessions are and will be void, because made by duress of imprisonment, whilst under restraint.' I answer, That the king, during all this Treaty, hath been in such a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, and had such free liberty of consultation and debate, upon his own earnest desire and his party's too, as well as the houses, that he cannot, either with honour or justice, void these concessions by any pretext of duress; especially since he has denied some things, and had the same liberty not to have granted other things, had he been pleased not to grant them. Besides, the king is to confirm the whole Treaty by acts of parliament, to which he is to give his royal assent, and oath too, when all is concluded, and that in a free condition; and then no duress can void them, no more than Magna Charta itself, first gained by the sword, and oft confirmed in parliament by our kings, against their wills. In 1223, the Barons demanding of king Henry 3. the confirmation of the Great Charter and their liberties, according to his oath upon the conclusion of the peace with Lewis of France, William Briwere, one of his (evil) Counsel, answered 'That the liberties they demanded were not to be observed nor confirmed, because they were forcibly extorted;' whereupon words growing between the Barons, the archbishop of Canterbury, and Briwere, the king closed up the strife with this honourable Answer, 'All of us have sworn to these Liberties, and that which we have assented and sworn to, all of us are bound to observe.*' We to this day enjoy these liberties, being confirmed by act of parliament, and sworn to by our kings, though forcibly extorted at the first. And so may we much more enjoy the king's Concessions, when turned into acts, and sealed with a sacred oath, superadded to a royal assent.

"Mr. Speaker; I have now waded through the whole Treaty, and given you the best reasons I can out of every parcel of it, to prove the satisfactoriness of the king's Answers, and answered all Objections hitherto made against my conclusion; I shall now, by your patience and leave, proceed a step or two further, to evidence, by clear demonstrations and reasons to your consciences, 1. That our closing with the king upon these Concessions, is the only, speediest, best, legalist, safest, and certainest, way to settle a firm and lasting Peace between the king, parliament, and his three kingdoms: 2. That the new way to Peace and Settlement, proposed and prosecuted by the General, the Officers of the Army, and their friends in the house, is a most desperate, dishonourable, unsafe course; and a certain way to speedy ruin both of our king, parliaments, army, city, country, and three kingdoms too; yea, a mere project of the Jesuits to destroy the king; dissolve this present and all future parliaments; betray Ireland to the Popish Rebels; subvert our religion, reformation, laws, liberties, kingdoms; introduce Popery, tyranny, slavery; and make us a prey to our foreign enemies. And if I make this clearly appear to all your consciences and reasons, I beseech you all, lay your hands upon your hearts, and consider what you vote in this debate, lest you become instrumental to the Jesuits and accomplish these their designs, instead of settling a safe well-grounded Peace upon their new-frangled foundations of liberty and safety, but indeed of slavery and ruin.—To begin with the first branch of the first of these assertions, That our closing with the king upon these Concessions, is the only way to settle a firm and lasting Peace between the king, the parliament, and his three kingdoms. Not to insist upon this general maxim, That Treaties, in all ages, have been the usual and only way to conclude and settle peace and unity between kings and their people, and all dissenting kingdoms, states, persons; and therefore this Treaty now is the only way to our present

* In our First Volume, p. 10.

Peace and Settlement, I shall touch only upon particulars. 1st, That yourselves in this house, and the lords in their house, have severally and jointly voted and resolved over and over heretofore, and published to all the world, from time to time, in sundry Declarations, Remonstrances, and other printed Papers since the king's departure from the houses, and the late wars, That it has been, is, and always shall be, their cordial desire, and sincere unwearied endeavour, to settle a speedy, firm, and well-grounded Peace between his majesty, his people, and three kingdoms; and that this hath been the only end they have aimed at in all their wars and treaties with the king: That the king's presence with, and residence near, his parliament, is of so great necessity and importance towards the removal of our distractions, fears, jealousies; the happy beginning of confidence and contentment between the king and his people, and the settlement and preservation of the peace and safety of the kingdom, and king's person, that they thought they had not discharged their duties until they had declared and backed it with some reasons: That those persons who advised his majesty to absent himself from his parliament, are an obstruction and enemies to the Peace of this kingdom, and justly suspected to be favourers of the Rebellion in Ireland: That the sending of Propositions, and a Treaty with the king, and a good close with him and his commissioners thereupon, is the only way to settle a firm, safe, and lasting Peace: and this is the only way and means you have hitherto pursued to obtain such a Peace and Settlement. 2dly, The Parliament of Scotland, and their Commissioners here employed, have voted and resolved this the only way and means to such a Peace and Settlement, both for this kingdom and their own too; and have joined with us in all former Treaties, and promoted this. 3dly, The generality of the people, and all the wisest and most cordial to the public interest, both of the parliament and kingdom, have approved and desired a Treaty and close with the king, as the only means of Peace and Settlement, as is evident by their frequent and multiplied Petitions to both houses. 4thly, The king himself, and all his party, when tired out with the miseries of war, have desired and embraced a Treaty, as the only means to close our bleeding wounds, and make a firm union between the king, parliament, and three kingdoms. 5thly, The General, Officers, and Council of the Army themselves, when in their right senses, and not intoxicated with self-conceit and Jesuitical principles, have publicly declared, That compliance by a Treaty with the king, and restitution of him to a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, was the only way to a lasting Peace and Settlement: yea, the Grandees of the Army were so over-forward to comply, treat, and close with him upon terms more dishonourable, and less safe, than these we are now a closing with him in this Treaty, that when they falsely impeached the

11 Members of the house of commons, in July 1647, for holding secret intelligence and correspondence only with him, without consent of the house, themselves at that very instant, without and against consent of the houses, were secretly treating and complying with him upon Proposals framed by themselves; and persuaded the king to reject the houses Propositions, sent to his majesty to Hampton-Court, to treat upon those they had tendered to him privately, without the houses privy, as more advantageous to him and his party than the parliament's; declaring to all the world, that they were as cordial to the king, as desirous to bring him up to London, and to restore him to a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, and more favourable to Delinquents in mitigating their fines and punishments, than the houses. All which they are not ashamed to acknowledge in their Remonstrance of the 20th of last month, yet with this detestable brand upon themselves, 'That their compliances with him were but negative. Secondly, 'What we declared of moderation was but 'hypothetical, with careful caution and a saving for the public interest, according to our 'then understanding of it, &c. Yet, however in that degree of compliance admitted in 'that kind, we find matter of acknowledgment before the Lord concerning our error, 'frailty, unbelief, and carnal councils therein; 'and we bless him that preserved us from 'worse.' If their Compliance and Treaty with the king, &c. was but hypothetical, (as I fear this very Remonstrance and their actings since all are, or at leastwise Jesuitical) I hope our Treaty shall be real, and not in their power to make it hypocritical; as they have attempted, by endeavouring to force us, by this Remonstrance and their subsequent Advance to London, to break it off; to render us odious to our king and kingdoms, to God, and all good men, and translate the odium of it from themselves to us. And because themselves may discover their own apostacy from their former principles, which they would falsely father upon us, and how justifiable and advantageous to the kingdom our closing with the king upon these Propositions are before all the world, be pleased to take notice of these following Passages in their own Letters, Declarations, and Remonstrances, made upon mature advice a year before this Treaty.—In the humble Remonstrance from his Excellency and the Army under his command, presented to the Commissioners at St. Alban's, June 23, 1647, (see p. 647) they print, 'Whereas there 'have been scandalous informations presented 'to the houses, and industriously published in 'print, importing as if his majesty were kept 'as prisoner amongst us, barbarously and uncivilly used; we cannot but declare that the 'same, and all other suggestions of that sort, 'are most false, scandalous, and absolutely 'contrary, not only to our declared Desires, 'but also to our principles; which are most 'clearly for a general right and just freedom

‘to all: and therefore, upon this occasion, we cannot but declare particularly, That we desire the same for the king, and others of his party, so far as can consist with common right and freedom, and with the security of the same for the future: and we do further clearly confess, we do not see how there can be any Peace to the kingdom, firm or lasting, without a due consideration of, and provision for, the rights, quiet, and immunity of his majesty’s royal family, and his late partakers: and herein we think that tender and equitable dealing, as supposing their cause had been ours, and a spirit of common love and justice, diffusing itself to the good and preservation of all, will make up the most glorious conquest over their hearts, if God in his mercy see it good, to make them and the whole people of the land lasting friends.’ And in the Representation of the Army, June 14, 1647, there are the like expressions of their judgment in relation to the king and his party too.—In a Letter of sir Tho. Fairfax’s to both houses giving an account of some transactions between his majesty and the Army, dated from Reading, July 8, 1647, (p. 679) there is this passage, which he there declares to be the general sense of all or most part of the officers in the Army; ‘In general, we humbly conceive that, to avoid all harshness, and afford all kind usages to his majesty’s person in things consisting with the Peace and Safety of the kingdom, is the most Christian, honourable, and prudent way: and in all things we think, that tender, equitable and moderate dealing, both towards his majesty and his royal family, and late party, so far as may stand with the Safety of the kingdom, and Security to our common Rights and Liberties, is the most hopeful course to take away the seeds of war, or future feuds amongst us, for posterity, and to procure a lasting Peace and a government in this distracted nation.’—Since this, the Officers and the Army, in their Propositions, Aug. 1, 1647 (p. 738) for the Settlement of a firm Peace, have this for one, ‘That his majesty’s person, queen, and royal issue, may be restored to a condition of safety, honour, and freedom in this nation, without diminution of their personal rights, or further limitation to the exercise of the regal power, than according to the particulars foregoing.’ These Propositions of the Army were so pleasing to his majesty, that, in his Answer to the Propositions presented to him at Hampton-Court, Sept. 9, 1647, (p. 773) by the Commissioners of both houses and of the kingdom of Scotland; he refused to grant the Propositions by them tendered, ‘as being destructive to many principal interests of the Army, and of all those whose affections concurred with them.’ And he gave this further Answer to them, ‘That his majesty having seen the Propositions of the Army to the Commissioners from his two houses of parliament residing with them, and with them to be treated on, in order to the clearing and securing the Rights and Liberties of the kingdom, as to the settling of a just and a lasting Peace; to which Propositions, as he conceives, his two houses not to be strangers, so he believes they will think with him, that they more conduce to the satisfaction of all interests, and may be a fitter foundation for a lasting Peace, than the Propositions which at this time are tendered to him, &c.—Lo, here we have the General, Officers, and Army itself, so zealous for a Personal Treaty with the king, for Settlement of this kingdom’s Peace, and the carrying on of their own interests, that themselves draw up Propositions for a Treaty with him, without the houses privy; yea, prevail with him to lay aside the houses Propositions to treat upon theirs, as more advantageous to him and his, and less beneficial to the kingdom’s interest: in which Treaty he desires, That Commissioners from the Army, whose the Propositions were, might likewise be admitted; and yet those zealots for a treaty then, are most furious to break off our treaty now, even by open force and violence, almost upon the very close, though they never made any opposition against it, during all its agitation; perchance to bring on another Treaty with the king upon their own Propositions, wherein the king and they will be the only treaters, and the houses but idle spectators; to rob them of the honour and benefit expected by our present Treaty, and of settling the kingdom’s Peace on so good terms for the public interest.—In fine; the General, and Army under his command, in their Remonstrance of Aug. 18, 1647, (p. 758.) approved and printed by order of the house of peers, do thus express their readiness and desire for the parliament’s closing with the king upon good grounds, and his bringing up to London; (though now they cry out for nothing but Justice and Execution to be done upon him, as their capital Enemy): ‘For our parts, we shall rejoice as much as any to see the king brought back to his parliament; and that not so much in place, as in affection and agreement, on such sound terms and grounds as may render both him and the kingdom safe, quiet, and happy; and shall be as ready as they to bring his majesty to London, when his being there may be likely to produce (not greater disturbance or distractions, but) a Peace indeed; and that such as may not, with the shipwreck of the public interest, be shaped and moulded only to the private advantages of a particular party or faction; but bottomed chiefly on grounds of common and public welfare and security.’ The General, Officers, and Army, therefore, being so zealous for a Treaty and close with the king, in all these several Remonstrances, Papers, and Propositions, as the only hopeful way of settling and securing the kingdom’s Peace, cannot, without the highest injury, and most detestable juggling, hypocrisy, and apostacy from their own engagements and principles, wherewith they do now falsely charge the house, dislike our present proceedings in the self-same way, upon his majesty's Concessions in this Treaty: which, by all these particular Resolutions, and the Army's own acknowledgments, is the only way of Peace and Settlement.—Next, as this is the only, so it is the speediest way of all others. If we now accept of these Concessions, the most whereof I have turned into bills already, and shall turn all the rest into bills by our next sitting, I see no reason but we may, in one fortnight, at least by the 1st Jan. next, have fully settled and concluded all things in difference between the king and us, to the general content and safety of all honest men; and so end the old and begin the new year with Peace: whereas, if we now break off, and let go all the king hath granted, I see no end of our wars and miseries, nor any probable means of Peace and Settlement in many years at least, if ever in this or the succeeding generation. And the speediest Remedy in this case (especially considering the kingdom is so far exhausted, that we know neither how to pay our public Debts, our Fleet, or Army their present Arrears, much less their future) must needs be the best, and be preferred before all others that will require more time and expence, and be more hazardous and contingent in the event.

“And as this is the speediest, so the best, legallest, safest, and certainest way of all others. 1. There is no danger nor hazard at all in it, nor any expence of money or effusion of blood; it is but accept, and then confirm by acts and oaths, and the work is presently done. If we think of Settlement in any other way, we must fight again, and that will be both costly and hazardous; and, when all is done, we must treat again, perchance upon worse terms, else there will be no Peace nor Settlement. 2. This is the way we have ever formerly pitched upon, the way all parties have consented to and approved, but those alone who desire neither Peace nor Settlement; therefore best, safest, and durablest. 3. It is the legallest, safest, certainest, because a Peace and Settlement, by acts of parliament, is the highest security to Englishmen under Heaven; to which king, lords, commons, and in them the whole kingdom, consent, and will all acquiesce in what is done, without question or future dispute. What Peace soever is settled otherwise, either by a bare Order or Ordinance of the houses, or by the sword and power alone, will neither be sure, safe, nor lasting, no longer than maintained by the sword; and every man will be sure to question and unsettle all again upon the least advantage given. The highest Security that England ever had was Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta; these were gained by the sword, but not held by it.—That which hath kept and perpetuated these since their making, was those acts of parliament which confirmed them: These are our only security for whatever we enjoy, which will survive all other we can think of. Nulum violentum est diuturnum; whereas privileges kept and held by public acts will last for ever, and be entailed to us and our posterities, with peace and happiness attending them. This was the way of settling Peace between kings and subjects heretofore, in Henry 3. Edw. 2. Rd. 2. and Henry 6th's reigns; and an Act of Pacification and Oblivion was the only safe and usual way the parliaments both of England and Scotland lately fixed on, to settle a firm and lasting Peace between both nations and kingdoms: all other Settlements will be but like an ulcer skinned over, which will soon break out again, with greater pain and danger than before.

“Secondly, For the new Way proposed by the Army for a firm Peace and Settlement; it is certainly the most desperate, dishonourable, dangerous, and destructive, that can possibly be imagined; and such as we can neither in honour, justice, conscience, nor prudence embrace. To examine it a little by parts. The first way to Peace and Settlement propounded by them, is presently to break off the Treaty; and that, contrary to our public faith to the king and kingdom, yea to our own Votes, before the Treaty was fully ended: This is the drift of their whole Remonstrance; which, as it will totally, if not finally, deprive us of the fruit and benefit of all the king's Concessions in the Treaty, (all which are, by mutual agreement, no way obligatory to either party in any particular unless all be agreed) being all that we can possibly think of for our safety and advantage, and more than any nation under Heaven yet enjoyed; so it will inevitably cast us upon present ways of new distractions, confusions, and civil wars, now we are quite exhausted; and end at last in our absolute destruction, instead of a well-grounded Peace; and those blessings we may forthwith enjoy for the very accepting, without further charge or trouble. But if God, beyond our hopes, should, after any new embroilments give us Peace, yet it must be upon a new Treaty; and that, perchance, upon far worse terms than now are offered: therefore it must needs be dangerous to reject a safe way to follow a hazardous or destructive one.

“The next thing proposed by the Army, in their Remonstrance, for a speedy Peace and Settlement, is the bringing of the king to speedy Justice for all his treasons and bloodshed in the late wars, and then to depose and execute him as the greatest capital malefactor in the kingdom. This certainly is a very dangerous and unlikely way to Peace and Settlement: For, 1. ‘Smiting the Shepherd is the way to scatter, not unite, the sheep.’ The slaying of the king or general in the field, scatters and dissolves the Army, not secures them. To cut off an aching head, is the way to destroy, not cure, a diseased body. Such kind of state policy may destroy or disturb, but never settle us in perfect Peace. The Prince, his next heir, the queen, the duke of York, all his children, and allies, both at home and abroad, will certainly meditate revenge; and all kings in Christendom will assist them, even for their own interest and safety, lest it should become a precedent for themselves. And will this then secure, or be a likely way to Peace or Settlement? 2. The greatest part of the members in both houses, the lords, gentlemen, and all sorts of people throughout the kingdom, the whole kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, (who have as great an interest in the king's person, being their lawful king, as we have; and are obliged, by allegiance and Covenant, to protect his person and crown from violence) will unanimously, as one man, oppose and protest against it; and, by force of arms, endeavour to bring those to execution who shall presume to advise or attempt to depose or destroy the king, in any kind, contrary to their allegiance and Solemn Covenant: yea, all Protestant realms, churches, states in foreign parts will abhor both the fact, and adjudge it contrary to their principles and religion, as that which may irritate Popish kings and princes to take up arms to ruin them, lest they should fall into the like Jesuitical practices. And can this then be a safe or speedy way to Peace and Settlement, especially when we know not what government shall succeed upon it, and can expect nothing but bloody consequences from such a bloody Jesuitical advice? 3. I never read of any Peace or Settlement in any kingdom where King-killing was practised or approved. When the Roman armies began once to kill their emperors, and cut off their heads, they were scarce ever free from civil wars. One army set up one emperor, another army another, and the senate a third, who always warred till they had cut off one another's heads. Most of those emperors had very short reigns, few of them above a year or two, and some of them scarce two months, but most of them untimely deaths. In Slavonia and Norway, where they had a law that he that slew a Tyrant-King should succeed him in the throne, they had almost every year a new king, and perpetual wars and discords; not one of all their kings, for above 100 years together, ever came to a natural death, but was murdered as a tyrant, and succeeded by a worse and greater tyrant, as Saxo Grammaticus and Neubrigensis testify.—And, in the Sacred Story itself, it is very observable, that after the ten Tribes revolted from Rehoboam, though by God's justice and approbation, for Solomon's sins, they had never any Peace or Settlement, but perpetual wars with one kingdom or another, or between themselves; their kings, or most of them, were all tyrants and idolaters; and, by the just hand of God, for the most part tumultuously slain and murdered, one of and by another, who succeeded them; he that murdered his predecessor being usually slain by his successor, or his predecessor's sons, servants, or by the people of the land, in a tumultuous way. In 2 Kings, xv. we read in that one chapter of no less than four of those kings slain, one by another: and as for the people under these kings, they had never any rest, peace, settlement, or freedom; but lived under the greatest misery and oppression that ever any subjects under Heaven did, as the Sacred History records. This King-killing certainly can be then no probable way at all to peace, safety, settlement, or freedom; but the Jesuits policy to deprive us eternally of all these, and of God and religion to boot, as it did the ten tribes heretofore.—4. This way to Peace and Settlement is directly contrary to all the former Engagements, Oaths, and several Petitions, Declarations, Remonstrances, Protestations, and professions of both houses of parliament to the king, kingdom, people; wherein we have always protested and held forth unto them, both before and since the wars. Now for us, after all these multiplied, reiterated Protestations, Promises, Engagements, Declarations, Remonstrances, to all the world, from the beginning of the differences and wars till now, to think or talk of deposing and destroying the king, and altering the government, as the only safe and speedy way to Peace and Settlement, as the Army-Remonstrants prescribe, would be such a most detestable breach of public faith, such a most perfidious, treacherous, unrighteous, and wicked act, as not only God, angels, and good men, but the very worst of Turks and devils would abhor; and therefore it is a miracle to me, that these precious saints should thus impudently, before all the world, propose it to the house, and force you to pursue it, to stain your reputation, and make you execrable before God and men. 5. The very Oath of Allegiance, which every one of us hath taken upon our first admission to be members, engageth us not only not to offer any violence or hurt to his majesty's person, state, or government; but, in positive terms, 'To bear faith and true allegiance to his majesty, his heirs and successors; and him and them to defend to the uttermost of our power, against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever, which shall be made against his or their persons, crown, or dignity; and from our hearts to abhor, detest and abjure, as impious and heretical, this Jesuitical and Popish doctrine, That Princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope,' (as it seems the king is now, for extirpating Episcopacy, Popery, Mass, and Prelacy, out of his dominions by his present Concessions, without any possibility or hopes of replanting) 'may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever;' which Jesuitical contrivance and practice, as our whole state and parliament, in the Statutes of 3 Jac. c. 1, 4, 5. 35 Eliz. c. 1, 2, and other acts resolve, is the only way to unsettle, ruin, and subvert, not to settle and establish, the peace and government of our realm. And both houses, since this parliament, have, by a solemn Protestation first, and by a solemn League and Covenant since, with hands lifted up to the Most High God, engaged both themselves and the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by a most sacred and serious Vow and Protes-tation, purposely made and prescribed by them, 'For the honour and happiness of the king and his posterity, and the true public liberty, safety, and peace of the three kingdoms,' (as the Title and Preface declare) 'sincerely, really, and constantly to endeavour, with their estates and lives, to preserve and defend the king's majesty's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdom,' (which he hath now fully and actually performed by his Concessions in this Treaty) 'that the world may bear witness with our consciences of our loyalty; and that we have no thoughts or intentions to diminish his majesty's just power or greatness: and shall also, with all faithfulness, endeavour the discovery of all such as shall be incendiaries or evil instruments, by dividing the king from his people, that they may be brought to speedy trial, and receive condign punishment: and shall not suffer themselves, directly or indirectly, by whatsoever combination or terror, to be withdrawn or make defection from this Covenant; but shall, all the days of their lives, really and constantly continue therein, against all opposition, and promote the same against all lets and impediments whatsoever. And this Covenant we all made in the Presence of Almighty God, the Searcher of all Hearts, with a real intention to perform the same, as we shall answer at that great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed.'—Now, how we, who are members of this house, or any who are subjects of our three kingdoms, or officers and soldiers in the Army, who have taken this oath of allegiance, protestation, league or covenant, or any of them, (as some have done all of them, or two of them at least sundry times over) can, without the highest perjury to God, treachery to the king, perfidiously to the kingdom, infamy to the world, scandal to the protestant religion, and eternal dishonour to the parliament and themselves, atheistically break through or elude all those sacred and religious ties upon our souls, by a speedy public dethroning and decolling of the king, and disinheriting his posterity, as the Army-Remonstrants advise; and that in the open view of the world and that all seeing God, to whom we have thus appealed and sworn, (by those Jesuitical equivocations or distinctions, of which the Army's Remonstrance is full, or professions of our damnable hypocrisy in the breaking of them) transcends my understanding.—And for those who style themselves Saints, and charge as one of the highest crimes against the king, his frequent breach of oaths and promises, to transcend him and the Jesuits in this very sin, is such a monster of impiety, as, I conceive, could never have entered into the hearts of infidels, or the worst of men or devils. And to act this under a pretext to preserve and settle the Peace of the kingdom, is such a solecism, as militates point-blank against the very words and scope of our Protestation and Solemn League and

Covenant; 'which crosseth not the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, but more strongly engageth all men to preserve and defend the king's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true Religion and Liberties of the kingdom,' as the Assembly of Divines and both houses affirm in their 'Exhortation to take the Covenant:' which prescribes this as the only means of securing and preserving Peace in all the three kingdoms, to preserve the person and honour of the king, his crown and dignity, from any such violence and invasion as is now suggested by the Army; all of which do engage us, and all the three kingdoms, with our lives and fortunes, really and constantly, to oppose, against all lets and impediments, &c. and to bring those to condign punishment, as incendiaries and evil instruments, who suggest it: so as if the Army will proceed in this Jesuitical destructive way of treason and ruin, we, and all the three kingdoms, are solemnly engaged, with our estates and lives, unanimously, to oppose and bring them to Justice.—And is this then the way to public Peace and Settlement, to raise another new war, to murder one another in a new quarrel; wherein the Army and their adherents must be the sole Malignants and enemies we must fight with? no, verily, but the high way to the kingdom's and Army's ruin, whose commissions we are obliged to revoke, whose contributions we must in conscience withdraw, and whose power we must with our own lives resist, unless we will be perjured, and guilty of breach of Covenant in the highest degree, if they persist in these Anti-covenant Demands.—6. Both houses having held a Personal Treaty with the king so lately, and he having granted us in that Treaty whatever we have or can demand for the safety and preservation of our religion, laws, and liberties; and both houses engaged themselves by Vote, in Answer to the king's Propositions, to restore him to a condition of honour, freedom, and safety, according to the laws of the realm, (which was the Army's own Proposals in his behalf in August 1647) we can neither in honour, honesty, justice, or conscience, were he ten thousand times worse than the Army would render him, depose and bring him to execution; it being against all the rules of justice and honour, between two professed enemies, who had no relation one to another, much more between king and subjects in a Civil War, and a thing without precedent in any age. To this the Army Remonstrance answers, 'That this would be thought an unreasonable and unbecoming Demand in a Personal Treaty, between persons standing both free and in equal balance of power; but not when one party is wholly subdued, captivated, imprisoned, and in the other's power.' But this certainly is a difference spun with a Jesuitical thread; for to treat with any king in our power, or out of it, on Articles of Peace, upon these terms, That if he consent to them, we will restore him to his throne with honour, freedom, and safety; and when he hath yielded us our Demands, then to depose him and cut off his head, is the highest breach of faith, truth, honour, and justice that can be imagined; and those who dare justify such perfidious and unchristian dealing, deserve rather the stile of Turks and equivocating Jesuits than pious Saints.—7. There is no precedent in Scripture that the General Assembly, or Sanhedrim of the Jews or Israelites, did ever judicially imprison, depose, or execute any one of the kings of Judah or Israel, though many of them were the grossest idolaters and wickedest princes under Heaven, who shed much innocent blood, and oppressed the people sundry ways. We know that David himself committed adultery with the wife of Uriah, a faithful servant and soldier, whilst he was with his general Joab in the field, and then afterwards caused him to be treacherously slain; yet neither the Assembly of the Elders, nor Joab and the Army under him, did impeach or crave Justice against him for these sins, though he lived impenitently in them. And when he numbered the people afterwards, for which sin 70,000 of his subjects lost their lives, yet he was not arraigned or deposed for it; and God (who is sovereignly just, though David was the principal malefactor in this case, if not the sole; and thereupon, when he saw the Angel that smote the people, cried out, 'Lo, I have sinned and done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done? Let thy hand be against me and my father's house,') spared him and his household, though the principals, and punished the people, only, with death for this sin of his. After him Solomon, his son, a man eminent for wisdom and piety at first, apostatized to most gross idolatry of all sorts, to please his idolatrous wives, and became a great oppressor of his people, making their burdens very heavy, yet his subjects or soldiers did neither impeach or depose him for it; and though he was the principal offender, yet God spared him for David's sake, in not taken the ten Tribes from him for these sins during his life, though he rent them from his son Rehoboam, who was at most but accessory for his father's sins, not his own. True it is, some of the idolatrous kings of Israel, by the just avenging hand of God, were slain by private conspiracies and popular tumults, in an illegal way; but not deposed nor arraigned by their Sanhedrims or general congregations; and those who slew them were sometimes slain by others who aspired to the crown, or by the people of the land, or by their children who succeeded them, and came to untimely tragical ends.—8. Though there be some precedents of Popish states and parliaments deposing their Popish kings and emperors at home, and in foreign parts, in an extraordinary way, by power of an armed party; yet there is no precedent of any one Protestant kingdom or state, that did ever yet judicially depose or bring to execution any of their kings or princes, though never so bad, whether Protestants or Papists: and the Protestants in France, though some of their kings, when they had invested them in their thrones, became apostates to Popery, and persecutors of their people, albeit they resisted them by force of arms in the field to preserve their lives, did never once attempt to pull them from their thrones, or bring their persons unto Justice; and I hope our Protestant parliament will never make the first precedent in this kind, nor stain their honour or Religion with the blood of a Protestant king, against so many Oaths, Protestations, Covenants, Declarations, and Remonstrances made and published by them to the contrary. 9. For the precedents of Edw. 2. and Rd. 2. in times of Popery, they were rather forcible resignations by power of an Army, than judicial deprivations, neither of them being ever legally arraigned and brought to trial in parliament. And Mortimer, who had the chief hand in deposing Edw. 2. was, in the parliament of 4 Edw. 3. impeached, condemned, and executed as a traitor, and guilty of high treason, for murdering Edw. 2. at Berkeley-Castle, after he was deposed; and sir Simon de Berkeford, together with Thomas de Gurney and William de Ocle, were adjudged Traitors for assisting him therein, one of them executed, and great rewards promised to the apprehenders of the other two*. And as for R. 2. though he was deposed after Hen. 4. was crowned by pretence in parliament, yet this deposal was after his resignation only, not before it; and without any formal trial or arraignment, or any capital judgment of death against him, for which I find no precedent in any parliament of England, Scotland, France, nor yet in Denmark itself, though an elective kingdom; who though they justly deposed Christiern II. for his most abominable tyrannies and cruelties, yet they never adjudged or put him to death, but only restrained him as a prisoner. I shall only add this, that though the elective kingdoms of Hungary, Bohemia, Poland, Denmark, and Sweden have, in their parliaments and diets, deposed sundry of their kings for their wickedness and tyranny, yet they never judicially condemned any one of them to death, though Papists: and for a Protestant parliament, (to please an Army only, acted by Jesuits in this particular, to render both parliament, army, and our religion too, for ever execrable throughout the world, and set all men's pens and hand against them to their ruin) to begin such a bloody precedent as this, upon a most false pretext of settling Peace, contrary to the express command of God himself, who commands Christians 'to pray for kings, and all in authority, that they may live a quiet and peaceable life under them in all Godliness and honesty,' not to depose or cut off their heads as the only way to Peace and Settlement, will not only be scandalous but monstrous.

"The next thing the Army propose for a present Peace and Settlement, is 'The execu‘ting of the Prince if he come not over upon ‘summons at a short day, and give not satis‘faction to the houses; or else to declare him

‘and the duke of York, if they appear not ‘upon summons, to be incapable of any trust
‘or government in this kingdom or any domi‘nions thereunto belonging, and thence to ‘stand exiled for ever as enemies and traitors;
‘and to die without mercy, if ever taken or ‘found therein.’ (see p. 1121) A Jesuitical inevitable way to civil wars and ruin: for the king being deposed and cut off, the Prince, no doubt, is next heir to the crown, both by the common law and the statute of 1 Jac. c. 1. to which, I doubt, a Vote or Ordinance of both houses only will be no such legal bar in any lawyer’s or wise man’s judgment, but that he will claim his right; and the generality of the kingdom, at least ten thousand to one, proclaim and embrace him for their lawful king, and assist him with their lives and fortunes both to regain and retain his right; being bound by their oath of supremacy and allegiance, and their Solemn League and Covenant, so to do.
And must not this of necessity beget a present lasting war, instead of a speedy settled Peace?
undoubtedly it will.—But consider further, that the Prince is not only heir apparent to the crown of England, but of Scotland and Ireland too; and though we reject him, yet undoubtedly Scotland and Ireland will readily embrace him as their lawful king, notwithstanding any Votes of ours; and will both unanimously assist him with their lives and fortunes to recover his right to the crown of England: and those two kingdoms falling off wholly from us, and proclaiming war against us, and joining with that potent party here, which certainly will appear in his behalf, out of a natural inclination to the right undoubted heir, or hopes of favour and preferment, since plures solem orientem quam occidentem adorantur, and with all his friends and allies forces from abroad; whether this will not be an unavoidable occasion, not only of a present war, but of certain destruction and desolation to this poor kingdom, and more especially to the Army and their adherents in this desperate advice, who must stand or fall upon their own bottom, without the least aid or contribution from any other, I desire them, and all others who have either eyes or brains in their heads, most seriously to consider.—But that which makes me most of all detest this desperate advice, is this, That it is the only way that can be thought upon to accomplish the Pope’s and Jesuits designs to set up Popery, and subvert the Protestant religion, and professors of it, in all our three kingdoms, and in all foreign realms beyond the seas. For if this reforming parliament, which hath pretended so much to the extirpation of Popery, shall so far play the Popes and Jesuits, the undoubted contrivers of this Army’s new model of our Peace and Settlement, as to depose and behead the king his father, and for ever disinherit him of the crown, and bring him as a traitor to die without mercy, if he come hither, it will so far provoke and exasperate him and the Duke, (being both young and of generous spirits, not thoroughly grounded in our religion, and under the queen’s tuition, and in the power of this Popish party abroad; who will aggravate to the utmost these high affronts and injuries put upon them, and on whose protection they will be in this case necessitated to cast themselves (that there is great fear and probability they will immediately renounce such a bloody and detestable religion, as shall instigate us to such horrid actions and councils; and abominate all the professors of it, so as totally to abandon them, and turn Roman Catholics in good earnest, and then match themselves to great potent Popish alliances; and, by their purses, forces, and assistance, and of the Pope’s and all his Ca-tholick sons in foreign parts, (for the advancement of the Catholick cause, and of the popish, malignant, and discontented parties in England, Scotland, and Ireland, which will questionless receive and assist the Prince as their sovereign lord and king) invade our poor impoverished, divided, and distressed kingdom with such a power as,

in all human probability, would speedily overrun and destroy this mutinous Army and the houses too; put them, with all their adherents, to the sword, without mercy or quarter, and disinherit them and their heirs for ever, to revenge their father’s blood, and their own disinherison of the crown. Then Popery and Pre-lacy will both return with greater authority, power, and approbation than ever; over-spread our whole three kingdoms, and extirpate our religion, and the professors of it, as the most anti-monarchical, treacherous, perfidious, and bloody miscreants under Heaven; and excite all other foreign states and kingdoms to do the like, to prevent the springing up of a new generation of treacherous, king-killing, state-subverting Agitators, and hypocritical and perfidious Army-Saints; and engage all Protestant kingdoms, churches, and states, for their own security and vindication, to disclaim and declare against us.—This, questionless, will be the sad inevitable issue of this Jesuitical advice, if ever the houses or Army shall put it into actual execution, and not speedily prevent it;
it being long since fore-plotted by the Jesuits, as I shall prove anon, at the beginning of the late war against the Scots.—But if the Prince and Duke be set aside, I would gladly learn of these Statists who and what king they would set up? not any of the king’s posterity, certainly, since they disinherit two at a blow; and the blood being corrupted by the king’s and their attainders, no other heir can inherit it by descent? it must escheat to the houses or Army’s disposal, and become no kingdom at all but an elective one, if any: and is this the next way to Peace and Settlement? if so, I have certainly lost my reason and senses too.
No, it will be a seminary of lasting wars, of which few elective kingdoms are long free; every new election producing commonly a new war, where there is no pretence of an hereditary succession, much more where a right heir is forcibly and unjustly disinherited. I shall give you but one instance, though I could name you divers, and that is a memorable one at home in our own kingdom.—King Henry I. having one only daughter, Maud, to reserve the crown to her after his death, caused her to be crowned, and made all the prelates and nobles swear to receive her as their queen and princes, after his decease: but she marrying afterwards to the emperor, and being out of the realm when king Henry died, the abp. of Canterbury, with the rest of the prelates and nobles, contrary to their oath and agreement, elected Stephen earl of Blois for their king, and put by Maud, the right heir: Stephen taking an oath to grant and confirm such laws and Liberties, for the kingdom's Peace and Settlement, as they propounded to him before his coronation: a very likely means to settle peace and prosperity as they imagined. But was the event answerable? No, verily; this cursed perjury and policy brought all the chief contrivers of it to great calamity and miserable ends, and ingendered a bloody civil war in the bowels of this kingdom, which continued no less than 17 years together, with interchangeable successes, till the whole kingdom was laid waste and desolate; most houses, towns, and villages burnt to the ground; their gardens and orchards quite destroyed; their monies and estates exhausted and plundered; their cattle and flocks consumed and eaten up; their fields over-grown with weeds instead of corn; most of the people devoured by the sword, famine, and pestilence; and 1100 castles, holds, and garrisons erected, which were no other but dens of thieves and plunderers. Such was the Peace and Settlement this policy produced. At last both parties, weary of the wars, out of pure necessity came to a Personal Treaty; and, in conclusion, made this agreement, That Stephen, having no issue of his body, should enjoy the crown during his life; and Henry, son and heir to Maud, and next heir also to Stephen, should succeed him after his death; and, in some sort, officiate with him in the kingdom's government during his life: and so these long-lasting wars concluded, after which there were at least 1100 castles demolished by order of parliament, that had been erected during these wars to the country's utter undoing. But if we disinherit the Prince and Duke, for ought I discern, if they suddenly recover not their possession of the crown of England, after one 7 years of war already elapsed, we may have 17 years more, and 17 after that again; and be reduced to a more miserable condition than our ancestors were in King Stephen's days; and that on these grounds: 1. The contest then was only between two competitors for this one kingdom, who had no other kingdoms of their own to side with them: but the Prince and Duke, being successively heirs as well to the crowns of Scotland and Ireland, as England, will have their aid and assistance, and of their foreign friends too, to carry on the wars till they have got possession of the crown of England upon better terms than ever they are like to enjoy it, if we accept of the king's concessions; which we can never expect from them, if we depose and kill the king, and disinherit and banish them for Traitors. 2. Stephen, the actual king, then had no issue at all, and Henry was next heir to the crown, both to Maud and him; so as both titles meeting in him, the controversy and wars must needs cease: but if we shall now set up a new king by election, either of the king's line or other wise, as long as there is either an elective king, or hereditary, to exclude this prince or duke, or either of their heirs, to whom the inheritance of the crown belongs of right, we can neither hope for, nor expect, Peace or Settlement in this kingdom; as the bloody and long-lived wars between the two houses of Lancaster and York will inform us, which never ended till they were both united in king Henry 7.

“The Army's next Proposal for settling Peace is as bad as any of the former, viz, ‘The speedy dissolving of this present parliament;’ which, if not presently consented to, for ought I discern by their last Declaration, they are resolved to dissolve it by open violence on the houses, which they threaten. A tempest certainly of the Jesuits raising, to blow down this parliament, as they would have blown up that of 3 Jac. with gunpowder. But is this a way to safety and settlement, to dissolve the only visible means of both? if the king, prince, duke, and parliament, be all dissolved and quite laid aside, what means or hopes at all of peace, of safety, of settlement, can any man in his right senses rationally see or imagine? is the overturning of the very foundations and pillars of our church and kingdom the best and safest way to settle and preserve them? is it not the only certain way to subvert and ruin them? such ways of Peace and Settlement as these are fitter for Bedlam than a parliament house.—Yea, but they have one infallible way more, to which all the rest are but preparatory, to settle Peace and Safety in our kingdoms, which they idolize almost, viz, ‘A new Representative,’ or mock parliament, to be immediately subscribed to and set up in post-haste; constituted neither of king nor lords, (the brats of tyranny and the Norman Conquest, as some of themselves pretend, as this representative is of the Army) nor yet of knights, citizens, and burgesses duly elected; but of a selected company of politic mechanics, pragmatistical levellers, and statesmen of the General Council of the Army, (as they style themselves, by what commission I know not) who have usurped the whole power both of king, parliament, assembly, and all courts of justice, before their representative be settled, as a true pattern of it, which they are to imitate. A mere whimsical Utopia and Babel of confusion, invented by the Jesuits to please the vulgar rabble, and stir them up to mutinies against king, lords, commons, gentlemen, and their superiors of all ranks; that they alone may possess and sway the reins of government, magistracy, and ministry, to which they have now prepared their tumultuous spirits. Much might be said against it, but I shall contract myself, because nothing can be so much as probably pretended for it. 1. It is a new Jesuitical Popish Gunpowder Treason with a witness, which blows up and destroys at once the king, prince, duke, lords, knights of shires, citizens, burgesses, this present and all future parliaments, and noblest, antientest cities and boroughs of England. Is not this a blessed invention to settle Peace and Safety? 2. It blows up both our magistracy, ministry, laws, liberties, judges, and courts of justice at one crack; and breaks them all in pieces, to raise up this new Babel out of all their ruins. And is not this a blessed new invention of Jesuits and Saints to settle Peace? 3. It blows up all our Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, Protestation, Solemn League and Covenant; all former numerous Declarations, Remonstrances, Votes and Resolutions of one or both Houses of Parliament, 'not to alter the present form of government by king, lords, commons, and other ordinary magistrates and ministers of public justice; or let loose the golden reins of government to blasphemies, heresies, errors, libertinism, profaneness, schism, and all sorts of religions'. It unsettles all things, to settle that which is worse than nothing. And is this the way to safety, tranquillity, or settlement? 4. It inforceth a Subscription more unjust, unreasonable, illegal, tyrannical, and penal, than ever the bishops or pope invented; invents and sets up the very worst of monopolies, a monopoly of electors, of elections, and of representatives elected; ingrossing all men's antient rights, liberties, privileges of election, without consent or title, into the hands of those who never had a right unto them, the people; who are no freeholders, no free burgesses, free citizens, or men capable of votes by law; and these people no other than the Army themselves, and some of their levelling confederates, who must possess, judge, rule, usurp the rights and privileges of the whole kingdom, in point of electing parliament members, without charter or title. A cursed monopoly, which will discontent all men who are thus injuriously deprived of their rights, and produce nought else but infinite animosities, factions, fractions, and tumults, throughout the kingdom; and discontent all wise, all honest men, who will rather die than not oppose it unto death, as carrying the death and funeral of all peace, settlement, parliaments, and the kingdom in its bowels. And is this a fit tool to piece and unite our shattered kingdom, and settle Peace amongst us? 5. It no way extends to Ireland or our Islands, but to England only; it will require many years time and trial to settle and secure its own being, privileges, and power, and gain a general obedience to its new erected sovereignty: so that our church and state will be sunk and drowned, and Ireland inevitably lost, before this ark will or can be prepared for their safety. 6. This new Representative in this new Remonstrance is, in terminis, nought else but the very, 'Agreement of the People,' presented to the house by the Agitators, accompanied with some Jesuits, on the 9th of Nov. 1647; then, and in that very month, twice, by too express Votes, upon solemn debate, and an Ordinance of both houses in Dec. following, resolved to be destructive to the being of parliament, and to the fundamental government of the kingdom; a signal brand of disability and imprisonment imposed on the contrivers and presenters of it, and then condemned by the General and his Council of War, who shot one White to death for abetting it; of which more anon: therefore it seems a miracle to me that they should now be so vertiginous, rash, and audacious, as to tender this to the house again with such post-haste and violence, as the readiest, safest, and speediest course to settle Peace and Safety, and set aside the only means of Settlement, the Treaty. O the inconstancy and strange intoxications of these new Saints and Statists, who would make the houses as inconstant as themselves!

"Mr. Speaker; Since then I have clearly manifested to you, that all these Proposals of Peace and Settlement in the Army's late Remonstrance, are all and every of them most apparent precipices, Jesuitical contrivances, and labyrinths of speedy, imminent, unavoidable ruin and confusion to our king, prince, kingdoms, magistracy, ministry, church, religion, laws, liberties, government, the present and all succeeding parliaments, and the Army too, it must needs be the very extremity of madness to let go that speedy, safe, and sure way to certain Peace, Security, and Settlement I have propounded, by accepting of the king's Concessions, to catch at such a false deceitful shadow of Settlement as this, which will engulf us in endless wars and miseries. It is a rule in policy and divinity, Ex duobus malis minimum eligendum; but of these, one being a most certain destructive evil, and the other a certain good and advantage of the highest nature, it can admit of no deliberation which of them to embrace; and so much the rather, if we sadly consider our deplorable and almost desperate condition, both at home and abroad, pertinent to the point in hand.—We are all weary of a long and costly war, and yet God hath so infatuated many, that though in words they desire, yet in deeds they reject, all ways of Peace, and cast them out of their hands when put into them; as if they delighted to have our wars spun out, like Amaleck's, from generation to generation. We are unable any longer to maintain a war, and yet are unwilling to give it over. But I beseech you now seriously to consider into what great straits and difficulties you are already brought, and how the true state of your affairs stands in relation to your forces and friends, both at home and abroad.—There are many thousands of Reformadoes, that have formerly served you in your

wars, who lie daily clamouring at your doors for Arrears, complaining they are ready to starve, and some of them to rot in prison; desiring but some inconsiderable sum to satisfy their present necessities, and you return them for Answer, That you are unable to raise it; and, after many debates upon their general Ordinance, you cannot, in divers months, pitch upon any probable means to secure their Arrears, amounting, as is conceived, to above 200,000*l.* The Arrears alledged to be due to the Army, who now take free Quarter, and eat up the countries where they lie, amount to above 300,000*l.* and how to raise money to discharge this Debt, or so much as to disband the supernumeraries, and reduce the Army into their winter quarters, hath put you to a stand for many weeks, and as yet you know not how to do it: so as free quarter must still continue to ruin us on the one hand, and your Debts and Arrears be daily multiplied to undo us on the other. Your Navy is now coming into harbour, and your mariners expect a present considerable sum, amounting to many thousands, to pay them off; and you have not yet one penny in your treasury to satisfy their Arrears, and can pitch upon no way to raise any present monies, but only by the Earl of Arundell's Composition, amounting in all but to 6000*l.* and the moiety of it not to be paid till 3 months end at least. What your other Debts of the Navy are, and how many thousand pounds you owe to mariners, masters, and tradesmen, the Committee of the Navy can best inform you. Your Debts to your artificers, waggoners, and such who have advanced monies upon the public faith, amount to 2 or 3 millions at least: besides, your debts to Plymouth and other garrisons are so great, that they are all ready to mutiny and disband for want of pay. Your Debts, to the soldiers and officers in Ireland are vast; and if speedy and large supplies of men, provisions, and money arrive not there within one month, col. Jones, and your other officers there, profess the whole kingdom will be utterly lost; and you, for ought I find, have no possible means to supply them with either.—If then your Debts are already so great to reformadoes, tradesmen, the army, navy, garrisons, and those who have lent you money, that you know not how to satisfy any one of them; if you have not money to pay your Army or Navy at the present, nor to maintain them for the future, why do you now refuse that Peace which is tendered you upon such great advantages; and chuse a war, which you know not how to maintain, and must needs break your and the kingdoms backs in a few months more? Your credit is quite lost and broken in all places, in city and country; you cannot now borrow so much as 10,000*l.* for ought I know, upon any sudden occasion, were it to save the kingdom: your breaches of faith and security heretofore, and clashes with the city, have made you almost bankrupts, if not altogether. Goldsmiths-Hall, the Excise, Camden-House, and the Custom-House, are already charged with more debts than are likely to be paid in many years; Compositions are almost at a stand or end; Sequestrations generally disposed of to each particular county, or other uses; Bishops Lands engaged for far more than they are really worth; you have nothing of your own or the publick's left to raise either present monies, or credit whereon to borrow them; besides, the city, country, and whole kingdom are now quite exhausted, and almost as poor as naked Job was; many counties of the kingdom are so impoverished and exhausted with the last wars, especially the four Northern shires next to Scotland, that, as their knights and burgesses assure you, they are so far unable to pay any taxes, that they already starve and perish in most places for want of food, and are petitioners to you for some reparation towards their great losses, and present support to keep them from starving; the rich associated counties have been so harrassed and undone by the last Summers war, that they are grown poor, unable to lend or contribute to you any more force or assistance; the excessive dearth of corn and provisions the last year; the great destruction of corn by unseasonable weather this present year, which makes that which is wholesome exceeding dear; the extraordinary rot among sheep, and murrain among cattle (which should raise monies) in all counties; the general scarcity and decay of trade by land, of merchandize by sea, and apparent probability of their decaying every day more and more, by reason of the revolted Ships and Irish men of war; the Sequestrations of the malignant, the plunderings and losses of the well-affected, nobility and gentry, have so impoverished all sorts of men (but the Soldiers and Army, and some few treasurers and officers) that they know not how to live or subsist almost, much less to lend or contribute to maintain such a numerous army by land and sea, and supply Ireland's pressing necessities. If you cannot tell how to pay your present Debts, what folly is it to augment them for the future? if you cannot pay your Army or Navy now, how will you be able to do it hereafter?—If then you will have no Peace with the king upon the Treaty, but break it off, and keep up a war and Army still without colour of reason, in this your impoverished and exhausted condition, then mark the consequence: your forces being not duly paid, will live upon free Quarter still, and that will undo the country and make them desperate, and when they have eaten out all the poor, then they will mutiny, and fall on all that are rich; put them to present fines and ransoms at their pleasure, eat them out of house and home, share their estates and offices, which many of them already profess to be theirs by conquest; and then the longest sword will be the only true judge and measure of all men's properties, and divider of their estates, as well in this as former ages; of which we already begin to feel some sad experiments. And as the soldier on the one hand, so the penurious poor people in every place, for want of work and employment, and bread to put into their mouths, encouraged by the soldiers uncontrollable insolence, will fall to plunder and level all rich men on the other side. And if the 'Army's Remonstrance' and the 'Agreement of the People,' now in hot pursuit, take place, ministers shall receive no tithes, landlords no rents, creditors no debts, and oppressed ruined persons no law nor justice; kings must go down; princes and peers quite down; parliaments down; judges, justices, magistrates, laws, tenures, inclosures, down; all rich and landed persons down; their very wealth and estates will be sufficient cause to make them Malignants to a starved peasantry and an all-conquering unpaid Army; and then what follows but immediate irrecoverable ruin? I beseech you, therefore, consider in what a desperate, hazardous condition we and the whole kingdom now stand at present; how near we and Ireland are to the very brink of ruin. If we will now put in to that safe and sure harbour of Peace which the present Treaty invites us into, without any further cost or fear of ship-wreck, we may yet, through God's blessing, be safe and happy: but if we now wilfully put forth to sea again, among so many rocks, shelves, and quick-sands which surround us on every side; and will yet chuse war instead of peace, when the golden and silver sinews that formerly maintained it are quite shrunk up, we can expect nought else but drowning, and a sudden ship-wreck of all our kingdoms, parliaments, liberties, estates, and of our church and religion too.—Yea, but, say some, though all this be truth, we must not displease the Army, who are our present strength and safety; for then we are lost indeed. I have answered this objection once before in one sense, in relation to the Treaty's satisfactoriness; I shall here answer it in another. I say then, 1. That we have a God to please, who will be displeased, if we please the Army in their unjust Demands; and better it is to please God than any Army whatsoever. 'If God be with us, who can be against us?' We need no Army's Protection, if the Lords of Hosts be our guardian. 2. We have a conscience to please, as well as an Army; and we must satisfy that, though the Army (who pretend so much for liberty of conscience, yet will allow us none, or very little) be never so unsatisfied with it. 3. We have a kingdom, nay three kingdoms, to please, and to save too; and must rather please and save them, by rejecting the Army's Proposals, which will inevitably ruin them, than please the Army, in being any way instrumental for their destruction, by embracing their destructive counsels: if our kingdoms be preserved, we may have another Army, though this be disbanded, dissolved, yea destroyed; but if these kingdoms perish by our pursuing their rash Proposals, we shall neither have this army, nor any other army who must certainly perish in and with the kingdom's ruin. 4. We have a Navy to please as well as an Army, and which is more considerable to us than an army. A new army may soon be raised, though the old be disbanded; but a Navy being once lost, ships will not grow again, nor another navy be built in many years. And will not the pleasing of the Army in this, displease and lose the Navy now, as it did the last summer, to your great loss and danger? and can this Army guard the kingdom against any foreign invasions if the Navy be lost? no, nor treble their number. Look then, if you please, to your navy as well as your army. 5. We have many hundred thousands of well-affected and cordial Christians and Covenanters to please, who have adventured their estates, lives, and limbs in the present cause, and many of them done as gallant services in the field, both this last summer and before, as any in this Army; and are more considerable for number, quality, estate, wisdom, parts, and real piety and love to the public interest, than the Army. All which, I am certain, we shall highly discontent and grieve, nay palpably over-reach and cheat to their very faces, if we should please the Army in their present Demands, to their great prejudice and scandal, and our religion's too. There was no man of public spirit that engaged with, contributed towards, or took up arms in, the parliament's service, or cause at first, but merely upon these five Grounds, expressed in all the houses Remonstrances, Declarations, Petitions, Protestations, and in the Solemn League and Covenant: 1. To defend and maintain the true Protestant Religion, against popery, error, and superstition. 2. To defend the king's Royal Person, dignity, and legal authority, against violence, treachery, and usurpation. 3. To maintain the privileges, rights, and freedom of parliaments, and the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom, against state innovations and tyranny. 4. To rescue the king's Person from evil counsellors, and bring such incendiaries and Delinquents to condign punishment. 5. To settle the kingdom in freedom, safety, and peace, against cruelty, dangers, and imminent wars and tumults.—Upon these Grounds, and for these ends only, did both houses, and all who adhered to them, or took up arms for them, by their commissions, engage, and so did this very Army. I appeal then to every man's conscience, Whether the houses, or any who engaged with them, did ever contribute any monies, plate, horse, arms, or march out as an officer or soldier under them in these wars, with any such intention as this, to depose and bring the king to Justice; disinherit the Prince and king's posterity; dissolve the present parliament, and pull up by the roots all future parliaments and their privileges; subvert the fundamental government of the realm, and set up a new representative to dash all these in pieces; and to destroy religion, magistracy, and ministry? Did they not all abhor and disclaim in public, all such thoughts and intentions as these? And, when objected by the king and his party out of jealousy and fear, did not the houses presently resent and remonstrate against it as the grossest scandal on them and their adherents? Or would ever a man have engaged with the houses, or the houses with them in this war, or inrolled his name even in this new modelled Army, had he been told at first, That he must fight to depose the king, and bring him to execution; to disinherit his posterity; to dissolve this parliament, and the very rights, privileges, and being of all future parliaments; to set up a new government and representative in our church and state; to alter and change all things at their fancies, and to break every clause and article of the Solemn League and Covenant: if not one of these was the true end of our wars and engagements against the king at first, and all along till now, but the clean contrary to them; then how can they now be propounded as the only fruits of our wars, and means or conditions of our Peace and Settlement? Will they not all say, if the houses or Army proceed in their Proposals for Peace and Settlement, mentioned in their last Remonstrance, that they engaged and took up arms to do quite contrary to what they now propose to the houses, and endeavour to inforce them to put it into punctual execution? And will they not now say, That they are, by their original Engagement and Covenant, obliged, with their lives and estates, to oppose and oppugn the Army in all these particulars; that having thus declared and resolved, they cannot pray for, but against, the Army's late successes herein; that they cannot henceforth contribute towards their future pay and support, in point of conscience or prudence, but must withdraw and withhold their contributions, and resist them to their faces; declare their commissions null, and not look on, or take them as an Army, but as a tumultuous rout of persons, assembled without commission, to act over Jack Cade's treasons again; and quite pull down that frame of government and order which they have been building up and supporting these many years, with such vast expence of treasure and blood? Better then displease the Army, than that all these Covenanters and Engagers should suffer, to theirs and three kingdoms hazard, Ireland's certain loss, and this very Army's overthrow; which these Jesuitical designs will certainly destroy in a very short space, if they, Jehu like, drive on so furiously, in the prosecution and execution of them, as they have done of late.—Consider, I beseech you, of the desperateness and excessive unavoidable destructiveness of these monstrous ways to the speedy Peace and Settlement of our church and state, and of the safety and security of the things yourselves have pitched on for Peace and Settlement, in and by the Treaty; and the Lord guide our hearts and votes aright therein, that we chuse not death instead of life; the ways of misery and destruction instead of the way of peace; which armies seldom know, or prescribe to themselves or others.

“ Mr. Speaker; Having thus demonstrated to you the unavoidable destructiveness and confusion of those councils and pretended ways of Settlement, which the Officers of the Army have propounded, and would imperiously and forcibly thrust you upon, to the king's, kingdom's, parliament's, religion's, their own, ours, and Ireland's certain and most speedy ruin; I must now crave leave, with much sadness of heart, to unbosom my very soul unto you, and discover you that secret which God hath so clearly manifested to my understanding, that I dare not, under the highest penalty, but acquaint you with: That the Jesuits and Roman Priests and Catholics are the original contrivers, and principal fomenters, of the late and present distempers, and undutiful mutinous proceedings and councils of the Officers and Army; and chief Contrivers of the new Babel, or model of confusion, which they have tendered to you in their late Remonstrance, as the only way to Peace and Settlement. And if I shall clearly demonstrate this unto the house, I hope every member present, and the whole Army and Kingdom, when they know it, will eternally abhor and renounce it, and never henceforth countenance or promote this Jesuitical and Romish design; which I am persuaded the General, and most of the officers and soldiers of the Army, in the simplicity of their hearts, with honest and public intentions of Justice and common freedom, have been ignorantly drawn into, by the over-reaching pates and Machiavellian policies of these cunning Jesuits, who can metamorphose themselves into any shape, and invisibly insinuate themselves into their councils and actings, to promote their own interest and our destruction.—To make out this Discovery so clearly evident that none can rationally deny, but be sufficiently convinced of its truth, I must remind you of these particulars, of undoubted truth and certainty, which both houses have jointly and severally published and remonstrated to the whole kingdom, king, and world, in several Declarations and Remonstrances, and other printed Papers. 1. That the Jesuits, and other engineers and factors for Rome, for the alteration of religion, the setting up of Popery and tyranny in this kingdom, and subversion of the fundamental laws and government of it, did, long before the beginning of this parliament, compose and set up a corrupt, malignant, ill-affected party, consisting of corrupt bishops and clergymen, some great officers and counsellors of state, and others of trust and nearness about the king, his children, and court, to carry on these their designs, who were acted by their subtil practices; and that, by this means, those Jesuits and Romish engineers had a very powerful operation upon his majesty's councils, and the most important affairs and proceedings of his government both in church and state. 2. That the most dangerous divisions, preparations, and armies to make a war between England and Scotland, were made and carried on by the practices and counsels of the Jesuits, Papists, and their confederates; many Scots Jesuits being sent from London into Scotland, to foment the divisions there; and a general convention of all the principal Roman Catholics in this kingdom, and of sundry priests and Jesuits, whereof Con the Pope's nuncio was president, being held in London; wherein great sums of money were granted towards the raising of the army against the Scots, and treasurers and collectors appointed by them in every county; and Popish commanders sent for over and employed in that service, as was apparently proved before a committee, and reported to this house soon after the beginning of this parliament, as your own Journals manifest. And it further appears by one who was privy to that Plot, sent from Rome as an assistant to Con, that the end of the Scots wars was to engage the king to cast himself wholly on the Papists and their party, (the Puritans and Protestant party being averse to this war, and inclining to the Scots) who would not engage to assist him, unless he would condition with them to grant an universal toleration of Popery, and free exercise of that religion to the Papists, if their party prevailed; to which if he should shew himself unwilling or averse, then they would presently dispatch him out of the way, and poison him with an Indian nut, which they had prepared, kept in Con's custody, as they had poisoned his father king James; and the Prince being next heir to the crown, educated near his mother, accustomed to the Popish party, and easy to be perverted in his religion, being but young and under age, they would get him into their power, educate him in their religion, and match him to a Papist; and so all their work accomplished, Popery set up, and the Protestants and their religion soon extirpated both in England, Scotland, and Ireland.—3. That the dissolving and breaking up of all the parliaments in this king's reign, in discontent, proceeded from the counsels and practices of the Jesuits and their Popish confederates; to disaffect the king against them, and prevent the calling of parliaments for the future; as being the principal obstacle to prevent and counter-work all their designs to promote Popery, and subvert our religion, laws, and government.—4. That the Jesuits, Popish priests, Papists, and their confederates, ever since this parliament, have, by policy and power, endeavoured to dissolve and put an end to this present parliament, as the only basis and support of our religion and liberty; the only bulwark between us and tyranny, popery and superstition, ready to over-run the three kingdoms; the dissolution whereof would not only deprive us and our posterities of the present, but of the hopes and capacity of any future parliaments; and that they have indefatigably used and left no means unattempted, to dissolve this parliament, the continuance and close whereof with the king, in a happy Peace and Settlement, would frustrate all their hopes and Popish designs, as both lords and commons have most fully declared in their Remonstrances of May 19 and 26, also in their Propositions in Feb. and their Declarations in March 1642, and often since: that to effect this they have

1. Slandered and traduced this parliament's proceedings both to the king and people, to render them odious to both;
2. Endeavoured to bring up the Northern Army to over-awe and force the houses to act according to their dictates and interests, or else for to dissolve and destroy them;
3. Persuaded the king to impeach the lord Kimbolton and the 5 members, and then to come personally with a strong armed guard to demand and seize upon their persons, which was first plotted in France;
4. Raised up a rebellion of all the Papists in Ireland, to destroy the protestants there, and dissolve the parliament here; against whom they have publicly declared, and sent over forces to the king to assist him in this war to suppress the parliament by force of arms;
5. Persuaded the king, and many lords and commons, to desert his houses of parliament, in order to dissolve and destroy the parliament, and then to raise war against them; in which the Jesuits and Papists, at home and abroad, have been most active, and deepest engaged both in purse and person; they being the principal contrivers, abettors, and fomenters of this war, to subvert our religion and liberties, and set up Popery and tyranny;
6. Plotted the seizing and apprehending of some eminent leading Members, by a confederacy and commission here in London, for which Tomkins and others were executed; as the lords and commons in their Declaration of Oct. 22, and their Humble Desires, Feb. 1, 1642, with other Declarations since, remonstrate;
7. That these Jesuits and their party have obstructed, diverted and prevented, the relief and supply of the Protestants in Ireland with men and money, to betray us into the power of the Irish rebels, and extirpate the Protestants and their religion there.—All these are remonstrated and declared to all the world by near 100 of our own Declarations, and every man's real experience: All which the Army, in their late proceedings, have pursued and exceeded.

“On the other side it is as evident, by your own Declarations, that this Army, and all your other forces, were purposely raised and engaged, both by commission, oath, covenant, and their own solemn Protestations and Remonstrances, to defend the king's person, in the maintenance of our religion, laws, and liberties; to maintain the antient government of this kingdom, by king, lords, and commons; the rights and privileges of members of parliament, against all force and violence to them, and the fundamental laws of the realm; and to extirpate, as much as in them lay, all popery, idolatry, error, superstition, schism, and whatever is contrary to sound doctrine.—This engagement they really performed in the field, till all the king's popish and prelatical party in arms were utterly routed and broken in pieces, and their garrisons reduced to the parliament;

till which time the Priests, Jesuits, and Papists, joined all the force and power they could raise, with the king's forces, against the houses and this Army, to conquer and destroy them: But their hopes and designs being wholly frustrated by the king's total defeat, these Jesuits and their engineers, who transform themselves into all shapes, and leave no means unattempted to compass their ends, then faced about from the king's party; and secretly insinuated themselves into the parliament's Army, to mutiny and debauch them against the parliament, and engage them to put a speedy period and dissolution to it. To this end they attempted to hinder and dissuade them from disbanding and going over to relieve distressed Ireland according to the houses Votes; and to engage them against the houses in March, April, and May, 1647, till which time the Army had ever shewed themselves most dutiful and obedient to the houses commands: But then, to divert and hinder all relief of the Protestant party in Ireland, then brought low, and ready to be swallowed up, (when we had no need at all of above 7 or 8000 standing forces in England, where there was no visible enemy: and might have spared 10,000 men for Ireland, who would soon have quelled the Rebels and Papists, there) these Jesuits, and their popish instruments, at that very instant, which is observable, on purpose to preserve their party in Ireland, and destroy the Protestants there, not only dissuaded those of the Army who were engaged and drawn off for Ireland from going thither, but discouraged and enforced them to desert that service; yea hindered other forces from going over for their relief; persuading the Army, that this dividing of them was but a Plot of Mr. Hollis and other members to destroy them; and then, by fomenting this jealousy, and raising up a new order and council of Agitators in the Army, some whereof were verily suspected, if not known to be Jesuits, they caused the Army, at a general rendezvous, to enter into a solemn Engagement not to disband; but to march up to London, to force the houses to alter, annul, and repeal divers Votes and Ordinances they had passed; published divers scandalous Declarations and Papers against their proceedings, to disengage and draw off the city and country from their defence; impeached no less than 11 of their members at once, (when as the king impeached only 5) demanded their present suspension from the house before any legal charge or evidence, else they would march up to the houses doors, and pull them out by violence, as the king would have done: after which they fall to seclude and drive away more members by a new ex officio proceeding; enforcing them now at last to accuse themselves and draw up their own cases; and, in August 1647, drove away most of the house by their open force and high menaces.—Then they set up several Councils of State in the Army: and waving their Demands as soldiers, formerly insisted on, fell to new model the state, contrary to their former Engagements; to set up a new model of government; to put a speedy and limited time for the period of this parliament, and a new and more equal election of members and representatives, and beginning and ending of parliaments, for the future; receive Petitions; order all matters of Church and State without the parliament, who must only ratify and confirm their Votes; and fell to treat with, and tender Proposals of their own to the king, without the houses privy. Besides, to pick a quarrel with the city of London, who had first raised and were so cordial to the Army and Parliament, and make an irreconcilable breach between the city and houses, to destroy them both by degrees, they caused the houses on a sudden, upon a Letter from the General, in one afternoon, without hearing the city or giving them the least notice of it, to recall the new Ordinance for settling their Militia; wherewith they being justly offended, thereupon the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council presented a Petition to both houses, July 20, 1647, to resettle their Militia as before, being in a full and free house settled without any dissenting Votes, by all their consents, which was seconded by a Petition from the Apprentices; who, being over earnest, offered some unarmed violence to the houses, and got the Ordinance of Repeal nulled, and the Militia resettled as formerly: hereupon they persuaded the Army to march up speedily to London, (not only without, but against the houses Order not to quarter within 40 miles of the city) to protect the houses from any future violence; to bring the authors of this force to speedy and exemplary punishment, and restore the houses to a condition of honour, freedom, and safety; and that, by offering a greater force to the members who continued sitting in the absence of those who repaired to, and engaged with them, than that of the Apprentices; driving the 11 members, formerly impeached, out of the house and kingdom; expelling them and others out of the house; forcing away most of the commons; nulling all Votes, Orders and Ordinances, from July 26, to Aug. 6, 1647; and, after that, marched through London in triumph; broke down all their forts and works about the city; took the Tower out of their possession; divided the Militia of Westminster and Southwark from them; impeached and imprisoned sundry Aldermen and others, who appeared most active for the parliament from the beginning; impeached, suspended, and imprisoned 7 lords at once, for sundry months together; afterwards released them without any prosecution: and, by this means raised such a breach between the city and houses, set the members one against another, and put such a stand to their proceedings, by these disturbances in the parliament's Army, as they could never effect before by all their military power and forces.—Now, lay all these distempers and proceedings together, and compare them with the Army's late Remonstrance, Declarations, Menaces, and present march to London, to force and levy war, against the houses, and their members, in case they concur not with them in their Jesuitical Whimsies and designs; and we shall find them all so opposite and repugnant to the Army's former obedience, professions, and principles; so suitable to the Jesuits practices in every particular; all tending only to force and dissolve this present parliament, to annul and invalidate its proceedings, and weaken all its interest, both in the city and country; and then every rational man must needs acknowledge, they all originally sprung from Jesuitical suggestions and councils; and that Ignatius Loyola, then and now, rode in an open and triumphal chariot in the van of these, and all their late actions of this nature.—Add to this the monstrous Opinions broached publicly and privately, in the Army and their quarters, against the Divinity of the Scriptures; the Trinity; the Deity of our Saviour; that Antichrist is only within us; that conscience ought to be free, and all Religions tolerated; that every man is a minister, and may lawfully preach without Ordination;* that the civil magistrate hath no legislative nor coercive power in matters of religion; that Tythes are

* "Cromwell and his officers," says Lord Clarendon, "took upon them to preach and pray publicly to their troops; and the common soldiers, as well as the officers, did not only pray and preach among themselves, but went up into the pulpits in all churches, and preached to the people; who quickly became inspired with the same spirit; women as well as men taking upon them to preach and pray; which made as great a noise and confusion in all opinions concerning Religion, as there was in the Civil Government of the State; scarce any man being suffered to be called in question for delivering any opinion in Religion, by speaking or writing, how profane, heretical, or blasphemous soever it was; which, they said, was to restrain the Spirit!" History, vol. v. p. 42.

Mechanics of all sorts were then preachers, and some of them much followed and admired by the mob. "I am to tell thee, Christian reader," says Dr. Fentley, Preface to his Dipper dipped, wrote 1645, and published 1647, p. 1, "this new year of new changes, never heard of in former ages; namely, of stables turned into temples (and I will beg leave to add, temples turned into stables, as was that of St. Paul's, and many more), stalls into quires, shopboards into communion tables, tubs into pulpits, aprons into linen ephods, and mechanics of the lowest rank into priests of the high places—I wonder that our door posts and walls sweat not upon which such notes as these have been lately affixed: On such a day, such a brewer's clerk exerciseth, such a taylor expoundeth, such a waterman teacheth.—If cooks, instead of mincing their meat, fall upon dividing of the word; if tailors leap up from the shopboard into the pulpit, and patch up sermons out of stolen shreds; if not only of the lowest of the people, as in Jeroboam's time,

Antichristian, and the like; seconded with public affronts to our ministers, climbing up into their pulpits; interrupting them publicly in their sermons; and making our Churches common stables in some places, and receptacles of their excrements; their open revilings at the proceedings of parliament and their members; and all to render our religion and the professors of it odious to the people; to make them readier and better inclined unto Popery; disgrace and undo our ministers, and render them and their preaching ineffectual; subvert the power of our magistracy; make the houses odious to all; and put all things into a present confusion: I am confident all these were nothing else but the projects and practices of Jesuits and their agents, who crept into the Army to seduce and distemper them; being so diametrically contrary to the General's, officers, and soldiers former practices, principles, professions, and that piety they have professed.—But that which further demonstrates it is this, That after the General and Officers of the Army had confessed their error, in meddling with state affairs, and settling and reforming the commonwealth, in the General Council priests are consecrated to the Most High God:—do we marvel to see such confusion in the church as there is?" They are humorously girded, in a tract entitled, The Reformato precisely characterized, by a modern church-warden, p. 11. Pub. Libr. Camb. xix. 9, 7. "Here are felt-makers (says he) who can roundly deal with the blockheads and neutral dimicasters of the world; cobblers who can give good rules for upright walking, and handle Scripture to a bristle; coachmen, who know how to lash the beastly enormities and curb the headstrong insolences of this brutish age, stoutly exhorting us to stand up for the truth, lest the wheel of destruction roundly over-run us. We have weavers that can sweetly inform us of the shuttle-swiftness of the times, and practically tread out the vicissitude of all sublunary things, till the web of our life be cut off; and here are mechanics of my profession, who can separate the pieces of salvation from those of damnation, measure out every man's portion, and cut it out by a thread, substantially pressing the points, till they have fashionably filled up their work with a well-bottomed conclusion." Mr. Tho. Hall, in proof of this scandalous practice, published a tract, entitled, The Pulpit guarded by Seventeen Arguments, 1651, occasioned by a dispute at Henley in Warwickshire, Aug. 20, 1650, against Laurence Williams, a nailer, public preacher; Tho. Palmer a baker, public preacher; Thomas Hind, a plough-wright, public preacher; Henry Oaks, a weaver, preacher; Hum. Rogers, late a baker's boy, public preacher.

"God keep the land from such translators,
From preaching cobblers, pulpit praters,
Of order and allegiance haters."

at Putney, (where they voted and acted more like a parliament than a council of war) and promised to proceed no further in it, but acquiesce with the houses determinations, these Jesuits, by the help of their instruments, the Agitators, to carry on their design of putting a speedy period to the present and all future parliaments, drew up a Model of a new Representative, which they intitled, 'The Agreement of the People,' subscribed by divers regiments of the Army (9 of horse and 7 of foot), and then caused it to be presented to the house of commons in Nov. 1647. The matter, end, and time of it compared together, and the houses Votes upon it, are very considerable, and discover a Jesuit in the front and rear of it. We all know that the Jesuits and their popish confederates, ever since queen Elizabeth's reign, when so many strict laws were made against them, have had an aching tooth against parliaments. Their first and most desperate attempt was in the 3rd year of king James, to blow up the king and both houses of parliament with Gunpowder: the original Plotters of this horrid treason were the Pope and Jesuits, as is clear by Del Rio's Book, and other printed papers almost a year before; the chief actors in it were discontented gentlemen and soldiers, Catesby, Percy, Winter, Faux, and others, as our stories relate, fit instruments to blow up parliaments: the day when this was to be executed was the 5th of November; but this treason being, through God's great mercy, discovered on that day, the king and parliament adjudged those Jesuits and Popish traitors to be executed, and that day, by act of parliament, to be perpetually observed for a Thanksgiving for this happy deliverance from that treason. The Jesuits, who have broken off all former parliaments in this king's reign till this, and would eternally dissolve this and all succeeding parliaments, by way of revenge for their ill successes then, have, these two last years together, in this very month of November, conspired to blow up or pull down this and all other parliaments; so as the very circumstance of the month and time discovers, in my apprehension, the Jesuits to be chief actors in this tragedy. The first attempt of this kind was on the 5th Nov. 1647, the very day of the Powder Plot, but, by the houses occasions, put off till the 9th: then the 'Agreement of the People' was ushered into the house of commons, with a Petition from the Agitators. When this 'Agreement of the People' and Petition was presented, Giffard, a Staffordshire gentleman, and a Jesuit, (a year before sent from beyond the seas, who at first feigned himself a convert to our religion) was present in the lobby with the Agitators, and promoted it all he could; expressing his approbation of it, being gotten into the General's own life guard, and the next man to him when he came to bring the Speaker into the house of commons, Aug. 6, 1647. He was afterwards very active to persuade the Staffordshire supernumerary forces not to disband or to go for Ireland, and prevailed so much with them, that there were several orders from the House and General before they would obey; therefore it is probable he and they persuaded the Army at first not to disband or to go for Ireland: after which he was taken this summer, at a meeting in Ram-alley, contriving the raising a new war; and being carried prisoner to the committee of safety, made an escape from thence, by bribing his keepers, as is conceived, having offered 50 pieces to a captain to suffer him to escape.—Now, compare this third Gun-powder Plot with the two former in Nov. last, to blow up king, prince, duke, lords, commons, this present and all future parliaments at one attempt; to destroy the king and parliament; disinheriting his royal posterity; unpeer all the lords, and level them with the dust; to root up them and all parliaments, root and branch, at once, against all our Oaths, our Covenants, our Remonstrances, and our Declarations; our laws, our Protestant religion, all here devoted to ruin together; as the only safe and speedy way to settle peace and safety in church and state, (to omit the horrid equivocations, dispensations with oaths and covenants, and Jesuitical distinctions in that Remonstrance) they are such clear visible characters of a Jesuit's pencil, hand, and head in this Remonstrance (so abounding with their bloody disloyal tenets and practices of killing and deposing Christian kings who will not do homage to their Roman pontiff, and blowing up Protestant states, kingdoms, parliaments); so abhorrent to all Protestants principles, professions, practices; who never yet imbrued their hands in, nor stained their religion with, the blood of any king, or actual deposal of any Protestant or Popish prince who was their lawful king, or disinheriting of his lawful heirs, or pulling down a Protestant reforming parliament; that none but Jesuits and Jesuited papists could possibly invent, or spur on the General Officers, and Army so violently and madly to prosecute them, as they do by a subsequent high Declaration, discovering a very Jesuitical spirit in the penman: charging the members of the house dissenting from them, in these treasonable practices, with a treasonable breach of trust; and usurping to themselves a power to judge, censure, and exclude them; and make those members who shall confederate with them herein, though never so few, materially a parliament, though formally and essentially no parliament at all; and moving them to depart the house and join with them in these Jesuitical designs; which they have since aggravated and backed by their disobedient march to London and Westminster against our commands, by force and open violence to overawe us: and, by our Votes in parliament, to put all their treasonable Romish demands in present execution; to justify these very treasonable doctrines and practices of theirs, which our parliaments have, in direct terms, in sundry acts condemned, and in the Oath of Allegiance, (which every one of us must take im-

"I shall further offer this to your considerations, That as soon as ever this Agreement of the People was suppressed in Nov. 1647, and the king persuaded to reject the Propositions tendered to him by both houses, by some officers in the Army, on purpose to treat on their Proposals, the Agitators and Jesuits in the army opposing these Proposals, and threatening to offer some violence to the king's person, caused him secretly to withdraw himself from Hampton-Court into the Isle of Wight, where they shut him up close prisoner, without the houses privity; which done they caused their confederates, when most of the members were sent into the country to disband the supernumeraries, to pass a Vote in the Commons house, to make no more Addresses to the king; not to set him aside as they then professed to many dissenting members, but only to induce the king to seek first to them, without which protestation they had never carried that Vote; which being passed, and most of the members departing, three more Votes were set on foot, and passed at an unseasonable hour, and gotten by surprise.—The very next morning there came a Declaration from sir Tho. Fairfax, and the General Council of the Army, dated Jan. 9, 1647, signifying their Resolutions to adhere to the houses, 'for settling and securing the parliament and kingdom without the king and against him, or any others that shall hereafter partake with him.' But the lords sticking at these Votes, there was a regiment or two of foot sent to garrison Whitehall, and a regiment of horse from the Army billeted in the Mews, to fright and force the lords to a concurrence.—Some few days after, a Book written by Doleman, alias Parsons the Jesuit, against king James's title to the crown, and concerning the lawfulness of subjects and parliaments deposing and chastising of their kings for their misgovernment, and the good and prosperous success that God commonly hath given to the same, (reprinted verbatim from Doleman's own printed copy, except the word parliament added to it now and then) was published to the world, with this title, 'Several Speeches delivered at a Conference, concerning the power of parliaments to proceed against their King for Misgovernment'; which false new title published at that season, intimated to the world that this discourse of a Jesuit, for which he was condemned of high treason, was nothing else but 'Speeches made by some Members of the Commons House, at a Conference with the Lords.' The highest dishonour and affront ever put upon a Protestant parliament, to have the book and doctrines of a Jesuit thus falsely fathered on them; of which, though I myself and others complained, there was nothing done to vindicate the houses from this gross imputation.—About the same time there was another Book, intitled, 'Royal Tyranny discovered, discovering the Tyranny of the Kings of England, from William the Invader, and Robber, and Tyrant, alias the Conqueror, to this present King Charles; who is plainly proved to be worse and more tyrannical than any of his predecessors, and deserves a more severe punishment from the hands of this present parliament than either of the dethroned Kings Edw. II. or Rd. II. had from former Parliaments; which they are bound by duty and oath, without equivocation or collusion, to inflict upon him, he being the greatest delinquent in the three Kingdoms, and the head of the rest,' so the title. In the Table there are these Passages amongst others, 'Charles Stuart guilty of Treason; C. R. [Charles Rex] ought to be executed'; where the houses are not only pressed to depose and execute him, but his execution, in case of their neglect, foretold, and that in an exemplary manner, in despite of all his protectors and defenders.—These Jesuitical Books and Counsels, published at that instant, discovered clearly to my apprehension, their Votes for laying the king aside, and deposing and executing of him, even then to have been intended; but only interrupted by the Scots invasion, and the last Summer's commotions, occasioned by those Votes of Non-addresses; and the forcing of them on, both then and now, by the Army, with the violence they use, to be no other but a very plot and project of the Jesuits, to ruin and destroy the king and us.—I shall only add to this what I manifested but now, that it was the Jesuits Plot, when they engaged and assisted the king in his war against the Scots, to dash the Protestants in both nations in pieces one against another; so to be masters of both kingdoms, and extirpate our religion in both; and that, if the king consented not to grant them a general free exercise of their religion throughout all his realms and dominions, or did but stick at it, that then they would presently poison and dispatch him; possess themselves of the Prince, the next heir to the crown; and then, by flattery, or menaces, draw him to their religion, and match him to a Papist; and then all the three kingdoms would soon turn Papist, and all Protestants be murdered, or burnt for Heretics.—Now these Papists and Jesuits understanding that the king, beyond and contrary to their expectation, hath granted all or most of our Propositions in the Isle of Wight, and fully condescended to several new Bills, for the Extirpation of Mass, Popery, and Popish Innovations out of his Dominions; the putting all laws in execution against them, and for speedier discovery and conviction of them than formerly; and that their good friends and confederates, our archbishops, bishops, deans and chapters, and other branches of the hierarchy, are to be wholly rooted out both in England and Ireland, (so as they are never likely to have any more footing in them again, after all their late wars, charges, hazards, plots, and designs, to set up their Catholic religion and party) are so enraged with the king, and so inexorably incensed against him both at home and abroad, as I am credibly informed, that now they are mad against him; and thirst for nothing but his blood; which they think they cannot advantageously and effectually accomplish, but by engaging the Army to dissolve the Treaty and force the parliament, in case they vote his Answers satisfactory; and then, by themselves or a confederate party in the house, to depose and cut off his head. The Prince being also now beyond seas in their power, destitute of his hopes of succession to this crown, banished and declared a traitor, and to die without mercy if he return hither, and to lose his head as well as his father, (upon such high affronts put upon his father and himself, and that by a Protestant Parliament and Army of Saints) will be so enraged against all professors of our religion, that he will probably profess himself a Roman Catholic, and his brother too, and match with a Catholic princess; and thus engage all the Papists in foreign parts, England, Scotland, and Ireland, to unite their forces, purses, and councils, by way of revenge, to cut all the Protestants throats in all the three kingdoms, who have adhered to the parliament, and hew the Army itself in pieces, when they have thus accomplished their designs; which will render them and the parliament execrable and infamous to all posterity: and then farewell all parliaments, and our Protestant religion for ever; not only here, but throughout all Christendom, where the Popish princes will presently massacre the Protestants, lest they should fall to the like perfidious practices. This I am most confident is their design, by what I have met with in their Papers, and in the Jesuit Contzen's politics and others, who have chalked out a way, by degrees insensibly to screw Popery into any Protestant church, by those very steps which our prelates followed, who were directed by them; and to alter and subvert any Protestant state and kingdom, by this new modelling of them into such a popular anarchy, as is now suggested and presented in the Army's Remonstrance. This I am assured will be the unavoidable, desperate, and deplorable fate, if we comply with them and the Army in it, unless God in his infinite mercy shall hold off their hands, and turn their hearts, from prosecuting their present designs.

"I shall only add one thing more, and so conclude, That many of the Agitators and Army's Papers, especially 'Putney Projects,' and some late Declarations, savour of a Jesuit's stile and spirit; that I have been credibly informed, that not only Gifford, a Jesuit, was one of the General's own life-guard, and a very active man in the Army; but one Thomas Budds, alias Peto, the last Popish priest condemned at Newgate, was a trooper in this Army; and, by influence of some great officers in it, obtained a reprieve instead of an execution; that the Papists beyond seas wish very well to the Army, in whom now is their chiefest hopes; that the Jesuits cells and colleges in foreign parts are of late very empty; that many Popish priests and Jesuits are now in England, not saying mass, crying up the Pope and popish tenets as heretofore; no, that were too gross, and they easily discovered; but using all manner of mechanick trades; preaching in private corners as Sectaries, Anabaptists, Seekers, Broachers of new Light, or as gifted Brethren; that many of them are turned troopers, Agitators, if not some of them officers, in the Army; or at leastwise have so insinuated themselves into the leading officers there, (who are much taken with their parts, their new designs and tenets to alter and unsettle states) that they have as powerful an influence now upon the Army's Councils and Officers, as formerly they had upon the king and his council; and have now thus deeply engaged them, beyond all expectation, to accomplish those Jesuitical designs of theirs, to depose and destroy the king; dissolve this parliament; subvert our magistracy, ministry, religion, laws, liberties, government; and establish their Utopian new model of confusion in lieu of parliaments and regal power; thereby to accomplish that now, which all their Popish conspiracies, armies, and confederates, from the beginning of queen Elizabeth's Reign, could never yet effect by all their treachery, policy, and power; and how far they have proceeded, and engaged the Army and Officers unwillingly in it, out of honest intentions, we all now sadly behold to our great amazement, even in this instant of time when Ireland is in such imminent danger of being utterly lost.

"I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, let us lay this speedily to our hearts, and go about to prevent it ere it be too late. If we vote the king's Answers now unsatisfactory, and so break off the Treaty with him, we have all our hopes, our only means of Peace and Settlement, and all these large Concessions which the king hath granted both for our present and future security; our monarchy, magistracy, ministry, parliaments, laws, liberties, kingdoms, and that which is dearest to us, our religion also, endangered, yea lost at once; and such a certain foundation laid to carry on all these Jesuitical Designs I have here discovered, and that by authority of this house, as will stain the honour of this most glorious and renowned parliament to all posterity, and put a dishonourable speedy period to this and all future parliaments for ever: but if we vote it so far satisfactory, as I have stated it, and, humbly conceive, proved it substantially to every rational man's understanding and conscience, as that we may lay present hold upon it; and proceed therein without delay, to turn all the king's Concessions into Bills, which I have, for the most part, already drawn; and get the king's royal assent unto them, I doubt not but, by God's blessing on our endeavours, we may, before this month be ended, settle such a firm and well-grounded Peace between the king and all his people and kingdom, upon such honourable, safe, and advantageous terms for the public interest, and such strong securities, as no state or kingdom ever yet enjoyed the like since the creation. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, upon this long and tedious debate, (for which I most humbly beg pardon of the house) being a business of such infinite concernment to our present weal or ruin, I must and do conclude, 'That the king's Answers to the Propositions of both houses are so far satisfactory at the least, as that this house may, upon safe and firm grounds and great advantages, forthwith accept of and immediately proceed upon them; to the speedy Settlement of the Peace of the kingdom; and are bound both in honour, prudence, justice, and conscience so to do, to preserve themselves, our three kingdoms, and the Army too, from perpetual bloody wars, and inevitable impendent desolation and confusion.'

The Commons resolve, that the King's Answers are a Ground for settling the Peace of the Kingdom.] This Speech, as Mr. Prynne himself informs us, in an Appendix, being uttered with much pathetic seriousness, and heard with great attention, gave such general satisfaction to the house, that many members, formerly of a contrary opinion, professed they were both convinced and converted; others, who were dubious in the point of Satisfaction, that they were now fully confirmed; most of different opinion put to a stand; and the majority of the house declared, both by their chearful countenances and their words, (the Speaker going into the withdrawing-room to refresh himself, so soon as the foregoing Speech was ended) that they were abundantly satisfied by what had been thus spoken: after this the Speaker resuming the chair, Mr. Prynne's arguments were seconded by many able gentlemen. At length a motion being made, That the previous Question should be put, it was carried in the Affirmative, by 140 voices, against 104, with the four Tellers, notwithstanding the General's and whole Army's march to Westminster, and menaces against the members, in case they voted for the Treaty, and did not utterly reject it as unsatisfactory: And then, without any division of the house, it was resolved, 1. "That the Answers of the king to the Propositions of both houses, are a Ground for the house to proceed upon for the Settlement of the Peace of the kingdom. And, 2. That Mr. Pierpoint, sir John Evelyn of Wilts, Mr. Solicitor, col. Birch, Mr. Ashurst, sir Tho. Widdrington, and Mr. Maynard, be appointed to repair to the Head Quarters that afternoon, to confer with the Lord-General and his Officers, for keeping and preserving a good correspondence between the parliament and the Army." After which the Commons adjourned.—Mr. Prynne also remarks, "That though this last debate upon the king's Answer to the parliament's Propositions had continued from Monday morning, all the night through, and till 9 on Tuesday morning, Dec. 5, during which time the doors were never locked, yet that there were present in the house, when fullest, above 340 members; but that many of them, through age and infirmities, could not hold out all night, which was the reason of there being only 244 present when the previous Question was put."

Dec. 5. This day the lords passed the same Vote in favour of the Treaty as the commons had done, and then adjourned to the 12th.

The Army seize upon several Members of the House of Commons.] Dec. 6. We find by the Journals, That the commons being informed that divers Members, coming to attend, were staid and carried to the Queen's Court, or Court of Wards, the Serjeant was commanded to go to them, and require them to come to the house; who being returned, said, "That the Members seemed willing to consent, but that an Officer would not suffer them to pass till he had received orders about them, which he had sent for."

A particular Narrative of that Transaction.] This Affair being the greatest attack ever yet made upon the liberties of an English parliament, we shall present the reader with an Extract from the Narratives thereof, as drawn up by the Imprisoned and Secluded Members themselves, published at the very time of action,* in vindication of their own conduct, and by way of appeal to the nation against this unparalleled violence of the Army.—Mr. Prynne writes thus:† "The General and Officers of the Army, highly displeased with the Vote, 'That the king's Answers to the Propositions were a Ground for them to proceed upon, for settling the Peace of the kingdom,' and with those members who assented to it, sent 2 or 3 whole regiments of horse and foot to Westminster; set a strong guard at the house's doors, in the lobby, stairs, and at every door leading towards them; admitting none but parliament men themselves to enter into Westminster-Hall, or the back stairs leading to the Court of Requests, and excluding their servants who attended them. Then col. Pride, col.

‡ This invasion of the parliament commonly passed under the name of Colonel Pride's Purge; so much disposed was the nation to make merry with the dethroning of those members, who had violently arrogated the whole authority of government, and deprived the king of his legal prerogatives. Hume.

Hewson, and sir Hardress Waller, seized upon divers members of the commons house; some at the doors, others in the lobby, and on the stairs near the house, without any warrant, or reason alledged, but their sword and power, as they were going to discharge their duties. Among others, col. Pride seized upon Mr. Prynne, going up the stairs next the house; and told him, 'Mr. Prynne, You must not go into the house, but must go along with me.' Mr. Prynne returned for answer, 'That he was a member of the house, and was going into it to discharge his duty, from which no man should or ought to hinder him; whither he would go, and he' (the colonel) 'should not keep him back;' and then thrust up a step or two more. Hereupon col. Pride thrusting him down before, sir Hardress Waller and others laying hands on, and pulling him down forcibly behind to the Court of Requests great door, Mr. Prynne thereupon demanded, 'By what authority and commission, and for what cause, they did thus violently seize on, and pull him down from the house?' To which Pride and Waller, shewing him their armed soldiers standing round about him with swords, musquets, and matches lighted, told him, 'That there was their commission.' To which Mr. Prynne answered, 'That they were no legal commission, nor cause for them to seize upon him, being a member; and openly protested, 'That it was an high breach of the privileges of parliament, and an affront to the house; desiring the standers-by to bear witness of this violence, and his protestation against it; and that they, being more and stronger than he, and all armed, and he unarmed, they might forcibly carry him whither they pleased; but stir he would not thence of his own accord:' hereupon they forcibly pushed him up into the Queen's Court, where some other members, a little before seized, were kept prisoners by them.—The house being informed of this violence upon him, and the high breach of privilege, in seizing him and other members, sent the serjeant at arms to demand them of the captain that guarded them, and to command their present attendance in the house; which message, though delivered by him, and the prisoners requiring his obedience, that they might accordingly attend the house, was yet slighted and disobeyed; whereupon the house ordered the serjeant a second time to go with his mace, and demand the members, and bring them into the house forthwith, as refusing to do any business till their members were restored; but Pride and his confederates staid the serjeant in the lobby, and would not suffer him to go to them; whereupon, returning into the house he acquainted them with the contempt, which was entered in the Journal: and the house concluded not to proceed till their members were restored; and sent a committee to the General to demand them.—Mr. Stephens and col. Birch, being in the house, were sent for to the door, by some of the officers, by false tickets, and pulled out by violence; col. Birch, putting his head within the door, and crying out to the Speaker, 'Whether they would suffer their members to be pulled out thus violently before their faces, and yet sit still?' notwithstanding which the officers still proceeded to seize more members as they came to, or went from, the house, carrying them all prisoners to the Court aforesaid.—About 3 in the afternoon Hugh Peters,* with his sword by his side, came rushing in to see the prisoners, and take a List of their Names, by order from the General, as he alledged; where some of them demanding of him, 'By what authority they were thus imprisoned and kept from their duty?' He answered, 'By the power of the sword;' and returning thither soon after, he released sir Benj. Rudyard and Mr. Fiennes (as he said) by the like power of the sword.—Night drawing on, the prisoners requested the captain who guarded them to desire col. Pride to speak with them; to the end they might know by what authority, and for what cause, they were thus detained by him, being members. The colonel returned this Answer, 'That he had other employment for the present, and could not wait upon them.' Soon after Hugh Peters, and some officers, acquainted them that they should all be removed to Wallingford-House, where they should have all fitting accommodations provided for them, and the lord-general Fairfax and lieut. gen. Cromwell, would come and speak with them, and that coaches would be provided to carry them thither; upon this assurance the prisoners went all from the Queen's Court, to take coach at the Lords Stairs; where, coaches attending them, instead of being carried to Wallingford-House, as was promised and expected, they were stayed at the back-gate of Hell, (a common victualling-house so called) and there thrust all into the common dining-room, and after that translated into two upper chambers.—When it grew late, sir Robert Pye and some six more were offered liberty to go to their lodgings, being near, upon their parole to appear before the General the next morning; but they, conceiving it inconsistent with the privilege of parliament, and a prejudice to their cause, refused to give any other parole than to appear in the house the next morning; which not being accepted, they were all enforced to remain in Hell, that night, most of them having no beds to rest their heads on (though antient and infirm, and gentlemen of honour) but the floor of the room, and benches and chairs: yet they patiently underwent this affront and duress in Hell itself, (a place culled out on purpose for the sake of its name, to put a more signal brand of contempt and infamy upon them and the parliament) reading and singing psalms to God, spending most of the night in discourses and walking, without taking one minute's rest or sleep. The provost-marshal, under whose custody they were unworthily put as malefactors, was so ashamed of this dishonourable usage, that, after some conference concerning it, he repaired to the General at Whitehall, to acquaint him with it, and receive his further order.—The next morning the prisoners expecting the issue, he returned to them about 11, and acquainted them that it was the Lord-General's pleasure they should all forthwith wait upon him and his Council of War at Whitehall, where he desired to confer with them: hereupon they were presently put into coaches, and carried to Whitehall, like traitors or felons, with strong guards of horse and foot attending them, and there brought into the king's lodgings fasting, and tired out with watching the night before; where arriving about 12, they expected a present answer; but, their more than royal new Excellences took so much state upon them as to make them wait their leisure till it was night, before they vouchsafed to send them any answer; at which time, disdaining to call the imprisoned members in, or to honour them with their more than lordly presence, they sent out 3 officers to acquaint them with this dilatory Answer, 'That other intervenient affairs of great concernment were now in agitation before the General and his Council, so as they could not admit them to their presence that night, as was expected; and that the General and his Council, for their better accommodation, had given order that they should be lodged at two Inns in the Strand, viz. the Swan and the King's Head, for that night; where they should receive from them, the next morning, some Propositions to be considered of.' After which the provost-marshal carried them all prisoners to the said Inns, through the streets, in the dirt, on foot (except some 6 or 7 only, who, being lame and aged, got a coach) with a musketeer attending upon every one of them in particular, and a strong guard marching before, behind, and on one side of them, like so many traitors and capital malefactors. Several of the soldiery reviled the members with opprobrious speeches, as 'That they had cozened the kingdom of its treasure, and them of their arrears.' To which the others replied, 'That they should make it appear to the soldiers ere long, that their Arrears were in the pockets of their commanders and the rest of their own party.' Being brought at last to the two Inns before mentioned, they had strong guards set upon them, and a centinel at every chamber door all night.—This day also the Officers and Army surrounded the house in the same manner as on Wednesday. Some of their officers standing at the commons door with a List of parliament-men's names in their hands, demanded every member's name as he came to the door to enter the house; and those whose names were in their list, they forcibly excluded and turned down stairs, though they earnestly pressed for entrance; and some of them acquainting the Speaker, by letter, with this high affront and breach of privilege, could find no redress; the officers admitting only such who were not in their Lists. About 40 members were, this day, thus forcibly excluded, not imprisoned; but Mr. Gawen was seized upon by one of col. Hewson's officers, at the house; Mr. Vaughan was apprehended at his own lodgings; and these two were carried prisoners to the Queen's Court, and from thence to Whitehall to the rest of the imprisoned members, who were there attending upon the General and his Council. Sir W. Litton was likewise seized that day, and kept prisoner in Whitehall, but afterwards released by sir W. Constable's order. The rest continued prisoners several days at the two before-mentioned Inns, but were, by degrees, either discharged without any cause assigned for their commitment, or else removed to other places of confinement, where they remained many weeks*."

Proposals from the Army, accusing Denzil Hollis, and others, of Faction, and Personal Interest.] Whilst the house was debating on the seizure of their Members, and had appointed a Committee to go to the General and expostulate the matter with him, they were informed that there was a Message from his excellency at the door, sent by lieutenant col. Axtel and some more officers. These messengers, being called in, acquainted the house, That they were commanded, by the Lord-General and the General Council of Officers, to let the house understand that they had something to deliver to them this morning, of very high concernment, which would be presently ready for their view. Soon after came col. Whalley to the house, and presented a Paper to them, which bore the following title:

To the Hon. the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, The Humble PROPOSALS AND DESIRES of his Excellency the Lord FAIRFAX and the General Council of Officers, Dec. 6, 1648, in order to a speedy Prosecution of Justice, and the Settlement formerly propounded by them.

"Having with others, for a long while sadly beheld and tasted, in your proceedings, the miserable fruits of councils divided and corrupted by faction and personal interest, even to the neglecting, betraying, and casting away all public good; to the lengthening out of endless troubles, burdens, and damage; to the continuance and widening of that issue of blood, whereby these nations have been so long polluted and consumed; and to the perpetual hazard, bondage, and destruction of them at last: and seeing no other or better way, we propound and demand as followeth: 1. Whereas Denzil Hollis, esq. Lionel Copley, esq. major-gen. Massey, and others of your members whose names you well know, were, in 1647, impeached by us for Treason, or for high Crimes and Misdemeanors, in relation to the

treasonable Engagement in the city of London, the violence then done upon the parliament; the levying of a new war, and other evils in maintenance and prosecution thereof; and, upon clear proofs against them, were, by your censure, expelled the house, and disabled from further trust therein; and, upon new writs issued out, new members were chosen and returned in some of their places; and yet, by the prevalence of their faction, when in the last summer's wars, divers faithful members were engaged abroad upon necessary public service, and others, through malignant tumults and disturbances, could not safely attend the house, the same persons were afterwards re-admitted to sit in the house and vote as formerly, without any trial or satisfaction in the things whereof they were accused: we demand that all those members so impeached may be forthwith secured, and brought to justice; and such others as are of their faction may be secluded from the house.

2. Whereas, by the confederacy of major-gen. Brown, now sheriff of London, with the said impeached members and others, the Scots were invited and drawn in to invade this kingdom the last summer; insomuch as when, upon their actual invasion, the house proceeded to declare them enemies, and those that adhered to them traitors; yet the said confederates, and other treacherous members, to the number of 90 and odd, as upon the division of the house appeared, did, by their counsels and votes, endeavour to hinder the house from declaring against their confederate invaders: we desire that the said major-gen. Brown may be also secured and brought to judgment; and that the rest of the 90 and odd persons, dissenting against the said Vote, may be excluded the house.—

3. Whereas, in a continued series of your proceedings for many months together, we have seen the prevalence of the same treacherous, corrupt, and divided counsels, through factions and private interests, opposing or obstructing justice in all kinds, diverting your counsels from any thing of public good, hindering any proceedings to any such Settlement as would consist with security to the public interest, or put a real end to the troubles, burdens, or hazards of the kingdom; and precipitating into treacherous and destructive compliances and conjunctions with the acknowledged enemies thereof, as in the Votes of 'No more addresses to the King, &c.' the justness and necessity whereof you had once so cleared to the world; also in the Votes for entertaining or seeking after all that Personal Treaty with the king; and, lastly, in the Votes declaring his past concessions to be a ground for the house to proceed upon for the Settlement of the Peace of the kingdom, notwithstanding the visible insufficiency and defects of them in things essentially necessary concerning the public interest and liberties of the kingdom, as those propounded in our late Remonstrance are, and in other matters both religious and civil: we therefore most earnestly desire, that all such faithful members who are innocent in these things, would immediately, by Protestation and public Declaration, acquit themselves from the guilt of any concurrence in the several votes or counsels here before particularly mentioned as corrupt or destructive, that the kingdom may know who they are that have kept their trust; and so distinguish themselves from the rest that have thus falsified the same; and that all such as cannot, or shall not, so acquit themselves particularly, may be immediately excluded or suspended the house; and not re-admitted until they have given clear satisfaction therein to the judgment of those who now so acquit themselves, and the grounds of such satisfaction be published to the kingdom.

4. Thus such, as by faithfulness have retained their trust being set in a condition to pursue and perform the same, without such interruptions, diversions, and depravity of counsels, as formerly, we shall desire and hope you will speedily and vigorously proceed to take order for the execution of justice; to set a short period to your own power; and to provide for a speedy succession of equal representatives, according to our late Remonstrance; whereby the differences in the kingdom may be ended, and we and others may comfortably acquiesce, as for our parts we hereby engage and assure you we shall. By the Appointment of his Excellency the Lord Fairfax, Lord-General, and his General Council of Officers. Jo. Rushworth."

Dec. 7. The commons ordered the Speaker to return their hearty Thanks to lieut. general Cromwell, then present, for the very great and eminently faithful services both here and in Scotland; which the Speaker did accordingly. Mr. Ludlow remarks, "That Cromwell did not come to London till the night after the first interruption of the house by the Army; and that he publicly declared he had not been acquainted with that design; yet, since it was done, he was glad of it, and would endeavour to maintain it."

Conference concerning the Imprisoned Members.] After this compliment paid to Cromwell, Mr. Pierpoint, one of the Committee appointed to go to the lord-general Fairfax, delivered 4 Papers, as the substance of the Conference with him the day before, for the Discharge of the members, which were read. And first The Paper from the Committee to the General:

"We having command, from the house of commons, to let your excellency know that divers of their Members are this day taken and detained by some officers and soldiers of your excellency's Army, it is the pleasure of the house they be discharged; for which we desire your excellency's present Order that it may be done accordingly. Dec. 6."

This produced the following Answer, signed by Mr. Rushworth, in the name of the Lord-General and his Council of Officers; "Having seen the Order upon which your last Paper is given in, we do not conceive it to be the positive pleasure of the house of commons that their Members be discharged: but concerning their discharge, for which you are appointed to confer, so soon as we shall receive the Resolutions of the house upon that Paper, this day sent in by us to them, which concerns those persons detained, we shall then be prepared to give you answerable satisfaction in relation to that particular."

To this the Committee made the following Reply: "In Answer to your Paper now delivered, wherein you do refer to one sent by you to the commons; we affirm that, since the reading of that Paper by the house, it was expressed by them to be their positive pleasure, that the members this day taken and detained by some of the officers and soldiers of the Army under your excellency's command, be forthwith discharged: and therefore we do insist that, according to our former Paper, the said members be forthwith discharged accordingly."

To this positive Demand of the Committee for the release of their Members, the General sent the following peremptory Refusal, signed as before: "In return to your last Paper concerning your insisting on the Discharge of the Members, we refer to our former Answer; and have no more to say to that particular, till we receive the Resolutions of the house upon our Paper, this day sent to them."

The same day the commons received Letters, dated Westminster, Dec. 7, from several members, signifying their being prevented from attending their duty in the house by the soldiery. After reading these Letters, a motion being made for proceeding upon the Proposals from the Army, it was carried in the affirmative by 50 against 28. Hereupon, those Members who were of the minority, we are told*, left the house, resolving to come no more till Justice was done to their absent brethren: an assertion in some measure confirmed by the Journals; since, though we meet with many divisions between this time and the Beheading of the King, yet there is not one instance, during that period, in which the number of members present exceeded 53.

The Commons revoke their former Resolutions for restoring the impeached Members.] Dec. 12. The commons being met, pursuant to adjournment, they proceeded upon the Proposals and Desires of the Army, which were read a second time; but the result, contained in several clauses, we are told by the editor of the printed Journals, was obliterated by an Order of March the second, 1659: however, these Votes we are enabled to supply, the house having ordered them to be printed and published about a month after the passing of them: Resolved, 1. "That the Votes of the 7th and 8th of June last, 'For revoking the Orders of the 7th and 9th Sept. and the 27th Jan. 1647, disabling commissary Lionel Copley, and also Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Philip Stapylton, &c. from being members of this house,' was of a dangerous consequence, tending to the destruction of the justice and peace of this kingdom; and is hereby repealed. 2. That the Vote of the 30th of June last, whereby this house did concur with the lords, 'That for opening a way towards a Treaty with his majesty for a safe Peace, the Votes of the 3d Jan. 1647, forbidding all Addresses to be made to or from the king, be taken off,' was highly dishonourable to the proceedings of parliament, and apparently destructive to the good of the kingdom."

List of the Members imprisoned and secluded by the Army.] The following is a List of the Members of the House of Commons imprisoned or secluded by the Army,* at different times, since the Vote of the 5th of December, declaring the King's Concessions to be a Ground for settling the Peace of the Kingdom.

Besides many more said to have absented themselves for fear of the Army.

The Commons annul all former Votes for a Personal Treaty with the King.] Dec. 13. We have already taken notice of two extraordinary Votes of Revocation, passed by the commons on the 12th; and they now proceeded to annul all such other Resolutions as had the least tendency towards a reconciliation with the king and his adherents. Nor does it appear, that they so much as asked the concurrence of the lords therein.

Dec. 14. Most of the secluded Members being still denied entrance into the house of commons by the soldiery, or kept prisoners at the King's Head and the Swan in the Strand, a motion was made, "That a committee should be appointed to go to the General, and know of him upon what Grounds their Members were restrained from coming to the house by the officers and soldiers of the Army?" which, being put to the vote, was carried affirmatively, by 35 against 18, and a committee was appointed accordingly.

Protestation of the Imprisoned and Secluded Members against the Violence committed on them by the Army.] Dec. 15. A printed Paper was presented to the house of commons, intitled,

A Solemn PROTESTATION of the Imprisoned and Secluded Members of the House of Commons, against the horrid Force and Violence of the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, on the 6th and 7th of Dec. 1648.

"We the knights, citizens, and burgesses of VOL. III.

the commons house of parliament, (above 100 in number) forcibly seized upon, violently kept out of, and driven from, the house, by the officers and soldiers of the Army under Thomas lord Fairfax, coming thither to discharge our duties, on the 6th and 7th of this instant Dec. do hereby, in our own names, and in the names of the respective counties, cities, and boroughs for which we serve, and of all the commons of England, solemnly protest and declare to the whole kingdom, 'That this execrable force and open violence upon our persons and the whole house of commons, by the Officers and Army under their command, marching up against their command, and placing strong armed guards of horse and foot upon them, without and against their Order, is the highest and most detestable force and breach of privilege and freedom ever offered to any parliament of England; and that all Acts, Ordinances, Votes, and Proceedings of the said house, made since the 6th of Dec. aforesaid, or hereafter to be made, during our restraint and forcible seclusion from the house, and the continuance of the Army's force upon it, are no way obligatory, but void and null to all intents and purposes: and that all contrivers of, actors in, and assistants to, this unparalleled force and reasonable armed violence, are open enemies to and professed subverters of, the privileges, rights, and freedom of parliament, and disturbers of the Peace and Settlement of the kingdom, and ought to be proceeded against as such: and that all members of parliament and commons of England, by their Solemn Covenant and duty, under pain of deepest perjury and eternal infamy, are obliged unanimously to oppose and endeavour, to their utmost power, to bring them to exemplary and condign punishment for this transcendent offence, tending to the dissolution of the present, and subversion of all future parliaments, and of the fundamental government and laws of this realm. All which we hold it our duties to declare and publish to the world; for fear our stupid silence should give any tacit consent or approbation to this most detestable crime, and make us guilty of betraying the privileges, freedom, and honour of this parliament, to our perpetual Reproach, and the prejudice of all succeeding parliaments. Dated at Westminster, Dec. 11, 1648.'

Both Houses declare the foregoing Protestation false, scandalous, and seditious.] Hereupon, a Committee was appointed to meet that afternoon, and enquire who printed, contrived, or published that scandalous Paper. Whether any discovery was made hereby does not appear: but the commons, having the same day, read and passed a Declaration against the aforesaid Protestation, and sent it up to the lords, the latter immediately gave it their concurrence, nem. con. whereby they avowed all the violence and outrage the Army had committed against the freedom and liberties of parliament, and hastened their own dissolution; but their lordships unanimity is accounted for by some of the Journalists, who inform us, That there were only 4 peers then present. This extraordinary Declaration runs thus:

"The lords and commons assembled in parliament, taking into consideration a printed Paper, intituled, 'A Solemn Protestation of the Imprisoned and Secluded Members;' The said lords and commons do hereby judge and declare the said printed Paper to be false, scandalous, and seditious; tending to destroy the visible and fundamental government of this kingdom; and do therefore order and ordain the said printed Paper to be suppressed; and that all persons whatsoever that have had any hand in, or giving consent unto, the contriving, framing, printing, or publishing thereof, shall be adjudged, and hereby are adjudged, incapable to bear any office, or have any place of trust or authority in this kingdom, or to sit as members of either house of parliament: and do further order and ordain, That every member of either house respectively now absent, upon his first coming to sit in that house whereof he is a member, shall, for the manifestation of his innocence, disavow and disclaim his having had any hand in, or giving consent unto, the contriving, framing, printing, or publishing of the said Paper, or the matter therein contained."

Further Proceedings relating to the Imprisoned and Secluded Members.] Dec. 20. The committee appointed to go to the General reported, That they had acquainted him with the Order and Votes of the house about their imprisoned Members; to which he answered; "That they were matters of great consequence, and that he believed the house did not expect a present Answer thereto, but that he would prepare one and send it forthwith; and, in the mean time, he desired the house would not trouble themselves to send any more to him about it." On this Answer a debate arose, and it being put to the question, Whether the former Message should be renewed by the same committee to the General concerning their absent members? it passed in the affirmative, 32 against 19.—Notwithstanding this ungracious Answer from the Lord-General to the committee, his excellency, this day, thought proper to send for 16 of the Imprisoned Members to Whitehall. When they arrived there, Ireton came to them in an outer room, and finding Mr. Prynne amongst them, chid the marshal for bringing him without order, and commanded him to be taken away: but upon his refusing to go, Ireton said, 'He should be thrust out by the head and shoulders:' hereupon Mr. Prynne openly protesting, 'That the Army endeavoured utterly to subvert the fundamental laws of the land, and privileges of parliament; that they had no power over him nor any member of parliament; that their late force acted upon them and their proceedings, was illegal and traitorous; that all men were bound to bring them to condign punishment, as rebels and traitors to 'their God, their king, country, and parliament;' the marshal was ordered to carry him back to his former confinement; and Ireton went in again to advise with the General and the rest of the officers. After a while he returned to the Members, and told them, 'It was the General's pleasure they should all be released, provided they attempted nothing against the present proceedings of the parliament and the Army;' adding, 'This at your peril.' However, the gentlemen declaring they would give no Engagement, were dismissed without any; and left at liberty to sit in the house again, if they thought proper. The Names of the Members discharged this day, were lord Wenman, sir G. Gerrard, Mr. F. Gerrard, sir A. Irby, sir T. Soame, sir J. Merrick, sir S. Luke, sir M. Lyster, Mr. Boughton, Mr. Buller, Mr. Vaughan, sir W. Erle, Mr. Bulkley, Mr. Crew, sir R. Pye, and Mr. Knightley.

A Fast-Sermon preached before both Houses by Hugh Peters.] Dec. 22. A Day of Humiliation having been ordered by both houses, for removing the heavy Judgments of God now upon this kingdom, and for his direction and blessing upon the counsels of parliament, the famous Hugh Peters preached, on that occasion, at St. Margaret's, Westminster. There were present only 4 lords, viz. the earls of Pembroke, Nottingham, Denbigh, and Mulgrave, with the Prince Elector, and about 20 commoners.*

The Commons resolve to proceed Capitally against the King.] Dec. 23. There was a de-

* That they might effect their business with the greater formality, they held a Solemn Fast in St. Margaret's Church at Westminster; where that Pulpit Buffoon, Hugh Peters, acted a Sermon before them, taking his text out of the Psalms 'To bind their Kings in Chains &c. such honour have all his Saints.' He paralleled the state of the kingdom with the bringing the Children of Israel out of Egyptian Bondage. And the better to shew how they should be brought out of this bondage; having put his hands before his eyes, and laid his head on the cushion; from whence, after a while, raising it suddenly up, he told them, 'That he had a revelation how to do it,' which was 'by extirpating of Monarchy both here, and in all other places.' He compared the King to Barabbas, whom the foolish citizens would have to be released, and the Red-Coats he called 'Our Saviours,' whom they would have to be crucified. As to the 'Saints' in his text, he often called them 'Saint Judges;' and professed 'he had found upon a strict scrutiny, that there were in the Army 5000 Saints no less holy than those that now conversed in Heaven with God Almighty.' Then kneeling, weeping, and lifting up his hands, he begged them 'in the name of the people of England, to execute justice upon that great Barabbas at Windsor, and not let Benhadad escape in safety, &c.' Echard History of England, p. 652.

bate in the commons on that part of the Army's Proposals for bringing Delinquents to Justice; in which the design of taking off the King, that had been so long secretly in agitation, was now openly avowed. Mr. Whitlocke, writes; "That several members made no scruple to mention his majesty, by name, as the greatest Delinquent, and as such to be brought to Justice. Others insisted, That he was not capable of being brought to justice by his subjects, but by God alone; and that the parliament having subdued him and his party, there was no need of any thing further but to secure themselves from their enemies rising against them any more; and this might be done without bringing the king to any judicial trial: a thing not read of in any history. But the fiercer party prosecuted their design with all eagerness; and those of a contrary opinion either durst not oppose, knowing they should be presently secluded the house, if they did, or seeing that no opposition would be to any effect or purpose." He adds, "That several members endeavoured to throw this business wholly upon the Army; that if they would have the thing done, they should do it themselves, as most proper for such an irregular and unheard-of business to be done in an irregular way, and by such irregular men: but these were subtle enough to see and avoid that, and to make those whom they left sitting in parliament, to be their stales, and to do their most dirty work for them; many of whom they found, and persuaded to be, strangely forward to engage in it; insomuch that it was carried by Vote in the house of commons, to name a Committee of 38 persons to consider of drawing up a Charge; and, for that purpose, to receive all Informations, and Examinations of all witnesses, for the matters of fact against the King and all other Delinquents that might be thought fit to be brought to condign punishment."—Another Contemporary informs us, † "That when it was first moved in the house of commons to proceed capitally against the king, Cromwell stood up and said, "That if any man moved this upon design, he should think him the greatest Traitor in the world; but since providence and necessity had cast them upon it, he should pray God to bless their counsels though he was not provided on the sudden to give them advice."

The King brought to Windsor.] This day the King was brought to Windsor-Castle, escorted by a party of horse under the command of major-gen. Harrison, who was sent some days before to fetch him from Hurst-Castle.

The Commons declare it to be Treason in the King, to levy War against the Parliament.] January 2. The commons had been several days employed in fixing upon the manner of proceeding against the King; and this day, they sent up a Message to the lords with a Vote which had passed their house without division, declaring, "That by the fundamental laws of this kingdom, it is Treason in the king of England, for the time being, to levy war against the parliament and kingdom of England;" and also an Ordinance for erecting a High Court of Justice for the Trying and Judging Charles Stuart, king of England; to both which they desired their Lordships concurrence. To this extraordinary Message the lords made the usual return, That they would send an Answer by messengers of their own.—The commons being withdrawn, their lordships read the declaratory Vote twice; and, on the third reading, the question being put, Whether to defer the consideration of it to another time? it passed in the negative. Then the question being put, Whether to agree to this Vote? it was also resolved in the negative, nem. con.

Ordinance for the Trial of the King.] Next, the Ordinance for erecting a High Court of Justice for the Trial of the King was read:

"Whereas it is notorious that Charles Stuart, the now king of England, not content with the many encroachments which his predecessors had made upon the people in their rights and freedom, hath had a wicked design totally to subvert the antient and fundamental laws and liberties of this nation, and in their place to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; and that, besides all other evil ways and means to bring his design to pass, he hath prosecuted it with fire and sword, levied and maintained a civil war in the land, against the parliament and kingdom; whereby this country hath been miserably wasted, the public treasure exhausted, trade decayed, thousands of people murdered, and infinite other mischiefs committed; for all which high and treasonable offences the said Charles Stuart might long since have justly been brought to exemplary and condign punishment: whereas also the parliament, well hoping that the restraint and imprisonment of his person, after it had pleased God to deliver him into their hands, would have quieted the distempers of the kingdom, did forbear to proceed judicially against him; but found, by sad experience, that such their remissness served only to encourage him and his accomplices in the continuance of their evil practices and in raising new commotions, rebellions, and invasions: for prevention therefore of the like or greater inconveniences, and to the end no other chief officer or magistrate whatsoever may hereafter presume, traiterously and maliciously, to imagine or contrive the enslaving or destroying of the English nation, and to expect impunity for so doing; be it enacted and ordained by the [Lords] and commons in Parliament assembled, and it is hereby enacted and ordained by the authority thereof, That the earls of Kent, Nottingham, Pembroke, Denbigh, and Mulgrave; the lord Grey of Warke; lord chief justice Rolle of the king's bench, lord chief justice St. John of the common Pleas, and lord chief baron Wylde; the lord Fairfax, lieut. general Cromwell, &c." all about 150,*) shall be, and are hereby appointed and required to be, Commissioners and Judges, for the Hearing, Trying, and Judging of the said Charles Stuart; and the said Commissioners, or any 20 or more of them, shall be, and are hereby authorized and constituted an High Court of Justice, to meet and sit at such convenient times and place as by the said commissioners, or the major part, or 20 or more of them, under their hands and seals, shall be appointed and notified by public Proclamation in the Great Hall, or Palace Yard of Westminster; and to adjourn from time to time, and from place to place, as the said High Court, or the major part thereof, at meeting, shall hold fit; and to take order for the charging of him, the said Charles Stuart, with the Crimes and Treasons above-mentioned, and for receiving his personal Answer thereunto, and for examination of witnesses upon oath, (which the court hath hereby authority to administer) or otherwise, and taking any other Evidence concerning the same; and thereupon, or in default of such Answer, to proceed to final Sentence according to justice and the merit of the cause; and such final Sentence to execute, or cause to be executed, speedily and impartially.—And the said court is hereby authorized and required to chuse and appoint all such officers, attendants, and other circumstances as they, or the major part of them, shall in any sort judge necessary or useful for the orderly and good managing of the premises; and Thomas lord Fairfax the General, and all officers and soldiers, under his command, and all officers of justice, and other well-affected persons, are hereby authorized and required to be aiding and assisting unto the said court in the due execution of the trust hereby committed unto them; provided that this act, and the authority hereby granted, do continue in force for the space of one month from the date of the making hereof, and no longer."

Debate thereupon in the House of Lords.] Upon this occasion a great debate ensued upon the question, "Whether it be Treason, by the fundamental laws, for the king of England to levy war against the parliament of England?" The earl of Manchester shewed, 'That, by the fundamental laws of England, the parliament consists of 3 estates, of which the king is the first: That he, only, hath power to call and dissolve them, and to confirm all their acts, and that without him there can be no parliament; and therefore it was absurd to say,

* Many of these Commissioners refused to act at all; some attended only once or twice at committees; others sat in Judgment upon the king, but did not sign the Warrant for his Execution; and the rest went through every circumstance from first to last. All these Distinctions, so far as they concerned such of them as were members of the house of commons, are prefixed to their respective Names in the List of this parliament already given in vol. ii, p. 597.

'The King can be a Traitor against the parliament.' His lordship was seconded by the earl of Northumberland, who said, 'That the greatest part, even 20 to 1, of the people of England, were not yet satisfied whether the king did levy war against the houses first, or the houses first against him. And besides, if the king did levy war first, they had no law extant, or that could be produced, to make it Treason in him so to do; and for us, said he, my lords, to declare it Treason by an Ordinance, when the matter of fact is not yet proved, nor any law in being to judge it by, seems to me very unreasonable.' The earl of Pembroke swore 'He loved not to meddle with businesses of life and death; and, for his part, he would neither speak against the Ordinance, nor consent to it.' And the earl of Denbigh declared, 'That whereas the commons were pleased to put his name into the Ordinance, as one of the commissioners for trying his majesty, he would chuse to be torn in pieces, rather than have any share in so infamous a business.' At length the Question being put, Whether the said Ordinance, now read, should be cast out? it was resolved in the affirmative, nem con: and then the lords adjourned for a week.—The Names of those few noble peers who had the courage, at this dangerous time, to make the aforesaid Resolutions, were, Denbigh, Speaker, Northumberland, Mulgrave, Pembroke, Rutland, Kent, Manchester, North, Hunsdon, Maynard, Dacres, Berkeley.

Jan. 3. The first thing the commons did this day, was to appoint two of their members, to go to Mr. Brown, clerk to the lords house, to inspect their Journals, and see how the business stood there upon the Ordinance and Vote relating to the King. These being returned, reported, first, the Names of all the lords who sat in the house that day; and then the other particulars, exactly as before given. Sir James Harrington, sir Henry Mildmay, sir Peter Wentworth, Mr. Scott, and some others, so much resented the lords rejecting the Ordinance for Trial of the King, that they insisted upon impeaching such of them as were present upon that Occasion, of High Treason, as favourers of the Grand Delinquent of England, and enemies to public justice and the liberty of the people: but this was over-ruled. However, the commons resolved, "That the several members of their house and others, appointed by the Orders and Ordinances of parliament to act in any Ordinance wherein the lords are joined, be impowered and enjoined to sit, act, and execute the said several committees of themselves, notwithstanding the lords will not join with them." After this, a Committee was appointed to draw up another Ordinance for erecting a High Court of Justice for the Trial of the King; in which the names of the six peers and the three judges were left out.

The Commons lay aside a Letter from the Queen, on behalf of the King.] The same day a Letter from the Queen was presented to the Speaker of the house of commons, by the French ambassador. Lord Clarendon informs us, "That it contained a very passionate lamentation of the sad condition the king her husband was in; desiring that they would grant her a pass to come over to him, and offering to use all the credit she had with him, that he might give them satisfaction: that however, if they would not give her leave to perform any of those offices towards the public, that she might be permitted to perform the duty she owed him, and to be near him in his uttermost extremity." But this Letter was laid aside without a reading.

The Commons vote themselves to be the Supreme Power of the Nation, &c.] Jan. 4. The commons being again met, the door of their house was ordered to be shut, and no member suffered to go out of it. Then a debate began, which ended in the following Resolutions; Resolved &c. "That the commons of England, in parliament assembled, do declare, That the People are, under God, the original of all just power. And do also declare, That the commons of England, in parliament assembled, being chosen by, and representing the people, have the Supreme Power in this Nation. And do also declare, That whatsoever is enacted, or declared for law, by the commons in parliament assembled, hath the force of a law; and all the people of this nation are concluded thereby, although the consent and concurrence of king, or house of peers, be not had thereunto."

Jan. 5. Mr. Prynne having at this time published a Pamphlet, intitled, 'A Brief Memento unto the present unparliamentary juncto, touching their present intentions and proceedings to depose and execute Charles Stuart, their lawful King,' two Members were ordered to go to Mr. Prynne, shew him the book, and ask him whether he will own and avow the said book; who being returned, reported that they had been with Mr. Prynne, and that he said, 'He would give no answer until he was commanded by a lawful authority.' Ordered, "That this Answer be taken into consideration this day se'nnight. In the mean time that the general be desired to command his marshal to put the Ordinance of September 30, 1647, concerning scandalous pamphlets, in execution."

Mr. Henry Elsyng, clerk of the house of commons, having desired leave to resign that office, on account of his ill state of health*, Mr. Henry Scobell was appointed in his room. It was also ordered that a Book of Vellum should be forthwith prepared, for entering all the public Acts of that house.

The Commons pass an Act for the Trial of the King.] Jan. 6. The commons being informed that the king's present condition was such as to admit an easy possibility of an Escape, ordered, "That the General be acquainted therewith, and that he be required to take speedy and special care for close securing the King's Person, and preventing any recourse to him, unless by order from the house." Also, "That the Commissioners nominated in the Act for erecting an High Court of Justice for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, king of England, do meet on the 8th inst. at 2 in the afternoon, in the Painted Chamber." The commons then read a 3d time, and passed, their Act for erecting an High Court of Justice for Trying the King.

These violent Proceedings gave so much disgust to the Committee of Estates of the Parliament of Scotland, then resident in London, that they sent a Letter, addressed to the Speaker, protesting against them. All the notice the commons took of this Remonstrance, was to order it to be read the next Monday, Jan. 8.

Jan. 9. The lords met again, and passed some Ordinances for securing the better Payment of the Army, which had been sent up by the commons; and then appointed the lords following to prepare and bring in an Ordinance to this effect, "That whatsoever king of England shall, hereafter, levy war against the parliament and kingdom of England, shall be guilty of High Treason, to be tried in parliament." The earls of Denbigh, Kent, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Mulgrave; the lords Hunsdon and Maynard, with the two lord chief justices and the chief baron as assistants. But this Ordinance was never brought in, the house of lords, as well as their king, seeming now in a dying condition; not above 5 or 6 of them being put down as attending the house every day, and little or no business of consequence done at it. Adjourned to the 18th.

The Commons order a new Great Seal to be made.] The same day the commons agreed on having a new Great Seal, on which was to be engraven, on one side, a map of England, Ireland, and the Islands of Jersey and Guernsey; with the Arms of England and Ireland, by which they are differenced from other kingdoms. The Inscription on the map side, 'The Great Seal of England, 1648:' on the reverse, a sculpture of the house of commons sitting: the motto, 'In the first Year of Freedom, by God's Blessing, restored, 1648.' Mr. Whitlocke informs us, That the device, and more particularly the Inscriptions on the Seal, were the fancy of Mr. Henry Marten. The sum of 60*l.* was ordered to be charged on the revenue towards the expence of this Seal, which was afterwards increased to 200*l.*

Jan. 10. The commons took Mr. Prynne's Answer, concerning his Memento, into consideration; and resolved, That thereby he had disowned the authority of the parliament; and ordered, That he be forthwith sent for in safe custody by the serjeant at arms attending the house. The serjeant returning, said, 'That he went to Mr. Prynne, and shewed him his warrant,' who gave him this Answer. 'That upon the 6th of Dec. last, as he was coming to do his duty in the house of commons, he was taken by col. Pride and sir Hardress Waller, and by them imprisoned, he knew not for what cause: that he yet remains under restraint, and is not yet discharged from that imprisonment, and therefore he would not come upon that warrant.'

Jan. 15. The commons continued to sit every day, except Sundays, though nothing material was done till this day, when a Declaration, ordered to be drawn on the 13th of last month, shewing the reasons for annulling and vacating the former Votes for taking off those of Non-Address to the king; and also for justifying the late and present proceedings of the house of commons, was read by parts, and, upon the question, agreed to.

Jan. 18. The lords being met, pursuant to adjournment, an Order was made by them, and sent down to the commons, "That, on account of the Great Business now in agitation, about settling the affairs of the kingdom, it would be convenient to adjourn the next Term for some small time." To this Message the commons returned the usual Answer, "That the house would send an Answer by messengers of their own."—However this might be taken by their lordships, they could not but be sensible that the time of their dissolution drew nigh; since the commons had not only voted themselves the Supreme Power of the kingdom, but had also passed some Acts by their own sole authority, besides that for the Trial of the King, and had voted and published them as Law. And on this very day, soon after the former Message was sent to the lords, a question being proposed in the commons, That the lords concurrence be desired to the three Votes of the 4th instant, it passed in the negative by 25 against 18. Nor did they ever send any Message to the lords about the Adjournment of the Term; but, the next day, made and published an Act of their own to that purpose.

The King brought before the High Court of Justice, in Westminster Hall.] Jan. 19. The High Court of Justice had met several times before this, after the rising of the house, to open their Commission, choose a President, and regulate some further preliminaries to the King's Trial; in order to which he was this day removed, under a strong guard, from Windsor to St. James's; and, on the next day, brought to Westminster Hall, before the High Court of Justice, where 67 of the Commissioners appeared upon the Bench. What passed before this unprecedented kind of tribunal, it is not in our province to relate, there being little or no mention made of their proceedings in the Journals of either house. And since the Trial itself has been so often printed, there is less occasion for us to proceed with the melancholy subject; observing only, from the Journals of the commons, that they had prejudged the King's Death, by appointing a committee, on the 17th of this month, to go and take an exact Inventory of his Goods, &c. in all his Palaces: A thing not practised before the conviction of the vilest malefactor.*

* The following short account of the Trial and Execution of this unfortunate monarch, may not be unacceptable to the reader. "All the circumstances of the trial were now adjusted; and the high court of justice fully constituted. It consisted of 133 persons, as named by the commons; but there scarcely ever sat above 70: so difficult was it, notwithstanding the blindness of prejudice and the allurements of interest, to engage men of any name or character in that criminal measure. Cromwell, Ireton, Harrison, and the chief officers of the army, most of them of mean birth, were members, together with some of the lower house; and some citizens of London. The twelve judges were at first appointed in the number: but as they had affirmed, that it was contrary to all the ideas of English law to try the king for treason, by whose authority all accusations for treason must necessarily be conducted; their names, as well as those of some peers, were afterwards struck out. Bradshaw, a lawyer, was chosen president, Coke was appointed solicitor for the people of England. Dorislaus, Steele, and Aske, were named assistants. The court sat in Westminster-hall.—It is remarkable, that, in calling over the court, when the crier pronounced the name of Fairfax, which had been inserted in the number, a voice came from one of the spectators, and cried, 'He has more wit than to be here.' When the charge was read against the king, 'in the name of the people of England,' the same voice exclaimed, 'Not a tenth part of them.' Axtel the officer, who guarded the court, giving orders to fire into the box whence these insolent speeches came; it was discovered, that lady Fairfax was there, and that it was she who had had the courage to utter them. She was a person of noble extraction, daughter of Horace, lord Vere of Tilbury; but being seduced by the violence of the times, she had long seconded her husband's zeal against the royal cause, and was now, as well as he, struck with abhorrence at the fatal and unexpected consequence of all his boasted victories.—The pomp, the dignity, the ceremony of this transaction corresponded to the greatest conception that is suggested in the annals of human kind; the delegates of a great people sitting in judgment upon their supreme magistrate, and trying him for his misgovernment and breach of trust. The solicitor, in the name of the commons, represented, that Charles Stuart, being admitted king of England, and entrusted with a limited power; yet nevertheless, from a wicked design to erect an unlimited and tyrannical government, had traiterously and maliciously levied war against the present parliament, and the people whom they represented, and was therefore impeached as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth. After

Jan. 20. The commons, at the King's desire, gave leave to Dr. Juxon, the then deprived bishop of London, to attend him as long as the king should require him; but not to permit him to go to and fro, but constantly to abide with him. The Prince Elector had permission from them also, at his request, to visit the King in the presence of his guards.

A Petition from the Army, presented to the

the charge was finished, the president directed his discourse to the king, and told him, that the court expected his answer. The king, though long detained a prisoner, and now produced as a criminal, sustained, by his magnanimous courage, the majesty of a monarch. With great temper and dignity, he declined the authority of the court, and refused to submit himself to their jurisdiction. He represented, "That having been engaged in treaty with his two houses of parliament, and having finished almost every article, he had expected to be brought to his capital in another manner, and ere this time, to have been restored to his power, dignity, revenue, as well as to his personal liberty: that he could not now perceive any appearance of the upper house, so essential a member of the constitution; and had learned, that even the commons, whose authority was pretended, were subdued by lawless force, and were bereaved of their liberty: that he himself was their Native Hereditary King; nor was the whole authority of the state, though free and united, entitled to try him, who derived his dignity from the Supreme Majesty of Heaven: that, admitting those extravagant principles which levelled all orders of men, the court could plead no power delegated by the people; unless the consent of every individual, down to the meanest and most ignorant peasant, had been previously asked and obtained: that he acknowledged without scruple, that he had a trust committed to him, and one most sacred and inviolable; he was entrusted with the liberties of his people, and would not now betray them, by recognising a power founded on the most atrocious violence and usurpation: that having taken arms, and frequently exposed his life in defence of public liberty, of the constitution, of the fundamental laws of the kingdom, he was willing, in this last and most solemn scene, to seal with his blood those precious rights for which, though in vain, he had so long contended: that those who arrogated a title to sit as his judges, were born his subjects, and born subjects to those laws, which determined, 'That the king can do no wrong:' that he was not reduced to the necessity of sheltering himself under this general maxim, which guards every English monarch, even the least deserving; but was able, by the most satisfactory reasons, to justify those measures in which he had been engaged: that, to the whole world, and even to them, his pretended judges, he was desirous, if called upon in another manner, to prove the integrity of his conduct, and assert the justice of those

Commons, inclosing 'AN AGREEMENT OF THE PEOPLE,' for a Settlement of the Nation upon a New Plan.] The same day the house being informed, That divers Officers of the Army were at the door, they were called in; and lieut. gen. Hammond acquainted them, that the Lord-General and his Council of Officers had commanded him, col. Okey, and the other gentlemen with him, to present to them their defensive arms, to which, unwillingly and unfortunately, he had had recourse: but that, in order to preserve a uniformity of conduct, he must at present forego the apology of his innocence; lest, by ratifying an authority, no better founded than that of robbers and pirates, he be justly branded as the betrayer, instead of being applauded as the martyr, of the constitution." The president, in order to support the majesty of the people, and maintain the superiority of his court above the prisoner, still inculcated, "That he must not decline the authority of his judges; that they over-ruled his objections; that they were delegated by the people, the only source of every lawful power; and that kings themselves acted but in trust from that community, which had invested this high court of justice with its jurisdiction, even according to those principles, which in his present situation he was perhaps obliged to adopt, his behaviour in general will appear not a little harsh and barbarous; but when we consider him as a subject, and one too of no high character, addressing himself to his unfortunate sovereign, his style will be esteemed, to the last degree, audacious and insolent. Three times was Charles produced before the court, and as often declined their jurisdiction. On the fourth the judges having examined some witnesses, by whom it was proved that the king had appeared in arms against the forces commissioned by the parliament; they pronounced sentence against him. He seemed very anxious, at this time, to be admitted to a conference with the two houses; and it was supposed, that he intended to resign the crown to his son: but the court refused compliance, (27th Jan.) and considered that request as nothing but a delay of justice. It is confessed, that the king's behaviour, during this last scene of his life, does honour to his memory; and that, in all appearances before his judges, he never forgot his part, either as a prince or as a man. Firm and intrepid, he maintained, in each reply, the utmost perspicuity and justness both of thought and expression: mild and equable, he rose into no passion at that unusual authority which was assumed over him. His soul, without effort or affectation, seemed only to remain in the situation familiar to it, and to look down with contempt on all the efforts of human malice and iniquity. The soldiers, instigated by their superiors, were brought, though with difficulty, to cry aloud for justice: 'Poor souls!' said the king to one of his attendants; 'for a little money they would do as much against their commanders.' Some humble Petition, with a Writing in parchment; which were as follows:

To the Hon. the COMMONS of England, in Parliament assembled; The Humble PETITION of his Excellency THOMAS Lord FAIRFAX, and the General Council of Officers of the Army under his Command. Whitehall, Jan. 15, 1648.

"In our late Remonstrance, of the 16th Nov. last, we propounded, next after the matters of public Justice, some Foundations for a general Settlement of Peace in the Nation, which we therein desired might be formed and established in the nature of a general contract or Agreement of the people: and since then, the matters so propounded being wholly rejected, or no consideration of them admitted in parliament, though visibly of highest moment to the public, and all ordinary remedies being denied, we were necessitated to an extraordinary way of remedy; whereby, to avoid the mischiefs then at hand, and set you in a condition, without such obstructions or diversions by corrupt members, to proceed to matters of public justice and general Settlement.—

of them were permitted to go the utmost length of brutal insolence; and to spit in his face as he was conducted along the passage to the court. To excite a sentiment of piety was the only effect which this inhuman insult was able to produce upon him. The people, though under the rod of lawless, unlimited power, could not forbear, with the most ardent prayers, pouring forth their wishes for his preservation; and, in his present distress, they avowed him, by their generous tears, for their monarch, whom, in their misguided fury, they had before so violently rejected. The king was softened at this moving scene, and expressed his gratitude for their dutiful affection. One soldier too, seized by contagious sympathy, demanded from heaven a blessing on oppressed and fallen majesty: his officer, overhearing the prayer, beat him to the ground in the king's presence. 'The punishment, methinks, exceeds the offence': this was the reflection which Charles formed on that occasion.—Three days were allowed the king between his sentence and his execution. This interval he passed with great tranquillity, chiefly in reading and devotion. All his family that remained in England were allowed access to him. It consisted only of the princess Elizabeth and the duke of Gloucester; for the duke of York had made his escape. Gloucester was little more than an infant: the princess, notwithstanding her tender years, shewed an advanced judgment; and the calamities of her family had made a deep impression upon her. After many pious consolations and advices, the king gave her in charge to tell the queen, that, during the whole course of his life, he had never once, even in thought, failed in his fidelity towards her; and that his conjugal tenderness and his life should have an equal duration. To the young duke too, he could not forbear

Now, as nothing did, in our own hearts, more justify our late undertakings towards many members in this parliament, than the necessity thereof in order to a sound Settlement in the kingdom, and the integrity of our intentions to make use of it only to that end; so we hold ourselves obliged to give the people all assurance possible, That our opposing the corrupt closure endeavoured with the king, was not in design to hinder Peace or Settlement, thereby to render our employments, as soldiers, necessary to be continued; and that neither that extraordinary course we have taken, nor any other proceedings of ours, have been intended for the setting up of any particular party or interest, by or with which to uphold ourselves in power and dominion over the nation; but that it was, and is, the desire of our hearts, in all we have done, with the hindering of that imminent evil and destructive conjunction with the king to make way for the Settlement of a Peace and Government of the kingdom upon grounds of common freedom and safety; and therefore, because our former overtures for that purpose (being only in general terms, and giving some advice, in order to season his mind with early principles of loyalty and obedience towards his brother, who was so soon to be his sovereign. Holding him on his knee, he said, 'Now they will cut off thy father's head.' At these words the child looked very stedfastly upon him. 'Mark, child! what I say: they will cut off my head! and perhaps make thee a king: but mark what I say, thou must not be a king, as long as thy brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off thy brothers' heads, when they can catch them! and thy head too they will cut off at last! therefore I charge thee, do not be made a king by them!' The duke, sighing, replied, 'I will be torn in pieces first!' So determined an answer, from one of such tender years, filled the king's eyes with tears of joy and admiration. Every night, during this interval, the king slept sound as usual; though the noise of workmen, employed in framing the scaffold, and other preparations for his execution, continually resounded in his ears. The morning of the fatal day (30th Jan.) he rose early; and calling Herbert, one of his attendants, he bade him employ more than usual care in dressing him, and preparing him for so great and joyful a solemnity. Bishop Juxon, a man endowed with the same mild and steady virtues by which the king himself was so much distinguished, assisted him in his devotions, and paid the last melancholy duties to his friend and sovereign. The street before Whitehall was the place destined for the execution: for it was intended, by choosing that very place, in sight of his own palace, to display more evidently the triumph of popular justice over royal majesty. When the king came upon the scaffold, he found it so surrounded with soldiers, that he could not expect to be heard by any of the people: he addressed, therefore, his dis-

not reduced to a certainty of particulars fit for practice) might possibly be understood but as plausible pretences, not intended really to be put into effect; we have thought it our duty to draw out these Generals into an intire frame of Particulars, ascertained with such circumstances as may make it effectively practicable; and, for that end, while your time hath been taken up in other matters of high and present importance, we have spent much of ours in preparing and perfecting such a Draught of Agreement, and in all things so circumstantiated, as to render it ripe for your speedier consideration, and the kingdom's acceptance and practice, if approved; and so we do herewith humbly present it to you.—Now, to prevent misunderstanding of our intentions therein, we have but this to say, That we are far from such a spirit, as positively to impose our private apprehensions upon the judgments of any in the kingdom, that have not forfeited their freedom, and much less upon yourselves: neither are we apt in anywise to insist upon circumstantial things, or ought that is not evidently fundamental to that public interest for which you and we have declared and engaged; but, in this tender of it, we humbly desire, 1. That, whether it shall be fully approved by you and received by the people, as it now stands or not, it may yet remain upon record, before you, a perpetual witness of our real intentions and utmost endeavours for a sound and equal Settlement; and as a testimony whereby all men may be assured what we are willing and ready to acquiesce in; and their jealousies satisfied or mouths stopt, who are apt to think or say, We have no bottom. 2. That, with all the expedition which the immediate and pressing great affairs will admit, it may receive your most mature consideration and resolutions upon it; not that we desire either the whole, or what you shall like in it, should be by your authority imposed as a law upon the kingdom, for so it would lose the intended nature of 'An Agreement of the People;' but that, so far as it concurs with your own judgments, it may receive your seal of approbation only. 3. That, according to the method propounded therein, it may be tendered to the people in all parts, to be subscribed by those course to the few persons who were about him; particularly colonel Tomlinson, to whose care he had lately been committed, and upon whom, as upon many others, his amiable deportment had wrought an entire conversion. He justified his own innocence in the late fatal wars, and observed, that he had not taken arms till after the parliament had inlisted forces; nor had he any other object in his warlike operations, than to preserve that authority entire, which his predecessors had transmitted to him. He threw not, however, the blame upon the parliament; but was more inclined to think that ill instruments had interposed, and raised in them fears and jealousies with regard to his intentions. Though innocent towards his people, he acknowledged the equity of his execution in the eyes of his Maker; and observed, that an unjust sentence, which he had suffered to take effect, was now punished by an unjust sentence upon himself. He forgave all his enemies, even the chief instruments of his death; but exhorted them and the whole nation to return to the ways of peace, by paying obedience to their lawful sovereign, his son and successor. When he was preparing himself for the block, bishop Juxon called to him: 'There is, sir, but one stage more, which, though turbulent and troublesome, is yet a very short one. Consider, it will soon carry you a great way; it will carry you from earth to heaven; and there you shall find, to your great joy, the prize to which you hasten, a crown of glory.' 'I go,' replied the king, 'from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown; where no disturbance can have place.' At one blow was his head severed from his body. A man in a vizor performed the office of executioner: another, in a like disguise, held up to the spectators the head streaming with blood, and cried aloud, 'This is the head of a traitor!'—A fresh instance of hypocrisy was displayed the very day of the king's death. The generous Fairfax, not content with being absent from the trial, had used all the interest which he yet retained, to prevent the execution of the fatal sentence; and had even employed persuasion with his own regiment, though none else would follow him, to rescue the king from his disloyal murderers. Cromwel and Ireton, informed of this intention, endeavoured to convince him, that the Lord had rejected the king; and they exhorted him to seek by prayer some direction from heaven on this important occasion: but they concealed from him that they had already signed the warrant for the execution. Harrison was the person appointed to join in prayer with the unwary general. By agreement, he prolonged his doleful cant, till intelligence arrived, that the fatal blow was struck. He then rose from his knees, and insisted with Fairfax, that this event was a miraculous and providential answer, which heaven had sent to their devout supplications.—It being remarked, that the king, the moment before he stretched out his neck to the executioner, had said to Juxon, with a very earnest accent, the single word Remember; great mysteries were supposed to be concealed under that expression; and the generals vehemently insisted with the prelate, that he should inform them of the king's meaning. Juxon told them, that the king, having frequently charged him to inculcate on his son the forgiveness of his murderers, had taken this opportunity, in the last moment of his life, when his commands, he supposed, would be regarded as sacred and inviolable, to reiterate that desire; and that his mild spirit thus terminated its present course, by an act of benevolence towards his greatest enemies." Hume that are willing, as petitions and other things of a voluntary nature are; and that, in the mean while, the ascertaining of those circumstances, which are referred to commissioners in the several counties, may be proceeded upon in a way preparatory to the practice of it: and if, upon the account of Subscriptions (to be returned by those Commissioners in April next) there appears a general or common reception of it amongst the people, or by the Well-affected of them, and such as are not obnoxious for Delinquency, it may then take place and effect, according to the tenor and substance of it. By the Appointment of his Excellency, and the General Council of Officers of the Army, Jo. RUSHWORTH, Secr."

Agreement of the People, for a Settlement of the Nation upon a new Plan.] The Writing in Parchment, presented to the house along with the foregoing Petition, was intituled

AN AGREEMENT of the People of England, and the Places therewith incorporated, for a secure and present Peace, upon Grounds of common Right, Freedom, and Safety.*

"Having, by our late labours and hazards, made it appear to the world at how high a rate we value our just freedom; and God having so far owned our cause as to deliver the enemies thereof into our hands, we do now hold ourselves bound, in mutual duty to each other, to take the best care we can, for the future, to avoid both the danger of returning into a slavish condition, and the chargeable remedy of another war: for as it cannot be imagined that so many of our countrymen would have opposed us in this quarrel, if they had understood their own good, so may we hopefully promise to ourselves, that when our common Rights and Liberties shall be cleared, their endeavours will be disappointed that seek to make themselves our masters; since therefore our former oppressions and not-yet-ended troubles, have been occasioned either by want of frequent national meetings in council, or by the undue or unequal constitution thereof, or by rendering those meetings ineffectual, we are fully agreed and resolved, God willing, to provide, That hereafter our Representatives be neither left to an uncertainty for times nor be unequally constituted, nor made useless to the ends for which they are intended. In order whereunto we declare and agree,

"First, That, to prevent the many inconveniences apparently arising from the long continuance of the same persons in Supreme Authority, this present parliament end and dissolve upon, or before, the last day of April, 1649.

* Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That the frame of this Agreement of the People was thought to be, for the most part, made by commissary general Ireton, a man full of invention and industry, who had a little knowledge of the law, which led him into the more errors." Memorials, p. 356.

"Secondly, That the People of England (being at this day very unequally distributed by counties, cities, and boroughs, for the election of their representatives) be indifferently proportioned; and, to this end, that the representative of the whole nation shall consist of 400 persons, or not above; and in each country, and the places thereto subjoined, there shall be chosen, to make up the said Representative at all times, the several numbers here mentioned, viz.

“Thirdly, That the people do, of course, choose themselves a representative once in 2 years, and shall meet for that purpose upon the first Thursday in every second May, by 11 in the morning; and the representatives so chosen to meet upon the second Thursday in the June following, at the usual place in Westminster, or such other place as, by the foregoing Representative, or the Council of State in the interval, shall be, from time to time, appointed and published to the people, at the least 20 days before the time of election: and to continue their sessions there, or elsewhere, until the second Thursday in December following, unless they shall adjourn, or dissolve themselves sooner; but not to continue longer. The election of the first representative to be on the first Thursday in May, 1649; and that, and all future elections, to be according to the Rules prescribed for the same purpose in this Agreement, viz. 1. That the electors in every division shall be natives or denizens of England; not persons receiving alms, but such as are assessed ordinarily towards the relief of the poor; not servants to, and receiving wages from, any particular person. And in all elections, except for the Universities, they shall be men of 21 years of age, or upwards, and housekeepers, dwelling within the division for which the election is: Provided, That (until the end of 7 years next ensuing the time herein limited for the end of this present parliament) no person shall be admitted to, or have any hand or voice in, such elections, who hath adhered unto or assisted the king against the parliament in any of the late wars or insurrections; or who shall make, or join in, or abet, any forcible opposition against this Agreement.—2. That such persons, and such only, may be elected to be of the Representative, who, by the rule aforesaid, are to have voice in elections in one place or other.—Provided, That of those none shall be eligible for the first or second Representative, who have not voluntarily assisted the parliament against the king, either in person before the 14th of June, 1645, or else in money, plate, horse, or arms, lent upon the Propositions, before the end of May, 1643; or who have joined in, or abetted, the treasonable Engagement in London, in 1647; or who declared or engaged themselves for a Cessation of Arms with the Scots that invaded this nation the last summer; or for compliance with the actors in any insurrections of the same summer; or with the Prince of Wales, or his accomplices, in the revolted Fleet. Provided also, That such persons as, by the Rules in the preceding Article, are not capable of electing until the end of 7 years, shall not be capable to be elected until the end of 14 years next ensuing. And we desire and recommend it to all men, that, in all times, the persons to be chosen for this great trust may be men of courage, fearing God and hating covetousness; and that our representatives would make the best provisions for that end.—

3. That whoever, by the Rules in the two preceding Articles, are incapable of electing, or to be elected, shall presume to vote in, or be present at, such election for the first or second Representative; or, being elected, shall presume to sit or vote in either of the said representatives, shall incur the pain of confiscation of the moiety of his estate, to the use of the public, in case he have any visible estate to the value of 50*l.* and if he has not such an estate, then shall incur the pain of imprisonment for 3 months. And if any person shall forcibly oppose, molest, or hinder the people, capable of electing as aforesaid, in their quiet and free election of representers, for the first Representative, then each person so offending shall incur the penalty of Confiscation of his whole estate, both real and personal; and, if he has not an estate to the value of 50*l.* shall suffer imprisonment during one whole year without bail or mainprize. Provided, That the offender in each such case be convicted within 3 months next after the committing of his offence, and the first Representative is to make further provision for the avoiding of these evils in future elections.—4. That to the end all officers of state may be certainly accountable, and no factions made to maintain corrupt interests, no member of a council of state, nor any officer of any salary-forces in army or garrison, nor any treasurer or receiver of public money, shall, while such, be elected to be of a representative: and in case any such election shall be, the same to be void. And in case any lawyer shall be chosen into any Representative, or council of State, then he shall be incapable of practice as a lawyer during that trust.—5. For the more convenient election of representatives, each county, wherein more than three representers are to be chosen, with the towns corporate and cities, if there be any, lying within the compass thereof, to which no representers are herein assigned, shall be divided by a due proportion into so many, and such parts, as each part may elect two, and no part above three representers. For the setting forth of which divisions, and the ascertaining of other circumstances hereafter expressed, so as to make the elections less subject to confusion or mistake, in order to the next Representative, Thomas lord Grey of Grooby, sir John Danvers, sir Henry Holcroft, knights; Moses Wall, gentleman; Samuel Moyer, John Langley, Wm. Hawkins, Abraham Babington, Daniel Taylor, Mark Hilsley, Rd. Price, and col. John White, citizens of London, or any 5 or more of them, are intrusted to nominate and appoint, under their hands and seals, three or more fit persons in each county, and in each city and borough, to which one representer or more is assigned, to be as commissioners, for the ends aforesaid, in the respective counties, cities, and boroughs; and, by like writing under their hands and seals, shall certify into the Parliament Records, before the 14th of Feb. next, the Names of the Com-

misioners so appointed for the respective counties, cities and boroughs; which commissioners, or any three or more of them, for the respective counties, cities, and boroughs, shall, before the end of Feb. next, by writing under their hands and seals, appoint two fit and faithful persons, or more, in each hundred, lath, or wapontake, within the respective counties, and in each ward within the city of London, to take care for the orderly taking of all voluntary Subscriptions to this Agreement, by fit persons to be employed for that purpose in every parish; who are to return the subscription, so taken, to the persons that employed them, keeping a transcript thereof to themselves; and those persons, keeping like transcripts, to return the original Subscriptions to the respective commissioners by whom they were appointed, at, or before, the 14th of April next, to be registered and kept in the County Records for the said counties respectively; and the Subscriptions in the city of London to be kept in the chief Court of Record for the said city. And the commissioners for the other cities and boroughs respectively, are to appoint two or more fit persons in every parish within their precincts, to take such Subscriptions; and, keeping transcripts thereof, to return the originals to the respective commissioners by the said 14th of April next, to be registered and kept in the chief court within the respective cities and boroughs. And the same commissioners, or any three or more of them, for the several counties, cities, and boroughs, respectively, shall, where more than 3 Representatives are to be chosen, divide such counties, as also the city of London, into so many, and such parts as are aforementioned; and shall set forth the bounds of such divisions; and shall, in every county, city, and borough, where any Representatives are to be chosen, and in every such division as aforesaid within the city of London, and within the several counties so divided, respectively, appoint one place certain wherein the people shall meet for the choice of the Representatives; and some one fit person, or more, inhabiting within each borough, city, county, or division, respectively, to be present at the time and place of election, in the nature of Sheriffs, to regulate the elections; and by pole, or otherwise, clearly to distinguish and judge thereof, and to make return of the person or persons elected, as is hereafter expressed; and shall likewise, in writing under their hands and seals, make certificates of the several divisions, with the bounds thereof, by them set forth, and of the certain places of meeting, and persons, in the nature of Sheriff, appointed in them respectively as aforesaid; and cause such certificates to be returned into the parliament Records before the end of April next; and before that time shall also cause the same to be published in every parish within the counties, cities, and boroughs respectively; and shall in every such parish likewise nominate and appoint, by warrant under their hands and seals, one trusty person, or more, inhabiting therein, to make a true List of all the persons within their respective parishes, who, according to the rules aforesaid, are to have voice in the elections; and, expressing who amongst them are, by the same rules, capable of being elected; and such list, with the said warrant, to bring in and return, at the time and place of election, unto the person appointed in the nature of Sheriff, as aforesaid, for that borough, city, county, or division respectively; which person so appointed as sheriff, being present at the time and place of election; or, in case of his absence, by the space of one hour after the time limited for the people's meeting, then any person present that is eligible, as aforesaid, whom the people then and there assembled shall chuse for that end, shall receive and keep the said Lists, and admit the persons therein contained, or so many of them as are present, unto a free vote in the said election; and, having first caused this Agreement to be publickly read in the audience of the people, shall proceed unto, and regulate and keep peace and order in the elections; and, by pole, or otherwise, openly distinguish and judge of the same; and thereof, by certificate or writing under the hands and seals of himself, and 6 or more of the electors, nominating the person or persons duly elected, shall make a true return into the parliament Records, within 21 days after the election, under pain for default thereof, or, for making any false return, to forfeit 100*l.* to the public use: and also cause Indentures to be made, and inchangeably sealed and delivered, betwixt himself, and six or more of the said electors, on the one part, and the persons, or each person, elected severally, on the other part, expressing their election of him as a Representative of them according to this Agreement, and his acceptance of that trust, and his promise accordingly to perform the same with faithfulness, to the best of his understanding and ability, for the glory of God, and good of the people.—This course is to hold for the first Representative, which is to provide for the ascertaining of these circumstances in order to future representatives.

“Fourthly, That 150 members at least be always present in each sitting of the Representative, at the passing of any law or doing of any act whereby the people are to be bound; saving, That the number of 60 may make a house for debates or Resolutions that are preparatory thereunto.

“Fifthly, That each Representative shall, within 20 days after their first meeting, appoint a Council of State for the managing of public affairs, until the 10th day after the meeting of the next representative, unless that next representative thinks fit to put an end to that trust sooner. And the same council to act and proceed therein, according to such instructions and limitations as the Representative shall give and not otherwise.

“Sixthly, That, in each interval betwixt biennial representatives, the Council of State, in case of imminent danger or extreme necessity, may summon a Representative to be forthwith chosen, and to meet; so as the session thereof continue not above 80 days; and so as it dissolve, at least, 50 days before the appointed time for the next biennial representative; and upon the 50th day so preceding it shall dissolve of course, if not otherwise dissolved sooner.

“Seventhly, That no member of any Representative be made either receiver, treasurer, or other officer, during that employment, saving to be a member of the council of state.

“Eighthly, That the representatives have, and shall be understood to have, the supreme trust in order to the preservation and government of the whole; and that their power extend, without the consent or concurrence of any other person or persons, to the erecting and abolishing of Courts of Justice and public Offices, and to the enacting, altering, repealing, and declaring of laws, and the highest and final judgment, concerning all natural or civil things, but not concerning things spiritual or evangelical.—Provided that, even in things natural and civil, these six Particulars next following are, and shall be, understood to be excepted and reserved from our Representatives, viz. 1. We do not impower them to impress or constrain any person to serve in foreign war, either by sea or land, nor for any military service within the kingdom; save that they may take order for the forming, training, and exercising of the people, in a military way, to be in readiness for resisting of foreign invasions, suppressing of sudden insurrections, or for assisting in execution of the laws; and may take order for the employing and conducting of them for those ends; provided, That, even in such cases, none be compellable to go out of the county he lives in, if he procure another to serve in his room. 2. That, after the time herein limited for the commencement of the First Representative, none of the people may be at any time questioned for any thing said or done in relation to the late wars or public differences, otherwise than in execution or pursuance of the determinations of the present house of commons, against such as have adhered to the king, or his interest, against the people; and saving, that accountants for public monies received, shall remain accountable for the same. 3. That no securities given, or to be given, by the public faith of the nation, nor any Engagements of the public faith for satisfaction of debts and damages, shall be made void or invalid by the next, or any future representatives; except to such creditors as have, or shall have, justly forfeited the same: and saving, That the next Representative may confirm or make null, in part or in whole, all gifts of lands, monies, offices, or otherwise, made by the present parliament to any member or attendant of either house. 4. That, in any laws hereafter to be made, no person, by virtue of any tenure, grant, charter, patent, degree, or birth, shall be privileged from subjection thereto, or from being bound thereby, as well as others. 5. That the Representative may not give judgment upon any man's person or estate, where no law hath before provided; save only in calling to account and punishing public officers for abusing or failing in their trust. 6. That no Representative may in any wise render up, or give, or take away, any of the foundations of common right, liberty, and safety contained in this Agreement, nor level men's estates, destroy property, or make all things common; and that, in all matters of such fundamental concernment, there shall be a liberty to particular members of the said Representatives to enter their Dissents from the major Vote.

“Ninthly, Concerning Religion, we agree as followeth. 1. It is intended that the Christian Religion be held forth and recommended, as the public profession in this nation, which we desire may, by the grace of God, be reformed to the greatest purity in doctrine, worship, and discipline, according to the Word of God; the instructing of the people thereunto in a public way, so it be not compulsive; as also the maintaining of able Teachers for that end, and for the confutation or discovery of heresy, error, and whatsoever is contrary to sound doctrine, is allowed to be provided for by our Representatives; the maintenance of which Teachers may be out of a public treasury, and, we desire, not by tithes. Provided, That Popery or Prelacy be not held forth as the public way or profession in this nation. 2. That, to the public profession so held forth, none be compelled by penalties or otherwise; but only may be endeavoured to be won by sound doctrine, and the example of a good conversation. 3. That such as profess faith in God by Jesus Christ, however differing in judgment from the doctrine, worship, or discipline publicly held forth, as aforesaid, shall not be restrained from, but shall be protected in, the profession of their faith and exercise of religion, according to their consciences, in any place except such as shall be set apart for the public worship; where we provide not for them, unless they have leave, so as they abuse not this liberty to the civil injury of others, or to actual disturbance of the public peace on their parts. Nevertheless, it is not intended to be hereby provided, That this liberty shall necessarily extend to Popery or Prelacy. 4. That all laws, ordinances, statutes, and clauses in any law, statute, or ordinance to the contrary of the liberty herein provided for, in the two particulars next preceding concerning Religion, be, and are hereby, repealed and made void.

“Tenthly, It is agreed, That whosoever shall, by force of arms, resist the orders of the next or any future Representative (except in case where such Representative shall evidently render up or give, or take away the foundations of common right, liberty, and safety contained in this Agreement) he shall forthwith, after his or their such resistance, lose the benefit and protection of the laws, and shall be punishable with death, as an enemy and traitor to the nation.—Of the things expressed in this Agreement: The certain ending of this parliament, as in the first Article; the equal or proportionable distribution of the number of the Representatives to be elected, as in the second; the certainty of the people's meeting to elect for Representatives biennial, and their Freedom in Elections; with the certainty of meeting, sitting, and ending of representatives so elected, which are provided for in the third Article; as also the Qualifications of persons to elect or be elected, as in the first and second Particulars under the third Article; also the certainty of a number for passing a law or preparatory debates, provided for in the fourth Article; the matter of the fifth Article, concerning the Council of State, and of the sixth, concerning the calling, sitting, and ending of Representatives extraordinary; also the power of representatives to be, as in the eighth Article, and limited, as in the six Reserves next following the same: likewise the second and third Particulars under the ninth Article concerning Religion, and the whole matter of the tenth Article: All these we do account and declare to be fundamental to our Common Right, Liberty, and Safety; and therefore do both agree thereunto, and resolve to maintain the same, as God shall enable us. The rest of the matters in this Agreement, we account to be useful and good for the public; and the particular circumstances of numbers, times, and places expressed in the several Articles, we account not fundamental; but we find them necessary to be here determined, for the making the Agreement certain and practicable; and do hold these most convenient that are here set down; and therefore do positively agree thereunto. By the appointment of his Excellency the Lord-General and his General Council of Officers. JOHN RUSHWORTH, Sec."

The Commons return Thanks to the Army for the foregoing Agreement.] The Petitioners being withdrawn, the commons ordered the Petition, but not the Agreement, to be read; the reason of which, as Mr. Whitlocke informs us, was on account of the great length of it; and the house then rising at 12 at noon, because the Commissioners for the King's Trial were to sit in the afternoon: notwithstanding which the commons ordered their Speaker to return their Thanks to the Petitioners; which he did accordingly.

Protestation of the Scots Commissioners against taking away the King's Life.] Jan. 22. The Commissioners from the Estates of the Parliament of Scotland, residing in London, having received no Answer to their Letter sent the 6th, to the Speaker of the house of commons, on occasion of the Act for erecting a High Court of Justice for the Trial of the King; they this day sent a second Letter in which was enclosed the following Protestation:

"By our Letter of the 6th instant, we represented unto you what endeavours have been used for taking away his majesty's life; for change of the fundamental government of this kingdom; and introducing a sinful and ungodly toleration in matters of Religion: and therein we did express our sad thoughts and great fears of the dangerous consequences that might follow thereupon; and, further, we did earnestly press, that there might be no proceeding against his majesty's person; which would certainly continue the great distractions of these kingdoms, and involve us in many evils, troubles, and confusions; but that, by the free councils of both houses of the parliament of England, with the advice and consent of the parliament of Scotland, such course might be taken in relation to him, as might be for the good and happiness of these kingdoms, both having an unquestionable and undeniable interest in his person as king of both; which, duly considered, we had reason to hope should have given a stop to all proceedings against his majesty's person.—But we understand that, after many of the members of the house of commons have been imprisoned and secluded; and also without and against the consent of the house of peers, power is given, by a single act of yours alone, to certain persons of your own number, of the Army, and others, to proceed against his majesty's person; in order whereunto he was brought, upon Saturday last in the afternoon, before this new extraordinary court: Therefore we do, in the name of the parliament of Scotland, for their vindication from false aspersions and calumnies, declare, That though they are not satisfied with his majesty's Concessions in the late Treaty at Newport, especially in the matters of Religion; and are resolved not to crave his majesty's restitution to his government, before Satisfaction be given by him to his kingdoms; yet they do all unanimously, with one voice (not one member excepted) disclaim the least knowledge of, or accession to, the late proceedings of the Army here against his majesty; and sincerely profess, that it will be a great grief unto their hearts, and lie heavy upon their spirits, if they shall see their trusting of his majesty's person to the honourable houses of the parliament of England, to be made use of to his ruin; so far contrary to the declared intentions of the kingdom of Scotland, and the solemn professions of the kingdom of England.—And to the end it may be manifest to the world, how much they abominate and detest so horrid a design against his majesty's person, we do, in the name of the parliament and kingdom of Scotland, hereby declare their Dissent from the said proceedings, and the taking away his majesty's Life; and protest, That as they are altogether free from the same, so they may be free from all the evils, miseries, confusions and calamities, that may follow thereupon to these distracted kingdoms. LOTHIAN. JO. CHIESLEY. WILL. GLENDINNING. Jan. 22."

The foregoing Paper &c. being read, the house ordered, That they should all be referred to a committee, who were to prepare an Answer thereto, and to consider of fit persons to be sent to the parliament of Scotland. These Papers were also presented to the Lord-General.

The High Court of Justice now sitting, in die ad diem, nothing passed in the house of commons worthy of notice; most of the days the house met, and did only adjourn to the next.

The Commons pass an Act for changing the Style of all public Proceedings.] Jan 27. This day an Act was passed for settling the Proceedings in the Courts of Justice; and that, in all writs, patents, commissions, indictments, process and proceedings in the several Courts of Justice, instead of the King's Name, used heretofore, the style should be changed into Autoritate Parliamenti Angliæ; and, instead of the Peace of the King, it should be the Public Peace. Also another Act, prohibiting Sheriffs, or any other officer or person soever, from presuming to proclaim any person as King, without the free consent of the people in parliament, signified by an act or ordinance for that purpose.

Ordered, "That the Clerk of the High Court of Justice be required forthwith to bring into this house the Record of the Judgment this day given against the King." Adjourned to Monday.

The Dutch Ambassadors make Application to both Houses, for sparing the King's Life.] Jan. 29. A Letter from the lord Joachimi and the lord Paw, Ambassadors of the States General of the United Provinces, directed to the Speaker, was read, with a Letter of Credence from the same. After which it was resolved that these Ambassadors should have audience in the house at 3 that afternoon; when, being admitted with much ceremony, the lord Paw* read out of a Paper, in French, the Desires of their masters, and then withdrew.—The same day, their Excellencies wrote a Letter to the earl of Denbigh, Speaker of the house of lords, desiring an immediate audience concerning a business very important to the good of the kingdom of England and the States General. Hereupon their lordships, in regard of the Ambassadors great importunity, (as it is termed in the Journals) ordered sir Oliver Fleming, Master of the Ceremonies, to introduce them: This being done accordingly, they delivered their Letters of Credence, and having spoke what they had in commission, were desired to withdraw into the lord-keeper's lodgings. After some debate they were re-admitted, and received the following evasive Answer from the Speaker, "That the lords in parliament had commanded him, in their names, to congratulate their Excellencies safe coming into England; and that their lordships do put a great esteem upon the ministers and ambassadors which come from that state, especially upon their Excellencies persons; and to assure them, that what they have or shall represent from that state, shall be respectfully received; and desired they would deliver what they now said, by word of mouth, in writing; that so their lordships may the better consider of it." And then they were conducted back by the master of the ceremonies. What these ambassadors were instructed to offer, is not entered in the Journals of either house: but it appears, by those of the commons, that their errand was to intercede with the parliament to spare the King's Life: for we are there told that, on the next day, a Report being made of what the Dutch Ambassadors had delivered, a committee was appointed to draw up Reasons, as the sense of the house, to be given to them, why the commons did not think fit to stay the Proceedings of the High Court of Justice.

THE BLOODY WARRANT.] The following is a copy of the Warrant given this day, for the Execution of the King:

And for so doing this shall be your sufficient Warrant. And these are to require all Officers and Soldiers, and other the good people of this Nation of England, to be assisting unto you in this Service. Given under our Hands and Seals.

His Majesty beheaded.] January 30. In the afternoon of this day, the fatal Blow being struck, the commons met again; when the first thing they went upon was to read a third time and pass, an Act for prohibiting the proclaiming of any Person to be King of England, Ireland, or the dominions thereof; which was ordered to be forthwith printed and published, and also to be immediately proclaimed, with Sound of Trumpet, in Cheapside, the Old Exchange, and Westminster; the lord-general Fairfax, or any other general officer of the Army, to take care to have the same done accordingly.

The Commons pass an Act against proclaiming any Person as King.] The house also ordered the common post to be stopped till Letters were prepared to be sent to the several Sheriffs in England and Wales, to publish and proclaim, in their different Counties and Districts, the said Act, which was in hæc verba:

“Whereas Charles Stuart, king of England, being, for the notorious treasons, tyrannies, and murders committed by him in the late unnatural and cruel wars, condemned to death; whereupon, after execution of the same, several pretences may be made, and title set on foot, unto the Kingly Office, to the apparent hazard of the public peace; for prevention thereof, be it enacted and ordained by this present parliament, and by the authority of the same, That no persons whatsoever do presume to proclaim, declare, publish, or any way promote Charles Stuart, (son of the said Charles) commonly called the Prince of Wales, or any other person, to be king or chief magistrate of England, or Ireland, or any the dominions belonging to them, or either of them, by colour of inheritance, succession, election, or any other claim whatsoever, without the free consent of the people in parliament first had, and signified by a particular act or ordinance for that purpose; any statute, law, usage, or custom, to the contrary hereof in anywise notwithstanding.—And it is hereby further enacted and ordained, That whosoever shall, contrary to this act, proclaim, declare, publish, or any way promote, the said Charles Stuart the son, or any other person, to be King, or Chief Magistrate, of England or Ireland, or any the dominions belonging to them, or either of them, without the said consent in parliament signified as aforesaid, he shall be deemed and adjudged a Traitor to the Commonwealth, and shall suffer pains of death, and such other punishments as belong to the crime of high treason. And all officers, as well civil as military, and all other well-affected persons, are hereby authorized and required forthwith to apprehend all such offenders, and to bring them in safe custody to the next justice of the peace, that they may be proceeded against accordingly.”

The same day, the commons ordered their 3 Votes, passed on the 4th, declaring their own Supremacy, to be printed and published.

From the 18th to the 30th, the house of lords met, from day to day, but did nothing material, seldom more than 5 or 6 of them being present: and, as they had hitherto continued to act in their judicial capacity, they read a Petition or two on private affairs; and then ordered, That all the lords in town should be summoned, as well as all the judges, to attend their house on Thursday, Feb. 1, to which time they adjourned.

The Commons appoint a Committee concerning the late King's Body, Seals, Papers, &c.] Jan. 31. Commissary-general Ireton reported to the commons a Paper of divers Particulars touching the late King's Body, his George and Garter, his Diamond and two Seals. After debate, the question being separately put, Whether to send these things to Charles Stuart, (son to the late king) commonly called Prince of Wales? it was carried in the negative as to all of them. Then a committee was appointed, consisting of col. Harrison, sir John Danvers, sir Michael Livesey, Mr. Scot, lord Grey, Mr. Holland, Mr. Allen, Mr. Edwards, Mr. Oldsworth, Mr. Trenchard, Mr. Pine, Mr. Love, col. Fleetwood, or any 3 of them, to consider of the foregoing particulars concerning the King's Body; also to peruse the Papers of the late King, and to make report to the house what was fit to be done therein.—Ordered, also, That the lord Grey should have 100*l.* paid to him out of Haberdashers-Hall, to be disposed of for the service of the Commonwealth, as he shall think fit. This secret way of disposing of the public money, never observed in the Journals before, makes it seem very probable it was given as a gratuity to the Executioner that performed the bloody office on the king.

The Lords propose a Joint Committee, to consider of settling the Government.] Feb. 1. The house of lords met pursuant to adjournment; when it was moved to take into consideration the Settlement of the Government of England and Ireland, in this present conjuncture of affairs on the king's death. A committee of 9 lords were appointed to join with a proportionable number of commons, and the following Message was sent down to that house, "That the lords had thought fit to name a committee of 9 of their house, in this conjuncture of time, to join with a proportionable number of the commons, to meet the next morning in the lord-keeper's lodgings, if it may stand with their conveniency; and so, from time and place, to adjourn as they shall see fitting, to consider of the Settlement of the Government of England and Ireland; to desire the concurrence of the commons therein; and that they would give the like power to their commissioners, and afterwards report the results of their consultations to their respective houses." In this Committee appointed by the lords, there are only the names of the earls of Northumberland and Kent entered for that purpose: but a Memorandum is put in the margin, that the earls of Salisbury and Nottingham, and the lord Montague were named of it, though not present. However, the lords might have saved themselves all this trouble, as will appear very shortly.

The Commons resolve that such of their Members as voted for a Treaty with the King, be no more admitted.] The same day, one of the secluded members coming into the house of commons, they immediately made an Order, That all those who had concurred in the Vote of the 5th Dec. last, 'That the king's Concessions were a Ground for settling the Peace of the nation,' should be disabled from sitting for the future; that such as then opposed the same, and were now present, should enter their Dissents; and that those who were absent should do the same previous to their being allowed to take their seats in that house. In consequence of this Order (which is erased out of the Original Journals, by the authority already mentioned) the following members, some days after, entered their Dissents, viz. col. John Bingham, Mr. E. Ashe, Mr. Armyne, Mr. Gould, Mr. Ashe, Mr. Thompson, sir Wm. Brereton, sir Wm. Masham; and were re-admitted into the house.

Feb. 2. The messengers the lords sent, the day before, to the commons, acquainted their lordships, That they went to that house and waited long, but were not admitted. On which the lords ordered, That they should go again, and desire that the committees of both houses might meet the next morning, at the same hour as before appointed.—The same day, the Speaker of the house of lords acquainted them, that he had received a Letter that morning from the earl of Northumberland, with a Paper inclosed of very great concernment; but, for the present the house ordered, That the Paper should be kept, sub sigillo, by the Speaker. It is probable this was to give the lords notice of their approaching Dissolution, for this day the commons resolved to take into consideration, and to debate, the Jurisdiction of the House of Lords; and that it should be the first business the next morning.

Petitions to the Commons in Approbation of their late Proceedings.] Feb. 3. Notwithstanding the former Order, the commons did not come to any resolution concerning the House of Lords this day; all that was done, was to read a Petition from the county of Hereford, as they had others, from different counties, the preceding days; which Petitions were in the nature of Addresses, on their new assumed power. On the presenting of one from Kent, the bearers of it told the house, viv voce, at the Bar, "That what it had pleased God had been done since the subscribing of their Petition, the petitioners could not take notice of in it; but that the petitioners resolved, in what the commons had lately acted, to stick to them with their lives and fortunes."—So many of these Petitions came up continually, that the commons appointed a committee to receive them, and report their contents to the house.

The Answer, given by the Lords, to the Dutch Ambassadors.] The same day the house of lords met; and first, ordered the earl of Denbigh, their Speaker that day, to go to the Ambassadors of the States of the General United Provinces, to congratulate their safe arrival, and to excuse the house for not sending sooner; for which the great alterations, that had lately happened in this kingdom, might afford a sufficient apology: to acquaint them also, That as to what was represented by them, in relation to his late majesty at their last audience, God having since disposed of him, it would now be unnecessary to give any further Answer than what may concern the continuance and increase of all fair correspondence between this kingdom and the States General.

The lords being informed that their Messengers to the house of commons were not yet admitted, expressed not the least resentment at this contempt; and only ordered them to go again this day, being Saturday, and desire the Committees, for settling the Government, might meet on the Monday next. But on that day, the lords still found there was no admittance, either for their messengers or their message; upon which it was once more ordered to send another message for a meeting the next morning; only the messengers were changed.

The Commons abolish the House of Peers.] Feb. 6. The grand debate concerning the House of Peers was resumed in the commons; when the question being proposed, "That this house shall take the advice of the House of Peers, in the exercise of the legislative power, in pursuance of the Votes of the 4th Jan. last," it was carried in the negative by 44 against 29. Then it was resolved, without division, "That the House of Peers in Parliament is useless and dangerous, and ought to be abolished; and that an Act be brought in to that purpose:" the care of which, in a committee, was especially recommended to Mr. Whitlocke. The same committee were ordered to consider, how such persons, as have been committed by the House of Peers alone, may be discharged;* how the subjects may have liberty to proceed against the persons or estates of Peers, and their servants, for their just debts; and, how far the Peers may be made capable to elect, or be elected, as knights or burgesses; and also to review a former Ordinance of the house of commons for making the estates of their members liable to payment of their debts; to propound a remedy where it is defective; and to render it effectual as to them and their servants. It was ordered likewise, That the Committee to whom the care of the Records of the house of commons is committed, do take into consideration the securing and preserving those of the lords.

Whilst the commons were thus passing sentence against the lords, the latter were sitting in their own house; but did nothing more, after prayers, than dispose of a Rectory, and then adjourned to ten the next morning. But it proved an adjournment ad longum diem, for they never met again till the Restoration of Monarchy, once more, established the Peers of this realm in their antient seats and privileges.

The Commons pass an Act for the abolishing of Monarchy: And resolve to erect a Council of State.] Feb. 7. The commons, having crushed the House of Lords the day before, now fell upon the Office of Kingship, as it is styled in their Journals; and, after debate, it was resolved, "That it hath been found by experience, and this house doth declare, That the Office of a King, in this nation, and to have the power thereof in any single person, is unnecessary, burthensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and public interest of the people of this nation; and therefore ought to be abolished." An Act was ordered to be brought in, to this purpose, by the same committee who were to bring in the other for taking away the House of Lords.—It was also ordered, "That there be a Council of State erected, to act and proceed according to such Instructions as shall be given to them by the House of Commons." A committee, consisting of Mr. John Lisle, Mr. Cornelius Holland, Mr. Tho. Scott, col. Edm. Ludlow, and Mr. Luke Robinson, were appointed to prepare and present to the house these Instructions for the Council of State; and likewise the Names of such persons as they conceived fit to be of this Council, not exceeding 40.†

* Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That it was put upon him to draw up this Act for taking away the House of Lords; wherein he desired to have been excused, in regard he was not in the house when the Vote passed, and had declared his opinion against it; but he could not get excused." Memorials, p. 372.

† The able Writers of the Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England, conclude this period of their Work with the following Summary Review of the most remarkable Transactions of the last three months: "When the Commissioners appointed by parliament to attend the king in the Isle of Wight had made their final report of the Treaty, the house of lords unanimously resolved, on the 5th of Dec. 'That the King's Answers to the Propositions of Peace were a Ground for a future Settlement;' When the same question was proposed in the commons, there were present about 300 Members; and although many of these, by age and infirmities, being unable to bear the fatigue of attending the whole day and night through, left the house; yet above 200 staid to the end of the debate, when the commons passed the same Vote as the lords had done before, by a majority of above three to two. In consequence of this Vote for Peace, the next day, Dec. 6, 47 Members were seized on and imprisoned by a detachment from the Army; 96 more were personally denied entrance, by the same lawless power, the following days; and many others thereby frightened away. The house being thus garbled, there were no more than 78 Members present on the 7th Dec. when the question was carried for proceeding upon the Army's Proposals; and, of these, 28 voted for the negative, and came no more to the house. From that period, and during the whole process against the King, though there are many Divisions set down in the Journals, yet there is not an instance in which the number of Members present exceeded 53; and they were once so reduced, That the Speaker sent to col. Pride, to bring in one of the Imprisoned Members to make up a house, there not being 40 then present*. The Ordinance, passed by this Junctio, for bringing the King to a Trial, was unanimously rejected by the house of lords; and, in the List of those commoners who sat in judgment upon him, there is not the name of one single gentleman, who made any considerable figure in the beginning of this parliament. From these indisputable facts it appears, That those great and able members, who first engaged on behalf of the Liberties of the People against the Encroachments of the Prerogative, meant no more than to oblige the King to rule according to law; not to bring him to the scaffold: and that Monarchy and the Peerage were not destroyed, till the Liberties of Parliament had been first subverted by an Army of their own raising."

Resolutions concerning the late King's Burial.] Feb. 8. The first thing the commons did this day, was to pass the following Resolutions

* This Circumstance (which is given upon the authority of Mercurius Pragmaticus, No. 39.) is confirmed by the following passage in lord Hollis's Speech to col. Axtell, when upon his Trial as a Regicide, Oct. 15, 1660: 'When both houses had resolved, That the King's Concessions were a sufficient Ground to proceed on for the Settlement of Peace, then did you fall upon the houses, and tear them in pieces; and, throwing out above 200, suffered only about 40 to remain; and these were glad to send for one member out of prison to make up a house.' State Trials, Vol. ii. p. 577.

touching the disposal of the late King's Body, viz.—Resolved, "That the house doth approve of Windsor for the place of the late King's Burial, and that he be carried there to-morrow for that purpose; also that the duke of Richmond, the marq. of Hertford, the earl of Lindsey, the earl of Southampton, and dr. Juxon, with three servants each, may attend the Funeral: That it be left to the duke of Richmond to take order for the place of the late King's Burial at Windsor, either in Henry the 8th's Chapel, or the choir there, as shall be thought fit; the circumstances and manner of the Interment to be wholly left to the said duke of Richmond; and a sum not exceeding 500*l.* to be allowed for the expences of the Funeral."

The Commons order the Great Seal to be broken, and a new one to be made.] The commons next proceeded to nominate a large Committee, who were ordered to inspect all the Commissions of the Peace in England and Wales, and give in the Names of fit persons to be trusted with new Commissions under their own Great Seal. This mark of sovereign authority, lately ordered to be made, was brought into the house, this day, by sir Tho. Widdrington and Mr. Whitlocke, two of the Commissioners for the late Great Seal, which was broken and defaced whilst the house was sitting, and the pieces thereof given to the said two Commissioners. Then, an Act was passed for authorizing and establishing the new Great Seal; as also another for making it high treason to counterfeit it; and it was committed to the custody of Mr. Whitlocke, Mr. Lisle, and Mr. serj. Keeble, who were to continue Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, *quamdiu bene se gesserint.

Six of the Judges refuse to accept of new Commissions.] The Speaker, who had been ordered to demand of the Judges, whether they would accept of new commissions under the present powers, this day reported their Answers, "That baron Trevor, justice Bacon, justice Creskeld, baron Atkins, justice Brown, and justice Bedingfield, desired to be excused from accepting of new Commissions to be Judges; and that the two lord chief justices, (Rolle and St. John) the lord chief baron, (Wyld) justice Jermyn, justice Phesant, and baron Gates, were willing to accept of them; but desired the house to declare, That the Judges should proceed according to the laws and statutes of this kingdom." Hereupon, a

* Mr. Whitlocke remarks, That it was debated whether they should be simply styled Commissioners, or Lords Commissioners; the word Lords being less acceptable at this time than formerly: yet, that the house might not seem to lessen their own authority, nor the honour of the offices by them constituted, they voted the title to be Lords Commissioners, and the Act was passed accordingly. Memorials, p. 374.—A salary of 1000*l.* per Annum was also voted to each of them.

Declaration was agreed to in hæc verba, "That the parliament of England do declare, That being fully resolved to maintain the Fundamental Laws of this nation, for the good of the people; and having appointed Judges for the administration of Justice, in execution thereof; they do expect that they should proceed accordingly."—This Declaration was ordered to be forthwith printed and published; and the name of the King's Bench was directed to be changed into that of the Upper Bench.

The Scots proclaim Prince Charles for their King.] Feb. 12. Letters came this day from Edinburgh, advising that Prince Charles was proclaimed King of Scotland by the whole parliament there, with great solemnity.

Instructions for the Council of State.] Feb. 13. Mr. Scott reported, from the Committee appointed to nominate a Council of State, the following Instructions for their direction; which were agreed to by the house:

I. "You are hereby authorized and required to oppose and suppress whomsoever shall endeavour to go about to set up or maintain the pretended title of Charles Stuart, eldest son to the late king, or any other of the said late king's issue, or claiming under him or them; or the pretended title or claim of any other single person whomsoever, to the crown of England or Ireland, dominion of Wales, or to any of the dominions or territories to them, or either of them, belonging. X. You have power, and are authorized, in case of danger to the Commonwealth, to administer an oath to any person or persons for the discovery of the truth. XI. You are hereby authorized and impowered to send for and imprison, or otherwise to secure by taking bound in recognizance, any such person or persons as shall be offenders against these or any other Instructions which you shall receive from the parliament; and all such as shall contemn, or be refractory to any your commands, directions, or orders in pursuance of the said Instructions. XII. You have hereby power, and are authorized to charge the public revenue, by warrant under the Seal of the Council, with such sum and sums of money, from time to time, as you shall find necessary for defraying all charges of foreign negotiations, intelligence, and other incidencies; and for the salary of such subordinate officers and attendants as you shall judge fit to employ; and for the effectual carrying on of the service by these Instructions committed to you, or by any other Instructions hereafter to be given you from the parliament. XIII. You are also to observe and put in execution such further Orders as you shall receive from time to time from the parliament. XIV. The power hereby committed to this Council of State shall continue for the space of one year from the day of passing hereof, unless it be otherwise ordered by the parliament."

List of the Council of State.] Feb. 14. The house went upon the nomination of the persons to constitute their new Council of State; when the following lords and gentlemen were named: Basil, earl of Denbigh, Edmund, e. of Mulgrave, Philip, e. of Pembroke, W. e. of Salisbury, W. lord Grey of Warke, Henry Rolle, lord chief justice of the upper bench, Oliver St. John, lord chief justice of the common bench, John Wylde, lord chief baron of the court of Exchequer, John Bradshaw, serjeant at law, Thomas lord Fairfax, Thomas lord Grey of Groby, Oliver Cromwell, Philip Skippon, Henry Martin, Isaac Pennington, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Rowland Wilson, Anthony Stapeley, sir W. Masham, Wm. Heveningham, Bulstrode Whitlocke, sir A. Haselrig, sir James Harrington, Robert Wallop, John Hutchinson, sir H. Vane, jun. Dennis Bond, Philip lord Lisle, Alex. Popham, sir John D'Anvers, sir W. Armyn, Valentine Wauton, sir H. Mildmay, col. Perfoy, sir W. Constable, John Jones, John Lisle, col. Edm. Ludlow, Tho. Scott, Cornelius Holland, and Luke Robinson. In all 41.—It was likewise ordered, That 9, and not under, should constitute the said Council of State, to act according to Instructions. But a Question being proposed, That there should be a Lord President of this Council, it passed in the Negative, by 22 against 16.

Feb. 15. The house ordered that the Arms of the late King, over the Speaker's Chair, be forthwith taken down; and that an Act be brought in for taking away the same out of the several Courts of Westminster, and all other public places, and that the Arms of England be set up in their stead.

Feb. 17. The commons ordered that the Council of State should prepare two Seals, a greater and a less, for their use; each of them to have engraved thereon the Arms of England and Ireland, with this Inscription, 'The Seal of the Council of State, appointed by the Parliament of England.' Also, That Whitehall be prepared for this Council to meet in.

Feb. 20. The Council reported to the house, That it was their opinion the Ordinance for constituting the earl of Warwick lord high admiral of England, should be repealed. The house agreed to this, and ordered an act to be brought in for that purpose; and that the Council of State should have and execute all such power and authority, as any lord-admiral or Commissioners of the Admiralty have exercised.

A Remonstrance presented by the Scots Commissioners to the Parliament, against their late Proceedings.] Feb. 24. It has been already observed, that the parliament of Scotland had proclaimed Prince Charles for their king, and sent a deputation to inform him of it; and that the house had since published their Answer to the Scots Commissioners Letters, presented in Jan. last. This day those Commissioners sent another Paper, directed to the Speaker, which is not given us in the Journals. Mr. Whitlocke tells us, 'That the Speaker acquainted the house this day with a Letter the Scots Commissioners sent him, at their going away, which was without taking leave.' And adds, 'It was full of bitterness against the parliament and their late proceedings against the king, the house of lords, and the secluded Members.—How highly the commons were affronted at this Remonstrance sufficiently appears from the following Declaration, passed on the 26th of this month; which they ordered to be forthwith printed and published.

“The parliament having received a Paper, dated Feb. 24, subscribed by the earl of Lothian, sir John Chiesley, and Mr. Glendinning, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, and taking the same into their serious consideration: they do declare, That the said Paper doth contain much scandalous and reproachful matter against the just proceedings of this parliament; and an assuming on the behalf of that kingdom, to have a power over the laws and government of this nation, to the high dishonour thereof; and lastly, a design in the contrivers and subscribers of it, to raise sedition and lay the grounds of a new and bloody war in this land; that, under the specious pretences in that Paper contained, they may gain advantages to second their late peridious invasion. And it is further declared, That all persons whatsoever, residing in England or Ireland, or the dominions thereof, that shall join with, or adhere unto, or voluntarily aid or assist, the said contrivers and Subscribers, or any whosoever of the kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of the grounds by them laid in the same Paper, for raising sedition and a new and bloody war in this land, are rebels and traitors to the Commonwealth of England; and shall be proceeded against as traitors and rebels. H. Scobell, Cler. Par.”

The Scots Commissioners ordered to be put under an Arrest.] Besides publishing this Declaration, the house ordered, That the Commissioners should have a guard set upon their lodging, to secure them from violence; and also to restrain them from communication with any by whom the sedition, contained in their Paper, might be promulged: and that none be suffered to have access to them, or to pass out from them, but for their supply with necessaries during their abode here. It was also ordered, That a message with a duplicate of the foregoing Remonstrance, be sent to the parliament and kingdom of Scotland, To know whether they do or will own and justify what hath been presented to this parliament in their names.

Feb. 28. In consequence of the above Orders, the commons were this day informed that the Scots Commissioners had been apprehended at Gravesend, as they were embarking on their return home, and were now under a guard: hereupon, it being put to the question, Whether to send them back to Scotland by land, so guarded? it passed in the affirmative.

March. The newly-erected Council of State having all the public business of the nation now before them, the house of commons, which constituted them, had little to do, except to confirm, by act, such proceedings as the other thought fit for that sanction: this council had also taken into their body great part of the house of commons. The High Court of Justice, now sitting on Trials, engaged still more; and by the expurgative test passed on the 1st of last month, denying admission to every member who would not enter his dissent or disapproval to the Vote of the 5th of Dec. last, many more were shut out that had gone great lengths with them before; so that, scarcely 50 members meeting in the house at this time, little business, except Petitions and other things of small moment, was done in this skeleton of a house of commons.

Interest of Money reduced.] March 12. The Interest of Money, which had been long at 8 per cent. was this day, by order of the house, reduced to 6, to take place from the 29th Sept. next.

Acts passed for abolishing of Monarchy, and the House of Peers.] March 17. The house had been employed a considerable time past, in framing and perfecting two Bills; the one called ‘An Act for abolishing the Kingly Office in England and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging;’ and the other ‘For abolishing the House of Peers.’ The first of these was read a third time this day, and passed without any division: the latter had the same sanction on the 19th. Both were ordered to be forthwith published, and proclaimed in Westminster, Cheapside, and the Old Exchange, by the lord mayor and sheriffs.

Declaration of the Commons stating their Reasons for establishing a Commonwealth.] March 21. The commons having, by these two Acts of their own house alone, abolished both Monarchy and the Peerage, they this day published the following Declaration: 2000 copies thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of the members, who were required to distribute them in their several counties; besides which, it was ordered to be translated into Latin, French, and Dutch.*

A DECLARATION of the Parliament of England, expressing the Grounds of their late Proceedings, and of settling the present Government in the way of a free State.

“The Parliament of England, elected by the people whom they represent, and by them trusted and authorized for the common good, having long contended against tyranny, and to procure the well-being of those whom they serve, and to remove oppression, arbitrary power, and all opposition to the peace and freedom of the nation, do humbly and thankfully acknowledge the Blessing of Almighty God upon their weak endeavours, and the hearty assistance of the well-affected in this work, whereby the enemies thereunto, both public and secret, are become unable, for the present, to hinder the perfecting thereof.—And, to prevent their power to revive tyranny, injustice, war, and all our former evils, the parliament have been necessitated to the late alterations in the government, and to that Settlement which they judge most conducive to the honour of God and the good of the nation, the only end and duty of all their labours. And that this may appear the more clearly and generally, to the satisfaction of all who are concerned in it, they have thought fit to declare and publish the Grounds of their Proceedings.—They suppose it will not be denied, That the first institution of the office of King in this nation was by Agreement of the People, who chose one to that office for the protection and good of them who chose him, and for their better government, according to such laws as they did consent unto. And let those who have observed our stories, recollect how very few have performed the trust of that office with righteousness, and due care of their subjects good: and how many have made it their study and labour, to satisfy their particular ambition and power, with high pressures and miseries upon their subjects; and with what horrid prodigality of Christian blood, upon punctilios of their own honour, personal titles and distastes: and in the whole line of them, how far the late king hath exceeded all his predecessors, in the destruction of those whom he was bound to preserve; and instead of spreading his protection to all, scarce permitting any to escape the violence of his fury.—To manifest this truth, it will not be improper to take a short view of some Passages in his reign, wherein he much farther out-went all his forefathers in evil, than any example can be found of punishment. In the Dissolution of the Parliament in the 2nd year of his reign, and afterwards, he shewed an unnatural forgetfulness, to have the violent death of his father examined: the sad business of Rochelle, and the Isle of Rhee, the poor Protestants of France do yet lament: the Loans, unlawful Imprisonments, and other oppressions, which produced that excellent law of the Petition of Right, were most of them again acted, presently after the law made against them; which was most palpably broken by him, almost in every part of it, very soon after his solemn consent given unto it: his imprisoning and prosecution of members of parliament, for opposing his unlawful will; and of divers worthy merchants, for refusing to pay Tonnage and Poundage, because not granted by parliament, yet exacted by him expressly against law; and punishment of many good patriots, for not submitting to whatsoever he pleased to demand, though never so much in breach of the known law: the multitude of Projects and Monopolies established by him; his design and charge to bring in German Horse to awe us into slavery; and his hopes of compleating all by his grand project of Ship-Money, to subject every man's estate to whatsoever proportion he only pleased to impose upon them. The private solicitations, promises of reward, and threats, from him unto the Judges of the law, to cause them to do his will, rather than equal right, and to break his and their own oaths: the oppressions of the Council-Table, Star-Chamber, High-Commission, Court Martial; of Wardships, Purveyances, Knighthood, Afforestations, and many others of the like nature, need no large repetition, remaining yet in most of our memories.—The exact slavery forced upon those in Ireland, with the army of Papists to maintain it, and the position of being loose and absolved from all rules of government, was but a pattern for the intended model here. The long Intermission of our Parliaments, and the determination to be troubled with no more, and the great mistake in first sending the new Service-Book into Scotland, raised their opposition against him, and gave no encouragement to the English to engage against them; which, with the doubtfulness of success, produced the last short parliament, which was only considered as to serve the king's pleasure, to cloak his breach of the pacification with Scotland; and, with 12 Subsidies demanded by him, to buy out his unlawful and unjust exaction of Ship-Money; but failing in his expectation therein, he suddenly and wilfully, to the terror of most men, dissolved it.—The Scots, upon the king's breach of his faith with them, and perceiving the discontents amongst us, came with an Army into England: the king, by many unjust and unlawful means, raised and brought a great force into the North to oppose them; where, being moved by worthy Petitions from several parts, and by the honourable endeavours of many noble persons, but principally by perceiving the backwardness of his subjects of both kingdoms at that time to engage in the destruction of one another, for which end such numbers of gallant men were prepared by him, whose office was to be the preserver of them; and seeing no other way, he did at last condescend to do that part of his duty to call this parliament.—Vast sums of Money were required and raised of the people of England, to gratify those by whom they had been highly damaged; and both armies paid by them, who neither occasioned nor consented to the raising of either. But, above all, the English Army was laboured by the king to be engaged against the English parliament: a thing of that strange impiety and unnaturalness, for the king of England to solicit his subjects of England to sheath their swords in one another's bowels, that nothing can answer it but his own being born a foreigner; nor could it easily have purchased belief, but by his succeeding visible actions in full pursuance of the same.—The first execution of this design of misery fell upon our poor Brethren in Ireland, where so many scores of thousands of them were with such wonderful cruelty murdered, that scarce any bowels but are filled with compassion at it; and yet some of the murderers themselves have not forborne to affirm, That they had the king's commission for their actions.—His late and slender proclaiming of them Rebels; his consent to a Cessation when the Rebels gained all advantages, and the Protestants were destroyed by it; his intercepting and taking away provisions and supplies going unto them, are no good testimonies of his clearness from that blood which cried loud for vengeance.—But to return to England, where appeared matter enough of mourning. Upon the king's coming in person to the house of commons to seize the 5 members, whither he was followed with some hundreds of unworthy debauched persons, armed with swords and pistols, and other arms; and they attending at the door of the house, ready to execute whatsoever their leader should command them: and upon some other grounds, (whereby doubts being raised in the people, that their Grievances would not be redressed, they grew into some disorders) the king took occasion from thence to remove from London, where presently forces appeared for him of his own company at Kingston.—From thence he travelled to the North, endeavouring to raise forces there; enticed many members of both houses to desert the parliament, and trust reposed in them by their country, and to join with him in bringing destruction upon their Brethren and upon themselves. Instead of doing Justice, he protected Delinquents from it. At Nottingham he set up his standard; from Wales and the Marshes he got together a powerful Army, and gave the first onset of Battle at Edge-hill.—He possessed and fortified Oxford, his head-quarter, and many other towns and places of strength; and prosecuted a fierce and bloody war against the body of all his own subjects represented, and then sitting in parliament; a thing never before attempted by any king in this nation, and which all men have too sad cause with much grief to remember.—Their towns and habitations burnt and demolished; their pleasant seats wasted; their inheritances given away to those that were most active in doing mischief; their servants, brothers, friends, and children, murdered. Thus his own people, whom, by the duty of his office, he was bound to protect from all injury, were, by himself in person, pursued with fire and sword, imprisonments, tortures, death, and all the calamities of war and desolation.—Notwithstanding all this, and in the heat of it, many Addresses were made by the parliament unto the king for Peace; but in none of them could an Agreement be obtained from him, when the least word of his consent would have stopped that issue of blood and torrent of misery which himself had opened in all parts of his kingdom.—When the great God of Battle had determined very much in favour of the parliament, and the king's strength was almost fallen away, so that he thought it unsafe to trust himself any longer with his own forces, yet would he not then vouchsafe to come in unto the English, but rendered himself to his countrymen, the Scots; giving unto them the honour both of receiving him, and parting with him again, upon their own terms.—After his restraint yet further Addresses were made unto him by the parliaments of both kingdoms for Peace, with Propositions, not heightened by success; but these would not be granted, there being new and hopeful designs of his in hand, for bringing new miseries upon his people, which an Agreement upon those Propositions might easily have prevented. After this passed the Votes for no further Addresses to be made unto him.—The last Summer the effect of those designs, even whilst he was under restraint, began to break forth; a new vein of blood was opened in the king's name; a Plot laid (as the terms of their own boasting were) as deep as Hell; the Army divided into several bodies; the fire brake forth in many parts of the kingdom at once; and, for fear lest the numbers of their English should be too small, or their compassion to their countrymen too great, a malignant party in Scotland is easily invited hither: and although at first they understood the Covenant in that sense, and prosecuted the ends thereof, in joining with the parliament of England, and fighting against the king's party; yet now their judgments are rectified to prosecute the same ends by joining with the king's party, and fighting against their fellow-covenanters, the parliament of England. But God will not be mocked; and though this cloud of fresh calamities, both here and from the North, threatened the poor nation; and, in all human probability, was pouring utter ruin upon us, yet the visible hand of God, as many times formerly, so now mightily and miraculously, appeared for us; and led the Army, whom he was pleased to make his instruments, with that courage, wisdom, and fidelity, as amazed and subdued our enemies, and preserved under him, all that can be dear unto us.—During these distractions, and by what means is sufficiently known, and related more fully in a late Declaration, an eighth Address must be made unto the king, contrived by his party; the Votes of parliament to the contrary revoked, and Commissioners sent to the Isle of Wight; where, instead of yielding to their just Desires, whilst they were treating with him for Peace, even then was he plotting to raise a new war against them, and to draw more blood of his people: to this end his two elder sons were in hostility, and armed with power of granting commissions further to destroy the people committed to his charge.—Upon all these, and many other unparalleled offences; upon his breach of faith, of oaths and protestations; upon the cry of the blood of Ireland and of England; upon the tears of widows and orphans, and childless parents, and millions of persons undone by him, let all the world of indifferent men judge, whether the parliament had not sufficient cause to bring the king to justice.—But it was objected, and it was the late king's own assertion, 'That those in his high place are accountable for their actions to none but God, whose Anointed they are.' From whence it must follow, That all the men of this land were only made for the sake of that one man the king, for him to do with them what he pleaseth; as if they had been all created for no other purpose but to satisfy the lusts, and to be a sacrifice to the perverse will, of a tyrant.—This will not easily be believed to be so ordained by God, who punisheth, but never establisheth, injustice and oppression; whom we find offended when the people demanded a king, but no expression of his displeasure at any time, because they had no king. Such an unaccountable officer were a strange monster to be permitted by mankind; but this doctrine is better understood by the present age, than in former times; and requireth the less to be said in confutation of it, being enough to confute itself.—For the phrase of ‘Anointed,’ no learned Divine will affirm it to be applicable to the kings of England, as to those of Judah and Israel, or more to a king than to every other magistrate or servant of God; or that the words, ‘touch not mine Anointed,’ were spoken of kings, but unto kings; who were reprov’d and enjoined to do no harm to the Prophets and Saints of God, there understood to be his Anointed.—Another Objection was, ‘That to bring a king to trial and capital punishment is without Precedent.’ So were the crimes of the late king: and certainly the Children of Israel had no known law or precedent to punish the Benjamites for their odious abuse of the Levite’s wife, yet God owned the action. There want not precedents of some of his predecessors, who have been deposed by parliaments, but were afterwards, in darkness and in corners, basely murdered: this parliament held it more agreeable to honour and justice, to give the king a fair and open Trial, by above an hundred gentlemen, in the most public place of justice: free, if he had so pleased, to make his own defence; that part of his crime being then only objected against him, of which the parliaments of both his kingdoms had, by their joint Declaration, formerly declared him guilty.—With his offences were joined all along a strange obstinacy and implacableness, and incessant labour for the destruction of his people; which (with the unerring truth, wherein is no dispensation for kings, ‘that no Satisfaction shall be taken for the life of a murderer, but he shall surely be put to death: and that the land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed therein, but, by the blood of him that shed it’) brought on and effected the work of justice upon him.—The king being dead, the next consideration fell upon his Children; from these branches could be expected no other than the same bitter fruit which fell in the reign of the father, who had engaged them in his own ways and quarrel; and the two eldest so early appearing in actual arms and hostility against the parliament, no more safety or security could be hoped for from them than from their predecessor; nor, in human probability, as affairs then stood, any safe way for a sure Peace and prevention of future troubles, and to avoid a succession of misery, but by taking away the

succession of that from whence it hath always risen, and would certainly spring again, if permitted to take new root, the designs and practices of kings, their flatterers and evil counsellors.—The Objection is obvious, ‘of Injustice to disinherit those who have a right and title to the crown.’ Surely the elder right is the people’s whom they claim to govern; if any right or title were in the eldest son, the same is forfeited by the father’s act, in other cases; even of officers of inheritance, which being forfeited for breach of trust, (a condition annexed to every office) none will deny but that the same excludeth the children as well as the officer: but here the elder sons levied war against the parliament; and it cannot be alledged that the younger children were born to any thing. But the same power and authority which first erected a king, and made him a public officer for the common good, finding him perverted to the common calamity, it may justly be admitted, at the pleasure of those whose officer he is, whether they will continue that officer any longer, or change that government for a better; and, instead of restoring tyranny, to resolve into a free state.—Herein the parliament received encouragement, by their observation of the blessing of God upon other states: the Romans, after their Regifogium, for many hundred years together, prospered far more than under any of their kings or emperors: the State of Venice hath flourished for 1300 years: how much do the commons in Switzerland, and other free states, exceed those who are not so, in riches, freedom, peace, and all happiness? Our neighbours in the united provinces, since their change of government, have wonderfully increased in wealth, freedom, trade, and strength, both by sea and land.—In Commonwealths they find Justice duly administered, the great ones not able to oppress the poorer, and the poor sufficiently provided for; the seeds of civil war and dissention, by particular ambition, claims of succession, and the like, (wherein this nation hath been in many ages grievously employed) wholly removed; and a just freedom of their consciences, persons, and estates, enjoyed by all sorts of men.—On the other side, looking generally into the times of our monarchs, what injustice, oppression, and slavery were the common people kept under; some great lords scarce affording to some of their servants, tenants, or peasants, so good meat, or so much rest, as to their dogs and horses? it was long since warned in parliament, by a privy counsellor to the late king, That we should take heed, lest, by losing our parliaments, it would be with us as with the common people in a monarchy, where they are contented with canvas cloathing and wooden shoes, and look more like ghosts than men: this was intended for the fate of England, had our monarch prevailed over us. To bring this to pass, their beasts of forests must grow fat, by devouring the poor man’s corn; for want of which, he and his wife and children must make many a hungry meal; A tradesman furnishing a great man with most part of his stock, or a creditor with money, and expecting due satisfaction and payment, is answered with ill words or blows; and the dear-bought learning that lords and kings servants are privileged from arrests and process of law. Thus many poor creditors and their families have perished by the injustice and prodigality of their lawless creditors.—A poor waterman with his boat or barge; a poor countryman with his team and horses, and others of other callings, must serve the king for the king's pay; which, if they can get, is not enough to find themselves bread, when their wives and children have nothing but the husband's labour to provide for them also. For that one exaction of the court called Purveyance, about which our ancestors made so many good and sharp laws, yet none of them could be kept; it hath been lately computed to cost the country more in one year than their assessments to the Army.—These are some of those generally observed, and more public Exactions, which were obvious, not to the understanding only, but to the sense of the many grieved sufferers; but if the vast expence of the Court, in ways of luxury and prodigality, be considered; as on the one side, by a standing ill ordered diet for a number of drones and unprofitable burdens of the earth; by chargeable feasts, and vain-glorious masques and plays, (their Sabbath-Days exercise or preparations) together with other (less sinful, but no less) chargeable provisions for Sports and Recreations, for which thousands of acres, scores of miles, and great parts of whole counties have been separated from a much better and public improvement.—On the other side, by those profuse donations of yearly Salaries and Pensions granted to such as were found, or might be made, fit instruments and promoters of tyranny, or else such as had relation to the king, in native or personal respects: in which latter kind may be shewed accounts of above 500,000*l.* per annum that was paid out of the Exchequer to Favourites of the Scots nation; besides the secret Supplies from the privy-purse and otherwise, best known to the receivers; which may perhaps be one reason why they are so zealous to uphold the kingly power in this nation, whereof the king was their countryman.—He that observes so many hundreds of thousands, communibus annis, expended in those ways; and shall know that the legal justifiable revenue of the crown (besides the Customs and some other perquisites charged with the maintenance of the Navy and Forts) fell short of 100,000*l.* might justly wonder what secret under-ground Supplies fed those streams of vanity and mischief, were it not as notorious, that the Projects, Monopolies, Sales of Offices, Bribes, Compositions for Breach of Penal Laws, and the like ways of draining the people's purses as wickedly got, so were only fit thus to be employed. By occasion whereof the court arrived at that unhappy height, as to be the great nursery of luxury and intemperance; the corrupter of the manners and dispositions of many otherwise hopeful branches, sprung from the noblest families; and an universal perverter of religion and goodness therein, making good the proverb Exeat aula qui vult esse pius.—In a free state, these, and a multitude of the like Grievances and Mischiefs will be prevented; the situation and advantages of this land, both for trade abroad, and manufactures at home, will be better understood, when the dangers of projects, monopolies, and obstructions thereof, are, together with the court, the fountain of them, removed; and a free trade, with encouragement of manufactures, and provision for the poor, be settled by the commonwealth, whereunto the same is most agreeable, and which the former government had never yet leisure effectually to do.—Upon all these before-mentioned, and many other, weighty considerations, the representatives of the people, now assembled in parliament, have judged it necessary to change the government of this nation from the former Monarchy (unto which, by many injurious incroachments, it had arrived) into a Republic, and not to have any more a king to tyrannize over them.—In order hereunto, and for the better Settlement of this Commonwealth, it being found of great inconvenience, that the house of lords (sitting in a body by themselves, and called by writ to treat and advise, yet) in the making of laws, and other great affairs, should any longer exercise a negative vote over the people, whom they did not at all represent; and likewise a judicial power over the persons and estates of all the commons, whereof they are not competent judges; and that their power and greatness did chiefly depend upon the power and absoluteness of a king, whereunto they had lately expressed a sufficient inclination: and it being most evident, that (especially in these times of exigency) neither the government of the Republic, nor the common safety, could bear the delays and negatives of a house of lords; it was therefore thought necessary, wholly to abolish and take the same away. Leaving, nevertheless, unto those lords who have been and shall be, faithful to the Commonwealth, the same privilege of choosing, and being chosen, representatives of the people, as other persons of interest, and good affections to the public have right unto; and which is not improbable to have been the way of our ancestors, when both lords and commons formerly sat together.—But an objection is frequently made, concerning the Declaration of the houses, of April, 1646, 'For governing the kingdom, by king, lords, and commons, and other Declarations for making him a great and happy prince.' This was then fully their intent, being at that time confident, that the king's ill counsel once removed from him, he would have conformed himself to the Desires of his people in parliament; and the peers who remained with the parliament, would have been a great cause of his so doing; but finding, after seven fruitless

Addresses made unto him, that he yet both lived and died in the obstinate maintenance of his usurped tyranny, and refused to accept of what the parliament had declared; and to the upholding of this tyranny, the lords were all obliged, in regard of their own interest in Peerage; whereby they assumed to themselves an exorbitant power of exemption from paying of their just debts, and answering suits in law, besides an hereditary judicatory over the people, tending to their slavery and oppression, the commons were constrained to change their former Resolutions, finding themselves thus frustrated in their hopes and intentions so declared: which change being for the good of the Commonwealth, no commoner of England can justly repine at; neither could the king or lords take any advantage thereof, because they never consented thereto; and where no contract is made, there none can be said to be broken: and no contract is truly made, but where there is a stipulation on both sides, and one thing to be rendered for another; which not being in this case, but refused, the commons were no ways tied to maintain that Declaration, to the performance of which, they were not bound by any compact or acceptance of the other part; and to the alteration whereof so many reasons for the preservation of the people's liberties did so necessarily and fully oblige them.—Another objection is, 'That these great matters ought, if at all, to be determined in a full house, and not when many members of parliament are by force excluded; and the privilege so highly broken, that those who are permitted to sit in parliament do but act under a force, and upon their good behaviour.' To this it is answered, That every parliament ought to act upon their good behaviour, and few have acted, but some kind of force hath at one time or other been upon them; and most of them under the force of tyrannical will and fear of ruin by displeasure thereof; some under the force of several factions or titles to the crown; yet the laws made, even by such parliaments, have continued, and been received and beneficial to succeeding ages. All which, and whatsoever hath been done by this parliament, since some of their members deserted them, and the late king raised forces against them, and several disorders and affronts formerly offered to them, if this objection take place, are wholly vacated.—For any breach of Privilege of Parliament; it will not be charged upon the remaining part, or to have been within their power of prevention or reparation; or that they have not enjoyed the freedom of their own persons and Votes, and are undoubtedly, by the law of parliaments, far exceeding that number which makes a house, authorized for the dispatch of any business whatsoever: and that which at present is called a force upon them, is some of their best friends, called and appointed by the parliament for their safety, and for the guard of them against their enemies; who, by this means, being disappointed of their hopes to destroy the parliament, would nevertheless scandalize their actions, as done under a force; who, in truth, are no other than their own guards of their own Army, by themselves appointed: and when it fell into consideration, Whether the privilege of parliament, or the safety of the kingdom, should be preferred, it is not hard to judge which ought to sway the balance; and that the parliament should pass by the Breach of Privilege (as had been formerly often done upon much smaller grounds) rather than by a sullen declining their duty and trust, to resign up all to the apparent hazard of ruin and confusion to the nation.—There remains yet this last and weighty Objection to be fully answered, 'That the Courts of Justice, and the good old laws and customs of England, (the badges of our freedom, the benefit whereof our ancestors enjoyed long before the conquest, and spent much of their blood to have confirmed by the Great Charter of the Liberties; and other excellent laws which have continued in all former changes; and, being duly executed, are the most just, free, and equal of any other laws in the world) will, by the present alteration of government, be taken away, and lost to us and our posterities.' To this, they hope, some satisfaction is already given by the Shorter Declaration lately published; and by the real demonstrations to the contrary of this objection, by the earnest care of the parliament, That the Courts of Justice at Westminster should be supplied the last term, and all the circuits of England this vacation, with learned and worthy judges; that the known laws of the land, and the administration of them, might appear to be continued. They are very sensible of the excellency and equality of the laws of England being duly executed; of their great antiquity, even from before the time of the Norman slavery forced upon us; of the liberty and property, and peace of the subject, so fully preserved by them; and (which falls out happily, and as an increase of God's mercy to us) of the clear consistency of them with the present government of a Republic, upon some easy alterations of form only, leaving intire the substance: the name of King being used in them for form only, but no power of personal administration or judgment allowed to him in the smallest matter contended for. They know their own authority to be by the law, to which the people have assented; and besides their particular interests, which are not inconsiderable, they more intend the common interest of those whom they serve, and clearly understand the same, not possible to be preserved without the laws and government of the nation; and that if those should be taken away, all industry must cease; all misery, blood, and confusion would follow; and greater calamities, if possible, than fell upon us by the late king's misgovernment, would certainly involve all persons, under which they must inevitably perish.—These Arguments are sufficient to persuade all men to be well contented to submit their lives and fortunes to those just and long approved rules of law, with which they are already so fully acquainted; and not to believe that the parliament intends the abrogation of them, but to continue and maintain the laws and government of the nation, with the present alterations, and with such further alterations as the parliament shall judge fit to be made, for the due reformation thereof; for the taking away of corruptions and abuses, delays, vexations, unnecessary travel and expences, and whatsoever shall be found really burthensome and grievous to the people.—The Sum of all the parliament's design and endeavour in the present change of government, from tyranny to a free state, and which they intend not only to declare in words, but really and speedily endeavour to bring to effect, is this: To prevent a new war and further expence and effusion of the treasure and blood of England, and to establish a firm and safe Peace, and an oblivion of all rancor and ill-will occasioned by the late troubles; to provide for the due Worship of God, according to his Word, the advancement of the true Protestant Religion, and for the liberal and certain maintenance of godly Ministers; to procure a just Liberty for the consciences, persons, and estates, of all men, conformable to God's glory and their own peace; to endeavour vigorously the punishment of the cruel murderers in Ireland, and the restoring of the honest protestants, and this Commonwealth, to their Rights there, and the full satisfaction of all Engagements for this work; to provide for the settling and just observing of treaties and alliances with foreign princes and states, for the encouragement of manufactures, for the increase and flourishing of trades at home, and the maintenance of the poor in all places of the land; to take care for the due reformation and administration of the law and public justice, that the evil may be punished, and the good rewarded; to order the Revenue in such a way, that the public charges may be defrayed, the Soldiers Pay justly and duly settled, that Free-quarter may be wholly taken away, the people be eased in their burdens and taxes, and the debts of the Commonwealth be justly satisfied; to remove all grievances and oppressions of the people, and to establish peace and righteousness in the land.—These being their only Ends, they cannot doubt of, and humbly pray to the Almighty power for, his assistance and blessing upon their mean endeavours; wherein as they have not envied or intermeddled, nor do intend at all to intermeddle, with the affairs of government of any other kingdom or state, or to give any offence or just provocation to their neighbours, with whom they desire intirely to preserve all fair correspondence and amity, if they please: and confine themselves to the proper work, the managing of the affairs, and ordering the government of this Commonwealth, and matters in order thereunto, with which they are intrusted and authorized by the consent of all the people thereof, whose Representatives, by election, they are; so they do presume upon the like fair and equal dealing from abroad; and that they, who are not concerned, will not interpose in the affairs of England, who doth not interpose in theirs: and in case of any injury, they doubt not but, by the courage and power of the English nation, and the good blessing of God. (who hath hitherto miraculously owned the justness of their cause, and, they hope, will continue to do the same) they shall be sufficiently enabled to make their full defence, and to maintain their own rights.—And they do expect from all true-hearted Englishmen, not only a forbearance of any public or secret plots or endeavours, in opposition to the present Settlement, and thereby to kindle new flames of war and misery amongst us, whereof themselves must have a share; but a cheerful concurrence and acting for the establishment of the great work now in hand, in such a way, that the name of God may be honoured, the true Protestant Religion advanced, and the people of this land enjoy the blessings of peace, freedom and justice to them and their posterities."

March 23. The commons, in order to establish their new Commonwealth the more effectually, resolved upon the Disposal of the Personal Estates of the late King, Queen, and Prince; which they, this day, made an Order to have inventoried, appraised, and sold, except such Parcels of them as should be thought fit to be reserved for the use of the State; but with this proviso, That no member of the house should have any concern therein.

A Land Tax laid upon the Kingdom for 6 Months.] March 24. The commons having resolved that 120,000*l.* per mensem be provided for 6 months for maintaining the Forces in England and Ireland, to the end Free-quarter might be taken off; and that, towards raising this sum, a tax of 90,000*l.* per mensem for 6 months, be levied upon Lands and Goods; and having appointed a Committee to consider of an equal rule for laying such Assessment, a report was this day made, from the Committee for the Army, of the Rates and Proportions for each county as agreed on by them; which was referred to a committee of the whole house, and the next month passed into an Act.—This being the first instance of a Tax laid upon the subjects of England, by authority of the commons only, the Speaker was ordered to write a circular Letter to the Commissioners appointed in every county for raising the same.

Pontefract Castle surrendered to the Parliament.] March 27. A Letter was received from major gen. Lambert, with the Articles of Agreement for the Rendition of Pontefract Castle; which being read, were approved of by the house. Also a Petition from the mayor, aldermen, and all the well-affected inhabitants of the town of Pontefract, was read; after which it was resolved, That the Castle of Pontefract should be totally and forthwith demolished; that it be referred to the Committee of the West-Riding of York, to take care to see this Castle demolished, and levelled with the ground.

The Clergy prohibited from meddling with Affairs of State.] March 28. While the king's Trial was depending before the High Court of Justice, the Presbyterian Ministers of many parishes in London and the adjacent counties to the number of above 60, published a Protestation, declaring themselves wholly unsatisfied with the proceedings since the Exclusion and Imprisonment of the Members of the house of commons; that they held themselves bound in duty to God, religion, the king, parliament, and kingdom, to profess before God, angels, and men, That they verily believed the taking away the Life of the king, in the way of Trial, was not only not agreeable to the Word of God, the principles of the Protestant Religion, (never yet stained with the least drop of the blood of a king) or the fundamental constitution of the kingdom; but contrary to them, as also to the Oath of Allegiance, the Protestation of May 4, 1641, and the Solemn League and Covenant. And many of them, after the King was beheaded, prayed publicly for the Prince of Wales, as king, by the name of Charles II. particularly one Mr. Cawton, who had the courage to do so before the lord mayor, for which he was ordered to be prosecuted in the Upper Bench, for high treason. The commons, in order to prevent such a defiance of their authority for the future, this day appointed a Committee to bring in an Act, forbidding Ministers in their pulpits, in preaching or praying, to meddle with matters of government, or the transactions of State; and likewise prohibiting to hold correspondence or intelligence with foreign states, under a penalty; and only to apply themselves to their duty in preaching Jesus Christ and his Gospel, to the edifying of their Congregations.

Cromwell goes to Ireland as Commander in Chief.] March 30. Affairs in Ireland growing still worse, the Council of State thought fit to nominate lieut. general Cromwell to go Commander in Chief into that kingdom, which the house agreed to. Commissary-general Ireton, his son-in-law, was also appointed next in command under him: but at the same time, as a compliment to lord Fairfax, they resolved to continue his lordship General of all the Forces of the parliament, both in England and Ireland.

The Lord Mayor refuses to proclaim the Act for abolishing Monarchy.] Complaint having been made, That the lord mayor of London had not proclaimed the late Act for abolishing the Kingly Office, he was ordered to be summoned to appear at the bar, on Monday, April 2, to answer his contempt therein. On which day the lord mayor being called in, and set to the bar, the Speaker told him, The house had heretofore sent an Order to him, and a writ, to proclaim an Act for abolishing the Kingly Office in England and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging; and he was now sent for to answer his Contempt in not doing it. The lord mayor answered, He did receive such an Order, but that his conscience being charged, as it was, with several Oaths at and before his mayoralty, he could not dispense with it in proclaiming that Act; and therefore had not done it. Being ordered to withdraw, and the house having considered of his sentence, he was called in again, when the Speaker told him, That it was their judgment he be discharged from the office of lord mayor, and be disabled from bearing that office; be fined 2000*l.* to be paid presently; and that he be committed prisoner to the Tower for a month. The City was also ordered to proceed forthwith to another election. The name of this conscientious lord mayor was Abraham Reynoldson. The very next day, when the house was informed another lord mayor was elected, they thought fit to alter the form of the Oath of this officer, from swearing to be true and faithful to the King, to be so to the Commonwealth, &c. And, the same day, alderman Andrews, being presented to the house as the new lord mayor elect, was confirmed in that office, and ordered to have the above Oath administered to him. Next, the house proceeded to reform the Bench of Aldermen in the City, and voted, That sir John Gayer, Tho. Adams, John Langham, James Bunce, with Abraham Reynoldson, aldermen, should be disabled and discharged from bearing that office; and that the city do proceed to elect others in their stead.

Lilbourne and others committed to the Tower, for writing a Pamphlet against the New Republic.] April 18. The Council of State having got intimation of the Authors, Printers, &c. of a Pamphlet called 'England's Second Chains, &c.' had imprisoned in the Tower for it, lieut. col. Lilbourne, Mr. Walwyn, Mr. Prince, and Mr. Overton.

A Petition in their Favour signed by 10,000 Persons.] This day the following Petition, subscribed by 10,000 hands, was presented to the house, intitled, 'The humble Petition of divers well-affected Persons in the Cities of London and Westminster, the Borough of Southwark, Hamlets and parts adjacent,' in behalf of the aforesaid Prisoners.

"The more we consider the state and condition of our four Friends, the more we are perplexed in our thoughts with the Fear of great danger intended towards them: for though nothing hath been pretended to be done by them contrary to any law made before the fact whereof they are suspected, nor any thing done by them after you had published your Declaration concerning the same; yet your Votes and Declaration, the hostile seizure by the Council of State, and their Examinations apart upon questions against themselves, no accuser appearing face to face, no friends allowed to be present, and thereupon committed prisoners to the Tower, do all in a great measure, forejudge them as really guilty of high treason.—All which proceedings being directly contrary to Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and to your own Declarations of the 8th Feb. and 17th March last; we are enforced to believe that some eminent persons, whose particular interests our said Friends may have opposed, have surprized this honourable house; and transported you into some causeless fears of danger from those our Friends, whose constant care and watchfulness for the Settlement of this long-wasted Commonwealth, and prevention of misery and bloodshed, hath been so evident by their frequent Motions and Petitions to those just ends; especially by that which was burnt by the common hangman, that of Sept. 11, 1648, and their 'Agreement of the People;' wherein are comprised such clear fundamentals of just government, redress of Grievances, and conducements to general peace and reconciliation, as, had their advice in any reasonable time been taken, we are verily persuaded, much of that rancour, bitterness, and bloodshed which hath befallen, had been prevented. And which, in our apprehensions, are sufficient evidences against all suspicions of treasonable practices, or intentions in them; and may also acquit them of that aspersion of unsettledness cast upon them; and which we wonder did not invite a more respectful carriage towards them, than to fetch them out of their beds and houses by so formidable parties of horse and foot.—And truly, if we may have leave to speak our hearts in behalf of these our Friends, who for many years have neither spared their estates nor time, but frequently hazarded their lives in our behalf, and for the safety and freedom of parliament and people; we are persuaded in our consciences the greatest crime, or rather cause, for which they are thus molested, is, That they have incessantly endeavoured to induce the Army to the real performance of those many good things they engaged for, and largely promised to this nation, in their many Declarations, &c. when first they disputed and opposed the Orders of parliament: and for that they have endeavoured to confine the interest of the Army to the just interest of the people, and to reduce the military power to a real subordination to the civil authority. For which their endeavours, we verily believe, they are hated by some eminent persons of the Army; whose frequent distinct actings according to their own immediate wills, towards this honourable house, in casting out members without any charge brought against them, leaving or taking in only whom they pleased, and so in the Army; and by their prevalency against some particular persons, hath made them presume, and, we fear, resolve, to sacrifice the blood and lives of these our dear friends, for standing betwixt their absolute domination and the freedom of the people.—And that this may not appear to be a groundless supposition, be pleased to take notice that our said Friends have been long aspersed by them as Levellers, Atheists, Jesuits, &c. upon what ground and to what end we know not, except to prepare them to destruction; threatening, 'That if they once caught hold of them, they should not escape out of their hands, as they had done out of the hands of Hollis and Stapylton; that they have deserved more to be fought against than the most desperate enemy:' plotting and contriving, in their General Council of Officers, to get a law 'To have power to hang, or otherwise put to death, as they saw cause; and that because the civil magistrate could not dispatch them fast enough.'—In all which their threats and contrivances, there are many circumstances to prove that they principally aimed at those our Friends: and so, when neither by threats or promises they could prevail with them to desist from preserving the freedom of the nation, and discovery of their designs, (as was done in their 'Serious Apprehensions,' presented to this house the 26th Feb. last) having absolute power in the house, where, contrary to the Self-denying Ordinance, they take up many places, which, with an Army at command, is more than all the rest; and having got anew of themselves into their Council of State, (contrary to their own positive consent in the 'Agreement of the People') they catch at an opportunity, and fall upon our Friends with such a face of force and terror as would have made the world believe, whatever cruelty had succeeded, there had been a cause answerable to that force.—The like having not been known, that persons so visible and responsible should (to the terror of their wives, children, families, and neighbours) in the break of the day, be fetched out of their beds, forced out of their houses, and carried away as prisoners of war; and, after a day's restraint in the garrison at Whitehall, carried before the Council of State; and there, after Examination of them against themselves (no accusers appearing face to face, or friends allowed to be present) were, about 12 at night committed prisoners to the Tower, upon suspicion of High Treason. In the debates whereupon, as we are credibly informed, lieut. gen. Cromwell declared in the Council, 'That they must break this party in pieces,' (meaning our Friends) 'or they would break them: that, if they did not do it, they would render themselves the most silly, low-spirited men in the world, to be routed by so contemptible and despicable a generation of men.'—And immediately after was published your Declaration, which, reflecting upon them as 'Persons seditious, destructive to the present government, mutineers, hinderers of the Relief of Ireland, and continuers of Free-quarter,' hath (with the rest before-mentioned) so fore-spoken them, that, wheresoever they come to trial, they are likely to fall under abundance of prejudice; besides the influence those eminent persons (who now visibly appear their particular adversaries) have upon all persons in office, and upon the present forces in being. Inasmuch as, all things duly weighed, they are, in truth, really fore-judged and condemned: for what judge and jury may not, unawares, be captivated by so many pre-occupations, and pre-possessions, or not be terrified to do what so forcible and powerful influences so strongly incline, if not enforce them unto?—Besides, your Order for their Trial requires the Attorney-General to take speedy course for prosecution of them; which is a disadvantage we hoped these times would have been free from, as holding too much resemblance with those foregone; that sought, by craft and sophistry, to entrap and enslave plain men in their trials for life, estate, or liberty, to the wills of princes: the said Attorney being a member of your house, and consequently a judge of the judge before whom he pleads; and, in opposition to our Friends, representeth no less than the Supreme Authority; a most unequal prosecutor, and against whom they have no plea or relief, as, by law, they have against others.—Upon all which considerations, we cannot discern it to be equal in itself, or safe for them, that they should through so many prejudices and pre-occupations, be by you put upon their trial in the Upper Bench: so that however plausible it may seem in itself for you to put them upon this kind of trial, yet all things considered, nothing more evidently tendeth to their destruction: nor can we discern how it can be just to try men upon a Declaration made after the fact pretended; nor can we judge it reasonable that so many members of the Army, their professed adversaries, should, contrary to the Self-denying Ordinance and common equity itself, sit as Judges in this honourable house, or in the Council of State, whilst this cause is debated; they having in effect been charged by those our Friends, in their ‘Serious Apprehensions’ to this house; and this proceeding towards them appearing but as a revengeful recrimination. And therefore if, after mature consideration of the premises, you shall judge them worthy of further prosecution as for our parts we verily believe there is no cause, we earnestly intreat that you will first make strict inquiry into the cause of that terror and force of soldiers used towards them, contrary to law; repair their credit; give them the benefit of law against whomsoever shall appear to have been authors or actors therein; and enlarge them from their present imprisonment in the Tower.—And then, if any person hath wherewith to accuse them, that they be proceeded against, as by law they ought, by warrants from a justice of the peace of the neighbourhood, where the fact in question was pretended to be committed; not granted without oath made of a crime against some law in being before the fact; and to be served by constables not soldiers, and that upon appearance of the accusers and accused face to face, as by law is due; and if the fact beailable, then to be allowed bail; if not, to be secured in that legal prison appointed for that place and fact, until the next sessions, not in a prerogative prison as the Tower is; and then, in an ordinary way, exempt from all such pre-occupations and fore-judgings, to have the benefit of a Trial by a Jury of 12 sworn men in the neighbourhood, not over-awed by soldiers, nor disturbed by policy or sophistry. A trial which, we conceive, cannot in justice, in any circumstance, be denied to the worst of thieves, murderers and traitors; and which was our real intentions in our late Petition presented to you concerning them. And we are confident our Friends, upon such a trial, will prove themselves to be no such persons, but faithful friends to their country’s liberties.—We also intreat that, for the future, no person may be censured, condemned, or molested, concerning life, limb, liberty, or estate, but for the breach of some law first made and published; and that this hon. house would be a pattern to all future parliaments, in leaving the trial of all such causes to subordinate magistrates, and ordinary proper courts of justice: That the Execution of Civil Affairs may be wholly freed from the interposition of the sword, and that martial law, during the time of peace, where all courts are open, may not be exercised upon the persons of any whomsoever. All which are not more evidently just in themselves, than they are consonant to Magna Charta and the Petition of Right; the benefit whereof, we trust, you will never be induced to take from us: That capt. Bray, now close prisoner in Windsor Castle,* may immediately be enlarged, or otherwise be put upon a legal trial, as is before desired in behalf of our other friends.—Lastly, we intreat that there may be some general encouragement from you, to proceed to a speedy Settlement, by way of an ‘Agreement of the People,’ upon the grounds of an equal and just government; that so all discord, enmity and dissatisfaction amongst former friends, may finally receive a speedy end, by and with this parliament; and that the end of this may be the beginning of a new and equal representative.”

The foregoing Petition, being read, gave so high offence to the house, that they resolved, That the petitioners should have a sharp reprimand for it. A Committee was also appointed to withdraw immediately, and prepare an Answer to be given to the petitioners by the Speaker; which, upon their being called in, he delivered to them in the following terms:

“Gentlemen; The house hath read your Petition; and, lest I should mistake as you have done, hath commanded me to give you this Answer; That the 4 Persons in your Petition principally concerned are, upon just and mature consideration, appointed to be brought unto a legal trial for crimes against law preceding the fact, and not after, as suggested; at which trial they will have free liberty to offer whatsoever they shall have to say in their own defence: and to such proceedings the parliament do expect that all persons in England should submit, and in the judgment of parliament acquiesce. That the Contrivers of this Petition have therein taken a liberty of scandalous and seditious suggestions, not allowable nor justifiable in any persons whatsoever, under pretence of Petitioning; and do so far countenance the imprisoned persons, in the offences for which they are questioned, as might render them justly suspected of the like crimes. But the parliament will yet exercise patience towards you, conceiving that divers well-meaning men may, by false yet specious pretences, be deluded into this miscarriage; and hoping that, by this forbearance, such may come to see their own errors."

This Answer was ordered to be printed and published; but it was of very little use, for when the men durst not any more petition in behalf of Lilbourne and his associates, the Women took it up; and presented one to the house in terms, as Mr. Whitlocke writes, 'almost scolding.' To which they ordered the following Answer to be given them by their serjeant at arms: "That the matter they petitioned about was of an higher concernment than they understood; that the house had given an Answer to their Husbands; and therefore desired them to go home and look after their own Business, and meddle with their Housewifery."

Three Peers elected Members of the House of Commons.] The earl of Pembroke, having so far waved his Peerage as to be chosen and returned knight of the shire for Berks, took his seat in the house; and was this day appointed by them one of the Commissioners of the Navy. Soon after the lord Howard of Eskricke got himself returned for Carlisle, and was admitted to sit as a commoner in the house. Wm. earl of Salisbury did the same for Lynn. These three lords were all of the whole Peerage that, so far, bowed their knees to this Commonwealth. And the commons, to compliment their coming amongst them, voted, That they should sit in all the committees of which they were members at the time when the house of lords was dissolved.

The Commons vote 3000l. per ann. for the Maintenance of two of the late King's Children.] April 25. The house heard a report from the Council of State, concerning a Letter received from the earl of Northumberland, about some Maintenance for the late King's Children. After which 3000l. per ann. was ordered to be settled upon the duke of Gloucester and the lady Elizabeth; and the care and tuition of them, with the management of this Allowance, was committed to sir Edw. Harrington, not a member, but he afterwards desired to be excused from the office.

The Commons order Money to be coined in the Name of the Commonwealth.] Another report was made to the house from the Council of State, concerning the Form and Inscriptions of the new Coin; when it was resolved to have the Inscription in the English tongue, and to be, on that side where the English arms do stand alone, 'The Commonwealth of England;' on the other Side, which bears the Arms of England and Ireland, 'God with us.'

An Act of Oblivion ordered in.] The last thing done this day was to vote that an Act of Oblivion should be brought in; and the question being put, That the time to be set in that act, from which no action or suit shall be commenced or prosecuted for any thing said or done in the time of the War, and in prosecution thereof, shall be before the first day of this Term: The house divided, when it was carried in the affirmative, 25 against 22; and an Act was ordered in accordingly.

May 3. This day was observed as a Day of public humiliation, to beg God's blessing upon Cromwell and his Army, then going for Ireland. The Ordinance for keeping a Monthly Fast was repealed, and occasional ones substituted in their stead; for which this reason is assigned in the Act, "That such set times for extraordinary duties of Worship are apt to degenerate into mere formality and customary observances."

The Parliament's Agent assassinated at the Hague.] May 2. Dr. Dorislaus, an Agent for the parliament in Holland, having been assassinated there by some royalists, in revenge, as they said, for their king's Murder, he having acted as counsel against his majesty at his trial: this day sir H. Vane reported to the house, from the Council of State, the Examinations of the 3 persons, servants to Dr. Dorislaus, who were present at his death, and likewise a letter from Mr. Walter Strickland. These being read, together with the Opinions of the Council of State, touching the Disposal of Dr. Dorislaus's body, his children and servants, the house ordered, That 200l. per Ann. be settled as a pension for life on his son; 500l. a-piece to be given to each of his daughters, and 250l. for his interment, to be charged upon the revenue. And that a Declaration should be drawn, on occasion of the Murder of Dr. Dorislaus, in order to be printed and published, which was done accordingly.

May 15. The house was resolved into a grand committee, to debate on the putting a Period to the sitting of the present Parliament. After the house was resumed, it was resolved, That, in order to the declaring a certain time for putting a Period to the Sitting of this Parliament, the house was of opinion, That, in the first place, consideration be had of the stating of the succession of future Parliaments, and of the regulating of their Elections; and a committee was ordered accordingly.

May 19. The house passed an Act, declaring and constituting the People of England to be a Commonwealth, and a Free State; to be henceforth governed as such by the Supreme Authority of the Nation, the Representatives of the People in Parliament, and by such officers as they shall appoint, without any King or House of Lords; and ordered it to be forthwith printed and published.

The house having received advice that the late Insurgents, now distinguished by the name of LEVELLERS,* were routed, their Leader, William Thompson, slain, and many of them in prison at Oxford and Northampton; they ordered commissions of Oyer and Terminer to be sent down to those places to try them, also a Proclamation into several counties, for apprehending all those who had fled from the lord general Fairfax.

* Mr. Hume gives us the following account of the State of Parties at this time: "The confusions which overspread England after the murder of Charles I. proceeded as well from the spirit of refinement and innovation, which agitated the ruling party, as from the dissolution of all that authority, both civil and ecclesiastical, by which the nation had ever been accustomed to be governed. Every man had framed the model of a republic; and, however new it was, or fantastical, he was eager in recommending it to his fellow-citizens, or even imposing it by force upon them. Every man had adjusted a system of religion, which being derived from no traditional authority was peculiar to himself; and being founded on supposed inspiration, not on any principles of human reason, had no means, besides cant and low rhetoric, by which it could recommend itself to others. The Levellers insisted on an equal distribution of power and property, and disclaimed all dependence and subordination. The Millenarians or Fifth-Monarchy-Men required, that government itself should be abolished, and all human powers be laid in the dust, in order to pave the way for the Dominion of Christ, whose second coming they suddenly expected. The Antinomians even insisted, that the obligation of morality and natural law were suspended, and that the elect, guided by an internal principle more perfect and divine, were superior to the beggarly elements of justice and humanity. A considerable party declaimed against Tythes and Hireling Priesthood, and were resolved that the magistrate should not support by power or revenue any ecclesiastical establishment. Another party inveighed against the law and its professors; and on pretence of rendering more simple the distribution of justice, were desirous of abolishing the whole system of English jurisprudence, which seemed interwoven with monarchical government. Even those among the Republicans, who adopted not such extravagancies, were so intoxicated with their Saintly character that they supposed themselves possessed of peculiar privileges; and all professions, oaths, laws, and engagements had, in a great measure, lost their influence over them. The bands of society were every where loosened, and the irregular passions of men were encouraged by speculative principles, still more unsocial and irregular. The Royalists, consisting of the nobles and more considerable gentry, being degraded from their authority, and plundered of their property, were inflamed with the highest resentment and indignation against those ignoble adversaries, who had re-

May 31. The house accepted of an Invitation from the Lord Mayor and citizens, to dine with them on the Thanksgiving Day at Grocers-Hall, after the sermons were ended.

The Parliament entertained, at Dinner, by the City of London.] June 6. A new Mace was brought into the house, ornamented with duced them to subjection. The Presbyterians, whose credit had first supported the arms of the parliament, were enraged to find that, by the treachery or superior cunning of their associates, the fruits of all their successful labours were ravished from them. The former party, from inclination and principle, zealously attached themselves to the son of their unfortunate monarch, whose memory they respected, and whose tragical death they deplored. The latter cast their eye towards the same object; but they had still many prejudices to overcome, many fears and jealousies to be allayed, ere they could cordially entertain thoughts of restoring the family, which they had so grievously offended, and whose principles they regarded with such violent abhorrence. The only solid support of the Republican Independent Faction, which, though it formed so small a part of the nation, had violently usurped the government of the whole, was a numerous army of near 50,000 men. But this Army, formidable from its discipline and courage, as well as its numbers, was actuated by a spirit that rendered it dangerous to the assembly which had assumed the command over it. Accustomed to indulge every chimera in politics, every frenzy in religion, the soldiers knew little of the subordination of citizens, and had only learned, from apparent necessity, some maxims of military obedience. And while they still maintained, that all those enormous violations of law and equity, of which they had been guilty, were justified by the success with which Providence had blessed them; they were ready to break out into any new disorder, wherever they had the prospect of a like sanction and authority. What alone gave some stability to all these unsettled humours was, the great influence both civil and military acquired by Oliver Cromwell. This man, suited to the age in which he lived, and to that alone, was equally qualified to gain the affection and confidence of men, by what was mean, vulgar, and ridiculous in his character; as to command their obedience by what was great, daring, and enterprising. Familiar even to buffoonery with the meanest centinel, he never lost his authority: transported to a degree of madness with religious extasies, he never forgot the political purposes to which they might serve. Hating monarchy, while a subject; despising liberty while a citizen; though he retained for a time all orders of men under a seeming obedience to the parliament; he was secretly paving the way, by artifice and courage, to his own unlimited authority."

flowers instead of the Cross, and a ball on the top; with the Arms of England and Ireland instead of the late king's: this was not only approved of and ordered to be carried before the Speaker for the future, but all other maces, throughout the nation, were required to be made according to the same form and pattern. The house also made an Order, That the Lord Mayor of London, on his reception of the Speaker and members of parliament at Dinner, the next day, should deliver the Sword, usually borne before the lord mayor, into the hands of the Speaker; and that he should, thereupon, re-deliver the Sword to the lord mayor. This ceremony, never done before to any but the kings of England, from whom they received that Sword, was performed at Grocers-Hall.—Mr. Whitlocke gives the following Account of the ceremonial observed at Dinner.* “The Speaker sat first, next to him the lord mayor, and then the lord-general. The earl of Pembroke calling to Whitlocke to sit down, being the antient Commissioner of the Great Seal, he desired his lordship would be pleased first to sit down, and then he would sit by him. With that the earl spoke aloud, (as he used to do) that all near him might hear, ‘What, do you think that I will sit down before you? I have given place heretofore to bishop Williams, to my lord Coventry, and my lord Littleton; and you have the same place that they had; and as much honour belongs to the place under a Commonwealth, as under a king; and you are a gentleman as well born and bred as any of them; therefore I will not sit down before you.’ With this earnestness he caused Whitlocke to sit down before him, and sat himself the next to him; the lord president of the Council, the other commissioners of the great seal, also the earl of Salisbury and the lord Howard, sat next to the earl of Pembroke; and, after them, lieut. gen. Cromwell, and other members of parliament, and of the Council of State.”—Upon this occasion some of the Aldermen and Common Council, in the name of the City, presented to the lord-general Fairfax a large, weighty bason and ewer of beaten gold; and to lieut. gen. Cromwell a service of plate of the value of 300*l.* and 200 broad-pieces of gold, as a testimony of the City's good affections. How acceptable all this was to the parliament appears by the following Vote passed the day after the entertainment, viz. Resolved, “That this house doth take in very good part the great respect shewn yesterday, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council, to the Speaker and members of this house; and that the hearty Thanks of the house be given to them for it.” A committee was also named to consider of some Mark of Favour and Respect to be done, by the house, to the city of London.

Votes for reducing the Honours observed to the late King's Children.] June 13. The care of the late King's Children had been committed to the countess of Leicester, by the house, and they had received a Letter from this lady, desiring some Regulations as to her conduct to them: on which the house this day voted, “That the late King's Children should sit with the earl and countess of Leicester, at their table, as part of their family, and not otherwise: and that the said earl and countess do take care that no other observance or ceremony be used to those Children, than to noblemen's children of this nation.”

Votes for rewarding the Parliament's Friends.] June 19. Whilst the house was reducing the estate of the remains of the unhappy royal family, they took care to aggrandize that of their friends and fellow labourers. Bradshaw, who sat as President in the High Court of Justice, at the Trial of the king, was made Lord President of the new Council of State; and this day, the house voted 2000*l.* per ann. to be settled on him and his heirs; and 1000*l.* to be forthwith paid him, towards his Charges expended in the service of the State. Soon after he was made Attorney-General of the Commonwealth for the counties of Chester, Flint, Denbigh, and Montgomery, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Large grants of lands and sums of money were also voted to members of the house, and others, out of Crown and Deans and Chapters Lands, forfeited Estates, &c. many instances of which now frequently occur in the Journals.*

Vote for the Recovery of Ireland.] June 22. A report from the Council of State was this day heard in the house; in which was included a Commission, constituting Cromwell commander in chief over the Forces in Ireland, and governor general of Ireland. This being read, in Latin and English, the house voted, “That the civil and military power in Ireland shall be, for the present, conjoined in one person; and that the time of the continuance of this commission shall be for 3 years.” Instructions for this commander were ordered to be prepared by the Council of State, and reported to the house with all speed.

Disposal of the Crown Lands.] June 30. The house having before disposed of the Personal Estates of the late king and his family, went next upon the disposal of the castles, houses, manors, parks, &c. belonging to the Crown. Amongst these the Council of State referred it to the parliament, that the following should not be sold, but kept for the public use of the Commonwealth, viz. Whitehall-House, Westminster-Palace, St. James's Park, St. James's House, Somerset House, Hampton Court, and the House Park, Theobalds and the Park, Windsor and the little Park next the House, Greenwich House and Park and Castle, and Hyde Park. Also, that the new Park at Richmond, in Surrey, be settled upon the city of London, as an act of favour from the house, for the use of the city and their successors. This proposal from the Council of State was confirmed by a resolution of parliament.

July 2. This day a Letter, subscribed by the lord Loudon, chancellor and president of the Parliament of Scotland, dated at Edinburgh, June 26, was read. After which it was ordered to be referred to the Council of State, to consider how the Demands formerly made by the parliament of Scotland, may be prosecuted, and this Parliament, with their proceedings, vindicated from the aspersions in this Letter. The Council having delivered in their opinion two days after, the house voted, "That the said Letter was of such a nature as laid an incapacity of prosecuting the former Demands by way of Treaty." And the Council of State were ordered to draw up a Declaration to that purpose, and present it to the house.

July 14. The said Declaration being perfected, was this day presented to the house, agreed to, and ordered to be forthwith printed and published. It is very long, and recapitulates the whole Dispute which had just before happened between the two kingdoms.

Cromwell prepares to embark for Ireland.] The house employed the greater part of this month in making necessary preparations for the Expedition into Ireland: the marquis of Ormond had advanced far in his conquest of that kingdom, and had actually laid siege to Dublin, which made the government on this side very anxious about it. The forces designed to be employed against him, under the command of Cromwell, were ordered to embark forthwith; and he himself was to go with them, invested with all the pomp and regalities of a deputy lieutenant of that kingdom. The house also borrowed 150,000*l.* more of the city, at 8 per cent. and on the credit of the Excise, for this Expedition.

Orders for melting down the Regalia, and demolishing the Statues of the late King.] Aug. 9. The house heard a Report from the Council of State; and afterwards, upon the motion of Mr. Henry Martin, ordered, That those gentlemen who were appointed to have the custody of the Regalia, do deliver them over to the trustees for Sale of the Goods of the late king, queen, and prince, who are to cause the same to be totally broken; and that they melt down the gold and silver of them, and sell the jewels for the best advantage of the Commonwealth; and to take the like care of those that were in the Tower. An Order was also made for taking down and demolishing the Arms of the late king in all public places, and likewise all Statues of him, and Inscriptions.

A Cessation agreed on by Colonel Monk with the Irish Rebels, censured by the House.] Aug. 10. An affair relating to colonel, afterwards the famous general, Monk, happened in the house this day, which deserves our notice. This officer had been long employed in Ireland by the parliament, and had lately made an Agreement for a Cessation of Arms with the Irish Rebels. The colonel was questioned for this by the new lord lieutenant in that kingdom, and by him remitted over into England, with his Papers, to the Council of State, who referred him to the parliament: and this day, being called to the bar to answer for his offence, he owned the fact, and said he did it on his own score, perceiving it was for the preservation of the English interest there; and that they had reaped some fruits thereof accordingly. After much debate, the house came to the following Resolution: "That this house doth utterly disapprove of the proceedings of col. Monk, in the Treaty and Cessation made between him and Owen Roe O'Neile; and that the innocent blood, which had been shed in Ireland, is so fresh in the memory of this house, that they do detest and abhor the thoughts of closing with any party of popish rebels there, who have had their hands in shedding that blood: nevertheless, the house being satisfied that what col. Monk had done therein, was, in his apprehension, necessary for the preservation of the parliament of England's interest there, the house was content the further consideration thereof, as to him, be laid aside; and should not at any time hereafter, be called in question." The colonel being again called in, the Speaker acquainted him with this resolution.*

Victory over the Marquis of Ormond, in Ireland, by the Parliament's Forces.] Aug. 14. The house received Letters from Ireland, giving an account of a great Victory obtained by their forces there against the marquis of Ormond. A Day of Thanksgiving was immediately appointed for this wonderful and seasonable victory, vouchsafed by the goodness of God to the parliament's forces, under the command of lieut. gen. Jones, Aug. 2, against the whole army of the Rebels in Ireland, commanded by the earl of Ormond, then besieging Dublin. A Declaration was also ordered to be drawn, of the Grounds and Reasons of the setting a-part the said Day of public Thanksgiving, and an Act for the due observation thereof, the care of which were left to Mr. Whitaker and Mr. Scott: 1000*l.* per ann. in lands, was settled, by an act, upon lieut. gen. Jones, and his heirs; also 6 of the king's best horses were given to him, as a reward for this great service.

Mutinies and Insurrections at Oxford, Norwich, and London.] Sept. 11. The parliament was not yet altogether free from alarms: for

* Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That Monk was much discontented at the proceedings in this business in relation to himself, especially at some passages highly reflecting on his honour and fidelity: that it was the opinion of divers, either not to have questioned him in this business at all, or, having once done it, never to employ him any more in the service: but that the major part carried it for beating him first, and then stroking him; which some think he never forgot." M. morials, p. 403.

they had intelligence of a great Mutiny in the garrison at Oxford, which was ordered to be inquired into. A much greater Insurrection happened also at Norwich, in which many people were slain; and Mr. Utting, the mayor, and one Mr. Tooly, were voted grand Delinquents, and ordered to be sent for as such by the serjeant at arms attending the house. They were afterwards fined and imprisoned in the Fleet.—Nor was the parliament without their fears nearer home, as appears by a Paper read in the house, intituled, ‘An Outcry of the young Men and Apprentices of London.’ As they had had enough to do with this sort of people lately, it gave them the greater alarm; and they ordered commissions to be issued out, under the Great Seal, for trying such persons as had been contrivers, promoters, or publishers of the said Paper, on their new act relating to Treason.

The Parliament's Declaration in Vindication of their Proceedings,] Sept. 28. This day the house agreed to the following Declaration in Vindication of all the late Proceedings of the Parliament:

A DECLARATION of the PARLIAMENT of ENGLAND, in Vindication of their Proceedings, and discovering the dangerous Practices of several Interests against the present Government and Peace of the Commonwealth.*

“How greatly it hath pleased God, even by a continued series of miracles and wonders, to exalt his own name, and glorify his mighty power in the eyes of this and our neighbour nations, by the constant course of Deliverances which he hath wrought for these many years late past, on the behalf of a sinful and undeserving people, and by the means of weak and unworthy instruments, we can never frequently enough remember, nor be sufficiently thankful for: ‘Their Rock hath not been as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being Judges.’—And, indeed, this wonderful Going-forth of the good hand of God with us, and for us, hath been that principally which hath supported us, and borne us up above all those swelling and multiplied waves that have followed one upon another, and hath made us to stand against the many storms and assaults wherewith we have been attempted by all sorts of parties and interests amongst us; who, dividing and withdrawing themselves from public ends, do all them, notwithstanding, (because acted by one principle, even the Power of Darkness) make shift so far to understand each other, as, when opportunity serves, to take one another by the hand, for strengthening and upholding themselves, in practising and contriving, under several specious pretences, against the good, peace, and safety of the whole. We have been like unto the Bush in the Midst of Flames; but, by the good-will of Him that dwelt in the Bush, we have not been consumed; and like the remnant left by God in the land, which though he will cause to pass through the fire, yet it is to refine them as silver is refined, and to try them as gold is tried, that he may make them a people ‘who shall call upon God, and he will hear them;’ and of whom God shall say, ‘They are my People, and they shall say, The Lord is our God.’ By this secret confidence and expectation of our hearts, wherein we hope we shall not be disappointed, and, through the good Providence of God, we have been kept together, even to this very day, as weak instruments in the hand of our great God, serving our generations, and discharging the high trust of our places, whatever the discouragements and difficulties have been that we have met with, and dangers that have threatened us on every side; such as we may truly say, former ages can hardly parallel; and such as were not to have been expected, especially from those who had made so great a progress in conjunction with us against the common enemy, and in vindicating and asserting the purity of Religion and public Liberty.—For, when first of all we came to be engaged in carrying on this great and glorious work of Religion and public Liberty, how lively and uncorrupted were our affections! how satisfied and unanimous were our judgments? how fixed and undaunted our resolutions in that which appeared to us so necessary, so just, and so worthy to be undertaken by true patriots and good Christians? we did therefore run well; but who, or what, hath hindered us that we seek not still to obtain what at first we thought so desirable, without giving back or turning aside until the Work be perfected, and the persons engaged in the prosecution thereof be secured against the enmity and revenge of those that are rather made more implacable, than converted, by all the Deliverances that God hath wrought for us, and the testimonies of displeasure against them, as often as they have risen up and set themselves against us? Whatever the great failings and infirmities have been, and do still daily discover themselves amongst us, that hold it our duty to give our attendance upon our trust in parliament, so long as opportunity is offered unto us for the same; we can truly say, That as Religion in its purity, and public Liberty, were the ends which, from the beginning, we had before our eyes when we engaged in this great Work, so are they still our desires and endeavours; the comfortable fruit whereof we would willingly have to be reaped by this nation, at least in their succeeding generations, if it were the will of God; and the prosecution of this, and this only, (however we are reproached, and unjustly vilified by slanderous tongues and pens) is that which keeps most of us together at such a time, when, as in the case of Hester, we see, if we had done otherwise than we have done, and deserted our stations, and cast up the helm, the visible means of carrying on the Work had failed, and sunk down into certain disorder and confusion.—But whether there hath not been found a manifest defection and apostacy from these good and public ends, by those that at the first did bear the name of Patriots and Lovers of Religion amongst us, we appeal to the actions and ways themselves, which such persons have since appeared in, that do sufficiently evidence against them, and declare them the builders up again of what they once joined in the destruction of; and so do make themselves transgressors, and stand in need of no other confutation and conviction.—Among the number of those we reckon them that, either under pretence of advancing Reformation of Religion, can go back and incorporate themselves with the avowed and known Haters of God, and enemies to the Life and Power of Holiness; or that, under pretence of bringing us into the perfection of public Liberty, can fetch a compass quite round, and make the bringing in again of Monarchy into this Commonwealth, to be the only means of settling it in freedom. The actors in such designs as these carry the evidence of their own conviction in their forehead, unto all that are not wilfully blind, or maliciously corrupt; and therefore would seem to stand in no great need of much pains to be taken to undeceive them.—And however it hath been the good pleasure of God to suffer those that have been formerly instrumental and helps to us in this great cause, thus, by steps and degrees, to fail, and fall off like untimely fruit; yet herein hath he shewed his wonderful goodness to this nation, that their deserting of us, and breaking from us, hath not hitherto been able to keep the Work itself at a stand, but that it is still carried on; wherein we rejoice.—And, on the contrary, the time wherein they afforded their assistance and help hath been improved by God's over-ruling Providence, to bring us much nearer to our journey's end than ever we could have expected, though the ship should hereafter miscarry in the very harbour; which God forbid. And, for our parts, the larger experience which we have had of God's constant owning and seasonable assisting us in our greatest straits and most imminent dangers; and the serious consideration that the Work itself is of that nature as requires and obliges us, and all good men, to the utmost, to offer up ourselves in the sacrifice and service thereof, as we desire to approve ourselves sincere in our obligations to God, and faithful in our trusts to this nation; we do resolve, through God's assistance, to cast ourselves upon his favourable acceptance of our endeavours in persevering to the end, and his protection of us in our doing our duties, let the issue be what seems best to his Divine Providence, whether for Life or for Death.—And that we may not be wanting in what we are able, for the awakening of all those whom it doth concern unto the same sense of their duty in this behalf with ourselves, we shall briefly lay before them the happy Progress that, through God's goodness, hath been made, in procuring the blessings of Pure Religion and just Liberty unto this nation, notwithstanding all the reproaches and unthankful murmurings of ill-minded men; and wherein, we are hopeful, to grow up to whatever remains yet unperfected, if there be but answerable readiness in those whom the good of this as much concerns as ourselves, to stand by us, and join with us, in attaining the same against those many hellish designs and cursed practices that are now on foot, to plunge us again into new troubles, and give greater advantage than ever to the common enemy, by our divisions and breaches, to come upon us as an irresistible flood, with tyranny, popery, superstition, profaneness, and whatever else we have so dearly contended against for so many years together.—And, first, as to advancing of Religion to its greatest degree of purity; can any be unmindful in what a corrupted and degenerate state we found the matters of Religion, at the first sitting of this present parliament? how near the whole administration of church-affairs was brought to the superstitious and idolatrous Pattern of Rome; and how quickly we should have found ourselves swallowed up in that sinful and wretched Apostacy? for our Recovery out of which danger, how careful and zealous hath the parliament been to propagate and advance the Work of Reformation in these nations; propounding to themselves, for their guide herein, the Word of God and the best Reformed Churches? In which Work, how happily and comfortably did they proceed, whilst we were purging and reforming the Evil of Popery, Superstition, and Profaneness; in which there was a common consent and agreement of all those that unfeignedly desired the enjoyment of Religion in its greatest purity; but when once there appeared amongst us (and this from some of those who most earnestly put on the Work of Reformation, until it arrived to their own Measure and Growth) an impatience toward any of differing minds from themselves, however otherwise truly fearing God, and faithful Advancers of his Glory; and a Fearfulness in them of going forward, lest that which was beyond them, and as necessary to be known and attained to lead us to the enjoyment of Religion in its purity and power, should take place; whereby it might appear, that the Reformers of Popery and Profaneness stood themselves in need of Reformation, by his appearance and manifestation of himself, who 'sits as a Refiner and Purifier of Silver, and shall purify the Sons of Levi, and 'purge them as Gold and as Silver, that they 'may offer unto the Lord an Offering in 'Righteousness.' When this Frame of Spirit appeared amongst us, then all future degrees and measures of attaining unto Religion in its purity would not be borne; but must be branded with the foul names of Heresy, Blasphemy, and Schism; and the persons be declared and proceeded against as enemies to reformation, as disturbers of the Peace, and as fit objects of the Magistrate's discountenance and punishment.—And such was the implacable and irreconcilable temper of these men towards those differing from them, that were desirous to carry on the Purity of Religion beyond their measure, that many of them chose rather to fall into the power of the Cavalier and Episcopal party, and became instrumental to the bringing in of the late king, upon the Treaty at the Isle of Wight, (so much since declared against by the Church of Scotland, as destructive to the Work of Reformation settled in these nations) than that they would join with those they reputed Sectaries, in their endeavours to carry on the Work they first engaged in, to that degree of perfection as became them, after so much blood and treasure expended in the prosecution of it.—In this condition was the Work of Reformation when the Treaty of the Isle of Wight, by God's over-ruling Providence, came to be broken off; that is to say, in a manner yielded and resigned up into the power of the enemies thereof, and refused to be carried on by them that were the most zealous promoters thereof at first; although it had pleased God to make a way for the same, by continuing together a competent number in parliament, to hold up the visible authority of this nation; and, by keeping their places and stations, to do their endeavours to prosecute their first principles and ends, whilst God gave them any opportunity for the same: nay, we could wish that they had only remained passive, and been contented to have let others carried on the Work of Religion in its Purity, though they themselves held back; but this would not serve their turn, unless they flew in the face of the visible authority of this nation, and took upon them to be judges, whether we were a lawful magistracy or not; as if that were within their line, and committed to them to determine. Yet hath not all this discouraged this present parliament to do their part in propagating the Gospel, and advancing the Purity and Power of Religion in this Commonwealth; but they have continued those laws and ordinances that were already in force, for the good and furtherance of the Work of Reformation, in doctrine, worship, and discipline; and are still most willing to uphold the same, in order to suppress Popery, Superstition, Blasphemy, and any manner of wickedness or profaneness in the land; only they do conceive themselves obliged to remove and take away all obstructions and hinderances to the Growth of Religion and Power of Holiness in the midst of us; and, for this end, they have it now under consideration how such Acts and Ordinances, or any part of them, as they find penal and coercive in matters of conscience, which have been made use of for snares, burthens, and vexations to the truly sincere-hearted people of God, that fear him, and wait for the Coming of his son Jesus Christ, may be taken away.—And because we are not ignorant how injuriously our Proceedings herein are charged upon us, as if we were setting up and countenancing an universal Toleration, when our true aim in the liberty we give, is only the necessary encouragement we conceive due to all that are Lovers of God, and the Purity and Power of Religion: we can and do therefore declare, in the sight of God and man, That by whomsoever we shall find this liberty abused, we shall be most ready to testify our displeasure and abhorrency thereof, by a strict and effectual proceeding against such offenders. And if, after all this, any of those amongst us, that do profess a love to God, and zeal to advance Religion in its purity, to be their chiefest end and desire, shall nevertheless still sit at a distance from us, or shall be given up so far by God, as to make defection to the contrary party against us, and join themselves to them that are open enemies to Religion and the Power of Godliness, in what dress soever they cover themselves; we shall not doubt but their own unfaithfulness, detestable neutrality, and wicked doings, will find them out; and enlargement and deliverance shall arise to the People of God some other way, whilst they, their names and posterities, shall be destroyed.—As for public Liberty, which is the second thing; for the vindication and asserting whereof we have not thought our lives nor estates, nor any other of these outward comforts, too dear for us to hazard and expose; In what a condition that was at the sitting-down of this parliament, how near it was to breathing its last, and how little it wanted of being swallowed up in the will of a tyrant, is so well known to all men that then made any observation of the state of things, or had any sense of their own sufferings, and will but now remember them, that it shall not be necessary to repeat: and into what a happy condition it is already brought at present, by the blessing of God upon the councils and forces of the parliament; and how far advanced, in a fair way, to a settled and well-established Security for the future, though it will not be confessed by unthankful men (whose ingratitude can value no benefit received, be it never so great, while any thing remains for their exorbitant desires to pursue) yet it is such as we cannot but have a deep and tender sense of, and acknowledge it with all humble thankfulness to our gracious God, who hath hitherto helped us; unless we should shew ourselves less affected with it than our friends are, who are less concerned, and yet look upon it with rejoicing. And how low thoughts soever these men have of the proceedings of providence in the carrying on of this Cause, yet the future contemplation of the actions of this time, (for the greatness and justice of them hardly to be exemplified in any other) will cause men to say, What hath God wrought! And our very enemies themselves shew, that they have other opinions of it, being forced to feel God's hand lifted up, which they would not see; sinking into confusion, and gnashing with their teeth, while they consume away in their envy, at that prosperity which God hath clothed us with from his own good hand.—And we are very confident, that even those who are now acting their parts for their private ends, which they would bring about by what means soever, and remove whatever stands in their way, however either dear or sacred; and would destroy this present Government, which doth and will hinder such designs so long as it is in being; and they therefore endeavour to render vile, publishing daily against it, and against many particular men whom God hath honoured with faithfulness to his Cause, and made eminently or specially instrumental to advance the same, all manner of shameless calumnies, lying revilings, slanders and reproaches; as if, in this time, nothing had been done toward this just liberty, nor that any thing would be done, unless they, like Absalom, could bring themselves into power, and undertake the Work according to those wild principles of theirs, which they have published in print to that purpose; which holds forth a liberty without property, public safety, or protection: We say, if those men would but recall to their consideration their own hopes which they had of Liberty in the beginning of this parliament, and with how small a proportion of what they now enjoy their then narrower Desires were bounded, they would confess them to be far short of what is already had.—But to let them pass, who, being acted by particular interest, have not left themselves the benefit of being convinced or directed by common and universal reason, it was not then believed by most of those, whose innocency and good meaning is now dangerously abused by the Malignant Party (by means of some of those whom they name Levellers, whose specious overtures and former pretensions to Goodness have deceived them) that ever they should have seen all that Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, with all their tyrannical Courts and Attendants, the Star-Chamber, High Commission-Court, Ship-Money, Projects, Monopolies and Purveyances, the Court of Wards and Tenures, and all the dependences of it, which heretofore was a legal pest to the free-born people of this nation, and the very ruin of many families, together with the deepest root and foundation of all the people's sufferings, even Kingship and Tyranny itself, as well as the late king, should be wholly taken away; and thereby (if God be pleased to go on to bless us, and the fault be not in the people themselves, suffering themselves to be made instrumental to their own miseries, by endeavouring to build again the things that are destroyed) a sure foundation laid for time to erect upon it the most happy structure of a just Liberty and settled Prosperity that may be expected in this world, under the direction and government of successive and equal representatives in parliament: yet all this, and much more, hath been done since the beginning of this parliament, and to which we have been led by several steps by the providence of God, directing our councils, in several degrees of manifestation, and blessing our forces for effecting of them, beyond what was either first propounded by us, or could reasonably have been hoped to be brought to pass; the very discovery of so remote an end, in the beginning of the action, had been sufficient to have discouraged any undertaking therein.—And although this great progress hath been made in the vindication and establishing of our just Liberties, yet we do not set up our rest, as if there remained no more to be done: and we conceive they who duly consider of how great weight and difficulty the Work is, that we have in hand, and will but inform themselves what hath been done now in 8 months, since the Restitution of the just Liberties of the people, and the settling of the present government, will not be offended that something remains to be proceeded in.—They may take notice that Ireland, which was brought into such a condition, first by the Treason of Inchiquin, whereby the whole province of Munster was lost; then by the return thither of Ormond, whereby most of the Popish party were reconciled, and with whom a peace was made for carrying on the interest and pretended title of Charles Stuart. Thirdly, by the Rebellion of all the Scots in Ulster, upon the same interest, and by the revolt of many that were under the command of lieut. gen. Jones; all that remained to the parliament there was only within the walls of Dublin and Derry, and they both strongly besieged: yet, through the blessing of God, Ireland itself is now in a more hopeful way of speedy settling, than at any time since the first rebellion.—There hath been also, this year, a great and powerful Fleet set out to sea, under faithful commanders, whereby Trade hath been protected, the English honour and interest upon their seas maintained, foreign attempts against us discouraged, and a great reputation procured to our affairs abroad. A free passage hath been also given to the execution of justice, according to the laws, throughout the nation: and the peace thereof hath been preserved, notwithstanding many designs, and some endeavours, to disturb it. And, for what still remains to be done, we shall, according to the great trust that is upon us from the people, proceed therein for the procuring their common good, which is the true and ultimate end of all just government; and, by a right aim at that, direct all our actions, and not cease to improve our best judgments, and lay out our most unwearied labours, notwithstanding all discouragements either from malice, envy, danger, or any other cause whatsoever, to promote the same, so far and so fast as the subject-matter will bear; the proceedings wherein ought to be judged sufficiently expeditious, that are sufficiently safe. And we should betray our great trust if we should suffer ourselves, by the impotent haste and importunity of any, to do that which might be inconsistent with the peace and safety of the whole.—The great Work we have first to do, is to establish the being and safety of the Commonwealth upon sure foundations, which are undermined by more enemies than are visible to all. This provided for, we shall not be wanting daily to remove or add what shall be for the well-being of it, either in conveniency or ornament; for the enjoyment whereof we conceive the people may with the greater patience attend, because their present condition is already so much better, besides the capacity of improvement, than it was in the best of that Egyptian state, to which, by reason of some necessarily remaining pressures, they are too easily seduced to an inclination to return. To preserve them from which (because we would not omit any thing that is in our power, that may be for the good of those who have trusted us) we shall endeavour to undeceive those of the people, whose innocency and well-meaning hath subjected them to be deceived and dangerously misled, by the specious and subtle insinuations of that sort of men, who, being themselves corrupted by the common enemy, do endeavour to bring the nation again under their bonds of tyranny and monarchy; and, while they have nothing in their view but Liberty, are deceived into those actions and practices which tend naturally and necessarily to the inevitable loss of that liberty they so much call for, if they should not be preserved against their will, by those who know the danger into which they run.—For this purpose we desire all men to remember, that, at the end of the first war, we had not then an end of our troubles; but that enemy which was beaten and conquered in the field, and could do no more by force, had recourse to subtle practices; and by corrupting a party in the parliament, and by their influence there, being so corrupted, had almost broken that Army by which he was beaten.—The specious pretence was the liberty and ease of the People; they had long been under a war, oppressed and ruined with heavy burthens, which it was now necessary to ease them of: what benefit had the people by those victories, and that conquest, if they must still continue under the same charge? there was now no more an enemy in the field, what need was there of an army to continue that heavy and unnecessary charge upon the people? by such arguments, and by their power, that faction prevailed to vote the disbanding of the Army, and vast sums of the Commonwealth's treasure was by them then wasted to effect it; thereby to make way for the admitting of the then king, to the re-exercising of that power which had produced such bloody and fatal effects, and without any just satisfaction given to the people for the same; which how easily and certainly it would have followed the disbanding of the Army, is sufficiently evident by the breaking out of the second war, then in design and agitation.—And although the second war was also, by the blessing of God upon the endeavours of those who were faithful in the Parliament and Army, brought to an end; and that design of mischief which was so universally laid, and that came to action in so many several parts of this nation, (although assisted with the invasion of a numerous army of a foreign enemy, who had a deep interest in, and close correspondency with, a very great party of all sorts in this nation) effected nothing of their main end, God being pleased so signally to evidence his indignation against them; yet it is very evident in what condition the Liberty of the people had been, as to all human support, if the Army had not been in a readiness to have opposed that design, which that traiterous Party did so vigorously drive on, under the pretence of easing their burthens, to leave them naked of all defence against the prepared attempts of their malice.—This grand design of mischief is still carried on, although by other agents, and under another pretence: the former agents have now neither credit nor power; and therefore being able to contribute to that cause no more than the first Malignants themselves, they now appear not. Another course is resolved and pursued; they saw they were not able to beat the Army, nor disband it, nor persuade the people they might spare it, so they attempt to corrupt the discipline of it, and debauch the fidelity of the private soldiers, and make them theirs: and while the endeavours are strong to re-establish Monarchy and Tyranny, and to make the people absolute slaves, nothing is to be held out to them but Liberty, and make them believe there is nothing hinders it but the parliament.—And the apparent actors in this must be those called Levellers, none being so fit as they to destroy the peoples Liberty unsuspected, if they once undertake it, as having endeavoured already (though there be little cause for it) to make them believe they are the only faithful Patriots, the asserters and maintainers of it. Some of those having made defection from that profession they sometimes made of Religion and Godliness, and having entertained principles of Atheism and Licentiousness, and practised accordingly, found that the practising of those principles would not be borne in a Commonwealth, under a good and just government, where Justice hath its course, and Property is maintained; where sobriety and temperance is in reputation, and the purity and Power and life of Religion and Godliness is countenanced and promoted.—And knowing that, if the pretended interest of Charles Stuart could be set up, the managing of it would be in the hands of those that are of as atheistical and licentious principles as themselves; and that they might in such a government, without either shame or danger, let out their lusts without controul) they have espoused that interest, come off to that side, held correspondency with him and his party: and in pursuance thereof have, for some while past, directed all their actions to the ruin of this Commonwealth, and enslaving the people; whom they deceive, in the mean time, with the name of Liberty, with which they would cloak their own licentiousness.—These principles and this practice of theirs is evident to all who observe their walkings and their Correspondency: besides, what, from the abundance of their hearts, flow from their pens in what they publish to the world, take this testimony of an intercepted Letter, written from one who hath been employed to corrupt them, and thereby drive on the main design; it needs no comment, it speaks plain, and is as follows:

'May it please your Lordships; Yours of the 3rd instant came to my hand; in return whereof know, that all our hopes here depend on his majesty's seeming compliance with Lilbourne and the Levelling Party, whose discontents increase daily; without which it is impossible for any of his Party here to be serviceable, unless upon their principles. For my own part, I am serviceable to that end with my utmost abilities. I have not been wanting to endeavour the creating Jealousies and Discontents, thereby to ruin the most potent: in order whereunto I have caused Lenthall, the Speaker, to be accused by some discontented persons, prisoners, to whom I have been very prodigal, both in rewards and promises of freedom; insomuch that they have prosecuted him so cunningly that many considerable persons, both in the Army and City, are engaged therein. And to the end the Plot may take to the purpose, I have insinuated by my agents, into some of the Levelling Party, that it is a design of the Grandees to remove him, to the end they may make their lord-president, Bradshaw, Speaker in his room; which hath taken such effect among the simple-hearted Levellers, that they, so far as I can apprehend, are resolved to join their interest with the Speaker's, to prevent so great a mischief, as they call it; by which means I doubt not but to accomplish a design that shall pull down those two great pillars of their new Commonwealth.—As touching the State of Affairs here, in relation to his majesty, I find that his friends increase daily, (as to matter of affection) but have no possibility of embodying, although some endeavours have been that way, unless the Levellers lead the way; which (although some overtures have been made to prevent) will be, I hope, suddenly put in execution. To that purpose I desire some assistance may be given me; for without supplies of money little can be expected, those I converse with all being either extreme needy or covetous. I have sent a faithful agent over sea, to salute and attend the motion of his Irish Excellency. I doubt not but shortly you will receive a good account touching that business. Sir, I pray be mindful of him, that as a prisoner for his affection to the service of his majesty, hath been wanting in nothing, according to his utmost possibilities, that might manifest his loyalty to his king, and respect to your lordship.* T. was inclosed, indorsed thus, 'For 250, these.' The outer case thus, 'A M. M. Robert Shamatre, au quatre Vents Rue perdue, proche la Place Maubert, à Paris.' In which was written thus; 'Sir, I beseech you, as heretofore, convey the inclosed as directed; the performance hereof will exceedingly oblige Your Friend, T. F.'—And whereas the principal means that God hath used to procure the liberty we now enjoy, hath been the councils and authority of the Parliament, and the faithfulness of the Army: these men have attempted upon both; they have, by their false, seditious, and treasonable invectives and Pamphlets, laboured to render the parliament not only contemptible, but abominable to all the people, that they might weaken and take off that respect and reverence they owe to them, from whose obedience they designed to debauch them, and so be left without any visible power to direct them; and that this Commonwealth might run into tumultuary confusions in the infancy, and not grow up into any measure of strength and settlement, in the hands of those whom God hath owned and used as instruments to bring the Work thus far; and who, by long use, might reasonably be supposed to have gotten some experience in that great Work: all their endeavours have been improved to procure a Dissolution of this Parliament, and the calling of a new Representative, pretending the people ought to have the liberty of new and frequent elections; though they very well know that, as the present distemper of the people was, the violence of faction, and activity of their secret enemies, either these elections could not be free, or the people must have lost their liberty by it, which was the thing they had in design and prosecution.—And to give them an experiment how much liberty they were like to have enjoyed under the managing of these men whose principles of tyranny are as the loins to the little finger of those whom they so much cry down; that crude conception of the 'Agreement of the People,' which was the first birth of a few of themselves, must be obtruded upon them as a super-parliamentary law, without receiving and owning of which, no man should have enjoyed those liberties they so much boast to be the unquestionable birthright of every free-born man.—For the Army; they knew the officers were above their secret practice, they therefore apply to the Soldiers; and, by their emissaries every where, infuse into them their doctrine of disobedience. And knowing well how the design of Charles Stuart was laid for Ireland, and into what hopeful condition for his party his affairs were there grown, all their endeavours were used to hinder the sending of forces thither, to prevent his greatness there, from whence he might have been considerably dangerous to this nation: they delivered for good political doctrine, 'That Ireland was a free kingdom, had been conquered by force, had justly vindicated their own liberty, and ought not to be compelled to any obedience or subordination to this nation; that the soldiers ought not to suffer themselves to be transported thither; they had indeed fought for their own liberty here, but ought not to be commanded out of their own to take away that of others.' And what effect this had, and how far and how long the Relief of Ireland was hindered by the disobedience and mutinies by them caused, is very well known? so as if God had not been pleased, by no less than a miracle, to give victory to a small handful of our men there, even besides their own intention, and beyond their design, against a very great Army of the enemy's, there had not been left a landing-place in Ireland for our Army, but what they must have fought for.—They also continually suggested to the soldiers, That the parliament was a Nest of Tyrants, and therefore to be destroyed as public enemies; with much more of this kind, both published in print, and so dispersed, and otherwise disseminated among them; and what effects this doctrine wrought, the defection begun in some regiments in Wiltshire and other places, (though, by the mercy of God, soon ended at Burford) and now lately at Oxford, hath sufficiently manifested: which disobedience, if it had proceeded further, and not been restrained by that special providence which hath set bounds to the sea which it cannot pass, we might soon have been without an army to have served the Commonwealth against their attempts, who had laid their designs to appear then, when the distempers in the Army should be ready for them; as at that time the Surprise of Weymouth was appointed by capt. Gardiner and his accomplices, by commission from Charles Stuart.—And to the end also the Army might be the more easily corrupted in its discipline, and made odious to the people, all means are used to keep the Army at free-quarter, whereby they might gratify licentiousness, while soldiers were unpaid, and so left to live at discretion; they pursue the former method, complain of Burthens, cry down Excise and Taxes, but not a word of Danger; they know without these, at present, an army cannot be paid, or the liberty of the people preserved: if this art had succeeded, and the people had absolutely refused to pay, the Army must either have come to free-quarter, heavier than all taxes, or must have broken, and then the Commonwealth had been again actually in the hands of tyranny.—To persuade the people the better, they represent unto them what vast sums are daily levied; tell of many millions, with a sufficient multiplication, that have been collected, of which no account, they say, can be given: that they are beyond all that ever was laid upon them by Monarchy in the worst of times; and they leave no way unattempted to aggravate every inconvenience, to make the people sensible of their smart, that they may throw away their plaister, and die of their wounds: indeed we cannot but acknowledge that the present burthens are great, and we have reason ourselves to be as sensible of them as any others, having no exemption from them according to the proportion of our estates, where ever they lie: and there is nothing that is more in our desires and endeavours, than that we may be able to abate the Taxes; and, in time, to take them off, that the people might come to enjoy intirely the fruit of that which hath cost them so dear; and we hope, through the blessing of God, disposing the minds of the people to a cheerful co-operation in this work, with a calmness and patience for a little while longer, there will be a happy end of these troubles, and a sure settlement of the peace of this Commonwealth, in the true, good, and just liberty of the people.—But, for the better preservation of the people from the distempers that might arise from such suggestions, we desire them to consider that if the burthens they bear be great, yet by whose means, and for what cause, were they laid on? Phisic may be, and often is, more troublesome than the disease; yet the tendency of the one is to health and recovery, the other to death; and from that difference the election is clear and easy: and though the art of restoring a dislocated joint is much more torment than the quiet suffering of the present pain, yet every man prefers that torment before lameness. No man refuseth to procure antidotes in time of epidemical diseases, though at very dear rates, because it is for his preservation; nor to buy food and cloathing, because he cannot live without them. And we doubt not but, if men would without prejudice consider that they can no more live, or live free, without an Army, than without food, as the present state of affairs stand; and that they now are in times of such general distempers, as that there is need of such a remedy, they would be beyond the danger of being seduced by these pretences.—And whereas the Liberty of the People is so highly cried up by these deceivers, as being that for which men must thus adventure all; we do acknowledge, that a just and well-regulated liberty, under just and good laws that may preserve it from participation of, or degenerating into, anarchy and confusion, is a most desirable thing, and that which may deserve the utmost hazard of all that is dear to a man; but we desire them to consider, that this was seized into such hands as it could not be purchased from without a vast expence, nor secured without trouble and charge; which we therefore, though with a tender sense and with much reluctancy, are, for the present, necessitated to raise. Those who cry out upon it, and would have all burthens, all taxes, taken off for the Liberty of the People, are those who at best (if they be not professedly enemies) are yet acted and abused by them, as instruments to destroy all our true liberties, to reduce us again under the power of a worse tyranny, than we ever yet were under: and to this the people must themselves be made instrumental, while they pursue an empty name of that thing, the possession whereof they already have, and may keep and enjoy, if they will not be abused by those who, under the pretence of that name, which is in itself most desirable, would bring into the nation what in themselves they have entertained, both in principle and practice; namely, atheism, licentiousness, with anarchy and confusion of all things.—We have thought it necessary, at this time, to make this discovery of those men, and to give this warning of them; and, God assisting us, shall not cease to watch against, and suppress, all their designs, and oppose all their practices: and as our duty is, in respect of our great trust, we shall endeavour to make the people happy, and promote their good; and shall not give over that good work, for any discouragements from the unkindness and unthankfulness of those for whom our labours are intended.—And if we have suffered these distempers to proceed thus far, and have not put forth the power that resides in us to secure the Commonwealth and good patriots from the dangers that are here represented; let it be considered what weighty affairs have been upon us, and how much hath been done since we were a Commonwealth. Besides that, the whole body hath been in a long and dangerous disease; and it could not be expected but, though the cure be perfect, yet many humours would remain that might possibly be capable to be altered; and, being so, be more profitable to the body than to be purged out; and we thought it convenient to wait, if their better consideration of affairs, and of their duty, would reduce them to a better temper: but now finding some incorrigible, and that our tenderness to their errors (which we would willingly have called mistakes) is interpreted to be weakness and fear by those that offend, and slackness and negligence by those who are in danger; we do hereby declare, That we have resolved to alter that course: and as justice hath been lately done on some at Oxford, in a military and martial way, who were subject to that jurisdiction, and shall be in like manner on any other that shall so offend; so we have issued special commissions of Oyer and Terminer, for the speedy Trial of the chief of those who have laid and carried on those dangerous designs: and shall be ready to spare the rest for present, whose repentance and sorrow for their past crimes may render them capable of mercy; and who shall give sufficient security, that they will not hereafter endanger or disturb the peace of the Commonwealth. And we do also hereby declare, That as we shall have in especial esteem all good patriots, and, for their just advantage upon all occasions, take notice of those who deserve well of the Commonwealth; so if any shall hereafter practise against the Commonwealth and the present government thereof, and shall offend against the laws established, of whatever quality, condition, or calling they are, there shall be a speedy and severe proceeding against them, without favour or respect of persons; that we may, so far as God shall enable us, fulfil the end of magistracy, in being a terror to the evil-doers, and for the praise and encouragement of them that do well. HEN. SCOBELL, Cler. Parl."

Drogheda taken by Cromwell.] Oct. 2. This day the house received dispatches from Cromwell, dated Dublin, Sept. 17, giving an account of the taking of Drogheda. For this important success of the parliament's forces in Ireland, the house appointed a Thanksgiving-Day to be held on the 1st of Nov. ensuing throughout the nation. They likewise ordered, that a Declaration should be prepared and sent into the several counties, signifying the Grounds for setting apart that day of public Thanksgiving. A Letter of Thanks was also voted to be sent to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and to be communicated to the officers there; in which notice was to be taken, That the house did approve of the execution done at Drogheda, as an act both of justice to them, and mercy to others who may be warned by it*.

The Parliament resolve that an Engagement to be true to the Commonwealth Government, be subscribed by all public Officers.] Oct. 11. This day a Resolution was passed, That every Member who then did, or should hereafter, sit in that house, should subscribe his name to the following Engagement, viz. "I do declare and promise, that I will be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England, as the same is now established without a King or House of Lords." And that these subscriptions should begin the next morning. Accordingly, the next day, the Speaker first, and afterwards divers Members did subscribe this Engagement.—Ordered, also, that the General, and all the Officers and Soldiers of the Army should do the same: that the Judges of the several Courts at Westminster, all the serjeants at law, counsellors, officers, ministers, and clerks, and all attornies and solicitors, should subscribe this Engagement. The same orders was sent into Ireland; to the lord mayor of London; to the generals, and admirals of the fleets; to the judges of the Courts of Admiralty and the Civil Law, to the readers, benchers, &c. of the several Inns of Court and Chancery: in short, to all and singular persons that bore any office, civil, religious, or military, and those under them, throughout all England, Wales, and all the English Dominions; who were to subscribe

* The Marquis of Ormond, the regal lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in his Letters to Charles II. and lord Byron, in relation to the storming of Drogheda, remarks, "That on this occasion Cromwell exceeded himself, and any thing he had ever heard of, in breach of faith and bloody inhumanity; and that the cruelties exercised there for five days after the town was taken, would make as many several pictures of inhumanity as are to be found in the Book of Martyrs, or in the relation of Amboyna." Carte's Life of James, duke of Ormond, vol. ii. p. 84.

this Engagement, or else be rendered incapable of holding any such office or employment, public or private, for ever after.—The house also ordered the style, heretofore used in the Orders and Acts of the house, viz. 'By the Commons in Parliament assembled,' to be no more used, but, instead thereof, these words, viz. 'By the Parliament.' As the first instance of which it was, at the same time, ordered, That the Title to the Engagement be changed, and made 'Resolved by the Parliament, &c.'

Wexford taken by Cromwell.] Oct. 30. The house received an account from Ireland of the taking of Wexford by the Parliament's forces. The Letters from lieut. gen. Cromwell on this occasion are mentioned in the Journals, but not entered there.—The parliament ordered their lord-lieutenant's Account of this action to be published by the Clergy in their respective congregations, on the Day appointed for a Thanksgiving to God for their late Success at Drogheda.

Charles II. lands in the Isle of Jersey, and publishes a Declaration of his Right to the Crown.] Nov. 6. About this time the parliament received advice, 'That Charles Stuart, eldest son of the late king, had left St. Germain's, and was arrived in the Island of Jersey, with a retinue of about 300 persons, where he had been proclaimed king; and that, upon an invitation from the Marquis of Ormond, he intended speedily to embark for Dublin.' His majesty continued in Jersey some months; but being informed of Cromwell's great successes in Ireland, gave over all thoughts of going thither, and removed to Breda; where Commissioners from the States of Scotland having attended on him with some Propositions for his Restoration, he resolved to embark for that kingdom. During his stay in the Island of Jersey, he issued the following Declaration; which, as the press was at this time under so heavy an embargo in England by the late Licensing Act, we may well presume could not be printed in this kingdom; and that probably was the reason of its being done at the Hague*.

His Majesty's DECLARATION to all his loving Subjects in his kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, published with the Advice of his Privy Council. CHARLES, the Second of that Name, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all Persons within our Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, to whom these presents shall come, greeting.

"We cannot, without unspeakable grief and sorrow, call to mind, nor, without horror, express, how that our dear and royal father,

king Charles, of ever blessed memory, hath been most barbarously and most cruelly murdered by the hands of bloody traitors and rebels, within our kingdom of England, with proceedings and circumstances so prodigious, that the particulars induce rather amazement than expression: and although we have hitherto seemed silent in a matter so highly concerning us, as not publicly to express to the people of England our grief of heart and high detestation of that heinous fact; yet being now safely arrived in a small part of our own dominions, at the Island of Jersey, we have thought fit rather from hence, where our kingly authority takes place, than from any foreign country, where we have been hitherto necessitated to reside, publickly to declare, That, out of a bitter sense and indignation of those horrid proceedings against our dear father, we are, according to the laws of nature and justice, firmly resolved, by the assistance of Almighty God, though we perish alone in the enterprize, to be a severe avenger of his innocent blood, which was so barbarously spilt, and which calls so loud to heaven for vengeance. And we shall therein, by all ways and means possible, endeavour to pursue and bring to their due punishment those bloody traitors, who were either actors or contrivers of that unparalleled and inhuman murder. And since it hath pleased God so to dispose, as by such an untimely Martyrdom to deprive us of so good a father, and England of so gracious a king, we do further declare, 'That, by his death, the crown of England, with all privileges, rights, and pre-eminences belonging thereunto, is, by a clear and undoubted right of succession, justly and lineally descended upon us, as next and immediate heir and successor thereunto, without any condition or limitation; without any intermission or claim; without any ceremony or solemnity whatsoever: and that, by virtue thereof, we are now in right lawfully seized of the said crown, and ought, by the laws of God, and that nation, to enjoy a royal power there as well in Church as Commonwealth; to govern the people of that kingdom according to the antient and known laws; to maintain them in peace and justice; and to protect and defend them from the oppression of any usurped power whatsoever. And the people of that nation, by the like laws, owe unto us, and ought reciprocally to pay, duty and obedience, as unto their liege lord and sovereign. This royal right of ours is grounded upon so clear a title, is settled by such fundamental laws, confirmed by so many oaths of allegiance in all ages, is supported by such a long continued succession in our royal progenitors, and by such a constant submission of all the people, that the same can admit of no dispute: no act of our predecessors can debar us of it; no power on earth can justly take it from us; and, by the undoubted laws of that nation, to oppose us, either in the claim or exercise thereof, is a treason of the highest degree.—And although the bloody contrivers of our father's Murder, out of a pernicious hatred to all monarchies, have by force, as much as in them lies, disinherited us of our princely right thereunto; banished and proscribed us; seized all our revenues; prohibited all intercourse and supplies to be sent to us; and have, by violence, imposed upon the people of England a new yoke of popular tyranny, to the utter subversion not only of our just rights, but of their laws and liberties; yet we do profess that we cannot persuade ourself that the body of the English nation hath so far degenerated from their antient loyalty and virtue, as to consent to these horrid proceedings against us, or to approve the casting off that Kingly Government under which they and their forefathers have happily flourished so many ages past, to the envy of all their neighbour nations. How can that once happy nation of England despair of blessed days under a royal sceptre, and vainly hope for them under the iron rod of an insolent multitude? no, we cannot look upon these sad and dismal changes as the desires or intentions of the better part of our subjects of that kingdom; but rather as the designs and contrivances of those wicked Murderers of our father; whose ambition is endless; whose avarice is insatiable; and whose guilt hath made them desperate: and therefore, out of a confidence we have of the loyalty and good affections of many of our subjects of that nation, and as well for their encouragement, who still persist in their natural allegiance and obedience to us, as for the security of such as shall yet return to their duties and loyalties, we have thought fit hereby further to declare.—That we are graciously pleased to receive all persons of our kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, other than such who voted or acted in that bloody Murder of our dear father, into our royal grace mercy, and protection; owning and esteeming them all as our good and loving subjects, whom, upon access to our kingly authority, we shall hold ourself bound, according to the law of God, the known laws of that nation, and the duty of our kingly office, to protect, maintain, and preserve in wealth, peace and happiness. And for a clear evidence of our good intentions towards them, we shall be contented freely to pardon, or otherwise by act to declare or hold indemnified, all persons within our said kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, except as before excepted, for any matters whatsoever relating to the late unhappy wars and distractions. And we shall, according to the example of our dear father, be ready, upon the establishment of our royal throne, to make such further concessions, for the satisfaction and security of our good subjects in general, and of all interests in particular, as shall be adjudged most to conduce to the peace and happiness of that kingdom.—And we do further declare, That we shall give our utmost assistance to restore parliaments to their antient dignity and honour, and shall preserve their just privileges, and join to repair all those injuries and affronts which have been done to the members of that high court.—And because all ways of gaining a mutual confidence betwixt us and our good subjects are at present obstructed, by the usurped force and power now prevalent in that kingdom, we are therefore resolved to make use of such expedients as shall be necessary for the suppression of that tyrannical and unjust power now exercised over them, and for bringing to their due punishment those bloody Murderers of our dear father, for shaking off the heavy burdens and taxes they now groan under, and for restoring our just rights, and the antient liberties and freedom of the English nation; not doubting but we shall find all our good subjects ready to concur and to assist us in our just and pious undertakings for those ends.—And, in the mean time, we require and command all our said subjects, according to their duty to God, their allegiance to us, their several oaths and protestations, and the love and affection they bear to the peace of their native country, that they do not betray their lawful king, nor the glorious liberties and laws of England, into a perpetual slavery, by acknowledgment of, or voluntary submission to, any new forms or models of government, under the name or mask of a Free State, nor under any other title or pretence whatsoever. Given at our court at Castle Elizabeth, in our Isle of Jersey, 31st Oct. 1649, the 1st year of our reign."

Nov. 13. On the 24th of last month the house having received information that Clement Walker, esq. (one of the secluded Members) had published a Book, intitled 'Anarchia Anglicana*', he was ordered to be sent for in custody of the serjeant at arms, with power to enter into any house, and break open any doors or locks for that purpose; also to search for, and seize, all his papers and writings. And it was referred to the Council of State to find out the printers and publishers of the said Book, and all others who had any hand therein. On the 13th of this month Mr. Walker having been apprehended accordingly, he was committed prisoner to the Tower, in order to his trial for High Treason.

The Town of Ross surrendered to Cromwell.
Nov. 16. This day came a Letter from lieutenant general Cromwell, concerning the surrender of the town of Ross to the parliament's forces. The house ordered the said Letter, with the Articles of Surrender, to be printed and published. They likewise referred it to the Council of State to send over Supplies of all kinds forthwith to the Army in Ireland.

* This forms the Second Part of 'The History of Independency,' published in the Name of Theodorus Verax. A Third Part was afterwards published, by the same Author, intitled, 'The High Court of Justice, or Cromwell's new Slaughter-House in England.' It was reprinted in 1660, with Mr. Walker's name to it, and a Fourth Part added by another hand.

Mr. Whitlocke's Speech in favour of Lawyers being elected Members of Parliament. In the proceedings of this month, as Mr. Whitlocke informs us, "There was a great peak taken against the Lawyers; insomuch that the old odium against them was revived, and it was said in the debate, 'That it was not fit for Lawyers, who were members of parliament, if any lawyers ought to be there at all, to plead or practise as Lawyers during the time they sat as members of parliament;' which gave occasion to one of that profession," meaning himself, "to speak as follows."

"Mr. Speaker; I was unwilling again to have troubled you upon this argument, had I not been again called up by the mistakes of the worthy gentleman that spoke last, to give a true account of these matters, and to vindicate the honour of that profession whereof I am an unworthy member. The gentleman was pleased to intimate, 'That Lawyers were heretofore excluded from being members of Parliament.' I suppose he had not much studied the records of that matter, and therefore related the discourses of others by hearsay only; but for his conviction, and for the satisfaction of others, I shall acquaint you with the clear passages of what he aimed at, as I suppose; and as I find them upon record, which is much more authentic than some (perhaps) table-talk, or discourses at random.—The statute 23 Edw. 3. called the members of parliament 'the learned men,' whereof many were learned in the laws, and therefore supposed to have had that title. But shortly after this the great men degenerating, in the old age of the same king, into several factions, and being much offended with those who were learned in the laws, because they hindered their oppressions by pleading the right of law on the behalf of their clients, in 46 Edw. 3. they petitioned that 'Nul home de ley pursuont besioignes en le court le Roy; ne viscount, pour le temps qu'il est viscount, soient retournes ne acceptes chivaliers des countees:' 'That no man of law, following business in the King's courts, nor sheriffs, be returned or accepted for knights of shires.' To this the king answers, 'Voet le roy que chivaliers, et serjeants des meaux vaultes du pays, soient retournés desore chivaliers en parliaments, et qu'ils soient eleus en pleine counté:' 'The king willeth that knights and serjeants (that is, esquires) of the best rank in the county be from henceforth returned to be knights in parliament, and that they be chosen in full county.'—After this Ordinance, and pursuant to it, a clause was inserted into the writ for chusing members for the house of commons, 5 Hen. 4. to this effect, 'Nolumus autem quod tu, seu aliquis alius vicecomes regni nostri, sive aliquis alius homo ad legem, aliquo qualiter sit electus:' 'We will not that you, or any other sheriff of our kingdom, or any other man of law, by any means be chosen.' According to this Ordinance and clause of Nolumus, the sheriffs have been since excluded from sitting in parliament as members, during the time of their sherifalty; the debate of which point was had, and full of learning, in a former parliament, in the case of a very learned and worthy person, sir Edw. Coke, whom most of us knew. He, being made sheriff of Bucks upon displeasure against him, was chosen knight of the shire for Bucks, and sat in parliament; and I had the honour then to be a young parliament-man, in the 2nd year of the late king*. The objections against him were 'the constant usage not to permit Sheriffs to sit as parliament-men; their oath to reside in their counties, the custody whereof was committed to them; and that their office was but annual, and so the disability was but for that time only.' But for a man to be disabled from being a parliament man, in regard of his being a lawyer, is to disable him during his life, or his continuance in his profession by which he gains his livelihood; and they are not public officers, obliged to another attendance on the public affairs, as the sheriffs are. Yet it is true that in the parliament, which was held 6 Hen. 4. all lawyers were excluded, and none of them returned to serve in that parliament; and perhaps from some general discourse hereof by others, the worthy gentleman is pleased, with confidence, to vent his doctrine and motion: but in case he did read, and understand the records of this Ordinance, and of the Clause of Nolumus, yet, I suppose he never looked into the ground of this business, nor into that which followed thereupon; wherein I shall hope to satisfy him, and so as to alter his opinion. King Henry 4. being in great want of money, summoned that parliament, and caused to be inserted in the writ this clause of Nolumus to exclude the lawyers; because he doubted that they would oppose his excessive demands which he was to make to the parliament. Walsingham saith, That all the lawyers being excluded, the Demands of the king were by this means obtained; and by this parliament was granted an unusual tax, and to the people, tristabilis & valde gravis, 'a tax full of trouble and very grievous;' whereof, the Historian saith, he would have set down the manner, had not the granters and authors of the same desired to be concealed for ever to posterity, by causing the papers and records thereof to be burnt.—Mr. Speaker, This is the precedent intimated by the worthy gentleman; and this was the occasion and issue of that precedent, the like whereof, I presume, is not wished by him. Walsingham styles that parliament, in the margin, 'Parliamentum indoctorum,' the 'parliament of unlearned men.' Speed, in his history, saith, That this parliament was called 'the Lack-learning Parliament, either for the unlearnedness of the persons, or for their malice unto learning.' But God hath blessed this nation with such an age of learned men at this present, that former times knew not; and we must acknowledge that, though the house should lack

all their members who are lawyers, yet the rest are of so great abilities that there would be no lack of learning: yet, sir, I am sure that the addition of those many learned gentlemen of our profession hath been, and will be, some help in your affairs, and will not be despised by any prudent men. The worthy gentleman was pleased slightly to call them 'Gownmen, who had not undergone the dangers and hardships that martial men had done:' and truly it might less become the gentleman that said it, than others, to make that observation, if it had been so. The antient Romans were soldiers, though gownmen; nor doth that gown abate either a man's courage or his wisdom, or render him less capable of using a sword when the laws are silent, or you command it. You all know this to be true by the great services performed by lieut. general Jones, commissary Ireton, and many of the members, and other lawyers; who, putting off their gowns when you required it, have served you stoutly and successfully as soldiers, and undergone almost as many and as great dangers and hardships, as the gentleman who so much undervalues all of them. But we are now speaking of their right to be chosen, and to sit as members of the parliament; which doubtless is as much and the same with all other the commoners of England.—The Historian last mentioned saith, That the commons of England, who have liberty in the choice of their knights and burgesses, would not be debarred thereof by the Ordinance of Edw. 3. nor by the clause of Nolumus inserted in the writ Hen. 4. but have made a constant choice of some of them to serve for them in all parliaments. The lord Coke, 4 Instit. p. 48, holds, That the Ordinance, 46 Edw. 3, by the general words of 5. Rich. 2. stat. 2. c. 4. and 7 Hen. 4. c. 15, was repealed: however, we read not of any parliament, except that unhappy one 6 Hen. 4. in which the lawyers were excluded; and after not a few considerable services, both civil and military, performed by some of them for you, it was somewhat an ungrateful motion now to have excluded them.—We may lay aside the clause of Nolumus, lest other clauses of Nolumus, which we find in the writs of summons, do come as near home to others. Sometime clauses were inserted in the writs for election of commoners, to this purpose, 'Nolumus autem quod aliquis de retinentia domini nostri regis aliquo sit electus?' 'We will not that any the retinue of our lord the king, in anywise, be chosen.'—Though, sir, I acknowledge that worthy gentleman, and many others who have been the king's servants and courtiers, have been very faithful to you, and done you acceptable services; and so some of them have done in former parliaments, and I hope you all do think so; yet the undervaluing of our profession to be members of parliament, hath less strength coming from such gentlemen, than from others; because of them, some from abroad will be apt to say, though scandalously, That courtiers and king's servants used to sit in parliament rather to promote their master's ends than their country's rights; but such Objections are now out of doors.—The like passage with this we are now debating is related in the Roman Story, when the law Cinna was made, whereby it was provided, 'That, for pleading of causes, no man should take either money or gift;' and this law was endeavoured, upon the like grounds, to be set on foot presently after the death of Tiberius Cæsar. But when some alledged that this would cause the want of counsellors and advocates, whereby the poor would be oppressed by the rich and mighty; that eloquence did not come by chance, or gratis, without study and labour; that the care of a man's own family was neglected, whilst he attended other men's affairs; that some maintained their life by war, some by tilling the earth, yet no man laboured in these callings, or to attain knowledge, but for the commodity arising thereby; that the meanest of the people endeavoured what they could to better their estates, and that if the reward of studies should be taken away, studies also would decay, as having neither glory nor honour. Upon these reasons the senate thought it not just, and I hope this senate will be of the same judgment, to take away the Honorarium of advocates; but limited the same to 1000 sesterces, which some compute to be about 78*l.* of our money. Neither, saith Tacitus, did that law continue or gain compliance to it. Neither do I think that such a law amongst us would be to any effect, or have any compliance to it. But I hope this honourable English senate, and that worthy gentleman, a member of it, will be satisfied with the reasons given in the Roman senate, who were very wise men; and not trouble themselves about such new laws, which will be ineffectual, prejudicial to many, and good to none.—But the gentleman objected, and it is much urged in these times, against the profession of the law and the professors of it, 'That they are the occasion of multiplicity of suits,' and of delays in them; and therefore, after the example of some foreign countries, not to be permitted. I have observed to you before, that those in power have most reason to be displeased with this profession, as a bridle to their power; but that the profession occasions multiplicity of suits, is as improbable as any other of his reasons or his arguments.—Mr. Speaker, the reason of the multiplicity of suits and law causes amongst us, is the greatness of our trade, which causeth a multitude of contracts, and these occasion a multitude of law suits. In those countries, mentioned by that worthy gentleman, there is not one of his profession, one merchant, or one contractor, for 100 in England; that is the cause they have so few law suits and we so many. And give me leave sir, to tell him, that in the Netherlands, and countries where there is much trade, there are proportionably as many law suits as there are in England.—Another ground of what I affirm, is that, in foreign countries, every man's estate is disposed of by their law, after a certain rule and proportion, which the possessor cannot, either by conveyance or by his testament, afterwards alter. As when one dies his estate is thus divided by the law; his wife hath a part set out for her, the eldest son hath a double portion, and all the other sons have equal portions, and every two daughters have as much as one son, of the whole estate of their father thus divided by law. Whereas, with us, every possessor of an estate hath power to dispose of it by his deed, or by his will, as he pleases, which must necessarily occasion the more differences and suits at law, upon constructions of those deeds and wills, and contests of parties claiming, than where the known law gives a certain rule and distribution of estates, which none can alter.—Another ground of what I say is the freedom of our nation, where every one hath equal right and title to his estate, and there is as full property to the meanest as to the greatest person; which causeth our countrymen to insist upon their right and privileges, and to contest for them with the greatest men, or the prince himself, if the right of law be on their side. This occasions many more law suits than do arise in those countries where the boors and peasants do wholly depend upon the will of their lords, to whom they are slaves, and dare not dispute any matter of right with him, but tamely submit unto their lord's good or had pleasure. And though in some of these Northern countries they have no counsellors at law, as a public profession, because the smallness of their law business will not maintain them, and the great lords are oft-times there parties and judges themselves; yet in Germany, France, Spain, and other countries, the doctors and professors of the law are in great numbers and credit, and gain vast estates, though by small fees, yet often taken, and long continuing; whereof, particularly in France, there are many precedents. And if we look so far as the times of the ancient Romans and Grecians, their lawyers will be found numerous, and of esteem among them; and when their Common-wealth enjoyed the greatest freedom, this profession was in the highest reputation.—Sir, the worthy gentleman was pleased to mention one thing with some weight, 'That lawyers were permitted to counsel and plead for men in matters touching their estates and liberties; but in the greatest matters of all others, concerning a man's life and posterity, lawyers were not permitted to plead for their clients.' I confess I cannot answer this objection, 'That, for a trespass of a sixpence value, a man may have a counsellor to plead for him; but where his life and posterity are concerned, he is not admitted this privilege and help of lawyers. A law to reform this, I think, would be just, and give right to the people.—What is said in defence or excuse of this custom is, 'That the judges are of counsel for the prisoners, and are to see that they have no wrong.' And are they not to take the same care of all causes that shall be tried before them? To that part of the gentleman's motion, 'That lawyers, being members of the house, should, during that time, forbear their practice and pleading,' I shall only give this Answer, That, in the act which he may be pleased to bring in for this purpose, it may likewise be inserted, that merchants shall forbear their trading, physicians from visiting their patients, and country-gentlemen forbear to sell their corn and wool whilst they sit as members of this house; which hath the same reason as to debar lawyers from their practice. But I doubt, sir, I have held you too long. My profession, and the subject matter of the debate, will plead in my excuse; and I hope, sir, by your prudence, such motions as these will be less frequent among us."

December. Business now grew very slack in the house; they did not sit above 4 days in a week, constantly adjourning from Friday till Tuesday following; and when they did meet their numbers were so few, as frequently to divide, in all under 40.

Taking of Enistery, Carrick, &c. by Cromwell.] Dec. 12. This day a Letter arrived from lieut. general Cromwell, with the intelligence of the taking of Enistery, Carrick, &c. These repeated Successes produced an Order for public Thanks to be given to Almighty God, on the next Lord's Day, in the several Churches in and about the city of London; where the lord-lieutenant of Ireland's Letter was to be publickly read to the congregations.

Col. Lilbourne's Election as a Common Council-Man of London, declared void by Parliament.] Dec. 26. Mention has been made, at p. 1306, of col. Lilbourne, and his commitment to the Tower by the Council of State. Having been tried by a special commission at the Guild-Hall, but acquitted by his jury; and, soon after, elected a common-council-man of London; this day a Petition was presented to the house, from several Aldermen and the Sheriffs of the same, against him, on which they resolved, "That lieut. col. Lilbourne was, by the late act, 'For disabling the Election of divers persons to any office or place of trust within the city of London,' disabled to be chosen a common-council-man; and his election was void."

Estimate of the Charge of the Fleet.] January 1. This month begins with an Estimate of the Charge of fitting and setting out a Fleet of 44 men of war and 28 merchant ships, manned with 8082 men, to serve for 8 months on the narrow seas, as a Summer's Guard for the year 1650. The house approved of this Estimate, amounting to 886,220*l.* and ordered the commissions of their three Admirals to be renewed for one whole year. The Names of all the Ships intended for this Summer's Guard are entered on the Journals; 3 of which being there styled the Prince, the Charles, and the Mary, the house ordered that it be referred to the Council of State to give other fit Names to those Ships. So intent were they upon extinguishing all remains of Monarchy, that they would not bear even the mention of the names of the late king, or any of his family.

The House resolve that Gen. Cromwell be desired to come home.] Jan. 8. The parliament having received Letters from general Cromwell, lord lieut. of Ireland, major-gen. Ireton, and the lord Broghill, dated at Cork the 18th and 19th ult. it was resolved, That the said lord-lieutenant be desired to come over, and give his attendance in parliament: and that the Council of State do prepare a letter to be sent to him for that purpose, to be signed by the Speaker; and at the same time to render him the Thanks of the house for his great service and faithfulness to the Common-wealth.—The same day, a Bill, which had been some time depending, for settling certain Lands upon Cromwell and his heirs, was reported to the house, and ordered a second reading.

Jan. 10. The house ordered their attorney-general to prepare a Patent to be passed under the great seal of England, appointing major-general Ireton to be President of the Province of Munster, he observing such Instructions as should be given him by the parliament, council of state, or the lord-lieut. of Ireland for the time being. As Cromwell's commission to the last-mentioned post was granted for 3 years, this advancement of his son-in-law must have been a prodigious addition to his influence and authority in that kingdom.

The House resolve upon a Style of Address to them from foreign Powers.] Jan. 30. Upon the lord Grey's report from the Council of State, That they had agreed that the Style to be used in all transactions with foreign Powers should run thus, 'Reipublicæ Anglicanæ Ordines,' unless the parliament thought fit to appoint any other: after debate it was resolved, "That, in all negotiations and transactions with foreign States, the Style or Title to be used should be 'Parliamentum Reipublicæ Angliæ:' that the lords commissioners of the great seal be required to pass, under the great seal of England, several commissions in common form, mutatis mutandis, to the two agents appointed by the Council of State, to be employed to Spain and Portugal: and that the style and title of every address to the parliament from foreign princes and states shall be 'The Parliament of the Common-wealth of England,' and no other style or title whatsoever."

Several Garrisons in Munster surrender to the Parliament's Forces.] Jan. 31. The house received Letters from the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, at Cork, advising that several Garrisons in Munster had surrendered to the Parliament's Forces without blood, or striking a stroke; and that the Army was in so good health that regiments which lately marched only 400 men, now marched 8 or 900; and that the horse were disposed of into garrisons.

VOL. III,

A Council of State elected for the Year 1650.]

Feb. 12. The time appointed for the continuance of the present Council of State, expiring the middle of this month, the house proceeded to the election of a new one for the next year; and first agreed, That the number of persons to act in this high station should not exceed 41. They next read over a List of the names of the present Council, and proceeded to vote every single person into the office or reject them, by putting the question upon each; when they were all re-elected except the earl of Mulgrave, lord Grey of Warke, and sir John D'Anvers.

Feb. 20. The filling up the vacancies in the Council of State gave occasion to much debate and many divisions of the house. At length, it was resolved to elect 5 persons to be of this Council; when Mr. Chaloner, Mr. Gourdon, col. Morley, sir P. Wentworth, and lord Howard, were chosen, sir Henry Vane, sen. was rejected by a majority of 54 against 44, and the new earl of Pembroke without a division."

Feb. 25. Notice has been already taken, that the parliament had desired lieut. general Cromwell to come over into England; and this day it was ordered, That his Excellency have the use of the Lodgings called the Cockpit, the Spring-Garden, St. James's House, and the command of St. James's Park.

March. The Proceedings of the house in this month ran chiefly on private affairs, few matters of moment coming before them.

Kilkenny surrendered to the Parliament's Forces.] April 12. The house having received a Letter from col. Hewson, governor of Dublin, with advice of the Surrender of the city and castle of Kilkenny in Ireland, the Speaker was ordered to write him a Letter of Thanks, as an acknowledgment of his good services therein.

The Acts passed this month, worth our notice, were, one 'For Provision for Ministers, and other pious Uses.' Another was passed, 'For inflicting certain Penalties for Breach of the Lord's Day and other solemn days.' By which it was enacted, "That goods cried or put to sale on the Lord's Day, or Days of public Humiliation or Thanksgiving, should be seized: travellers, waggoners, &c. not observing those days, to forfeit 10s. Any writ, warrant, &c. executed on those days, to be of no effect, and the person offending to forfeit 5*l*. No person to use or travel with boat, horse, coach, or sedan, except to Church, upon pain of 10*s*. The like penalty for being in a tavern, ale-house, &c. dancing, or profanely singing on any of those days. Where distress could not be found sufficient to satisfy the respective penalties, the offender to sit in the stocks 6 hours."

An Act passed for suppressing of Incest, Adultery, and Fornication.] May 10. An Act was passed for suppressing the detestable Sins of Incest, Adultery, and Fornication. The most material clauses thereof were these; "That all persons guilty of Incest shall suffer death, without benefit of clergy; that incestuous Marriages shall be void, and the children illegitimate: that Adultery shall also be deemed felony, and punished with death: but this shall not extend to any man who, at the time of committing such offence, did not know the woman to be married; nor to any woman whose husband shall be 3 years absent from her, so as she did not know him to be living. In case of Fornication, both parties, for the first offence, were to suffer 3 months imprisonment without bail, and also give security for their good behaviour for one whole year after. Every common bawd, for the first offence, to be openly whipped, set in the pillory, and there marked with a hot iron in the forehead with a B; also to be committed to the house of correction for 3 years without bail, and until sufficient security be given for good behaviour during life: and the persons a second time found guilty of the last recited offences were to suffer death."

Gen. Cromwell returns from Ireland.] June 4. This day Cromwell, the parliament's victorious general and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, who had been sent for over, took his seat in the house; when the Speaker, by order, gave him Thanks, in an eloquent oration, as the Journals express it, for his faithful services; setting forth the great Providence of God in those great and strange works, which God had wrought by him as the instrument.

The Parliament appoint their standing Council.] June 6. The parliament having resolved to appoint a standing Council for the Commonwealth, they this day agreed upon sir Tho. Widdrington and serjeant Green for that purpose, by the title of 'Serjeants at Law, for the Commonwealth,' and Robert Reynolds, esq. to be their Solicitor-General.

A Bill ordered in against immodest Dresses of Women.] June 7. A Bill was ordered to be read the Friday ensuing, against the Vice of Painting, wearing black Patches, and immodest Dresses of Women: but no mention is made of it in the Journal of that day, nor in Scobel's Acts; from whence it seems the ladies had interest enough to nip this project in the bud.

Gen. Cromwell gives the House an Account of the State of Ireland.] June 11. All the members having been required to give their attendance this day by 9 in the morning, general Cromwell standing up in his place in the house, made a Narrative of the State of the garrisons and forces of the enemy in Ireland, and their interest there; and likewise of the parliament's forces, in garrison and in the field, their condition, in what employment they were, and under what commands. At the end of which it was resolved, "That it be referred to the Council of State to take care of sending such speedy Supplies of Money for Ireland, as shall be necessary for the carrying on of that work; and to see what money there is in present view that can be made effectual for that service, and how the obstructions against bringing it in may be removed. Also to consider by what ways and means the reduction and settlement of Ireland may be perfected to the best advantage and the future ease of the charge of this Commonwealth."

A Commissioner from the States of Holland and West-Friesland admitted to an Audience by the Parliament.] The same day a Commissioner from the States of Holland and West-Friesland, was admitted to an audience; where he delivered in his credentials, and the Desires of his Masters, in French, by word of mouth. Soon after, the house resolved to give an Answer to this Commissioner on a day appointed; when being come into the Court of Wards, and the house apprized of it, the serjeant was sent to attend him, together with the master of the ceremonies: being come within the door uncovered, he came up to the bar, the serjeant at arms attending on his right hand, and the master of the ceremonies on the left; where, after mutual compliments between him and Mr. Speaker, all the members standing, he sat down in a chair, placed at the usual place, on the north side of the house; and, being set, Mr. Speaker delivered this Answer unto him by word of mouth, viz. "The parliament of the Commonwealth of England have taken into their serious consideration what your lordship did lately deliver unto them in behalf of your Superiors, the high and potent lords the states of Holland and West-Friesland, unto which I am commanded, in their name, to return this Answer: The Parliament, both from the motives remembered in your lordship's Paper, and from many other reasons and experiences of their own, hath, ever since it pleased God to restore this Commonwealth to its just freedom, been so apprehensive of the common benefits apparently redounding to this nation, together with the high and mighty lords the States of the United Provinces, by a strict alliance between them, that they thought fit long since to employ for that purpose, Walter Strickland, esq. a member of parliament, with Addresses as well to the States General, as to the High and Potent Lords the States of Holland and West-Friesland; which proceeding of theirs doth give a sufficient testimony on their behalf, that the fault hath not been in them if so desirable an union and friendship between the two Commonwealths hath not been attained.—And although the applications made by our said resident to the States General, on so friendly a subject, and for so good an end, have been hitherto neglected, and not so much as an audience yet given to him; which the parliament cannot but take notice of, as not understanding why the friendship of this Commonwealth should be of so small consideration with them: yet the parliament are so well satisfied with the deportment of the high and mighty lords the States of Holland and West-Friesland towards this Commonwealth and their said resident Walter Strickland, in the applications which he hath made on their part, and of the endeavours which the said high and potent lords, from time to time, have used with the other provinces, not only to prevent any misunderstanding, but to maintain all friendly and good correspondency between the two states, that they do the more chearfully and readily entertain what hath been propounded to them by your lordship; and do resolve to answer those assurances of friendship and neighbourly commerce which your lordship doth give on the behalf of your superiors, with most real returns of good acceptance; desiring, as an happy result from the same, that this Commonwealth and the States of Holland and West-Friesland may not only correspond together in a neighbourly and friendly commerce, but may at last grow up to so strict an union and alliance, as may be found necessary for the good of both.—And as there shall be occasion for your lordship to represent any further particulars concerning the interest of that province, or of any member thereof, whereunto there is no proper remedy applicable in the ordinary course of justice, the parliament hath empowered the Council of State to receive the same, and give such Answers from time to time as shall be requisite, and may witness the regard which this Commonwealth hath to the friendship of those by whom your lordship is deputed.”—This being ended, Mr. Speaker, by the master of the ceremonies, delivered the same Answer to the Commissioner in writing, signed by the clerk: which having received, he returned a reply to this effect:—[Here follows an hiatus in the Journals, and we are left in the dark as to the Answer made by the Commissioner.]

The House resolve that Lord Fairfax and Gen. Cromwell should march with an Army into the North.] June 12. The house voted that the lord-general Fairfax and lieutenant-general Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, should both be commanded to go upon the Northern Expedition. And that the Council of State do acquaint them with it, and take care for their speedy march towards Scotland.

The Lord General Fairfax declines accepting the Command in that Expedition.] June 25. The lord-commissioner Whitlocke reported from the Council of State, That they being acquainted by the lord-general Fairfax that some difficulties were upon him concerning the undertaking of the service required of him by the new Commission sent to him from the parliament; thereupon the Council had appointed a committee to confer with his lordship for his satisfaction, which was endeavoured by them, upon a long debate with his lordship: the result upon which conference was to this effect; “That the lord-general doth conceive that, upon the new commission coming to him, the former commission of General is at an end, and he freed from that charge; and in regard of his own infirmities and want of health, and want of freedom to undertake this service as a new employment, and the greatness and weight of the charge, he humbly desired to be excused; and for that purpose intended to signify his mind herein unto the parliament.”—Here follows another hiatus in the Journals, where, most probably, the lord Fairfax's real reasons for resigning his Commission were entered: but this deficiency is amply made up by Mr. Whitlocke in his Memorials, who has given a Narrative of the whole conference on this remarkable occasion between lord Fairfax and the Committee from the Council of State, of which himself was one.*

The Parliament pass a Vote of thanks to Lord Fairfax, for his faithful Services.] The same day that Mr. Whitlocke had reported to the house lord Fairfax's desire of resigning his commission, they resolved, That a committee be appointed to go to his lordship, and let him know the parliament's high esteem and good acceptance of those eminent and faithful Services, which have, by the blessing of God upon his endeavours, been by him performed for the Commonwealth, and that they are persuaded of his continued fidelity and affection.

It was also ordered, That all the Records belonging to the late house of Peers, be delivered to Mr. Scobell, the present clerk to the parliament.

The Parliament resolve to send an Army into Scotland forthwith: And publish a Declaration of the Justice and Necessity thereof.] June 26. The lord commissioner Whitlocke made another report from the Council of State, “That, in pursuance of the order of parliament, they had put an Army in readiness, and had given them orders to march northward: and that, upon mature consideration of what was required by the said Order, it was the opinion of that council, That they cannot prevent an Invasion from Scotland, but by the marching of an army into that kingdom” The justice and necessity of which expedition was set forth in a Declaration; a draught whereof was offered to the consideration of parliament. The said Declaration being read by parts, and every part put to the question, it was with some amendments agreed to, nem. con. Afterwards it was resolved, “That it was just and necessary for the Army of England to march into Scotland forthwith.” The Declaration was also ordered to be printed and published, with several other Papers annexed thereto, under the inspection of the Council of State; to whom it was referred to take care for the stopping of all correspondency, intelligence, traffic, or commerce, between England and Scotland, as they should see cause.

The Parliament appoint Cromwell Captain-General on lord Fairfax's resigning his Commission.] The same day, the earl of Pembroke reported from the committee appointed to attend the lord-General Fairfax with the Vote of yesterday, That they had accordingly attended on him; and that his lordship returned his humble thanks to the parliament for their great favour and respects to him. The house being also informed that Mr. Rushworth, his lordship's secretary, was at the door, he was called in; and acquainted Mr. Speaker, That the lord-general had commanded him to present to the parliament the last commission he received from them; and likewise his first commission, if they pleased to command it: accordingly the last commission was delivered in. Next, it was resolved that Mr. Rushworth do likewise deliver in the first commission, which was done. After all this ceremony, an Act for repealing the Ordinance and Act of Parliament for constituting Thomas lord Fairfax captain-general and commander in chief of all the forces raised by their authority, was passed, and ordered to be printed and published; as was also another for appointing lieutenant general Cromwell to succeed his lordship in that important station*.

An Act passed against profane Swearing.] June 28. The only Act passed this month worth our notice, besides those above-mentioned, was 'For better preventing and suppressing of profane Swearing and Cursing,' whereby it was enacted, That every person styling himself a duke, marquis, earl, viscount or baron, should, for the first offence, forfeit 30s. a baronet or knight, 20s. an esquire, 10s. a gentleman 6s. 8d. and all inferior persons 3s. 4d. double for the second, &c. to the ninth; and for the tenth to be bound to the good behaviour. The like penalty on Women offending; a wife or widow to pay according to the quality of her husband, and a single woman that of her father. Penalties to be recovered by distress and sale of the offenders goods; and, in default thereof, the party, if above 12 years of age, to be set in the stocks; if under, to be publicly whipt.

Mr. Ascham, the Parliament's Agent in Spain, assassinated.] July. About the middle of last month Mr. Ascham, whom the parliament had sent as their agent into Spain, was assassinated at an Inn in Madrid, together with one signor Riba, his interpreter, by six Englishmen; who inquiring for Mr. Ascham, and being admitted to his chamber, as he rose to salute them, the foremost laid hold on him by the hair and stabbed him; whereupon the interpreter, endeavouring to make his escape, was stabbed by another. The murderers having fled for refuge to the Venetian Ambassador's house, who refused them entrance, they took sanctuary in the next church. When the parliament was informed of this affair by Mr. Fisher, their late Agent's secretary, they first ordered that a Letter should be written to the king of Spain, and signed by their Speaker, to demand justice on the murderers of Mr. Ascham. Next, sir H. Mildmay having reported from the Council of State, That (in regard of the said horrible assassination and murder, and also of several late advertisements they had received of divers persons being come into England with intention of like murder and assassination; and that some faithful persons to the state are particularly designed to be attempted upon) it was the said Council's opinion the house should be moved to take into consideration what they published, in their Declaration of the 18th of May, 1649, on occasion of the murder of Dr. Dorislaus; and give order that something may be done effectually in pursuance thereof, to discourage and deter such bloody and desperate men, and their accomplices, from the like wicked attempts for the future: hereupon, the house resolved that six of those persons who have been in arms against the parliament, not being admitted to composition, and are now in their power and at their mercy, be speedily proceeded against to trial for their lives, before the high Court of Justice, upon their former offences, on occasion of the horrid and execrable Assassination of Mr. Ascham, Agent from the parliament to the king of Spain, and of his interpreter.

Commissioners of Excise prohibited from holding any other Employment.] July 9. The house voted that no person, employed as a Commissioner of Excise, shall continue in any other public employment for which he shall receive any salary from the Commonwealth; nor trade or traffic in any commodity exciseable, during the time he shall continue a Commissioner of Excise.

The same day, the parliament received advice from Ireland, of a great Victory obtained there by the Parliament's Forces commanded by sir Charles Coote, against the Rebels; the 28th of June last, with a List of their Commanders slain or taken prisoners in the action; for which a Day of Thanksgiving was appointed to be held on the 26th instant.

Cromwell departs for Scotland.] June 29. The parliament were now so intent upon prosecuting their Expedition into Scotland, that this day, only 3 days after Cromwell's being appointed Captain-General of the Army, he set forward from London towards the North. When he arrived at York, the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs attended on him, and invited him and his officers to dinner, where they were highly caressed. At Durham sir A. Hasilrigg, governor of Newcastle, with col. Pride, and other officers, met him, and attended him to that town, where he arrived on the 15th of July. During his stay there, a Fast was kept to implore God's blessing upon the Army's undertaking, and a Declaration agreed on to be dispersed in their march; which, being sent up to the parliament on the 19th, was by them ordered to be forthwith printed and published. It was intitled, "A Declaration of the Army of England upon

* Mr. Whitlocke attributes the great expedition made in passing these two Acts, to the contrivance of Cromwell's friends, who urged the ill consequences of the Army's being without a head; and adds, "That great ceremonies and congratulations of the new General were made to him from all sorts of people; and that he went on roundly with his business."

their March into Scotland. To all that are Saints and partakers of the faith of God's Elect, in Scotland." Besides this Declaration of the Army, another was published by Cromwell, on his arrival at Berwick, addressed "To the People of Scotland."

The Parliament resolve to send Prince Henry and Princess Elizabeth out of England.] July 24. Sir H. Mildmay reported from the Council of State, "That it was their opinion, in regard of the many Designs now on foot, if any insurrections should happen, the public peace would be much the more endangered, by occasion of the late King's Children remaining here, who may be made use of to the prejudice of the public; which they left to the consideration of the house to provide such remedy therein as to their wisdoms shall seem meet." On which after some debate, it was resolved, "That Henry Stuart, third son to the late king, and the lady Elizabeth his daughter, should be removed forthwith beyond the seas, out of the Limits of this Commonwealth. And that it be left to the Council of State to consider of a fit place to remove them to, the manner of sending them thither, and of a fit maintenance for their support, during the pleasure of parliament."

August 1. Another Report was made to the house from the Council of State, "That they had intelligence from some who were in custody, and other concurrent testimonies, of a Design ready to break out, which would have been of imminent danger to the parliament, and all that adhere to them, if not timely prevented, many being engaged therein; and the discovery made by such as were in the design: That the Council, thereupon, had ordered all the horses to be seized, in the city and parts adjacent, to prevent use to be made of them by those who were concerned in this business; which, as they were informed, was near breaking out, but, as they hoped, might now be broken." The house approved of all the Council had done in the affair, but we hear no more of it.

An Act forbidding all intercourse with Scotland.] Aug. 2. An Act passed the house, inhibiting all trade, traffic or intercourse with Scotland, and for enjoining the departure of all Scotsmen out of the Commonwealth; which was ordered to be forthwith printed and published, and proclaimed by beat of drum and sound of trumpet.

Aug. 9. The custom of the house was frequently, at this time, to order the door to be shut, and no member to be suffered to go out, without leave, till 12 o'clock: and this day, after such an Order, the house passed a Bill intitled, 'An Act against several atheistical, blasphemous, and execrable Opinions, derogatory to the Honour of God, and destructive to human Society, now held and propagated in this nation.'

The Bill for the better Regulation of Parliaments dropped.] Aug. 14. All this time the Bill, long since brought in, for an equal Representative, and regulating Elections for Members of Parliament, was canvassed, in a grand committee of the whole house, every Wednesday; but, as yet, nothing was done in it. This delay plainly shews, that the present members had no mind to part with their power or places, and venture a dissolution of the parliament. Nay, it seems about this time, when the Army was so far distant from them, they had a design to drop the Bill; for, at the end of the debate this day, a motion being made, That the house be resolved into a grand committee this day se'nnight, upon the Heads of the said Bill, &c. it passed in the negative, and this day fortnight was agreed to instead of it. During all this debate the doors were ordered to be kept shut, as usual: and we find that this Election Bill, after being put off from time to time, was at last laid aside.

Waterford taken by the Parliament's Forces.]

Aug. 27. A Letter from Ireland was received dated from the Camp at Waterford, August 12, 1650, and containing a narrative of the taking of Waterford, by the Parliament's Forces under general Ireton: after the reading of which, public Thanks were ordered to be given to God, the next Lord's Day, for these further Successes gained in that kingdom. A Declaration was ordered to be drawn up and published on that occasion; and likewise to be read in all congregations throughout the nation, immediately after the Psalm before Sermon, for the better stirring up the hearts of the people to praise God for this Victory.

Charles II. having published a Declaration in Scotland, the Parliament declare the abetting or publishing thereof to be High Treason.]

Aug. 28. King Charles II. was to have been crowned in Scotland on the 15th of this month; but the ceremony was suspended on account of his refusing to sign a Declaration which the Scots parliament required of him, whereby he was to profess his repentance for all the blood shed in his father's time, and since by his own means; and to resolve to adhere, for the future, to the Cause of God, the Kirk, and the Covenant: however, the king was prevailed upon to sign it on the 16th; and a Copy thereof being sent up to the parliament, it was read in the house this day; a committee was also appointed to withdraw and consider of a Declaration to be printed and published thereupon. This was presently brought in and passed, as preparatory to an Answer at large, which was ordered to be drawn up by the Council of State. The previous Declaration runs thus:

"The parliament of England having seen and read a pamphlet, intitled, 'A Declaration by the King's Majesty, to his Subjects of the Kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland, printed at Edinburgh, 1650,' do find therein a design of Charles Stuart, the declared king of Scotland, by the instigation of the State and Kirk of that kingdom, under a pretence of humiliation for his own and his father's opposition to the work of Reformation and Solemn League and Covenant, to seduce the people of this nation from their due obedience to this present government; and to invite them, by promoting his pretended interest here, not only to embroil this nation in new troubles, by a bloody and intestine War, (thereby, as much as in them lies, taking away all hopes of a settled Peace in this Commonwealth) but also to make themselves instrumental to intrude themselves again in tyranny and slavery, from which they have been, through the blessing and glorious appearances of God, so happily redeemed. And, however, the parliament have reason to believe, that no pious or judicious person can possibly be deluded under such gross deceits, to contribute such an assistance as in that Declaration is called for, and which would most undoubtedly end, if the Lord prevent it not, in the destruction of the truly godly in both nations, and the betraying of that cause that hath been engaged in by them; nevertheless, they have resolved, for the better information and satisfaction of the people of this land, more largely and particularly to unmask and discover the hypocrisy and wicked design lodged under the specious pretences in that Declaration; and, in the mean time, do enact and declare, That all persons whatsoever who shall abet or countenance the said Declaration, by printing or publishing the same, or by promoting or prosecuting the design or ends therein contained, are hereby adjudged to be guilty of High Treason, and shall be proceeded against as Traitors."

Great Victory obtained by General Cromwell near Dunbar.] Sept. 7. This day advice came of a great Victory gained by the English Army under Cromwell near Dunbar on the 3d, in which the Scots were entirely routed. When this important news arrived, the house was adjourned, according to their late usual custom, from Friday to Tuesday: hereupon the Council of State ordered a brief Narrative of this action to be immediately printed, and read the next Sunday in all the Churches in and about London, that the people might return Thanks to God for his signal mercy to the Commonwealth.

Annexed to General Cromwell's Narrative of the Battle was a List of the names of the Scots officers taken prisoners in this action: They consisted of one lieutenant-general, 3 colonels, 11 lieutenant-colonels, 9 majors of horse and foot, 47 captains of horse and foot, 7 captain lieutenants of horse and foot, one adjutant general, 70 lieutenants of foot, 12 cornets, 4 quartermasters of horse, and 78 ensigns. About 3000 of the enemy were slain and 9000 taken prisoners.

Hereupon, the house resolved, That the Council of State should give orders for prosecuting the war in Scotland in the most effectual manner, and prepare all necessaries of men, money, provisions, medicines, surgeons, &c. for that purpose: that the 8th of Oct. be set apart as a Day of publick Thanksgiving for this great Victory, which God had vouchsafed to the Parliament's Forces: that all the colours, both of horse and foot, now brought up from the Scot's Army, together with those taken at Preston, when they invaded England in 1648, be inventoried, with their respective motto's and devices, by the clerk of the parliament, and hung up on each side of Westminster-Hall, as a monument of this great mercy, to posterity: that the Council of State do prepare a Letter to be signed by the Speaker, and sent to the Lord General, in the name of the parliament, taking notice of his eminent services, with the special acknowledgment and thanks of the house; and that his Excellency be therein desired to return their Thanks also to the officers and soldiers of the Army; and that a number of gold and silver medals be distributed amongst them.

Death of the Princess Elizabeth.] Sept. 11. A report was made from the Council of State, That, in pursuance of the late Order of parliament for sending the two Children of the late King out of the Commonwealth, the Council had sent them to the Isle of Wight: that the lady Elizabeth was at present indisposed; that she had some inclination to go to her sister, the Princess of Orange, which the Council think fit she should; and that, for her maintenance, she be allowed 1000*l.* a-year, paid half-yearly, so long as she shall behave herself inoffensively to the parliament and Commonwealth, and half a year's allowance beforehand; and that, in the mean time, until she could be shipped away, her maintenance and transportation might be provided for by the committee of the revenue.—But, whilst the report was making concerning this provision for the unhappy Princess, we are told, by the Journals, That the house was informed the lady Elizabeth was dead. She died at Carisbrooke-Castle, in the Isle of Wight, within a week after her and her brother's arrival in that place. The house, on this information, gave orders to the committee of revenue for her interment in the said Island, and for providing mourning for her brother Henry, his servants now with him, and the servants of the said lady.—Another part of the Report related to the young Prince Henry; that he should be sent by some ship to his brother in Scotland, and to have 1000*l.* a-year, paid half-yearly, for his maintenance, so long as he should behave himself inoffensively to the Commonwealth. But this advice was rejected by the house; and, after some debate, it was resolved that 1500*l.* a-year be allowed from the Commonwealth, unto Henry the 3rd son of the late King, for his maintenance; and that he be sent to be brought up and educated in the University of Heidelberg.

Sept. 17. An Answer to the king's Declaration from Scotland was this day presented and read, first at large and afterwards by parts; and each part being put to the question, was assented to, with some amendments; on which a division of the house happened, (if we may call that a house which consisted only of 36 members, 20 against 16) and the debate was put off to next day; when the Answer, after some more amendments, at the table, was passed, and ordered to be printed and published, together with the king's Declaration, paragraph by paragraph.

Sept. 20. The house being informed that Mr. Rushworth, secretary to the Lord-General in Scotland, was at the door, he was called in, and made a Relation of the State and Condition of the Parliament's Army in that kingdom. Cromwell had now followed his blow at Dunbar so well as not only to take Leith and Edinburgh, but had likewise laid siege to the Castle.

*An Assessment of 120,000*l.* per Mensem voted for carrying on the War in Scotland.*]

Sept. 25. The house having made an Order to go upon nothing but money-matters for a week, this day the Council of State delivered in a Paper from the Treasurers at War, signifying, that, in pursuance of the Parliament's orders, they had considered of the sending men and provisions for carrying on the public service in Scotland, which would speedily be ready, unless money were wanting for the payment of them. Hereupon it was resolved, that 400,000*l.* be charged upon the whole nation, to be proportionably laid upon the several counties; and that the repayment thereof be secured by monies to be raised by the sale of Fee-Farm rents. But this proposal was afterwards dropped; and, instead thereof, a bill was ordered in for levying 120,000*l.* per mensem, for 4 months, according to the same proportions as the former assessment of 90,000*l.*

Barbadoes, and other Plantations in the West Indies, revolt from the Parliament.] Oct. 3. About this time the Island of Barbadoes had revolted from the parliament, and was followed by others of the Leeward Islands, which occasioned an Act to be passed this day for prohibiting all Commerce and trade to the Barbadoes, Antigua, Virginia, and Bermudas, or the Summer Islands. It was also ordered, that the Council of State be authorized to give orders to the generals at sea, for detaining all such ships as they shall find trading to those parts, until they shall have given an account thereof to the parliament or Council. And a strong fleet, with a number of transports, was ordered to be dispatched away with all possible speed, for reducing the Island of Barbadoes, and all other English Plantations that should persist in opposition to the government of this Commonwealth.

The Bill touching future Elections revived.] Oct. 23. The parliament revived the Bill, so long dropt, concerning the future Election of Members to sit in that House; and this day ordered that each Wednesday in every week, the house should be resolved into a grand committee upon it. It was also resolved, that the said committee should state the Proportions of Elections for the several counties; and consider how, and in what manner, the same might be made practicable for filling the house with members according to those several Proportions.

Act against observing Saints Days in Term.]

November 5. The house had ordered an Act to be brought in for taking away the superstitious Observation of All-Saints-Day, and other days in Term not juridical, and making them Court-Days; at the same they ordered the 5th of Nov. to be no Court-Day. Accordingly, the parliament met on that day, and, having adjourned to the next, they went to Margaret's Church, Westminster; where a sermon was preached by Mr. Nye, who had the Thanks of the house ordered him for his great pains taken therein.

November 8. A motion had been made in the house for converting the Law into English; and accordingly this day, the lord commissioner Whitelocke brought in a bill, 'For turning the Books of Law, and all Process and Proceedings therein, into English;' which was read a first and second time, and committed. On the 22d, the said bill was read a third time and passed.

Victory gained by the Parliament's Forces, over the Marquis of Clanrickard, in Ireland.]

Nov. 26. A letter of advice of a great Victory obtained by the Parliament's Forces in Ireland, addressed to the President of the Council of State, was this day read. This intelligence was so highly acceptable to the house, that they not only ordered it to be printed, but also resolved that public Thanks be given to Almighty God, on the Lord's Day next ensuing, in all churches and chapels in and about London, for his great mercy in vouchsafing so signal and seasonable a Victory to the Parliament's Army against the bloody Rebels in Ireland.

The Proceeding at the Trial of the late King, ordered to be entered on Record.] Dec. 22. The house had ordered, some time ago, that the Proceedings of the High Court of Justice, for the Trial of the late King, should be laid before them: accordingly, this day, Mr. Say reported the Records thereof, which were read, at large, by the clerk, viz. The Act for Trial of the King; the Precept for the Trial; the Charge against the King, exhibited, received, and read January 20, 1648, and the Sentence against him on the 27th of that month. After which it was resolved, 1. "That the parliament doth declare, That the persons intrusted in this great service, of the Trial of the late King, have discharged the trust in them reposed, with great courage and fidelity: and that the parliament is well satisfied in this Account of the Particulars, and Proceedings thereupon, and do approve thereof; and order that the same be recorded, to remain among the Records of Parliament, for the transmitting the memory thereof to posterity. 2. That all the said proceedings be engrossed, and recorded among the Parliament-Rolls. 3. That the lords commissioners for the great seal of England do issue forth a certiorari to the clerk of parliament, to transmit the said Proceedings into the chancery, to be there kept of record; and that the same be transcribed, and sent by Mittimus from thence into the Courts of the Upper Bench, Common Pleas, and public Exchequer; and also to the Custos Rotulorum in the respective counties of this Commonwealth, to be recorded in each of them."

The Spanish Ambassador admitted to an Audience of the Parliament.] Dec. 24. The Speaker acquainted the house, that the Secretary to an Ambassador lately come from Spain, had attended him, and delivered to him copies of his Letters credential in Latin, and a translation thereof in English; which being read, it was resolved by the parliament, That the Lord Ambassador of the king of Spain should have audience in the house; and that sir Oliver Fleming, master of the ceremonies, do attend him thither on the 26th. Accordingly, on the day appointed the Spanish Ambassador, Don Alonso de Cardenas,* was admitted to an Audience, with the following ceremonies: The house being informed by their serjeant, That the Lord Ambassador from the king of Spain, attended to present himself to the parliament, the serjeant with his mace, went to conduct his excellency into the house. So soon as the Lord Ambassador was entered, he uncovered himself: and Mr. Speaker and all the members stood up bare. When his excellency was come as far as the bar, the master of the ceremonies and the serjeant attended him, the one on the right hand and the other on the left, until he came to the chair appointed for that purpose, which was placed on the north side of the house, upon a Turkey carpet, with a cushion in it, and a foot-stool before it. After a few words addressed to Mr. Speaker, the Ambassador presented his Letters Credential; which being delivered, by the master of the ceremonies to Mr. Speaker, his excellency declared the substance of his embassy; which was to express the king of Spain's great desire of establishing a peace and good correspondence with the Commonwealth of England: he likewise delivered a copy in English, of what he had before expressed by word of mouth, and two other Papers mentioned in his speech.—Mr. Speaker having informed the Ambassador, by the master of the ceremonies, that he would acquaint the parliament with the purport of his embassy, his excellency, attended in the same manner as before, withdrew. Then the Letters Credential, in Latin, under the hand and seal of the king of Spain, were read; the superscription whereof was, 'Parlamento Reipublicæ Angliæ,' and subscribed, Philippus.

* Lord Clarendon gives a very minute and particular account of the occasion of the king of Spain's sending this ambassador into England, and of the fruitless negotiation of lord Cottington and himself on behalf of king Charles II. after above a year's residence in that kingdom. History, vol. v. p. 301, et seq.

Dec. 27. The Speaker informed the house, That he had received a Letter from Joannes de Guimaraes, a public minister from the king of Portugal, directed thus, 'Illustrissimo Domino, Domino Oratori Parliamenti Reipublicæ Angliæ;' also copies of his Letters Credential, in Latin, Portuguese, and English, inclosed in another Paper inscribed, 'Parlamento Reipublicæ Angliæ.' All these being read, the house appointed a committee to consider of the manner of giving audience to the Portuguese minister, and also all ambassadors, agents, and other public ministers, and to report their opinion thereupon to the house.

Surrender of Edinburgh Castle to the Parliament's Forces.] Dec. 31. By a Letter received from general Cromwell, and read in the house this day, he informed the parliament of the Surrender of Edinburgh Castle. The Articles thereof were inclosed, and several Papers which passed between Walter Dundas, esq. the Governor, and himself, relating to that Surrender.

Upon which, the house resolved (as if it were to shew the present king of Scotland, and the royal party there and elsewhere, in what great contempt they held them) that the 30th of January ensuing be set a-part as a Day of public Thanksgiving, to be observed through the whole nation, for the great mercies of God vouchsafed to the Commonwealth, both by sea and land, and carrying on the affairs thereof with so great success; and in particular, in the Rendition of the Castle of Edinburgh; the defeat of the Scots forces in the west of Scotland, by the parliament's forces under the command of major-gen. Lambert; as also in the discovery of the late horrid Design, here at home, to raise a new war.

Resolutions touching the Manner of receiving Foreign Ministers.] January 1. We have lately taken notice of a Committee's being appointed to consider of the Reception of Ambassadors, Agents, and other public Ministers from foreign Princes; the proceedings of this month begin with a Report made from that Committee, consisting of the following Resolutions, which were agreed to by the house: 1. "That Ambassadors, Ordinary, and extraordinary, sent from Commonwealths, Kings, Princes, and States, be admitted to public Audience in Parliament, so often as the parliament shall think fit. 2. That all other public ministers, under the quality of Ambassadors, have audience by a committee of parliament, sent out of the parliament for that purpose; who are to return and tender their report before the house rise. 3. That the day and hour be appointed by parliament, at which time the master of the ceremonies is to conduct such public minister to the place lately called the Inner Court of Wards; and then immediately to certify the parliament thereof. 4. That the late house of lords be the place for the committees of parliament to give Audience in, and to be fitted up for that purpose. 5. That it be referred to the Council of State to take especial care to provide convenient hangings for this house, and for the Inner Court of Wards; and that the suit containing the Story of 1588, be reserved for the service of the state, and hung up in the late house of lords; and that all such other accommodations be made, as are necessary for the uses above voted. 6. That Audience be given to the public minister from Portugal, the ensuing Tuesday, at 10 in the morning, by a committee of parliament, according to the foregoing general Rules for giving Audience; and that sir Oliver Fleming give him notice thereof."

The Portuguese Agent admitted to an Audience.] Jan. 10. We have lately given the parliament's manner of receiving the Spanish Ambassador, we shall now see how the Portuguese Agent was admitted; which was by a committee of 11 members appointed for that purpose. It seems the parliament had been disgusted at the king of Portugal, for allowing great liberties to Prince Rupert and the Fleet under him, to man and victual in all his ports: and admiral Blake had orders to sink and take the Portuguese ships wherever he met them; by which means the Brazil fleet fell into his hands. Hereupon, all the English merchants were seized in Portugal; but on the news of the great victory gained by the parliament in Scotland, the Portuguese king thought proper to release the merchants, and send an Agent to England, the manner of whose Audience was thus reported to the house by the lord commissioner Whitlocke:—"The committee appointed for that purpose met, on the 10th of this month, in the late house of lords; and the Agent from Portugal, attended thither by the master of the ceremonies, the committee being set, came in uncovered; whom the committee received with the like compliment; and, after mutual salutations performed, he sat down in a chair appointed for that purpose, and, covering his head, the committee did the like: then the lord commissioner Whitlocke, their chairman, declared to the Agent, that they were authorized by the parliament to give him audience, and the order for that purpose was read. Notice being also given him by the master of the ceremonies, to whom he should address himself, the Agent presented his letters credential from the king of Portugal; and, by word of mouth, declared to the committee, in the Portuguese language, the grounds and ends for which he was sent; which he likewise presented to them, in writing, both in Latin and English: and being, with the like attendance, withdrawn, it was ordered that the Council of State do prepare all papers, letters, and matters concerning the transactions between the parliament of England and the king of Portugal, from first to last, to be reported to the house."—The same ceremony of introduction was used when these public ministers received their Answers. But neither the reason of their mission, nor the Answers given to them by the house, are entered in the Journals.

VOL. III.

The Parliament appoint Ambassadors to the States General.] As the parliament received these testimonies of recognition from foreign states, so they thought proper to send out ministers of their own; and Oliver St. John, esq. formerly solicitor-general to the late king, but now lord chief justice of the common pleas, with Walter Strickland esq. their late agent in Holland, were constituted ambassadors extraordinary to the United Provinces. The Council of State were ordered to provide their credentials, instructions, &c. and all other things necessary for that service, with due respect to the honour of this Common-wealth. —However, a few days after, a Petition was presented by Mr. St. John, praying to be excused from this embassy. The Journals make no mention what were the allegations of this Petition, but we are informed by one of the Diaries* of these times, that the chief justice urged his present indisposition, and the opinion of his physicians that the air of Holland would be prejudicial to his health; though it seems as if the house looked upon this merely as a pretence; for, upon a division, it was resolved, by a majority of 42 against 29, that he should go: and it is highly probable the true reason was, that he dreaded the fate of Dorislaus, the parliament's first Agent to the States.

Jan. 14. This day several extracts of Letters from Cromwell and Lambert to the Council of State, dated from Edinburgh the 4th and 8th of this month, intimating a design of the Scots to attempt an Invasion of England, were read in the house:

A new Council of State elected.] Feb. 1. The proceedings of this month begin with the annual election of a new Council of State. Upon this occasion the house was much fuller than ordinary, there being 121 members present. This affair took up several days, and ended in a Resolution, that the number of that council for the year ensuing be 41, to be elected by ballot; of which only 21 to be chosen out of the present members thereof, and 20 new ones. Of the old members the following were re-elected, viz. the lord chief justice Rolle, the lord chief justice St. John, Mr. serj. Bradshaw, the lord general Cromwell, major-gen. Skippon, sir Wm. Masham, lord commissioner Whitlocke, sir A. Haselrigge, sir James Harrington, sir H. Vane, Dennis Bond, esq. sir Wm. Arnyn, col. Wauton, sir H. Mildmay, col. Purefoy, lord commissioner Lisle, Tho. Scot, esq. John Gardon, esq. lord Grey, sir Gilbert Pickering, and Tho. Chaloner, esq. The new members were, Rd. Salway, esq. alderman Allein, of London, Robert Goodwyn, esq. Wm. Lemman, esq. major-gen. Harrison, Edm. Prideaux, esq. Attorney-General, sir Tho. Widdrington, John Carew, esq. sir John Bouchier, sir John Trevor, lieut. gen. Fleetwood, Henry Darley, esq. Tho. Lister, esq. Wm. Cawley, esq. Walter Strickland, esq. Nicholas Love, esq. Wm. Say esq. John Fielder, esq. George Thompson, esq. and sir Wm. Brereton, bart. Gualter Frost, esq. was elected Secretary, and to take an oath not to reveal any of the proceedings of the Council without their order.

March 4. The house appointed a day for seeking of God, by solemn Fasting and Humiliation, to be observed through the whole nation. The parliament, the cities of London and Westminster, and all places within 10 miles thereof, kept this Fast on the 13th inst. and the rest of the nation on the 2nd of April; but what the Preachers before the house had done to displease them we know not, for, on a motion the next day, That Thanks be given to the Ministers that preached yesterday before the parliament, it passed in the negative.

Gen. Cromwell's Letter on occasion of his late Illness.] April 1. Last month the Council of State having received advice that the lord-general Cromwell was much indisposed, had sent two physicians into Scotland to attend on him. And this day the following Letter from him to serjeant Bradshaw, lord president of that Council, was communicated to the house and read:

“My lord; I do, with all humble thankfulness, acknowledge your high favour and tender respect of me, expressed in your letter, and the express sent therewith to inquire after one so unworthy as myself. Indeed, my lord, your service needs not me; I am a poor creature, and have been a dry bone, and am still an unprofitable servant to my Master and to you: I thought I should have died of this fit of sickness; but the Lord seemeth to dispose otherwise. But, truly my lord, I desire not to live, unless I may obtain mercy from the Lord to approve my heart and life to him in more faithfulness and thankfulness; and those I serve, with more profitableness and diligence. And I pray God your lordship, and all in public trust, may improve all those unparalleled experiences of the Lord's wonderful workings in your sight, with singleness of heart to his glory, and the refreshment of his people, who are to him as the apple of his eye, and upon whom your enemies, both former and latter (who have fallen before you) did split themselves: this shall be the unfeigned prayer of my lord, Your most humble servant, O. CROMWELL.”

Resolutions of the Parliament concerning Affronts offered to their Ambassadors at the Hague.] April 11. This day more Papers, from the parliament's Ambassadors in Holland, and two intercepted Letters, were read: upon which the house passed the following Resolutions: 1. “That the parliament doth approve of what the Ambassadors Extraordinary to the General Assembly of the States of the United Provinces, have done upon the Affronts offered to them. 2. That the parliament do approve of the direction given by the Council of State to the said Ambassadors Extraordinary, touching their return. 3. That it be referred to the Council of State, upon the debate now had in the house, on this report, to give such orders and directions as they shall think fit, for the honour of this Commonwealth and safety of the Ambassadors. 4. That the debates of the house this day, and the Votes thereupon, be not made known to any person: and that the members of the house, and the officers thereof, be enjoined secrecy therein for 21 days.”

In order to discover the reason of these extraordinary Resolutions, we must have recourse to the Contemporary Writers and Diaries of the times.* These authorities inform us, That many affronts and insults were offered to the parliament's Ambassadors at the Hague, by the royalists, of which they give the following instances; Mr. Strickland's coachman and another of his servants were attacked by six cavaliers, at their master's own door; the former of whom received a cut upon his head, and the other lost his sword in the fray. The threats ran so high that this Ambassador's domestics were obliged to keep constant watch in his house by turns. A design was formed to assassinate Mr. St. John; and an attempt made to break into his chamber. Prince Edw. one of the queen of Bohemia's sons, walking in the Park at the Hague with his sister, and meeting the Ambassadors in their coach, called out to them, in a taunting manner, ‘Oh you Rogues, you Dogs!’ with many other high expressions of his resentment and indignation, But the most remarkable instance was a kind of rencounter between the duke of York and Mr. St. John, which is related to the following effect, by a French Writer†, who gives it us on the authority of a gentleman, resident in Holland when the affair happened. “Mr. St. John, taking a walk in the Park at the Hague, unexpectedly met the Duke on foot, neither of them recollecting each other till they came up almost face to face. This Ambassador of the Commonwealth, thinking it beneath his dignity to give way to an exiled Prince, kept his ground; which the Duke resenting, snatched Mr. St. John's hat off his head, and threw it in his face with a ‘Learn, Parricide, to respect the Brother of your King’; to which the Ambassador immediately retorted ‘I scorn to acknowledge either you, or him of whom you speak, but as a Race of Vagabonds.’ Hereupon the Duke instantly clapt his hand to his sword; and, in all probability, the dispute would not have ended without bloodshed, had not the company upon the walk interfered and parted them.” Complaint being made of all these matters to the States, they remonstrated to the queen of Bohemia, and the Princess Dowager of Orange, against the behaviour of the two Princes. They offered a reward of 200 guilders for discovery of the other offenders, and published a very strict Proclamation for the punishment of all such as should hereafter offer any violence to the persons or privileges of Ambassadors or Agents from foreign powers. But all this the new Commonwealth of England were so far from looking upon as a sufficient satisfaction to their injured honour, that they soon after recalled their Ambassadors.

Votes in relation to the Dispute with Portugal.] Several days in this month, were taken up in carrying on a Treaty with the Portuguese Agent, and settling the disputes, on the matter lately mentioned, between the two powers. The whole of it is much too large and intricate for our purpose; but the following Resolutions of parliament, at the end of it, are too remarkable to be omitted:—Resolved, 1. “That if the Demands and Propositions now agreed on to be given in to the public minister of Portugal, be not by him consented unto within the six days limited, they, or any of them, are not to be obligatory on the part of the parliament. 2. That the several Votes on this subject be Instructions to the Council of State, in their giving in to the public minister of Portugal the final Resolution of the parliament on the Treaty that hath hitherto passed between them and the said public minister; and of demanding from him his Answer to the several Resolutions of parliament, within the time limited by the house: which they are hereby authorized and required to do, and to report their proceedings therein to the parliament. 3. That such Englishmen as have eminently suffered in Portugal, in their persons or estates, for their good affections to the parliament, shall be taken into particular consideration by the house, for a further reparation to be given to them, out of the estates of such other Englishmen (in the power of the parliament) as have there adhered unto, or assisted, Rupert or his party, over and above the provisions made for them in the Articles betwixt this Commonwealth and the public minister from the king of Portugal.”—According to these Resolutions the Portuguese Agent returned two several Answers to the house, but each of them was voted unsatisfactory, and 3 days time only allowed to give in another.

May 1. There is a multiplicity of matters of various sorts, entered in the Journals about this time, but very few of moment enough for our notice.—The Portuguese Ambassador gave in his third Answer within the Time limited, which was also voted unsatisfactory; and three days more allowed him for another. At the end of which, the house being not yet satisfied with the Agent's Answer, he was ordered to depart the territories of the Commonwealth within 14 days; the ships and goods of the Portuguese were declared to be lawful prize; and the Council of State were ordered to consider how the English merchants and others, prisoners in Portugal, might be set at liberty.

May 9. All the Lodgings at Whitehall, the Mews, and Somerset House, were ordered to be divided into Apartments, and fitted up for the use of the Members of Parliament, with the best conveniences those places would afford respectively; also to remove the soldiers and such other persons and families from them, as a committee should think fit.

May 27. General Cromwell sent word, that the air of Scotland did not agree with him; and desired to remove himself to some part of England, until, by the blessing of God upon means used, he might be restored into a condition of health and strength to return to the Army; and, in the mean time, disposing the management of affairs there into such hands as he should think fit. All which was granted.

A Charge of Bribery exhibited against Lord Howard of Escrick.] June 25. There had been, some months since, a Complaint exhibited in parliament against Edward lord Howard of Escrick, a peer of the realm, but now a member of the house of commons for the city of Carlisle. The Witnesses against him had been examined strictly by a committee of the house appointed for that purpose. The circumstances of the Charge are not particularized in the Journals: however, Mr. Ludlow in his Memoirs, explains this matter at length, which we shall therefore give in his own words:—“Before I left the parliament, [to go into Ireland] some difference happening between the countess of Rutland and the lord Edward Howard of Escrick, col. Gell, who was a great servant of the countess, informed major-general Harrison, that this lord, being a member of parliament, and one of the Committee at Haberdashers-Hall, had taken divers Bribes for the excusing Delinquents from Sequestration, and easing them in their Compositions; and that, in particular, he had received a diamond hatband, valued at 800*l.* from one Mr. Compton, of Sussex; concerning which he could not prevail with any to inform the parliament. Major gen. Harrison, being a man of severe principles, and zealous for justice, especially against such as betrayed the public trust reposed in them, assured him, ‘That if he could satisfy him that the fact was as he affirmed, he would not fail to inform the parliament of it.’ Upon satisfaction received from the colonel touching that matter, the major-general declared in the house, ‘That though the honour of every member was dear to him, and of that gentleman in particular, naming the lord Howard, because he had so openly owned the interest of the Commonwealth, as to decline his peerage, and sit upon the foot of his election by the people; yet he loved justice before all other things, looking upon it to be the honour of parliament, and the image of God upon them; and therefore he durst not refuse to lay this matter before them, though he was very desirous that the said lord might clear himself of the accusation. The parliament having received this information, referred the consideration of the matter to a committee, where it was fully examined; and notwithstanding all the art of counsel, learned in the law, who are very skilful in putting a good appearance upon a bad cause, and all the friends lord Howard could make, so just and equitable a spirit then governed, that the committee represented the matter to the parliament as they found it to be.—Mr. Ludlow then proceeds to the Sentence against the lord Howard: but this being more amply set forth in the Journals of this day, we shall give it from those authorities: “Resolved, That upon consideration of the several Charges against Edward lord Howard of Escrick, and the Proofs reported, and his Answer and Defence thereupon, the parliament doth, upon the whole matter, declare and adjudge him guilty of Bribery: That the said Edward lord Howard be discharged from being a member of this parliament, and for ever disabled to sit in any parliament; and from bearing any office or place of trust in this Commonwealth: That he be fined 10,000*l.* committed to the Tower during the pleasure of the parliament: and that he do attend at the bar of the house, and, upon his knee there, receive this judgment.”—The lord Howard was released from his Imprisonment in the Tower, on the 6th of August following; and on the 5th of April 1653, the Fine of 10,000*l.* imposed upon him, was ordered to be discharged.

July 1. This day the parliament received a letter from major-general Lambert, giving an Account of the continued Successes of their Forces in Ireland.

The late Ambassadors to the States General give the House an Account of their Negotiation.

July 2. We have before taken notice of the parliament's Ambassadors to the States General being recalled: This day they took their seats in the house, when the lord chief justice St. John, Mr. Strickland, standing by him, gave an Account of their Negotiation, beginning with the particulars of their reception at the Hague; and presenting the several Papers delivered in on either side, in the business of the Treaty: they also declared the occasion of them, with the several passages and occurrences which passed between them and the Assembly of the States, and the Letters re-credential from the said Assembly, in French, directed thus: ‘Au Parlement de la Republique d’Angleterre.’ These several Papers being read, it was resolved, That the Parliament doth approve of all the proceedings of the Lords Ambassadors in this Negotiation; and that they have the Thanks of the house for their great and faithful services therein; which the Speaker gave them accordingly. The same compliment was also paid to the gentlemen that attended them abroad, for their services to the parliament, and the respect shewn to their Ambassadors.—Thus ended this fruitless Embassy, which Mr. Ludlow,* accounts for in this manner: “This Negotiation was designed to procure a nearer conjunction and coalition between the two States, but it proved ineffectual; the province of Holland being not so much inclined to consent to it as was expected, and Frizeland, with most of the rest of the provinces, entirely against it; presuming that such a conjunction, as we demanded, would be no less than rendering those countries a province to England: so that our Ambassadors having used all possible means to succeed in their business, and finding the Dutch unwilling to conclude with us whilst the king had an army in the field, returned to England, without effecting any thing but the expence of a great sum of money. This disappointment sat so heavy upon the haughty spirit of the lord chief justice St. John, that he reported these transactions with the highest aggravations against the States; and thereby was a principal instrument to prevail with the Council of State to move the parliament to pass an Act prohibiting foreign ships from bringing any merchandizes into England, except such as were of the growth or manufacture of that country to which the said ships did belong. This law, though just in itself, and very advantageous to the English nation, was so highly resented by the Dutch, who had for a long time driven the trade of Europe by the great number of their ships, that it soon proved to be the ball of contention between the two Nations.” This Account of Mr. Ludlow is confirmed by another Contemporary,† who adds, “That when the States Commissioners came to take their leave of the parliament's Ambassadors, Mr. St. John gave them these parting words: ‘My lords, you have an eye upon the event of the affairs of the kingdom of Scotland, and therefore do refuse the friendship we have offered: now I can assure you that many in the parliament were of opinion that we should not have come hither, or any ambassadors been sent to you, before they had put an end to the contest between themselves and that king; and then expected your ambassadors to us. I now perceive our error, and that those gentlemen were in the right: in a short time you shall see that business ended; and then you will come to us, and seek what we have freely offered, when it shall perplex you that you have refused our proffer.’ All which was verified by the event.

The news from Scotland, this month, amounted to little more than that the King's Army remained in their fastnesses, industriously avoiding an engagement, though Cromwell continued to use his utmost efforts to provoke them to it; their aim being to keep the English in play till the winter's scarcity of provisions for their horse should force them to return to their own country.

Cromwell gains a great Victory over the Scots in Fife.] July 25. The parliament received, from the lord-general Cromwell, advice of a great Victory obtained over the Scots in Fife, by a detachment of their forces, under the command of major-general Lambert. After reading the said Letter the house ordered, That, the next Lord's Day, the ministers of London, the late lines of communication, and bills of mortality, do render Thanks to Almighty God for his wonderful mercy in this great Success given to the parliament's Forces in Scotland, on the 20th instant; and implore the continuance of God's blessing upon the proceedings of the Forces of this Commonwealth there, and the perfecting of his own Work to his praise.

Aug. 9. p. m. The Council of State received, by an express from Mr. George Downing, dated from Newcastle the 7th, a Relation of the Progress of the Parliament's Forces in Scotland; and advising, That the king had wholly abandoned that kingdom, and in despair, with what forces were left with him, marched into England; part of the Parliament's Forces being in his van, and the lord general Cromwell following in his rear. The house being adjourned for 4 days, the Council thought this intelligence so important, that the next morning after the receipt thereof, though on a Sunday, they published Mr. Downing's Narrative; and wrote a Letter to the lord mayor, desiring it to be read in the congregation where his lordship should attend divine service on that day.

Aug. 12. The proceedings of this day abound with instances of the vigorous resolutions of the parliament, touching the Invasion of the Scots; for, besides the Votes of the house already mentioned, they passed no less than three several Acts for the support of their new Commonwealth against the present threatened danger; viz. 1. An Act empowering the Commissioners of the Militia, to raise Forces and Money; and for reviving all Commissions formerly granted by Ordinance of Parliament, or the Council of State, to any Colonels, &c. 2. An Act containing Instructions to the Commissioners of the Militia; and 3. An Act for declaring it High Treason to hold any correspondence with the king.

Aug. 21. The house received intelligence, That the Scots Army lay on the 17th at Northwich, and the next day advanced between Nantwich and Chester; and that major-gen. Lambert and the Forces with him were cheerfully followed by the officers and soldiers of the Cheshire and Lancashire militia of foot; who, upon this emergency, (though their harvest was ready to cut) promised not to leave them till they either should be properly dismissed, or the Lord put a seasonable issue to this business.

Aug. 23. This day the house received intelligence from the majors general Lambert and Harrison dated the 22nd, That the Scots Army lay the night before at Tonge, in Shropshire, and that they inclined towards Worcester; that col. Danvers, governor of Stafford, with some few horse, fell in upon some of their quarters, and killed 5 of their men; but gave an alarm to the whole Army. By another Letter it was certified that the Scots had, of horse and foot, 120 colours; that their horse were poor and harrassed out; that their foot were miserably ragged, and sick creatures a great number of them; that their king was found, with cap in hand, desiring them yet a little longer to stick to him; persuading them that, within two days march, they should come into a country where all things would be plentifully provided for them, and shortly thence to London: That the parliament's forces were at Tamworth, and from thence had sent several parties to attend the enemy's motion; and to dispose their own marches, in order to a conjunction with the Lord-General, and the other Forces lately sent from London.

Surrender of Stirling-Castle to the Parliament's Forces. Aug. 27. This day a Letter to the Speaker, from Dr. Clerke, advocate to the court of admiralty, giving an account of the Surrender of Stirling Castle to the Parliament's Forces, was read.

Aug. 28. A Letter from lieut. gen. Fleetwood to the Speaker, intimating the Arrival of the King's Army in and about Worcester, was read.

Aug. 29. A Letter from col. Birch to the Speaker, with advice of the earl of Derby's being routed in Lancashire, was read to the house. In consequence of all these great Successes, the house ordered Thanks to be given to Almighty God, the next Lord's Day; and that the respective ministers should, at the same time, beg the Divine blessing upon the Parliament's Army now ready to engage with the enemy; and that the lord mayor of London do take care to give them notice accordingly. — About this time the king published another Declaration, intitled, 'His Majesty's second Declaration,' set forth upon his arrival at Worcester: this was also read in the house, and burnt a few days after by the common hangman. — The only Act passed this month worth our notice, besides those already mentioned, was for the lowering of the Common Interest of Money from 8 to 6 per cent. The preamble to this Act informs us, that the reason for passing it was, That land was lately fallen greatly in its value.

Sept. 1. This month begins with a series of Letters from the Army, communicated to the house by the Council of State, from whence the news of a general engagement was daily expected.

Battle of Worcester.] Sept. 5. This day the house received divers letters of the Defeat of the Scots Army near Worcester, on the 3rd. For this most remarkable instance of success the parliament order a Thanksgiving to Almighty God the next Lord's Day, till another could be appointed, to be observed throughout the nation.

Sept. 6. Major Cobbet, who was sent by the General from Worcester, gave the house a farther Account of the Battle near that city: he also produced a collar of SS, which was the king of Scots', and his Garter; which the said officer took in the king's quarters at Worcester; and presented a second Letter from the Lord-General Cromwell to the Speaker. After reading this Letter the house appointed the 2nd of Oct. to be kept as a Day of Thanksgiving throughout England, Ireland, and even Scotland too. They likewise resolved to dine together, on that day, after sermon, at the Banqueting-House in Whitehall; and the Council of State were ordered to provide a dinner accordingly. The house went still further in this Thanksgiving than ever they had done before, by ordering in an Act not only to set apart the said day, but also to appoint an annual commemoration of this Victory on the 3rd of Sept. for time to come.

A Deputation sent to Cromwell to compliment him on his great Victory.] A deputation, consisting of two commissioners of the great seal, Mr. Lisle and Mr. Whitlocke, with the lord chief justice St. John and sir Gilbert Pickering, were appointed to go and compliment the General on this occasion; and it was referred to a committee to consider of somewhat to be done by the parliament, as a testimony of their thankful acceptance of the great and faithful services performed by the Lord-General.* In the mean time, apartments were ordered to be fitted up for him in Hampton-Court; and the Council of State were im-

* Mr. Whitlocke gives us the following result of this Embassy: "That they met the General near Aylesbury, delivered their message, and he received them with all kindness and respect: that he gave each of them a horse and two Scots prisoners, as a token of his thankful reception of the parliament's regard in sending them to meet and congratulate him." A Journalist of these times adds, "That Cromwell was met at Acton, by the Speaker, the lord president Bradshaw, many members of parliament and the Council of State, with the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London: that he entered the City in a coach of state, and was received with all possible acclamations of joy." "All which," says Mr. Ludlow, "tended not a little to heighten the spirit of this haughty gentleman."

"The Battle of Worcester," says Hume, "afforded Cromwell what he called his crowning mercy," So elated was he, that he intended to have knighted in the field two of his generals, Lambert and Fleetwood; but was dissuaded by his friends from exerting this act of regal authority. His power and ambition were too great to brook submission to the empty name of a Republic, which stood chiefly by his influence, and was supported by his victories. How early he entertained thoughts of taking into his hand the reins of government is uncertain. We are only assured, that he now discovered to his intimate friends these aspiring views; and even expressed a desire of assuming the rank of king, which he had contributed, with such seeming zeal, to abolish."

powered to give such reasonable gratuities as they should think proper to the persons who gave intelligence to the parliament's Forces of the enemy's Transactions at Worcester.

Rewards voted to the Officers of the Army.] Sept. 9. The English Army in Scotland, which Cromwell had left behind him, under the command of Lambert, Monk, Whalley, Okey, and Alured, had made great conquests in that kingdom; whereupon, the house ordered lands of Inheritance, to the value of 1000*l.* per ann. to be settled on Lambert; 500*l.* on Monk and Whalley; 300*l.* on Okey; and 200*l.* on Alured, for their great and eminent services to the Commonwealth.—And, to shew the Scots nation that the English were resolved to keep what they had conquered in that kingdom, the house ordered a Bill to be brought in, 'For asserting the Right of England to so much of Scotland as is now under the power of their Forces, and to settle it under the government of this Commonwealth.'

Sept. 10. A Proclamation was issued, offering a reward of 1000*l.* 'For the Discovery and Apprehending of Charles Stuart, and other Traitors, his Adherents, and Abettors.'

Rewards voted to Cromwell.] Sept. 11. The house resolved that Lands of Inheritance, to the yearly value of 4000*l.* belonging to the state, [besides 2500*l.* per ann. formerly granted] be settled upon the lord-general Cromwell and his heirs, as a mark of favour from the parliament, for his great and eminent services to the Commonwealth. Likewise 2000*l.* yearly rent, was ordered to be settled on Henry Ireton, esq. lord-deputy of Ireland, Cromwell's son-in-law.*

Some of the capital Prisoners ordered to be tried.] This day Mr. Scott, from the Council of State, reported to the house the Names of those persons they thought proper to be made examples of justice, which were these; James earl of Derby, col. Massey, duke of Hamilton, John earl of Lauderdale, the earl of Cleveland, capt. Benbow, sir Timothy Featherstonhaugh, also Tho. Licence and James Bridges, the one mayor, and the other sheriff, of Worcester. These were all ordered to be tried by courts martial, in different places.

Sept. 16. This day the Parliament's victorious General, Cromwell, appeared in the house; when the Speaker, in their name, made an eloquent oration, as the Journals express it, to him; and gave him their hearty Thanks for his great services to the Commonwealth.

* Ludlow writes, "That when the news of this Grant was brought over to Ireton, it was so unacceptable to him that he said, The parliament had many just debts, which he desired they would pay before they made any such presents; that he had no need of their Land, and therefore would not have it; and that he should be more contented to see them doing the service of the nation, than so liberal in disposing of the public treasure."

A Bill ordered in, for fixing a Period to the present Parliament.] Upon the return of Cromwell we find that the Bill for an equal Representative in Parliament was briskly revived; for it was, this day, ordered to be taken into debate the next morning, and nothing to intervene. Accordingly, Sept. 17, it was made the subject almost of this whole day; but nothing further is entered concerning it, than that it was adjourned to this day sen'night; and then the report to be made to the house of it, the first business.—The 24th and 25th of this month were almost wholly employed in debating the grand point of a new Representative; on the latter of which the question being put, That a Bill be brought in for setting a Time certain for the Sitting of this Parliament, and for calling a new one with such fit rules, qualifications, proportions, and other circumstances, as this parliament shall think fit, and shall be for the good and safety of this Commonwealth, the house divided, and the Yeas went forth; when the Lord-General and Mr. Scott, the Tellers of them, brought in the numbers 33; sir H. Mildmay and sir James Harrington for the Noes, 26; on which the Bill was ordered in, and a committee appointed for that purpose.

Sept. 26. An Act 'For setting apart the 24th of Oct. 1651, for a Day of public Thanksgiving, together with a Narrative declaring the Grounds and Reasons thereof,' was read a 3rd time, and passed.

Oct. 1. The grand question of fixing a time for putting an End to the present Parliament being carried in the affirmative, as before mentioned, the Bill was ordered to be brought in that day sen'night.

Oct. 8. The Bill was read a first time, and ordered a 2nd reading on the 10th, when it was committed to a grand committee of the house; to sit de die in diem, with some intermissions, for a fortnight, on this important affair.

The Earl of Derby and others executed.]

Oct. 14. By a Letter from Chester, the parliament was informed that the Court-Martial there had tried and condemned to death, James earl of Derby, sir Timothy Featherstonhaugh, and capt. John Benbow, the first of this month. And, this day the house received a Letter, by the Speaker, from the earl; which being put to the question, to read it or not, was carried in the affirmative by 22 against 16. So the Letter, with a Petition inclosed, intitled, 'The humble Petition of James earl of Derby,' were both read; but nothing is entered farther about them in the Journals. However an authority before cited informs us,* "That the earl offered to give up the Isle of Man, and send the necessary orders to his lady and the governor for that purpose, on condition of obtaining his pardon; and that the Petition was presented by his son lord Strange." But the parliament paid no regard to this proposal; for he was beheaded the next day at Bolton, in Lancashire;* as was sir Timothy Featherstonhaugh, at Chester. Capt. John Benbow was also shot at Shrewsbury. Most of the common soldiers were sent to the English plantations; and 1500 of them were granted to the Guinea merchants, and sent to work in the gold mines there.

Act passed for Encouragement of Navigation.] The only law passed this month worthy of our notice, was intitled, 'An Act for Increase of Shipping and Encouragement of the Navigation of this Nation.' As this Act is in itself very interesting, and the passing thereof, was the foundation of the Grand Quarrel that soon after ensued between the republics of England and Holland, we shall give an abstract of it. The preamble sets forth, "That the Increase of Shipping, and the Encouragement of the Navigation of this Nation, is, under the good providence and protection of God, a great means of the welfare and safety of this Commonwealth: and therefore the parliament enacted, That no goods should be imported from Asia, Africa, or America, but in English ships, under the penalty of forfeiture of the said goods and ship: one moiety thereof to the use of the Commonwealth, and the other to the prosecutor; nor from any part of Europe, except in such vessels as belong to the people of that country of which the goods are the growth or Manufacture, under the like penalty: That no goods of foreign growth or manufacture should be imported, but from the ports where such goods could only be, or usually had been, first shipped for transportation, under the like penalty; That no salt-fish, whale-fins, or oil should be imported, but what were caught or made by the people of England; nor any salt-fish exported, or carried from one port to another in this nation, but in English vessels, under the like penalty: But commodities from the Levant Seas, the East-

* "When the earl of Derby was summoned [by Ireton] to surrender the Isle of Man, he returned this spirited and memorable answer: 'I received your letter with indignation, and with scorn return you this answer; that I cannot but wonder whence you should gather any hopes, that I should prove like you, treacherous to my sovereign, since you cannot be ignorant of my former actions in his late majesty's service, from which principles of loyalty I am no whit departed: I scorn your proffers; I disdain your favour; I abhor your treason; and am so far from delivering up this Island to your advantage, that I shall keep it to the utmost of my power to your destruction. Take this for your final answer, and forbear any further solicitations, for if you trouble me with any more messages of this nature, I will burn the paper, and hang up the bearer. This is the immutable resolution, and shall be the undoubted practice of him, who accounts it his chiefest glory to be his majesty's most loyal and obedient subject.' Humo.

Indies, the ports of Spain or Portugal, might be imported from the usual ports or places of trading used heretofore, though the said commodities were not the growth of the said places." This Act did not extend to bullion or prize goods, nor to silk or silk wares brought by land from Italy to Ostend, Amsterdam, &c. provided they were brought from those ports in English vessels.

Account of the King's Escape into France, as published by Authority of the House.] October 28. Notwithstanding the Proclamation of 1000*l.* reward lately issued, for Apprehending of the King's Person, and the indefatigable pains taken to discover him, he evaded all his pursuers, found means to hire a vessel on the coast of Sussex, and landed at Havre-de-Grace. This day an Extract of two Letters from Paris were published, (licensed by the clerk of the parliament) setting forth, "That on the 19th the Scots king arrived there, and was met by the duke of Orleans not far from that city, who had the day before sent some coaches for him to Maguy, where he lay that night: that his highness conducted him to the Louvre, where the late queen, his mother, repaired presently after from Chaliot, where she had been erecting a nunnery: that the king gave the company a full Narrative of all the particulars of what happened at the Fight at Worcester, threw out some reproachful words against the Scots, put some scurrilous language on the Presbyterian party in England, and boasted much of his own valour: That he told them how he slipt out of Worcester, and how near he was of being taken there; first in the fort, and after in his chamber: how he disguised himself, and went from county to county, and what shift he made for victuals and lodging; sometimes being driven to beg a piece of bread and meat, and ride with bread in one hand and meat in the other; and sometimes setting a guard about a little cottage while he rested there until the morning: as also his being in London, and the manner of his passing disguised through several counties in England, till he made his escape: the relation whereof produced some laughter, at the ridiculousness of his condition." Thus much for the Parliament's Account of the king's Escape. His majesty's own Narrative thereof may be found at large in lord Clarendon's History, who had all the particulars from the king himself.*

The Parliament fix upon a Time for their Dissolution.] Nov. 14. The members in and about Westminster Hall, as well Judges as others, were all ordered to be summoned, by the serjeant with his mace, and required to give their attendance in the house. The debate upon the Bill for the Dissolution of the Parliament was then resumed; and the question being put, That it is now a convenient time to declare a certain period for the continuance of this Parliament, beyond which it shall not sit, the house divided; when the Yeas, brought in by the lord-general Cromwell and the lord chief justice St. John, were 49; the Noes, by col. Morley and Mr. Bond, 47. After this Resolution, the house adjourned to the 18th, when it was resolved, That the Time for the Continuance of this Parliament, beyond which they resolve not to sit, shall be the 3d of Nov. 1654.—Thus was this great business, which had continued in agitation so many months, at length concluded, but the Dissolution put off ad longum diem. However, they did not live to the destined period; for, before that time, this remnant of a parliament met its fate, under the superior power of their lord-general Cromwell and his Army.

A New Council of State elected.] Nov. 19. A Report being made from the Council of State, That the time of the ceasing of the power of the said Council determined on the 1st of Dec. next, the house resolved, That the number thereof for the year ensuing, should be 21 chosen out of the present members, and 20 new ones; to be elected, as before, by ballot. Accordingly, a few days after, the house proceeded to the election, when the lord-general Cromwell, the lord commissioner Whitlocke, the lord chief justice St. John, sir H. Vane, jun. John Gardon, lieut. gen. Fleetwood, the lord chief justice Rolle, the lord commissioner Lisle, serj. Bradshaw, sir A. Haselrig, Dennis Bond, and Tho. Scott, colonels Puresoy and Wauton, sir Wm. Masham, sir J. Harrington, Tho. Chaloner, maj. Salway, sir Gilbert Pickering, John Carew and Nich. Love, were re-elected. The new members were Herbert Morley and Anthony Stapley, sir Peter Wentworth, Philip lord Lisle, Alex. Popham, John Corbet, Abraham Burrell, W. Hay, and Cornelius Holland, alderman Pennington, W. Masham and John Downes, sir W. Constable, John Dixwel, Hen. Nevil, Hen. Herbert, and Rob. Blake, Philip, earl of Pembroke, Henry Martin, and Robert Wallop. It is remarkable that, upon this contest for power, 120 Members were present, though, upon other occasions, the house very seldom consisted of more than 50, and oftentimes under 40.

Limerick, and the Isles of Jersey and Man, surrendered to the Parliament's Forces.] The last thing we find memorable, in the proceedings of this month, was appointing another Day of Thanksgiving, for the taking of the city of Limerick, by the lord-deputy there, Oct. 30, with all the artillery, arms, ammunition, &c. therein: likewise for taking the Isles of Jersey and Man,* with all their castles and forts, ordnance and ammunition contained in them. But Ireton, the victorious general in Ireland, did not long survive his conquest there; for he died at Limerick, the 26th of Nov. two days before the house had ordered some physicians to go over, with all speed, to attend him.

Commissioners appointed for the Government of Scotland.] Dec. 10. The Commissioners to be sent down into Scotland, in order to introduce an English Government in that kingdom, were this day nominated and appointed, and were these: lord chief justice St. John, sir H. Vane, jun. col. George Fenwick, major Salway, the majors general Lambert and Deane, lieut. gen. Monk, and alderman Tichbourne of London. But the Instructions for these Commissioners were forbid by the parliament to be entered in the Journals, and only one copy thereof ordered to be ingrossed for the use of the Council of State.

Prymate and Lilburne punished for petitioning against Sir A. Haslerig.] Jan. 16. Col. Lilburne having joined in a Petition with Josiah Prymate, to the house, against sir Arthur Haslerig, complaining of his great Oppression and Tyranny, in seizing on certain Collieries in the county of Durham; and overawing and directing the commissioners to whom he had applied for relief, the said Petition was voted false, malicious, and scandalous, and ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. Prymate and Lilburne were fined each 3000*l.* for the use of the Commonwealth; 2000*l.* to sir A. Haslerig, for damages, and 500*l.* a piece to the Commissioners before whom the cause had been heard. The former of them was also committed to the Fleet till payment should be made, and the latter was ordered to be banished out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the territories thereto belonging, and to suffer death in case of his return.

April 13. This day a Bill was brought in for incorporating of Scotland into one Commonwealth and Free State with England; and for abolishing the Kingly Office in Scotland. It was read a 1st and 2nd time.

Vote relating to Tythes.] The business of Tythes, was also another topic this month; and, after debate upon them, the house ordered it to be referred to the committee appointed to receive Proposals for the better Propagation of the Gospel, to consider how a convenient and competent Maintenance for a godly and able Ministry may be settled in lieu of Tythes, and present their opinion to the house. And the question being put, that this clause be added, "That Tythes should be paid as formerly, until such Maintenance be settled," the house divided; when it was carried in the affirmative, by 27 against 17.

A Sea fight with the Dutch.] May 21. About this time a Sea-Fight took place in the Downs, between the English and the Dutch; the particular Account of which was this day communicated to the house in a Letter from Admiral Blake. Upon which they voted their Approbation of what the Admiral had done in this affair; and ordered the Council of State to take care of the strengthening the Fleet, for the security and benefit of the Commonwealth.—About the same time with the above Sea-Fight, three Ambassadors from the States arrived at London, and were conducted to a public Audience of the house. Mr. Ludlow gives the following account of this Embassy: "The States General, being highly displeased with the late Act of Navigation passed by the parliament, which they accounted to be a great obstruction to their Trade, resolved to leave no means unattempted to procure it to be repealed. To this end they sent three Ambassadors to England; who pretending a desire to finish the Treaty begun formerly between the two States, requested that things might be as they were at the time of the parliament's Ambassador's departure from Holland; designing thereby, that the Act lately passed for the Encouragement of our Seamen should be suspended, and all such merchandizes restored as had been seized from the Dutch by virtue of the said act. The parliament refusing to consent to this Proposal, the States General gave Orders for the equipping a considerable Fleet, consisting of about 100 ships of war, giving notice to the house, by their ambassadors, of these preparations; and assuring them, that they were not designed to offend the English nation, with whom they desired to maintain a friendly correspondence; and that they were provided to no other end, than to protect their own subjects in their Trade and Navigation. But the parliament, being unwilling to rely upon the promises of those, who, by their past and present actions, had manifested little friendship to them, resolved to make what preparations they could to defend themselves."—But all these negotiations had no effect; for we find that the English demands being to have satisfaction from the Dutch for all charges and damages this State had sustained and been put to this summer, on their account, the Dutch denied to consent to it: and the Ambassadors having desired to take their leave of the house, it was granted on the 29th.

July. 6. The war with Holland now began to be entered into in earnest; sir George Ayscough, one of the English Admirals, lately returned from reducing the Plantations to the obedience of parliament, fought the Dutch Fleet, under admiral Van Tromp, and took, sunk, and dispersed 36 sail of their ships. An Account of which coming this day to the house, they ordered that a Letter of Thanks be written from the parliament to sir George, taking notice of his great services to the Commonwealth, and that he should give their Thanks also to the officers under him.—Admiral Blake was sent with a strong squadron Northward, to disturb the Dutch Fisheries on that coast, where he fought and dispersed their men of war, and took most of their Fishing Bussess, &c.

Aug. This month the house went principally upon the Distribution of the Lands lately conquered in Ireland, and appointed Cromwell Captain General of all the Parliament's Forces; lieutenant general Fleetwood, as commander in chief under him in Ireland; lieutenant general Ludlow, Miles Corbett, John Jones, and John Weaver, esqrs. commissioners for ordering and managing the affairs of that nation.

Deputies come up from Scotland, to treat with the Parliament about the intended Union of the two Nations.] October. A Deputation of 21 Commissioners from Scotland came up to London about this time, and were lodged in Westminster by the parliament's orders. These gentlemen came to treat with the parliament about the intended Union between the two nations: and, to that end, the house appointed 12 of their members, to meet these Deputies, to peruse their commission, and see that it was in pursuance of, and according to, a Declaration of Parliament lately published.—Mr. Ludlow writes “That this proposition of Union was cheerfully accepted by the most judicious of the Scots nation, who well understood what a great condescension it was in the parliament of England, to permit a people they had conquered to have a share with them in the legislative power.” But the Scots Clergy, as Heath informs us, protested against this Union, “lest such an incorporation should draw with it a subordination of the kirk to the state in the things of Christ.”

A new Council of State chosen.] November. The election for a new Council of State was according to annual custom, carried through this month. The serjeant at arms, with his mace, was ordered to go out and summon all the members in Westminster-Hall, and the parts adjacent, to attend the house. The doors were then ordered to be shut, when the number of members present appeared to be 122. The 21 members of the Council to be continued for the year ensuing, were Cromwell, Whitlocke, St. John, lord chief justice Rolle, sir H. Vane, jun. sir A. Haslerig, Tho. Scott, Herbert Morley, and Dennis Bond, esqrs. col. Purefoy, John Bradshaw, serj. at law, John Gurdon, esq. lord-commissioner Lisle, col. Wauton, sir Js. Harrington, sir Wm. Masham, Tho. Chaloner and Rob. Wallop, esqs. sir Gilbert Pickering, sir Peter Wentworth, and Nich. Love, esq. The 20 new Members, now elected, were, Rob. Goodwin, esq. alderman Allen, col. Thompson, Walter Strickland esq. sir H. Mildmay, maj. gen. Skippon, lord Grey, col. Sidney, Edm. Prideaux, esq. attorney-general, sir John Trevor, col. Norton, Tho. Lister, esq. col. Ingoldsby, sir John Bouchier, Wm. earl of Salisbury, Wm. Cawley, esq. sir Wm. Brereton, John Fielder and Wm. Say, esqrs. and major-gen. Harrison.

December. The Treaty with the Deputies from Scotland, still went on; the point they were now canvassing was the Proportion of Members for Scotland to sit in the English parliament and the time of their sitting; which was, at last, referred to the committee for the new Representative. The rest of the transactions in this month are too inconsiderable for our purpose.

January. The house began this month with a very considerable reduction of their Land-Forces, so as to lessen their pay from 80 to 70,000*l.* a month.

Great Naval Victory obtained over the Dutch, after an Engagement of 3 Days.] March 1. This day a Letter from the three admirals of the Fleet, Blake, Deane, and Monk, addressed to the Speaker, and dated aboard the Triumph, Feb. 27, in Stokes Bay, was read in the house. It contained an Account of a great Naval Victory obtained over the Dutch after an Engagement of 3 days. The English Fleet consisted of 80 sail, Blake commanded, and Deane under him, together with Monk, who had been sent for from Scotland. When the English lay off Portland (Feb. 18.) they descried, near break of day, a Dutch Fleet of 76 vessels, sailing up the channel, along with a convoy of 300 merchantmen. Tromp, and, under him, de Ruyter, commanded the Dutch. The battle was the most furious that had yet been fought between these warlike and rival nations. Three days was the combat continued with the utmost rage and obstinacy. The Dutch admiral made a skilful retreat, and saved all the merchant ships except 30. He lost 11 ships of war, had 2000 men slain, and near 1500 taken prisoners. The English, though many of their ships were extremely shattered, had but one sunk. Their slain were not much inferior in number to those of the enemy.—In consequence of this great Victory, the house ordered that Thanks be given to Almighty God, the next Lord's day, throughout London and Westminster. The Speaker was also directed to write a Letter of Congratulation to each of the three Admirals, taking notice of the parliament's resentment of their great and faithful services in the late Engagement, with Thanks to them and the several commanders under them; and a collection was ordered to be made in the house, for the widows of sailors killed in the action.

The Duke of Gloucester sent out of the kingdom.] March. 17. Some time ago the parliament had ordered, That Henry Stuart, commonly called duke of Gloucester, youngest son of the late king, should be released from Carisbrooke-Castle, in the Isle of Wight, and sent to Dunkirk: This day they received advice of his being arrived at Breda, where he was most affectionately received by his sister the princess royal, dowager of Orange.

The Dutch sue for Peace.] March 22. The Dutch having been heartily drubbed in their last Naval Engagement, seem now to lower their top-sails, and sue for peace. To that end we are told, by the Journals, that mynheer Paw's private secretary was sent over with a Letter from the States of Holland and West-Frizeland to the Parliament; on which occasion the house ordered the Council of State to prepare an Answer thereto, and a Letter addressed to the States General, both in Latin, for the parliament's approbation; which was done accordingly, and sent away by a special messenger: but these Letters imported no more than a general intimation of the parliament's good disposition to Peace upon proper terms.

Cromwell comes to the House and turns the Members out of Doors.] April 19. This long lived parliament was now drawing near its end, which was so sudden and unexpected, that few of its members were the least aware of it. This day, after debate on a Bill for settling the Claims of the Adventurers for Ireland, on a sudden the Printed Journals break off without any notice taken of the occasion; only we are told by the publisher of them in a marginal Note, That there did an Entry follow; but against it was written, in the Margin of the Original, 'This Entry was expunged, by order of parliament, Jan. 7, 1659.' In looking forwards into the Journal of that day, we meet with the following passage: "Whereas this house do find an Entry in the Journal-Book of the 20th of April, 1653, in these words, 'This day his excellency the Lord General dissolved this Parliament;' which was done without consent of parliament; this house doth declare the same to be a forgery; and do order Mr. Scobell to be sent for to the bar to answer it. Mr. Scobell soon after appearing there, the Entry was shewn him, and being asked Who made it? He acknowledged, That it was his own hand writing, and that he did it without the direction of any person whatever. The house then ordered the Entry to be expunged out of the Journal, and referred it to a committee to consider whether the then late Act of Indemnity extended to pardon that offence.—This is all we can collect from the Journals, relating to this most remarkable transaction; but since the reader's curiosity may require a more explicit Account of it, we shall give a Narrative of the Manner of this Parliament's being dismissed, from a Diary* of equal authority with that of the Journals themselves; being published at the very time of action, and licensed by Mr. Scobell, clerk of the house. It runs thus:

"The Officers of the Army have, for 16 weeks past, or more, used all possible means to have persuaded the parliament to have passed such things as might be for the common good, and proposed the particulars to them; then many endeavoured to present Petitions from several parts of the nation to the officers, but they refused to meddle, leaving it to the parliament, desiring that all might be acted by them. The officers used all private means to persuade them, as they had occasion from time to time, telling them, 'How the country people did expect it;' and, after all that, sent a letter, and had meetings with divers whom they looked upon as most ready to promote the public good; and at one time met with almost 30, and endeavoured to engage them to act therein; giving them reasons for the passing of those things which they proposed, for the general good of the people: but the members only answered, 'That when they were in parliament they had liberty of their Yeas and their Noes.' The last night before this dismissal, there were near 20 members with the General, to whom the danger of the Act, for calling a new Representative, was declared, as the house was about to pass it; it giving so much liberty, that many disaffected persons might be chosen; and by the said Act these present members were to sit and to be made up by others chosen, and by themselves approved of: hereupon they engaged not to meddle with it this day; and when major gen. Harrison saw, this morning, that they fell upon it, he most sweetly and humbly desired them to lay it aside, shewing them the danger of it; but they going on, the Lord General required them to depart the house; and lieut. col. Worsley, with some soldiers, came in and ordered the house to be cleared; took the mace away, and caused the house to be locked up. The next day there was a Paper, by somebody, posted upon the Parliament House door, thus: This House is to be Lett, now unfurnished."

Mr. Whitlocke writes thus*:—"On the 19th of April there having been a great meeting at Cromwell's lodgings at Whitehall, of parliament men, and several officers of the Army, sent to by Cromwell to be there; and a large discourse and debate having been amongst them touching some expedient to be found out, for the present carrying on of the government of the Commonwealth, and putting a period to this present parliament, it was offered by divers, as a most dangerous thing to dissolve the present parliament, and to set up any other government; and that it would neither be warrantable in conscience or wisdom so to do; yet none of them expressed themselves so freely to that purpose as sir Tho. Widdrington and Whitlocke then did. Of the other opinion, as to putting a period forthwith to this parliament, St. John was one of the chief, and many more with him, and generally all the officers of the Army; who stuck close in this likewise to their General. And the better to make way for themselves and their ambitious design of advancing them to the civil government, as well as they were in the military power, they and their party declared their opinions, That it was necessary the same should be done one way or other, and the members of parliament not permitted to prolong their own power. At which expression Cromwell seemed to reprove some of them; and this conference lasted till late at night, when Widdrington and Whitlocke went home weary and troubled to see the indiscretion and ingratitude of those men, and the way they designed to ruin themselves; therefore these came early again the next morning, according to appointment, to Cromwell's lodging, where there were but a few parliament men, and a few officers of the Army. A point was again stirred, which had been debated the night before, 'Whether 40 persons, or about that number of parliament men and officers of the Army, should be nominated by the parliament, and impowered for the managing the affairs of the Commonwealth, till a new parliament should meet, and so the present parliament to be forthwith dissolved.' Whitlocke was against this proposal, and the more, fearing lest he might be one of these 40; who, he thought, would be in a desperate condition after the parliament should be dissolved: but others were very ambitious to be of this number and council, and to be invested with this exorbitant power in them. Cromwell being informed, during this debate, that the parliament was sitting, and that it was hoped they would put a period to themselves; which would be the most honourable dissolution for them: hereupon he broke off the meeting, and the members of parliament with him left him at his lodging, went to the house, and found them in debate of an act, the which would occasion other meetings of them again, and prolong their sitting. Thereupon col. Ingoldsby went back to Cromwell, and told him what the house were doing; who was so enraged thereat, expecting they should have meddled with no other business but putting a period to their own sitting without more delay, that he presently commanded some of the officers of the Army to fetch a party of soldiers, with whom he marched to the house, and led a file of musketeers in with him; the rest he placed at the door of the house, and in the lobby before it. In this manner entering the house, he, in a furious manner, bid the Speaker leave his chair; told the house 'That they had sat long enough, unless they had done more good; that some of them were whoremasters, (looking then towards Henry Martyn and Sir Peter Wentworth) that others of them were drunkards, and some corrupt and unjust men, and scandalous to the profession of the Gospel; and that it was not fit they should sit as a parliament any longer, and desired them to go away.' The Speaker not stirring from his seat, col. Harrison, who sat near the chair, rose up and took him by the arm, to remove him from his seat; which when the Speaker saw, he left his chair. Some of the members rose up to answer Cromwell, but he would suffer none to speak but himself; which he did with so much arrogance in himself, and reproach to his fellow-members, that some of his privadoes were ashamed of it: but he and his officers and party would have it so; and among all the parliament men, of whom many wore swords, and would sometimes brag high, not one man offered to draw his sword against Cromwell, or to make the least resistance against him; but all of them tamely departed the house. He bid one of his soldiers to take away that fool's bauble, the mace, and stayed himself to see all the members out of the house, himself the last of them, and then caused the doors of the house to be shut up."

The next is Mr. Ludlow's Account, who writes, "That Cromwell having notice that the house was sitting, hastened there, where he sat down and heard the debate some time; then calling to Harrison to come to him, he told him, 'That he judged the parliament ripe for a Dissolution, and this to be the time of doing it.' The major answered, as he since told me, 'Sir, the work is very great and dangerous, therefore I desire you seriously to consider of it before you engage in it.' You say well," replied the General, and thereupon sat still for about a quarter of an hour; and then the question for passing the Bill being to be put, he said again to Harrison, 'This is the time: I must do it;' and, suddenly standing up, he made a speech, wherein he loaded the parliament with the vilest reproaches, charging them, 'not to have a heart to do any thing for the public good; to have espoused the corrupt interest of presbytery and the lawyers, who were the supporters of tyranny and oppression; accusing them of an intention to perpetuate themselves in power; and thereupon told them, that the Lord had done with them, and had chosen other instruments for carrying on his work that were more worthy.' This he spake with so much passion and discomposure of mind, as if he had been distracted. Sir Peter Wentworth stood up and said, 'That this was the first time that ever he had heard such unbecoming language given to the parliament; and that it was the more horrid in that it came from their servant, and their servant whom they had so highly trusted and obliged.' But as he was going on, the General stept into the midst of the house, where, continuing his distracted language, he said, 'Come, come, I will put an end to your prating,' then walking up and down the house like a mad-man, and kicking the ground with his feet, he cried out, 'You are no parliament; I say you are no parliament: I will put an end to your sitting: call them in, call them in.' Whereupon the serjeant attending the parliament, opened the doors, and lieut. col. Worsley, with two files of musketeers, entered the house; which sir Henry Vane observing from his place, said aloud, 'This is not honest; yea, it is against morality and common honesty.' Then Cromwell fell a railing at him, crying out with a loud voice, 'O sir Henry Vane, sir Henry Vane, the Lord deliver me from sir Henry Vane.' Then looking upon one of the members, he said, 'There sits a Drunkard;' and giving much reviling language to others, he commanded the Mace to be taken away, saying, 'What shall we do with this Bauble? here, take it away.' Having brought all into this disorder, major-gen. Harrison went to the Speaker as he sat in the chair, and told him, 'That seeing things were reduced to this pass, it would not be convenient for him to remain there.' The Speaker answered, 'That he would not come down unless he were forced.' 'Sir,' said Harrison, 'I will lend you my hand;' and thereupon putting his hand within his, the Speaker came down. Then Cromwell applied himself to the members of the house, who were in number between 80 and 100, and said to them, 'It is you that have forced me to this, for I have sought the Lord night and day, that he would rather slay me than put me upon the doing of this work.' Hereupon alderman Allen, told him, 'That it was not yet gone so far, but all things might be restored again; and that if the soldiers were commanded out of the house, and the mace returned, the public affairs might go on in their former course:' but Cromwell having now passed the Rubicon, not only rejected his advice, but charged him with an Account of some hundred thousand pounds, for which he threatened to question him, having been long Treasurer for the Army; and in a rage committed him to the custody of one of the musketeers. Alderman Allen told him, 'That it was well known that it had not been his fault that his Account was not made up long since; that he had often tendered it to the house; and that he asked no favour from any man in that matter.' Cromwell having acted this treacherous and impious part, ordered the guard to see the house cleared of all the members; and then seized upon the Records that were there, and at Mr. Scobell's house. After which he went to the clerk, and snatching the Act of Dissolution, which was ready to pass, out of his hand, he put it under his cloak; and having commanded the doors to be locked up, went away to Whitehall."

Cromwell having thus dispatched this grand affair, and deposed the late lords and masters at Westminster, from their dominion and sovereignty in this nation, went in the afternoon of the same day to the place where the Council of State usually sat, and finding many of them there, he accosted them thus: 'Gentlemen, if you are met here as private persons, you shall not be disturbed; but if as a Council of State, this is no place for you; and since you cannot but know what was done at the house in the morning, so take notice that the parliament is dissolved.' To this Serjeant Bradshaw answered, 'Sir, we have heard what you did at the house in the morning, and before many hours all England will know it: but, sir, you are mistaken to think that the parliament is dissolved; for no power under Heaven can dissolve them but themselves; therefore take you notice of that.' Something more was said to the same purpose, by sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. Love, and

Mr. Scott, but all of them, perceiving themselves to be under the same violence, thought proper to withdraw.

Cromwell's Declaration of the Grounds and Reasons for thus dissolving the Parliament by Force.] The next step Cromwell took was to issue out, in his own name and his Council of Officers, the following Declaration of the Grounds and Reasons for dissolving the Parliament: *

"Whitehall, April 22, 1653.

"Our intention is not to give an Account, at this time, of the Grounds which first moved us to take up arms, and engage our lives and all that was dear unto us in this cause; nor to mind, in this Declaration, the various dispensations through which Divine Providence hath led us, or the witness the Lord hath borne, and the many signal testimonies of acceptance which he hath given, to the sincere endeavours of his unworthy servants, whilst they were contesting with the many and great difficulties, as well in the wars, as other transactions in the three nations; being necessitated, for the defence of the same cause they first asserted, to have recourse unto extraordinary actions, the same being evident by former Declarations published on that behalf.—After it had pleased God not only to reduce Ireland and give in Scotland, but so marvelously to appear for his people at Worcester, that these nations were reduced to a great degree of peace, and England to perfect quiet; and thereby the parliament had opportunity to give the people the harvest of all their labour, blood, and treasure, and to settle a due liberty both in reference to civil and spiritual things, whereunto they were obliged by their duty, their engagements, as also the great and wonderful things which God hath wrought for them; it was matter of much grief to the good and well-affected of the land, to observe the little progress which was made therein, who thereupon applied to the Army, expecting redress by their means; notwithstanding which, the Army being unwilling to meddle with the civil authority in matters so properly appertaining to it, it was agreed, That his excellency, and Officers of the Army which were members of parliament, should be desired to move the parliament to proceed vigorously in reforming what was amiss in government, and to the settling of the Commonwealth upon a foundation of justice and righteousness; which having done, we hoped that the parliament would seasonably have answered our expectation: but finding to our grief, delays therein, we renewed our Desires in an humble Petition to them, which was presented in August last; and although they at that time, signifying their good acceptance thereof, returned us thanks, and referred the particulars thereof to a committee of the house, yet no considerable effect was produced, nor any such progress made, as might imply their real intentions to accomplish what was petitioned for; but, on the contrary, there more and more appeared amongst them an aversion to the things themselves, with much bitterness and opposition to the people of God, and his spirit acting in them; which grew so prevalent, that those persons of honour and integrity amongst them, who had eminently appeared for God and the public good, both before and throughout this war, were rendered of no farther use in parliament, than by meeting with a corrupt party to give them countenance to carry on their ends, and for effecting the desire they had of perpetuating themselves in the Supreme Government, for which purpose the said party long opposed, and frequently declared themselves against having, a new Representative: and when they saw themselves necessitated to take that Bill into consideration, they resolved to make use of it to recruit the house, with persons of the same spirit and temper, thereby to perpetuate their own sitting; which intention divers of the activist amongst them did manifest, labouring to persuade others to a consent therein: and the better to effect this, divers Petitions, preparing from several counties for the continuance of this parliament, were encouraged, if not set on foot, by many of them. —For obviating of these evils, the Officers of the Army obtained several meetings with some of the parliament, to consider what fitting means and remedy might be applied to prevent the same: but such endeavours proving altogether ineffectual, it became most evident to the Army, as they doubt not it also is to all considering persons, that this parliament, through the corruption of some, the jealousy of others, the non-attendance and negligence of many, would never answer those ends which God, his people, and the whole nation expected from them; but that this cause, which the Lord hath so greatly blessed, and bore witness to, must needs languish under their hands, and, by degrees, be wholly lost; and the lives, liberties, and comforts of his people delivered into their enemies hands.—All which being sadly and seriously, considered by the honest people of this nation, as well as by the Army, and wisdom and direction being sought from the Lord, it seemed to be a duty incumbent upon us, who had seen so much of the power and presence of God going along with us, to consider of some more effectual means to secure the cause which the good people of this Commonwealth had been so long engaged in, and to establish righteousness and peace in these nations.—And after much debate it was judged necessary, and agreed upon, That the Supreme Authority should be, by the parliament, devolved upon known persons, men fearing God, and of approved integrity; and the government of the Commonwealth committed unto them for a time, as the most hopeful way to encourage and countenance all God's people, reform the law, and administer justice impartially; hoping thereby the people might forget monarchy, and, understanding their true interest in the election of successive parliaments, may have the government settled upon a true basis, without hazard to this glorious cause, or necessitating to keep up armies for the defence of the same. And being still resolved to use all means possible to avoid extraordinary courses, we prevailed with about 20 members of parliament to give us a conference, with whom we freely and plainly debated the necessity and justness of our Proposals on that behalf; and did evidence that those, and not the Act under their consideration, would most probably bring forth something answerable to that work, the foundation whereof God himself hath laid and is now carrying on in the world.—The which, notwithstanding, found no acceptance; but, instead thereof, it was offered, that the way was to continue still this present parliament, as being that from which we might reasonably expect all good things: and this being vehemently insisted upon, did much confirm us in our apprehensions, that not any love to a Representative, but the making use thereof to recruit, and so perpetuate themselves, was their aim.—They being plainly dealt with about this, and told that neither the nation, the honest interest, nor we ourselves, would be deluded by such dealings, they did agree to meet again the next day in the afternoon for mutual satisfaction; it being consented unto by the members present, that endeavours should be used that nothing in the mean time should be done in parliament that might exclude or frustrate the Proposals before-mentioned. Notwithstanding this, the next morning the parliament did make more haste than usual, in carrying on their said Act, being helped on therein by some of the persons engaged to us the night before; none of them which were then present endeavouring to oppose the same: and being ready to put the main question for consummating the said Act, whereby our aforesaid proposals would have been rendered void, and the way of bringing them into a fair and full debate in parliament obstructed; for preventing thereof, and all the sad and evil consequences which must, upon the grounds aforesaid, have ensued; and whereby, at one blow, the interest of all honest men, and of this glorious cause, had been in danger to be laid in the dust, and these nations embroiled in new troubles, at a time when our enemies abroad are watching all advantages against us, and some of them actually engaged in war with us, we have been necessitated, though with much reluctancy, to put an end to this parliament; which yet we have done, we hope, out of an honest heart, preferring this cause above our names, lives, families, or interests, how dear soever; with clear intentions and real purposes of heart, to call to the government persons of approved fidelity and honesty; believing that as no wise men will expect to gather grapes of thorns, so good men will hope, that if persons so qualified be chosen, the fruits of a just and a righteous reformation, so long prayed and wished for, will, by the blessing of God, be in due time obtained, to the refreshing of all those good hearts who have been panting after those things.—Much more might have been said, if it had been our desire to justify ourselves by aspersing others, and raking into the misgovernment of affairs; but we shall conclude with this, That as we have been led by necessity and Providence to act as we have done, even beyond and above our own thoughts and desires; so we shall, and do, in that part of this great work which is behind, put ourselves wholly upon the Lord for a blessing; professing, we look not to stand one day without his support, much less to bring to pass any of the things mentioned and desired, without his assistance; and therefore do solemnly desire and expect, that all men, as they would not provoke the Lord to their own destruction, should wait for such issue as he should bring forth, and to follow their business with peaceable spirits; wherein we promise them protection by his assistance. And for those who profess their fear and love to the name of God, that seeing in a great measure for their sakes, and for righteousness sake, we have taken our lives in our hands to do these things, they would be instant with the Lord day and night on our behalfs, that we may obtain grace from him; and seeing we have made so often mention of his name, that we may not do the least dishonour thereunto; which indeed would be our confusion, and a stain to the whole profession of godliness. We beseech them also to live in all humility, meekness, righteousness, and love one towards another, and towards all men, that so they may put to silence the ignorance of the foolish, who falsely accuse them; and to know that the late great and glorious dispensations, wherein the Lord hath so wonderfully appeared in bringing forth these things by the travel and blood of his children, ought to oblige them so to walk in the wisdom and love of Christ, as may cause others to honour their holy profession, because they see Christ to be in them of a truth.—We do further purpose, before it be long, more particularly to shew the Grounds of our proceedings, and the Reasons of this late great action and change, which in this we have but hinted at. And we do lastly declare, That all judges, sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, committees and commissioners, and all other civil officers and public ministers whatsoever, within this Common-wealth, or any parts thereof, do proceed in their respective places and offices; and all persons whatsoever are to give obedience to them as fully as when the parliament was sitting.* Signed in the name, and by the appointment of his Excellency the Lord-General, and his Council of Officers, Will. Malyn, Secretary."

Cromwell and his Officers having thus gained the power of government into their hands, were complimented from all parts of England, on the justice of his late action; and with Engagements to stand by them with their lives and fortunes. The Diaries of these times abound with Addresses of this sort.

Cromwell and his Council resolve to call a Parliament.] Though Cromwell and his Council of Officers had hitherto exercised the civil authority without controul, yet not thinking themselves quite safe in their newly-acquired power, without, at least, the appearance of a legislative sanction, they agreed upon calling a sort of parliament. To this end, a meeting of the general officers of the Army was appointed at Whitehall, where major-gen. Lambert, gen. Harrison, and other great men of the Army came. Lambert proposed that a few persons, not exceeding 10 or 12, might be intrusted with the Supreme Power: Harrison was for a greater number, inclining much to that of 70, being the number the Jewish Sanhedrim consisted of. But, after some debate, it was resolved, that a number of persons in England, Ireland, and Scotland, as nearly as might be proportionable to their payments toward the public charge, should be nominated by the Council of Officers, and sent for to meet at Westminster on a certain day; to whom all the authority of the nation should be delegated by an Instrument signed and sealed by the General and the Officers, obliging themselves to be obedient to their Orders.

A Summons issued by Cromwell for that Purpose.] The Summons to be sent out for collecting this Assembly, in the General's name only, was in these words:

"Forasmuch as upon the Dissolution of the late Parliament it became necessary that the peace, safety, and good government of this Common-wealth should be provided for; and, in order thereunto, divers persons fearing God, and of approved fidelity and honesty, are by myself, with the advice of my Council of Officers, nominated, to whom the great charge and trust of so weighty affairs is to be committed; and having good assurance of your love to, and courage for, God and the interest of his cause, and of the good people of this Common-wealth: I Oliver Cromwell, captain-general and commander in chief of all the Armies and Forces raised, and to be raised, within this Common-wealth, do hereby summon and require you (being one of the said persons nominated) personally to be and appear at the Council-Chamber, commonly known or called by the name of the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, upon the 4th day of July next ensuing the date hereof; then and there to take upon you the said trust unto which you are hereby called and appointed, to serve as a member for the county of . And hereof you are not to fail. Given under my hand and seal the 6th day of June, 1653.

O. CROMWELL."

Cromwell's Speech to his new Parliament.
July 4. In pursuance of the foregoing Summons, this most extraordinary Convention assembled themselves together; the Account of which we shall give, as then published by authority, in the following terms: * "This being the day appointed by the letters of summons from his excellency the Lord-General, for the meeting of the persons called to the Supreme Authority, there came about 120 of them to the Council-Chamber in Whitehall. After each person had given in a ticket of his name, they all entered the room and sat down in chairs, appointed for them, round about the table: then his excellency the Lord-General standing by the window, opposite to the middle of the table, and as many of the Officers of the Army as the room could well contain, some on his right hand and others on his left, and about him, made the following Speech to the assembly: †

"Gentlemen; I suppose the summons that hath been instrumental to bring you hither, gives you well to understand the cause of your being here. Howbeit, having something to impart, which is an Instrument drawn up by the consent and advice of the principal Officers of the Army, which is a little, as we conceive, more significant than that other summons, we have that here to tender you: and we have somewhat further likewise to say to you for our own exoneration, and we hope it may be somewhat further to your satisfaction; and therefore seeing you sit here somewhat uneasy, by reason of the scantness of the room and the heat of the weather, I shall contract myself with respect to that.—I have not thought it amiss a little to remind you of that series of providence, wherein the Lord hitherto hath dispensed wonderful things to these nations, from the beginning of our troubles to this very day. If I should look much backward, we might remember the state of affairs as they were before the short, and that which was the last, parliament; in what a posture the things of this nation stood, doth so well, I presume, occur to all your memories and knowledge, that I shall not need to look so far backward, nor yet to the beginning of those hostile actions that past between the king that was and the then parliament. And, indeed, should I begin this labour, the things that would fall necessarily before you, would rather be fit for a history, than for a discourse at this present.—But thus far we may look back: you very well know, after divers turnings of affairs, it pleased God, much about the midst of this war, to winnow, as I may say, the forces of this nation, and to put them into the hands of men of other principles than those that did engage at the first. By what strange provi-

dences that also was brought about, would ask more time than is allotted me to remember you of. Indeed there are stories that do recite those transactions, and give narratives of matter of fact; but those things wherein the life and power of them lay, those strange windings and turnings of providence, those very great appearances of God in crossing and thwarting the designs of men, that he might raise up a poor and contemptible company of men, neither versed in military affairs, nor having much natural propensity to them, even through the owning of a principle of Godliness, of Religion; which so soon as it came to be owned, and the state of affairs put upon that foot of account, how God blessed them and all undertakings, by the raising of that most improbable, despicable, contemptible means, for that we must for ever own, you very well know.—What the several successes have been, is not fit to mention at this time neither, though I must confess I thought to have enlarged myself upon this subject; forasmuch as the considering the works of God, and the operation of his hands, is a principal part of our duty, and a great encouragement to the strengthening of our hands, and of our faith for that which is behind. And then having given us those marvellous dispensations amongst other ends, for that was a most principal end, as to us, in this revolution of affairs, and issues of those successes God was pleased to give this nation, and the authority that then stood, were very great things brought about; besides those dints that were upon these nations and places where they were carried on, even in the civil affairs, to the bringing offenders to justice, even the greatest; to the bringing the state of this government to the name, at least, of a Commonwealth; to the searching and sifting of all places and persons; the king removed and brought to justice, and many great ones with him; the House of Peers laid aside; the house of commons, the representative of the people of England, itself winnowed, sifted, and brought to a handful, as you may very well remember.—And, truly, God would not rest there; for, by the way, although it be fit for us to intitle our failings and miscarriages to ourselves, yet the gloriousness of the work may well be attributed to God himself, and may be called 'his strange Work.' You may remember well that, at the change of the government, there was not an end of our troubles; although that year such things were transacted, as, indeed, made it to be the most memorable year (I mean 1648) that ever this nation saw; so many insurrections, invasions, secret designs, open and public attempts, quashed in so short a time; and this by the very signal appearances of God himself, which I hope we shall never forget.—You know also, as I said before, that as the effect of that memorable year 1648, was to lay the foundation of bringing delinquents to punishment, so it was of the change of the government; although it be true, if we had time to speak, the carriages of some in trust, in most eminent trust, was such as would have frustrated to us the hopes of all our undertakings, had not God miraculously prevented: I mean by that closure that would have been endeavoured with the king, whereby we should have put into his hands all that cause and interest we had opposed, and had nothing to have secured us but a little piece of paper.—But things going on, how it pleased the Lord to keep this nation in exercise both at sea and land, and what God wrought in Ireland and Scotland, you likewise know, until the Lord had finished all that trouble upon the matter, by the marvelous salvation wrought at Worcester. I confess to you I am very much troubled in my spirit, that the necessity of affairs doth require that I should be so short in these things, because I told you before, this is the leanest part of the transaction, to wit, An historical Narration; there being in every dispensation, (whether the King's going from the Parliament, the pulling down the Bishops, purging the House at that time by their going away to assist the king, or change of government) whatever it was, not any of these things but hath a remarkable point of providence set upon it, that he that runs may read. Therefore I am heartily sorry that, in point of time, I cannot be particular in those things which I did principally design this day, thereby to provoke and stir up your hearts and mine to gratitude and confidence.—I shall now begin a little to remember you the Passages that have been transacted since Worcester Fight; whence coming with my fellow-officers and soldiers, we expected, and had some reasonable confidence that our expectations should not be frustrated; that the authority that then was, having such a history to look back unto, such a God that appeared for them so eminently, so visibly, that even our enemies many times confessed that God himself was engaged against them, or they should never have been brought so low, nor disappointed in every undertaking: for that may be said, (by the way) had we miscarried but once where had we been? I say we did think, and had some reasonable confidence, that coming up then, the mercies that God had shewed, the expectations that were in the hearts of all good men, would have prompted those that were in authority to have done those good things which might, by honest men, have been judged a return fit for such a God, and worthy of such mercies; and indeed a discharge of duty to those for whom all these mercies have been shewed, that is, the interest of the three nations, the true interest of the three nations.—And if I should now labour to be particular in enumerating some businesses that have been transacted from that time, till the dissolution of the late parliament, indeed I should be upon a theme that would be very troublesome to myself: for I must say for myself and fellow-officers, we have rather desired and studied healing than to rake into sores, and look backward to render things in those colours that would not be very well pleasing to any good eye to look upon. Only this we must say, for our own exoneration, and as thereby laying some foundation for the making evident the necessity and duty that was incumbent upon us to make this last great change; I think it will not be amiss to offer a word or two in that, not taking pleasure to rake into the business, were there not some kind of necessity so to do. Indeed we may say, without commending ourselves, I mean myself and those gentlemen that have been engaged in the military affairs, that upon our return we came fully bent, in our hearts and thoughts, to desire and use all fair and lawful means we could to have had the nation to reap the fruit of all that blood and treasure that had been expended in this cause; and we have had many desires and thirstings in our spirits, to find out ways and means wherein we might any ways be instrumental to help it forward; and we were very tender, for a long time, so much as to petition; till August last, or thereabouts, we never offered to petition. But some of our then members and others having good acquaintance and relation to divers members of the parliament, we did, from time to time, solicit that which we thought (if there had been nobody to prompt them, nobody to call upon them) would have been listened to, out of ingenuity and integrity in them that had opportunity to have answered our expectations: and, truly, when we saw nothing would be done, we did, as we thought, according to our duty, remind them by a Petition; which we delivered either in July or August last. What effect that had is likewise very well known; the truth is, we had no return at all; all the satisfaction for us was but a few words given us; the businesses petitioned for, most of them, we were told, were under consideration, and those that were not had very little or no consideration at all.—Finding the people dissatisfied in every corner of the nation, and bringing home to our doors the non-performance of those things that had been promised, and were, of due, to be performed, we did think ourselves concerned; we endeavoured, as became honest men, to keep up the reputation of honest men in the world, and therefore we had divers times endeavoured to obtain a meeting with divers members of parliament, and truly we did not begin this till Oct. last; and in those meetings did, in all faithfulness and sincerity, beseech them that they would be mindful of their duty to God and man, and of the discharge of their trust to God and man. I believe that many of these gentlemen who are here, can tell that we had at the least 10 or 12 meetings, most humbly begging and beseeching them that, of their own accords, they would do those good things that had been promised; that so it might appear they did not do them by any suggestion from the Army, but of their own ingenuity; so tender were we to preserve them in the reputation and opinion of the people to the uttermost. And having had many of those meetings, we declared plainly that the issue would be the

Judgment and displeasure of God against them, the dissatisfaction of the people, and the putting things into a confusion; yet how little we did prevail we well know, and we believe is not unknown to you.—At the last, when we saw indeed that things would not be laid to heart, we had a serious consideration amongst ourselves what other way to have recourse unto; and when, indeed, we came to those close considerations, they began to take the act of the new representative to heart, and seemed exceeding willing to put it on; the which had it been done, or would it have been done, with that integrity, with that caution, that would have saved this cause, and the interest we have been so long engaged in, there could nothing have happened, to our judgment, more welcome than that would have been: but finding plainly that the intendment of it was not to give the people that Right of Choice, but the seeming to give the people that choice was intended and designed only to recruit the house, the better to perpetuate themselves: and truly having, divers of us, been spoken to to that end, that we should give way to it, a thing to which we had a perpetual aversion, which we did abominate the thoughts of, we always declared our judgments against it, and our dissatisfaction; but yet they would not hear of a new Representative till it had laid 3 years before them, without proceeding with one line considerably in it; nay, they could not endure to hear of it: then when we came to our close considerations, then, instead of protracting, they did make as much preposterous haste on the other hand, and ran into that extremity; and finding that this spirit was not according to God, and that the whole weight of this cause, which must needs have been very dear unto us, who have so often adventured our lives for it, and we believe is so to you; when we saw plainly that there was not so much consideration how to assert it, or to provide security for it, but indeed to cross those that they reckoned the most troublesome people they had to deal with, which was the Army, who, by this time, was sufficiently their displeasure: I say, when we that had the power in our hands, saw that to let the business go to such an issue as this, was to throw back the cause into the hands of them we first fought with, we came to this first conclusion amongst ourselves, That if we had been fought out of it, necessity would have taught us patience; but to have it taken from us so unworthily, we should be rendered the worst people in the world, and we should become traitors both to God and man. And when God had laid this to our hearts, and that we found the interest of his people was grown cheap, and not laid to heart, and if we came to competition of things, the cause even amongst themselves would (even almost in every thing) go to the ground: this did add more consideration to us, that there was a duty incumbent on us. And, truly, I speak it in the presence of some that are here, that were at the close consultations (I may say) as before the Lord, the thinking of an act of violence was to us worse than any engagement that ever we were in yet; and worse to us than the utmost hazard of our lives that could be; so unwilling were we, so tender were we, so desirous were we, if it were possible, that these men might have quit their places with honour: and, truly, this I am the longer upon, because it hath been, in our hearts and consciences, our justification; and hath never yet been imparted thoroughly to the nation; and we had rather begin with you to do it, than to have done it before; and do think indeed that these transactions be more proper for a verbal communication than to have been put in writing. I doubt whosoever had put it into writing, would have been tempted to have dipped his pen in anger and wrath; but affairs being at this posture, that we saw plainly and evidently, in some critical things, that the cause of the people of God was a despised thing; truly then we did believe that the hands of other men must be the hands that must be trusted with it; and then we thought it high time for us to look about us, and to be sensible of our duty. If I should take up your time to tell you what instances we have to satisfy our judgments and consciences that these things were not vain imaginations, that were petitioned for, but that fell within the compass of our certain knowledge and sense; should I repeat these things to you, I should do that which I would avoid, to rake into these things too much. Only this: if anybody were in competition for any place of real and signal trust, how hard and difficult a thing it were to get any thing to be carried without making parties, without things indeed unworthy of a parliament; and when things must be carried so in a Supreme Authority, indeed I think it is not as it ought to be. But when it came to other trials, in that case of Wales, which I must confess, for my own part, I set myself upon; if I should inform what discountenance that business of the poor people of God there had, who had men watching over them like so many wolves, ready to catch the lamb as soon as it was brought out into the world: how signally they threw that business under foot, to the discountenancing of the honest people there, and the countenancing of the malignant party of this Common-wealth, I need but say it was so; many have felt, by sad experience, it was so, who will better impart that business to you, which (for myself and fellow-officers) I think was as perfect a trial of their spirits as any thing; it being known to many of us, that God kindles a seed there, indeed, hardly to be paralleled since the primitive times.—I would this had been all the instances; but finding which way their spirits went, and finding that good was never intended to the people of God; I mean, when I say so, that large comprehension of them under the several forms of godliness in this nation; when I saw that tenderness was forgotten to them all, (though it was very true that by their hands and means, through the blessing of God, they sat where they did) and affairs (not to speak it boastingly) had been instrumentally brought to that issue they were brought to by the hands of those poor creatures, we thought this an evil requital. I will not say they were at the uttermost pitch of reformation, although I could say that in one thing, the regulation of the law, so much groaned under in that posture it now is in, there were many words spoken for it; we know, many months together was not time enough to pass over one word called 'Incumbrances.' I say, finding that this was the spirit and complexion of them, that though these were faults for which no man should have dared to lift his hand, simply for these faults and failings, yet when we saw their intendment was to perpetuate themselves and men of this spirit, for some had it from their own mouths, from their own designs, who could not endure to hear of being dissolved; this was an high breach of trust, if they had been a parliament never violated, sitting as free and as clear as ever any sat in England; yet if they would go about to perpetuate themselves, we did think this to be so high a breach of trust, as greater could not be. And we did not go by guess in this; and, to be out of doubt in it, we (having that conference among ourselves, whereof we gave account) did desire once more, the night before the dissolution, (and it had been in our desires some 2 or 3 days before) that we might speak with some of the principal persons of the house, that we might, with ingenuity, open our hearts to them, to the end we might be either convinced of the ground of their principles and intentions to the good of the nation; or, if we could not be convinced, they would hear our offer, or expedient, to prevent this mischief; and indeed we could not prevail for 2 or 3 days, till the night before the dissolution. There is a touch of this in that our Declaration; we had often desired it, and at that time attained it; there were above 20 of them who were members, none of the least consideration for interest and ability, with whom we desired to discourse those things, and had discourse with them; and it pleased the gentlemen Officers of the Army to desire me to offer their sense to them, and indeed it was shortly carried thus: we told them the reason of our desire to wait upon them was, to know what security we had in the way of their proceeding so hastily with their Act for a new Representative, wherein they had made a few qualifications, such as they were; but how the whole business should be executed we had no account of, which we desired them to give us; for we thought we had an interest in our lives, estates, and families, as well as the worst people of the nation, and that we might be bold to ask satisfaction in that; and if they did proceed in honest ways, as might be safe to the nation, we might acquiesce therein. When we pressed them to give satisfaction in this, the Answer was, That nothing could be good for the nation but the Continuance of this Parliament. We wondered that we should have such a return; we said little to that.—But seeing they would not give us that which might satisfy us that their way was honest and safe, they would give us leave to make our Objections: we did tell them, That we thought that way they were going in would be impracticable: we could not tell them how it would be brought to pass, to send out an act of parliament into the country, to have Qualifications in an Act to be the rules of electors and elected, and not to know who should execute this; desiring to know whether the next parliament were not like to consist of all Presbyterians? Whether those Qualifications would hinder them, or Neuters? And though it be our desire to value and esteem persons of that judgment, only they having, as we know, deserted this cause and interest upon the king's account, and on that closure between them and the neighbour nation, we do think we must confess we had as good have delivered up our cause into the hands of any, as into the hands of interested and biassed men; for it is one thing to live friendly and brotherly; to bear with, and love, a person of another judgment in religion; another thing to have any so far set into the saddle upon that account, as that it should be in them to have all the rest of their brethren at mercy. Having had this discourse, making these Objections of bringing in Neuters, or such as should impose upon their brethren, or such as had given testimony to the king's party; and objecting to the danger of it, in drawing the concourse of all people to arraign every individual person, which indeed did fall obviously in, (and the issue would certainly have been the putting it into the hands of men that had little affection to this cause) it was confessed by some that these Objections did lye: but Answer was made by a very eminent person, at the same time as before, That nothing would save the nation but the Continuance of this Parliament. This being so, we humbly proposed an expedient of ours, which was indeed to desire that the government, being in that condition it was, and things being under so much ill sense abroad, and so likely to come to confusion in every respect, if it went on; we then desired they would devolve the trust over to persons of honour and integrity, that were well known, men well affected to religion and the interest of the nation; which we told them, and was confessed, had been no new thing, when these nations had been under the like hurly-burly and distractions; and it was confessed by them, it had been no new thing. We had been at labour to get precedents to convince them of it; and we told them those things we offered, out of that deep sense we had of the good of the nation, and the cause of Christ; but were only answered, That nothing would save the nation but the Continuance of that Parliament. Although they would not say they would perpetuate it, at that time

least of all, yet we found their endeavours did directly tend to it; for they gave us this Answer, That the things we had offered were of a tender and very weighty consideration. They did make objections how we should raise Money, and some other objections: we told them, that we offered as an expedient, because we thought it better than that for which no reason was, or thought would be given. We desired them to lay the thing seriously to heart: they told us they would take consideration of these things till the morning; that they would sleep upon them. And I think that there was scarce any day that there sat above 50, 52, or 53. At the parting, 2 or 3 of the chief ones, the very chiefest of them, did tell us, That they would endeavour the suspending the proceedings of the Representative the next day, till they had a further conference, and we did acquiesce; and had hope, if our expedient could take up a loving debate, that the next day we should have some such issue thereof as would have given a satisfaction to all.—They went away late at night; and the next morning, we considering how to order that which we had to offer to them when they were to meet in the evening, word was brought they were proceeding with a Representative with all the eagerness they could. We did not believe persons of such quality could do it. A second and a third messenger told us they had almost finished it, and had brought it to that issue, with that haste as had never been known before; leaving out the things that did necessarily relate to due Qualifications, as we have heard since; and resolved to make it a Paper Bill, not to engross it, that they might make the quicker dispatch of it: thus to have thrown all the liberties of the nation into the hands that never bled for it: upon this account we thought it our duty not to suffer it, and upon this the house was dissolved.—This we tell you, that you may so know that what hath been done in the Dissolution of this parliament, was as necessary to be done as the preservation of this cause; and that necessity that led us to do that, hath brought us to this issue of exercising an extraordinary way and course to draw yourselves together upon this account, as you are men who know the Lord, and have made observations of his marvelous dispensations, and may be trusted with this cause. It remains (for I shall not acquaint you further with what relates to your taking upon you this great business, that being contained in this Paper in my hand, which I do offer presently to you to read) having done that which we thought to have done upon this ground of necessity, which we know was not feigned necessity, but real and true, to the end the government might not be at a loss; and to the end we might manifest to the world the singleness of our hearts and integrity, who did those things, not to grasp after the power ourselves to keep it in a military hand, no not for a day, but, as far as God enables us with strength and ability, to put it into the hands that might be called from several parts of the nation: This necessity, I say, and we hope may say, for ourselves, this integrity, of labouring to divest the sword of all power and authority in the civil administration of it, hath been that that hath moved us to conclude of this course; and, having done that, we think we cannot, with the discharge of our consciences, but offer somewhat unto you, as I said before, for our own exoneration; it having been the practice of others who have voluntarily, and out of sense of Duty, divested themselves, and devolved the government into the hands of others; it having been the practice where such things have been done, and very consonant to reason, together with the authority to lay a charge in such a way, as we hope we do, and to press to the duty, which we have a word or two to offer to you.—Truly God hath called you to this work by (I think) as wonderful providences as ever passed upon the sons of men in so short a time. And truly, I think, taking the argument of necessity, (for the government must not fall) taking the appearances of the will of God in this thing, I am sure you would have loath it should have been resigned into the hands of wicked men and enemies. I am sure God would not have it so; it comes therefore to you by way of necessity; it comes to you by the way of the wise providence of God, though through weak hands: and therefore, I think, it coming through our hands, though such as we are, it may not be taken ill, if we offer to you something as to the discharge of that trust which is incumbent upon you. And although I seem to speak that which may have the face of a charge, it is a very humble one; and he that means to be a servant to you, who are called to the exercise of the Supreme Authority, to discharge that which he conceives is his duty, in his own and his fellows names; to you who, I hope, will take it in good part. And, truly, I shall not hold you long in that, because I hope it is written in your hearts to approve yourselves to God; only this Scripture I shall remember to you which hath been much upon my Spirit, Hosea, xi. 12. 'Yet Judah ruleth with God, and is faithful among the Saints;' it is said before, 'Ephraim did compass God about with lies, and Israel with deceit:' How God hath been compassed about with Fastings and Thanksgivings, and other exercises and transactions, I think we have all to lament. Why, truly you are called by God to rule with him and for him: and you are called to be faithful with the Saints, who have been somewhat instrumental to your call: 'He that ruleth over men,' the Scripture saith, 'must be just, ruling in the fear of God.'—And, truly it is better that we should pray for you than counsel you to exercise the judgment of mercy and truth; I say, it is better that we should pray for you than to advise you. Ask wisdom from Heaven (which I am confident many thousands of Saints do this day, and have done, and will do, through the permission of God, and his assistance) to advise you: only, truly, I thought of a Scripture likewise, that seems to be but a scripture of common application to every man as a Christian, wherein he is counselled to ask wisdom; and he is told what is that Wisdom that is from above; 'it is pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be intreated, full of good fruits, without partiality, without hypocrisy;' and my thoughts ran thus upon this, that the executing of the judgment of truth, (for that is the judgment that you must have Wisdom from above for, and that is pure, that will teach you to execute the judgment of truth) and then, if God give you hearts to be easy to be intreated, to be peaceable spirits, to be full of good fruits, bearing good fruits to the nation, to men as men to the people of God, to all in their several stations; this wisdom will teach you to execute the judgment of mercy and truth. And I have little more to say to this; I shall rather bend my prayers for you in that behalf, as I said before, and I know many others do also. Truly, the Judgment of Truth will teach you to be as just towards an unbeliever as towards a believer, and it is our duty to do so. I confess I have often said it foolishly, if I would miscarry I would rather do it to a believer than to an unbeliever; perhaps it is a paradox; but let us take heed of doing it to either, exercising injustice to either; if God fill our hearts with such a spirit as Moses and Paul had, which was not only a spirit for the believers among the people of God, but for the whole people, he would have died for them; and so saith Paul to his countrymen, according to the flesh, he could have died for them: truly this will help us to execute the Judgment of Truth and Mercy also.—A second thing is, to desire you would be faithful with the Saints; and I hope, whatever others may think, it ought to be to us all a matter of rejoicing, that as one person, our Saviour, was touched with our infirmities, that he might be pitiful, I think this Assembly, thus called, is very much troubled with the common infirmity of the Saints, and I hope that will teach you to pity others; that so Saints of one sort may not be our interest; but that we may have respect unto all, though of different judgments: and if I did seem to speak any thing that might seem to reflect upon those of the Presbyterian judgment, I think if you have not an interest of love for them, you will hardly answer this faithfulness to his saints. I confess, in my pilgrimage, and some exercises I have had abroad, I did read that Scripture often in Isaiah, xli. 19. when God gave me and some of my fellows what he would do there and elsewhere, which he performed for us: and what would he do? to what end? 'That he might plant in the Wilderness the Cedar and the Shittah Tree, and the Myrtle Tree and the Palm Tree together.' To what end? 'That they might know, and consider, and understand together that the Hand of the Lord hath done this, and that the Lord hath created it; and that he hath wrought all salvation and deliverance which he hath wrought for the Good of the whole Flock:' Therefore I beseech you (but I think I need not) have a care of the whole flock; love all the sheep, love the lambs; love all, and tender all, and cherish all, and countenance all in all things that are good; and if the poorest Christian, the most mistaken Christian, should desire to live peaceably and quietly under you, soberly and humbly desire to lead a life in godliness and honesty, let him be protected.—I think I need as little advise you concerning the Propagation of the Gospel, and encouraging such Ministers, and such a Ministry as be faithful in the land, upon whom the true character is; men that have truly received the spirit for such a use, which Christians will be well able to discover, and do; men that have received gifts for the Work before-mentioned from him that 'ascended on high, and led captivity captive.' And truly the Apostle, Romans xii. when he had summed up all the Mercies of God and the Goodness of God; and had discoursed of the foundations of the Gospel, and of the several things that are the subject of his discourse in the first 11 chapters; after he had besought them to 'offer up their souls and bodies a living sacrifice to God,' he beseecheth not to 'esteem more highly of themselves than they ought,' but that they would be humble and sober minded, and not stretch themselves beyond their line; but would have a regard to those that had received gifts to those uses there mentioned. I speak not (it is far from my heart) for a Ministry deriving itself through the Papacy, and pretending to that which is so much insisted upon to be succession: the true succession is through the spirit, given in that measure that the spirit is given; and that is a right succession: but need I not discourse of these things to you; I am persuaded you are taught of God in a greater measure than myself in these things. Indeed I have but one word more to say, and that is, (though in that perhaps I shall shew my weakness) by way of encouragement to you to go on in this work.—And give me leave to begin thus: I confess I never looked to see such a day as this, it may be nor you; when Jesus Christ shall be owned as he is this day, and in this world: Jesus Christ is owned this day by you all, and you own him by your willingness in appearing here; and you manifest this, as far as poor creatures can, to be a day of the power of Christ by your willingness. I know you remember that Scripture in Psalm cx. 3. 'The People shall be willing in the day of thy power,' God doth manifest it to be a day of the power of Jesus Christ. Having through so much blood and so much trials as have been upon these nations, made this to be one of the great issues thereof: to have a people called to the Supreme Authority upon such an avowed account, God hath owned his son by this; and you, by your willingness, do own Jesus Christ; and therefore, for my part, I confess I did never look to see such a sight.—Perhaps you are not known by face one to another; but we must tell you this, that indeed we have not allowed ourselves in the choice of one person in whom we had not this good hope, that there was faith in Jesus Christ, and love to all his Saints and people. And thus God hath owned you in the face and eyes of the world; and thus by your coming hither, have you owned him, as it is in Isaiah xliii. 21. (it is an high expression, and look to your own hearts whether now or hereafter God shall apply it to you) 'This People,' saith he, 'have I formed for myself, that they might shew forth my praise.' It is a memorable place, and, I hope, not unfitly applied: God apply it to each of your hearts. I shall not descant upon the words; they are plain; you are as like the forming of God as ever people were. If any man should ask you one by one, and should tender a book to you, you would dare to swear, that neither directly nor indirectly did you seek to come hither: you have been passive in coming hither, in being called hither; and that is an active word.—'This People I have formed.' Consider the circumstances by which you are called together; through what difficulties, through what strivings, through what blood, you are come hither. Neither you nor I, nor no man living, 3 months ago, had a thought to have seen such a company taking upon them or rather being called to, the Supreme Authority; and therefore own your Call. Indeed, I think, as it may be truly said, that never was a Supreme Authority consisting of so numerous a body as you are, which I believe are above 140, who were ever in the Supreme Authority, under such a notion, in such a way of owning of God, and being owned by him; and therefore I say also, never a people formed for such a purpose, so called; if it were a time to compare your standing with those that have been called by the suffrages of the people. Who can tell how soon God may fit the people for such a thing, and who would desire any thing more in the world but that it might be so? I would all the Lord's people were prophets; I would they were fit to be called, and fit to call; and it is the longing of our hearts to see them once own the interest of Jesus Christ: and give me leave to say, if I know any thing in the world, what is there more like to win the people to the interest and love of God? nay what a duty will lie upon you, to have your conversation such, as that they may love you; that they may see you lay out your time and spirits for them? is not this the most likely way to bring them to their liberties? and do you not by this put it upon God to find the time and the season for it? by pouring forth his spirit, at least, by convincing them that, as men fearing God have fought them out of their thralldom and bondage under the regal power, so men fearing God rule them in the fear of God, and take care to administer good unto them. But this is some digression: I say, own your Call; for indeed it is marvelous and it is of God, and it hath been unprojected; un-thought of by you and us; and that hath been the way God hath dealt with us all along to keep things from our eyes; that in what we have acted we have seen nothing before us; which also is a witness in some measure to our integrity. I say, you are called with a high Call, and why should we be afraid to say or think, that this way may be the door to usher in things that God hath promised and prophesied of, and to set the hearts of his people to wait for and expect? We know who they are that shall war with the Lamb against his enemies; they shall be a people called, chosen, and faithful; and in the military way, (we must speak it without flattery) I believe you know it, he hath acted with them and for them, and now in the civil power and authority; and these are not ill prognostications for that good we wait for.—Indeed I do think something is at the door, we are at the threshold; and therefore it becomes us to lift up our heads, and to encourage ourselves in the Lord: and we have some of us thought it our duty to endeavour this way, not vainly looking on that prophecy in Daniel, 'And the kingdom shall not be delivered to another people.' Truly God hath brought it into your hands, by his owning, and blessing, and calling out a military power; God hath persuaded their hearts to be instrumental in calling you; and this hath been set upon our hearts, and upon all the faithful in the land; it may be that it is not our duty to deliver it over to any other people, and that Scripture may be fulfilling now to us: but I may be beyond my line. But I thank God I have my hopes exercised in these things, and so I am persuaded are yours: truly, seeing that these things are so, that you are at the edge of the promises and prophecies; at least if there were neither promise for this nor prophecy, you covet the best things, you endeavour after the best things; and as I have said elsewhere, if I were to chuse the meanest officer in the Army, or Commonwealth, I would chuse a godly man that hath principles, especially where trust is to be committed, because I know where to have a man that hath principles. I believe if any man of you should chuse a servant you would do so; and I would all our magistrates were so chosen; there may be good effects of this. It is our duty to chuse men that fear the Lord to praise the Lord, yea such as the Lord forms for himself, and he expects not praises from others; this being so, it puts me in mind of another scripture, Psalm lxviii. 22. which indeed is a glorious prophecy, and I am persuaded of the Gospel, or it may be of the Jews also; there it is prophesied, 'He will bring his people again out of the depths of the sea, as once he led Israel through the Red Sea.' And it may be some do think God is bringing the Jews home to their station from the Isles of the sea: surely when God sets up the glory of the Gospel Church, it shall be a gathering people out of deep waters, out of the multitude of waters; such are his people drawn out of the multitudes of the nations, and people of the world. And that Psalm will be very glorious in many other parts of it, 'When he gave the Word, great was the company of them that published it; kings of the armies did flee apace, and she that tarried at home divided the spoil: and although ye have lain among the pots yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.' And indeed the triumph of that Psalm is exceeding high and great, and God is accomplishing it; and for the close of it, that closeth with my heart, and I am persuaded will with yours also, that God shakes hills and mountains and they reel; and God hath a hill too, and his hill is as the hill of Bashan; and the chariots of God are 20,000 of angels, and God will dwell upon this hill for ever.— Truly, I am sorry that I have troubled you, in such a place of heat as this is, so long; all that I have to say in my own name, and in the names of my fellow-officers, who have joined with me in this work is, That we shall commend you to the grace of God, and to the guidance of his Spirit. Having thus far served you, or rather our Lord Jesus Christ in it, we are, as we hope, and shall be ready in our stations, according as the providence of God shall lead us, to be subservient to the work of God, and the authority which we reckon God hath set over us. And although we have no formal thing to present you with, to which the hands and outward visible expressions of the hearts of the Officers of the three nations are set; yet we may say for them, and we may say also with confidence for our brethren at sea, with whom, neither in Scotland nor Ireland, nor at sea, hath any artifice been used to persuade their approbations to this work; yet we can say, that their consent and affections hath flowed into us from all parts beyond our expectations: and we are confident we may say with all confidence, that we have had their approbations and full consent, unsought indeed to the other work; so that you have their hearts and affections in this; and not only they, but we have very many papers from the Churches of God throughout the nation, wonderfully both approving what hath been done in removing obstacles, and approving what we have done in this very thing. And having said this, I shall trouble you no more; but if you will be pleased that this Instrument may be read, which I have signed by the advice of the Council of Officers, we shall then leave you to your own thoughts, and to the guidance of God, to order and dispose of yourselves for further meetings as you shall see cause.—I have only this to say further, That the affairs of the nation laying on our hands to be taken care of, and knowing that both the affairs at sea, the armies in Ireland and Scotland, and the providing of things for the preventing of inconveniences, and the answering of all emergencies, did require that there should be no interruption; but that care ought to be taken for these things. And foreseeing likewise, that, before you could digest yourselves into such a method as you may think best, both for place, time, and other circumstances, in the way you shall purpose to proceed in, you would ask some time, which the Commonwealth would not bear, in respect of the managing of things, I have, within a week, set up a Council of State, to whom the managing of affairs is committed; who, I may say, very voluntarily and freely, before they see how the issue of things would be, engaged themselves in business, 8 or 9 of them being members of the house that late was, I say, I did exercise that power that I thought was devolved upon me at that time, to the end that affairs might not have any interval: and now, when you are met, it will ask some time for the settling of your affairs, and your way, and a day cannot be lost, but to be in a continual Council till such time as you shall take further order; so that the whole matter of their considerations are also at your disposal, as you shall see cause; and therefore I thought it my duty to acquaint you with thus much, that you may not be distracted in your way, that things have been thus ordered, that your affairs will go on till you see cause to alter this Council, they having no authority, nor longer to sit than until you shall take further order."

The Authority before cited proceeds to inform us, "That when the lord-general Cromwell had ended this very grave, christian, and seasonable speech*, his excellency produced an Instrument under his own hand and seal, whereby he did, with the advice of his Officers, devolve and intrust the Supreme Authority and Government of this Commonwealth unto the persons then met; any 40 of whom were to be deemed the Supreme Authority of the Nation, and to whom all persons within the same were to yield obedience and subjection; but not to sit longer than the 3d of Nov. 1654; and then other members being called, were to succeed them: That the said Instrument being, by his excellency, delivered to them, he did then commend them to the grace of God. After which, his lordship and the officers being withdrawn, the said persons so met, and having the Supreme Authority put into their hands, after a short space, adjourned until the morning, and appointed to meet where the late parliament sat; there to keep that day in Fasting and Prayer, to seek God for direction in this great work, and for his presence and blessing therein; and all the said persons at their meeting, and all the time of their being together, manifested a very great cheerfulness and willingness to this work."

* Mr. Carrington, in his Life of Cromwell, asserts, "That this Speech was pronounced in so excellent a manner, as sufficiently manifested that (as the lord-general himself was thoroughly persuaded) the Spirit of God acted in and by him."

We shall now look into the Historians of the times for the characters of these persons, who, in this unconstitutional manner, took upon them the supreme Authority of three nations. Lord Clarendon writes, "That there were amongst them divers of the quality and degree of gentlemen, and who had estates, and such a proportion of credit and reputation, as could consist with the guilt they had contracted: but that much the major part of them consisted of inferior persons, of no quality or name, artificers of the meanest trades, known only by their gifts in praying and preaching, which was now practised by all degrees of men, but scholars, throughout the kingdom: and in this number, that there might be a better judgment made of the rest, his lordship thought it not amiss to name one, from whom that parliament itself was afterwards denominated, who was Praise-God Barebone, a Leatherseller in Fleet-Street; from whom, he being an eminent Speaker in it, it was afterwards called "Praise God Barebone's Parliament:" and that, in a word, they were generally a pack of weak senseless fellows, fit only to bring the name and reputation of parliaments lower than it was yet."—Mr. Heath styles them "A set of men for the most part of such mean and ignote extraction, that so far were they from being taken notice of by their shires, each of whom (but two or three) represented, that they were scarce known in the very towns where they were born, or afterwards inhabited, till the Excise, then Committees for Sequestration, and the war in the respective counties, made them infamously known: and that the rest were of Cromwell's partizans in the parliament and high court of justice."

We have before taken notice, That, after Cromwell had harangued the new members at Whitehall, and invested them with the Supreme Authority of the nation, they resolved to meet at the old parliament-house the next day: accordingly, about 8 in the morning, many of them assembled there, where, say our Authorities above cited, "They began with seeking God by prayer; and the Lord did so draw forth the hearts of them, that they did not find any necessity to call for the help of a minister, but performed the service amongst themselves; 8 or 10 speaking in prayer to God, and some briefly from the word; minding what the lord-general had said to them at Whitehall the day before; and what expectation God's people had in this Commonwealth for them to do, in the Work of the Lord; and by prayer, seeking to God for direction and assistance in this great work, and for a blessing upon their endeavours therein: that much of the presence of Christ, and his spirit, appeared at that time, to the great gladdening of the hearts of many; some affirming they never enjoyed so much of the spirit and presence of Christ in any of the meetings and exercises of religion in all their lives, as they did that day." About 6 in the evening they proceeded to business, and resolved, That Francis Rouse, esq. be called to the Chair. This was the only ceremony they used in appointing their Speaker; and it was afterwards declared, That such persons as were called to the chair, in that manner, should be stiled Speaker. A Committee was nominated to go to the Lord-General, and desire him to afford his presence and assistance as a member of the house: they also resolved that major-generals Lambert, Harrison, Desborough, and col. Tomlinson, should be called to sit as members; and appointed Mr. Scobell their clerk.

July 6. The question being put, That the house go on in seeking the Lord this day, it passed in the Negative, and Monday the 11th was appointed for that holy exercise. They next fell into a debate about the Style or Title wherein all Addresses should be made to the house: and the question being put, That the Title of 'Parliament' be given to this Assembly, the house divided into Yeas, 65; Noes, 46. And the further debate concerning what Addition should be made to the word 'Parliament,' was referred to the next day, when these words 'of the Commonwealth of England,' were added to it.

July 9. The house proceeded to elect a new Council of State, though upon the last foundation; who were to act by the same Instructions, with some few Additions and Alterations. The number that was to constitute this body was 31, of which 9 were to be a quorum.

July 11. This day was spent wholly by the house in SEEKING THE LORD*, in a special manner, for counsel, and a blessing on the proceedings of this parliament; when about 12

* Sir Roger L'Estrange observes, upon the pretended saints of these times, "That they did not set one step in the whole train of this iniquity without seeking the Lord first, and going up to inquire of the Lord, according to the cant of those days: which was no other than to make God the author of sin, and to impute the blackest practices of Hell to the inspiration of the Holy Ghost." Reflections upon Poggius's Fable of the Husband, Wife, and Ghostly Father, part. i. fab. 357.

of the members prayed and spoke till 4 in the afternoon. The Lord-General was present, and it was a comfortable day.—We have before observed, That this house had no occasion for a Chaplain: and from this day their constant method was, That as soon as about a dozen members were met, they began with Prayer; and so continued praying, one after another, till there was a sufficient number assembled to make up a house; and then the Speaker took the chair.

July 12. A Committee was appointed to draw up a Declaration, to invite the people of this Common-wealth to seek unto the Lord for the same blessing; which was done accordingly.

July 13. The house revived the consideration of the Bill, never got through in the last parliament, for correcting the Grievances and Inconveniences in the Proceedings of the Law; and also another on the business of Tythes.

Committees appointed to redress Grievances, correct Abuses, and settle Public Affairs.] July 20. The house nominated divers Committees; and, besides those for Scotland and Ireland, there was one for the business of the Law; another for the Army; for inspecting the Treasuries and regulating the officers thereof and their salaries; for receiving Petitions; for Trade and Corporations; for receiving Proposals for the Advantage of the Common-wealth; for the Poor, and inquiring into the Revenues of Hospitals; for regulating the Commissions of Peace throughout the nation; for Public Debts; for receiving Accusations of Bribery, public Frauds, and Breach of public Trust; for Prisons and Prisoners; for Advancement of Learning, and receiving all Propositions tending thereto; and for removing all Laws and Ordinances which are hinderances to the Progress of the Gospel.

August 1. The house being informed how much the country had been burdened, in the manner of collecting the Excise, referred it to a committee to consider how the Excise might be brought in with the greatest ease to the people; and how the oppressions and burdens, in the managing of that business, might be redressed for the future.

Aug. 2. Mr. Rouse having now sat a month in the chair, as Speaker, he took his place as a member; but, by the general voice, was again called to the Chair, to keep it for one month longer; from which time he continued to be chosen Speaker every month, till the Dissolution of this parliament.

Proceedings against Col. Lilburne.] In the proceedings of Feb. 1651, notice was taken that col. Lilburne was ordered by the last parliament to be banished; but hearing of their Dissolution, and the change of government consequent thereon, he ventured to come back to England; and, by letter, applied to Cromwell for protection, which he denying, Lilburne was thrown into Newgate, and soon after ordered to be tried at the Old Bailey; but putting in Exceptions to the Bill of Indictment, the trial was put off to the next sessions. Hereupon a Petition was this day presented to the house, in his favour, intitled, 'The Humble Petition of divers well-affected and constant adherers to the Interest of Parliaments, and their own native and fundamental Rights and Freedoms therein concerned, young Men and Apprentices of the cities of London and Westminster, borough of Southwark, and the parts adjacent.' This Petition was presented by six persons, who being withdrawn, and called in again to the bar, the Speaker asked their names; to which one of them answered, Their names were to the Petition. And being again asked, if he knew of the making of this Petition; he said, He was commanded by the rest of his friends and fellow Apprentices not to answer any questions, but to demand an Answer to their Petition: upon which they were ordered to withdraw, when the house voted the Petition to be a most high breach of the privilege of parliament; scandalous and seditious; and the six persons who delivered it, to be taken into custody of the serjeant at arms; which was done accordingly. They were afterwards sent to Bridewell, there to be kept to hard labour during the pleasure of the house, who also referred it to the Council of State to examine the authors, subscribers, abettors, and printers of this Petition; and resolved, That col. Lilburne should be kept close prisoner.

The Court of Chancery abolished.] Aug. 5. The house took into consideration the business of the High Court of Chancery, and resolved that the same be forthwith taken away; and a Bill was ordered to be brought in for that purpose. An anonymous member of this parliament, who published a short Abstract of their Proceedings,* informs us, "That in the course of the debate the Court of Chancery was called, by some members, the greatest grievance in the nation: others said, That for dilatoriness, chargeableness, and a faculty of bleeding the people in the purse-vein, even to their utter perishing and undoing, that court might compare with, if not surpass, any court in the world: that it was confidently affirmed by knowing gentlemen of worth, that there were depending in that court 23,000 causes, some of which had been there depending 5, some 10, some 20, some 30 years, and more: that there had been spent therein many thousands of pounds, to the ruin, nay utter undoing, of many families: that no ship almost that sailed in the sea of the law, but first or last put into that port; and, if they made any considerable stay there, they suffered so much loss, that the remedy was as bad as the disease: that what was ordered one day was contradicted the next, so as in some causes there had been 500 orders and more. That when the purses of the clients began to be empty, and their spirits were a little cooled, then, by a reference to some gentlemen in the country, the cause so long depending, at so great a charge, came to be ended; so that some members did not stick to term the Chancery a mystery of wickedness, and a standing cheat. And that, in short, so many horrible things were affirmed of it, that those who were, or had a mind to be, advocates for it, had little to say on the behalf of it; and so at the end of one day's debate, the question being put, it was voted down."—This unanimity of the house is confirmed by the Journals, for it appears by those authorities, that the Resolution for abolishing the Court of Chancery passed without any division.

Severe Proceedings against Lilburne.] Aug. 17. Col. Lilburne was brought to a second Trial at law; and, after a long hearing, was acquitted by his jury, but ordered back to Newgate. Upon his acquittal medals were struck, with his head on one side, and the names of all his Jury on the reverse. But the parliament was so provoked at Lilburne's Acquittal, that they ordered the Council of State to examine the whole business of the Trial; particularly the Judges and Jury upon it. According to this Order, a few days after, sir Anth. Cooper reported from the Council of State, that they had examined into the Proceedings on the late Trial of col. Lilburne; and that the clerks attending there had returned several scandalous and seditious Speeches, spoken by the said Lilburne at his trial, which they took in short hand, an extract of which was read; whereupon the house committed Lilburne to the Tower; and the lieutenant was enjoined to detain him there, notwithstanding any Habeas Corpus to be granted by the Upper Bench, or any other Court of Justice, till the parliament should give farther order.—So great a dread had they of this man's popularity, who, from his invincible zeal in opposing the arbitrary proceedings of men in power, under every change of government, was at this time distinguished by the name of Freeborn John.

Aug. 25. Great part of this month had been taken up in canvassing a Bill concerning Marriages, and the registering thereof, and also of Births and Burials: this day it passed the house on the question, and was ordered to be printed and published. This extraordinary Act entirely took Marriages out of the hands of the Clergy, and put them into those of the Justices of Peace.

Complaint against seditious Pamphlets.] Oct. 11. The Council of State made a Report to the house, of several seditious and scandalous Pamphlets coming out, tending to the disturbance of the Commonwealth; and that they had employed divers persons to find out the authors, printers, and publishers thereof. One of these, intitled, 'A Charge of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, Esq. for several Treasons by him committed,' was read, and some Informations taken of the printers, &c. But the house referred this business back to the Council, to prepare and present to them what they thought fit to be done in the case, and for prevention of the like evils for the future.

Several remarkable Bills in Agitation.] A Bill had been brought in, for uniting and incorporating Scotland into one Free State and Commonwealth with England. A Bill was also ordered in, to make those persons incapable of Places who should solicit for them; together with another for regulating the great Exorbitance of Fees in the Law and elsewhere; and for the better Election of Jurors. The house had likewise resolved to reduce the number of Officers in the Excise and other Duties, and lower their respective salaries, in order to a Saving of the public Charge. But all these great matters were left unfinished, in consequence of the sudden Dissolution of the Parliament.

A new Council of State elected.] Nov. 1. This month began with the Election of a Council of State for the ensuing year: a resolution had passed, That 16 of the old Council should stand, and 15 be changed. The form of the Election was much the same as formerly. The members present were 113; and though the house was much divided upon this occasion, yet it is remarkable that the lord general Cromwell had every Vote.

Dec. 1. This Parliament, or rather Convention, began now to be near its period; though several Bills, and some of great moment, lay yet before them unfinished: their great master Cromwell, who had given them the power they sat by, thinking proper, shortly after, to retract that power, and leave them private persons as he found them. They continued, however, to sit and do business as usual, and acted, as if they had not the least apprehension of a dissolution.

The Parliament resolve to surrender back their Power to Cromwell.] Dec. 12. This day we find the following Entry in the Journals, viz. "Monday, Dec. 12. It being moved in the house this day, That the Sitting of this Parliament any longer, as now constituted, will not be for the good of the Commonwealth; and that therefore it was requisite to deliver up unto the lord general Cromwell the powers which they had received from him; and that motion being seconded by several other members, the house rose; and the Speaker, with many of the members of the house, departed out of the house to Whitehall; where they, being the greater number of the members sitting in parliament, did, by a Writing under their hands, resign unto his Excellency their said powers: and Mr. Speaker, attended with the members, did present the same to his Excellency accordingly."

Motives thereto, and the Manner thereof.] This Convention being thus laid aside, without any other notice taken of the suddenness of it, in the Journals, we shall add some Particulars collected into one view, from three different members of this Convention, said to have been present at the Dissolution of it.* "As soon as the Speaker had taken the chair, a member stood up, and spoke to this effect: 'That he must disburden himself of some things that had a long time laid upon his heart: that he was now to speak to the esse, or being, rather than the bene-esse, or well-being, of the Commonwealth; which was ready to sink, through the ill management of the authority intrusted to that Assembly; and that, for his own part, he must resign his power from whence he had it; foreseeing clearly that their waitings and expectations of ever coming on to things of public good were more and more disappointed: he then instanced the particulars touching the Army, the Clergy, the Law, &c. 'And that, for these considerations, he could not satisfy himself to sit any longer in the house, and so be guilty of bringing confusion and desolation upon the nation; but if any would yet be so hardy as to continue there, he would say unto them, in the words of the prophet, 'Ephraim hath joined himself to idols; let him alone.'—This motion being seconded by two more, with some bitter invectives, another member stood up; and (declaring himself to speak with much disadvantage in that he had not, as the other gentleman, any premeditated thing to say) told the Speaker, 'He had in his hand an expedient in reference to the things comprehended in the Vote of the 10th of Dec. concerning Tythes, which he hoped would satisfy all; and that the committee for regulating the Law had ready to be offered to the house, several Bills of very great concernment to the good and ease of the people; protesting before God, angels, and men, his dissatisfaction to the proposed resignation, as being destructive to the Commonwealth.' Some gentlemen standing up to second him, were not suffered to speak. Others continued to press the former motion, insisting, 'That it was not now a time to debate:' whereupon the Speaker, though earnestly called on to keep the chair, left it; and the serjeant, as if he had been of his counsel, took up the mace, and carried it before him, though much urged to the contrary. These were instantly joined by the chief clerk, and followed by about 80 members, who went directly to Whitehall, and there subscribed a Resignation of their power to the Lord-General: 30 odd staid in the house till col. Goffe and major White came in, and intreated them earnestly to go out. To which it was as earnestly replied, That at their personal request they could not, nor would not withdraw, unless compelled by force. Whereupon the officers calling in a file of musketeers, the members withdrew; and some of these went, 3 or 4 days after, and subscribed the Instrument of Resignation. When this Instrument, so signed, was brought to Cromwell, he lifted up his eyes with astonishment; and, with no less seeming modesty, refused to receive it; but, at length, through the importunity of major-gen. Lambert and others, representing to him that the welfare of the nation absolutely required his acceptance of the parliament's Resignation, he thought fit to comply with their request.*

Cromwell declared Lord Protector.] Cromwell having, as before observed, accepted the parliament's Instrument of Resignation, the same day called a Council of Officers and others, and having consulted with them how this great burden of governing England, Scotland, and Ireland, with the Armies therein, and Navies at sea, should be borne, and by whom; after several days seeking of God, and advising therein, it was resolved, That a Council of godly, able, and discreet persons should be named, to consist of not more than 21, nor less than 13: and that his excellency be chosen Lord Protector of the three nations. The Names of this Council were, Henry Lawrence, esq. the president; Philip lord visc. Lisle; the majors general Lambert, Desborough, and Skippon; lieut. general Fleetwood; the colonels Edw. Montagu, Philip Jones, and Wm. Sydenham; sir Gilbert Pickering, sir Ch. Wolseley, and sir Anth. Ashley Cooper, Barts. Francis Rouse, esq. Speaker of the late Convention, Walter Strickland, and Rd. Major, esqrs. most of whom had been principally concerned in bringing about the late Resignation; by which all obstacles to Cromwell's glory being quite removed, he was, 4 days after, declared Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland: the Form and Manner of which unprecedented Ceremonial we shall describe as particularly as possible.

Form and Manner of Cromwell's Inauguration.] On the 16th of Dec. his Excellency came from Whitehall, attended by the lords commissioners of the great seal, the judges and barons of the several Benches in their robes; and most of the Council of the Commonwealth: the lord mayor and aldermen of London, in their scarlet gowns, with the recorder, town-clerk, and sword-bearer with the cap of maintenance and sword, but not erected, passed immediately before his Excellency; all in their coaches. Last of all came his Excellency himself, in his own coach, dressed in a black velvet suit and cloak, with his life-guard, and divers gentlemen bare before him; many of the chief officers of the Army, with their cloaks and swords, and hats on, passed on foot before and about his coach.—In this equipage his Excellency and attendants came to the Court of Chancery in Westminster-Hall; where was placed a rich chair of state, with a large cushion and carpets on the floor. The lords commissioners of the great seal stood on each side of the chair, and his Excellency on the left hand of it, all bare-headed: round about the chair stood all the judges and the Council of State; the lord mayor and aldermen were placed on the right side of the court, and the chief Officers of the Army on the left.

Articles for the future Government of the Commonwealth.] Then, major-general Lambert, after declaring the Dissolution of the Parliament and the great exigency of the times, did, in the name of the Army, and of the three nations, desire the Lord-General to accept of the Protectorship; to which he, with seemingly great reluctance, having given his consent, the following Instrument was read aloud by Mr. Jessop, one of the secretaries of the Council:

The GOVERNMENT of the COMMONWEALTH of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging.

I. "That the Supreme Legislative Authority of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, shall be and reside in one Person, and the people assembled in parliament; the style of which Person shall be 'The Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland.'

II. That the exercise of the chief Magistracy, and the administration of the Government over the said countries and dominions, and the people thereof, shall be in the Lord Protector, assisted with a Council, the number whereof shall not exceed 21, nor be less than 13.

III. That all writs, process, commissions, patents, grants, and other things, which now run in the name and style of 'The Keepers of the Liberty of England by Authority of Parliament,' shall run in the name and style of 'The Lord Protector,' from whom, for the future, shall be derived all magistracy and honours in these three nations; and have the power of Pardons (except in case of murders and treason) and benefit of all forfeitures for the public use; and shall govern the said countries and dominions in all things by the advice of the Council, and according to these presents and the laws.

IV. That the Lord Protector, the parliament sitting, shall dispose and order the Militia and Forces, both by sea and land, for the peace and good of the three nations, by consent of parliament; and that the Lord Protector, with the advice and consent of the major part of the Council, shall dispose and order the Militia for the ends aforesaid in the intervals of parliament.

V. That the Lord Protector, by the advice aforesaid, shall direct in all things concerning the keeping and holding of a good correspondence with foreign kings, princes, and states; and also, with the consent of the major part of the Council, have the power of war and peace.

VI. That the Laws shall not be altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed, nor any new law made, nor any tax, charge, or imposition laid upon the people, but by common consent in parliament, save only as is expressed in the 30th Article.

VII. That there shall be a Parliament summoned to meet at Westminster upon the 3rd day of Sept. 1654, and that successively a parliament shall be summoned once in every 3d year, to be accounted from the Dissolution of the present Parliament.

VIII. That neither the Parliament to be next summoned, nor any successive parliaments, shall during the time of 5 months, to be accounted from the day of their first meeting, be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, without their own consent.

IX. That as well the next as all other successive Parliaments, shall be summoned and elected in manner hereafter expressed; that is to say, the persons to be chosen within England, Wales, the Isles of Jersey, Guernsey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, to sit and serve in parliament, shall be, and not exceed 400. The persons to be chosen within Scotland, to sit and serve in parliament, shall be and not exceed, 30: and the persons to be chosen to sit in parliament for Ireland, shall be, and not exceed, 30.

X. That the persons be elected, to sit in parliament from time to time, for the several counties of England, Wales, the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, and all places within the same respectively, shall be according to the proportions and numbers hereafter expressed: that is to say, XXXV. That the Christian Religion, as contained in the Scriptures, be held forth and recommended as the public Profession of these nations; and that, as soon as may be, a provision, less subject to scruple and contention, and more certain than the present, be made for the encouragement and maintenance of able and painful Teachers, for instructing the people, and for Discovery and Confutation of Error, Heresy, and whatever is contrary to sound Doctrine: and that until such Provision be made, the present Maintenance shall not be taken away nor impeached.

XXXVI. That to the public Profession held forth none shall be compelled by penalties or otherwise; but that endeavours be used to win them by sound doctrine, and the example of a good conversation.

XXXVII. That such as profess Faith in God by Jesus Christ, (though differing in judgment from the doctrine, worship, or discipline publicly held forth) shall not be restrained from, but shall be protected in, the profession of the faith, and exercise of their Religion; so as they abuse not this liberty to the civil injury of others, and to the actual disturbance of the public peace on their parts: provided this liberty be not extended to Popery nor Prelacy, nor to such as, under the profession of Christ, hold forth and practice licentiousness.

XXXVIII. That all laws, statutes, and ordinances, and clauses in any law, statute, or ordinance to the contrary of the aforesaid Liberty, shall be esteemed as null and void.

XXXIX. That the Acts and Ordinances of Parliament, made for the sale or other disposition of the lands, rents, and hereditaments of the late king, queen, and prince, of archbishops and bishops, &c. deans and chapters, the lands of Delinquents, and forest lands, or any of them, or of any other lands, tenements, rents, and hereditaments belonging to the Commonwealth, shall nowise be impeached or made invalid, but shall remain good and firm; and that the securities given by Act and Ordinance of Parliament for any sum or sums of money, by any of the said lands, the excise, or by any other public revenue; and also the securities given by the public faith of the nation, and the engagement of the public faith for satisfaction of debts and damages, shall remain firm and good, and not be made void and invalid upon any pretence whatsoever.

XL. That the Articles given to, or made with, the enemy, and afterwards confirmed by parliament, shall be performed and made good to the persons concerned therein: and that such Appeals as were depending in the last parliament, for relief concerning Bills of Sale of Delinquents Estates, may be heard and determined the next parliament, any thing in this writing, or otherwise, to the contrary notwithstanding.

XLI. That every successive Lord Protector over these nations shall take and subscribe a solemn Oath, in the presence of the Council, and such others as they shall call to them, that he will seek the peace, quiet, and welfare of these nations, cause law and justice to be equally administered; and that he will not violate or infringe the matters and things contained in this writing; and, in all other things, will, to his power, and to the best of his understanding, govern these nations according to the laws, statutes, and customs thereof.

XLII. That each person of the Council shall, before they enter upon their trust, take and subscribe an Oath, that they will be true and faithful in their trust, according to the best of their knowledge; and that in the election of every successive Lord Protector, they shall proceed therein impartially, and do nothing therein for any promise, fear, favour or reward."

After reading the foregoing Instrument of Government, the lord commissioner Lisle presented the Form of an Oath, engrossed on parchment, to be taken by the Lord Protector: during the reading of which his Excellency held up his right hand, and lifted up his eyes to Heaven with great solemnity and devotion, and then subscribed the same in the face of the Court; which Oath was as follows:

"Whereas the major part of the last parliament (judging that their sitting any longer, as then constituted, would not be for the good of this Commonwealth) did dissolve the same; and by a Writting under their hands, dated the 12th Dec. resigned unto me their powers and authorities; and whereas it was necessary thereupon, that some speedy course should be taken for the settlement of these nations upon such a basis and foundation as, by the blessing of God, might be lasting, secure property, and answer those great ends of Religion and Liberty so long contended for: and, upon full and mature consideration had of the Form of Government hereunto annexed, being satisfied that the same, through the divine assistance, may answer the ends aforementioned; and having also been desired, and advised, as well by several persons of interest and fidelity in this Commonwealth, as the Officers of the Army, to take upon me the Protection and Government of these nations in the manner expressed on the said Form of Government, I have accepted thereof, and do hereby declare my acceptance accordingly; and I do promise, in the presence of God, that I will not violate or infringe the matters and things contained therein; but, to my power, observe the same, and cause them to be observed, and shall, in all other things, to the best of my understanding, govern these nations according to the laws, statutes, and customs thereof; seeking their peace, and causing justice and law to be equally administered. O. CROMWELL."

To this Oath was subjoined the following Memorandum: "Oliver Cromwell, Captain-General of all the Forces of this Commonwealth, and now declared Lord Protector thereof, did, this 16th Dec. 1653, sign this Writing, and solemnly promise, as is therein contained, in presence of the lords commissioners of the great seal of England, who administered the same Oath, and of the lord mayor and aldermen of the city of London, divers of the judges of the land, the officers of state and Army, and many other persons of quality."

After the Lord Protector had taken the foregoing Oath, major gen. Lambert, kneeling, presented him with a Sword in the scabbard, representing the Civil Sword, which his Excellency accepting put off his own; thereby to intimate that he would no longer rule by the military one. Then the lords commissioners of the great seal, the judges and officers of the army, invited him to take possession of the Chair of State, as Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, which he did; and sat down with his head covered, having a gold hatband about his hat, the court continuing all bare. Then the lords commissioners delivered up to him the Purse and Seals, and the lord mayor of London his sword, which were presently delivered to them back again by his highness, with an exhortation to use them well; and then, after a salute, the court rose, and the procession returned in the following manner: First came the aldermen and the members of the council, from the court of chancery to Westminster-Hall gate; next after them the judges; then came the commissioners of the great seal, one of them bearing the purse and seals: these were followed by the life-guard, and 4 serjeants at arms carrying the maces belonging to the city of London, the court of chancery, the council and the parliament. The lord mayor went next before his highness with the sword, and the officers of the army about his person, to the Hall-Gate, where they took coach, and returned to Whitehall; the lord mayor riding bare-headed, and carrying the sword in the boot of the coach with the Lord Protector, amidst the great acclamations and shoutings of the people all along the streets as they passed. His highness with his attendants being returned to the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, they had an exhortation made to them there by Mr. Lockier, chaplain to his highness; which being ended, the company were dismissed with three volleys of shot by the soldiery, between 4 and 5 at night.

On the 19th, the Protector was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, in the Palace-Yard Westminster, at the Old Exchange, and several other places in London. The same was done afterwards through every city and county in England.

Cromwell issues out Writs, for calling a Parliament.] It was not till the month of June, 1654, that it was thought proper to call a Parliament upon the new Model prescribed by the Instrument of Government. The Writs for that purpose were issued out by the Lord Protector on the 1st of this month; an Ordinance was soon after published for the distribution of elections for Scotland and Ireland; each nation being to send 30 members, who were to sit and vote in this English Convention.

Meeting of Cromwell's second Parliament.]
 Sept. 3. This being the day appointed for the parliament to meet, though Sunday,* the major part of the members were present in the afternoon, at the Abbey-Church in Westminster, where Mr. Marshall preached before them upon Hosea, xii. 3, 4. About 4 they repaired

* Mr. Hobbes imputes this appointment of the 3rd of Sept. to a superstitious choice in Cromwell, because that day had been so lucky to him at Dunbar, in 1650, and at Worcester, in 1651. Hist. of the Civil Wars, p. 257.

to the Parliament-House, where there appeared about 300. After a-while a Message was brought that the Lord Protector was come by water from Whitehall to the Painted-Chamber, and desired their presenee: whereupon they immediately went thither to his highness; who standing bare, upon a pedestal erected for that purpose, informed them, that on the morrow morning there being a sermon to be preached at the Abbey-church, where he intended himself to be present, he thought fit to make them acquainted with it; and to let them know he had some things to communicate to them in reference to the great affairs of the Commonwealth, not so fit to be delivered upon that day, which was not to be taken up in ceremonies: he therefore desired they would meet him again the next morning in the same place. This done, the members went back to the house, and adjourned to that time.

Sept. 4. The Lord Protector came in state from Whitehall, to the Abbey-Church in Westminster: some hundreds of gentlemen and officers went before him bare, with the life guards; next before the coach his pages and lackies richly cloathed; on the right of it went Mr. Walter Strickland, one of his council, and captain of his guard, with the master of ceremonies, both on foot; on the other side capt.
 Howard of the life-guards. In the coach with him was his son Henry and gen. Lambert, who both sat bare. After him came Cleypole, master of the horse, with a led horse richly trapped;
 next came the commissioners of the great seal, and of the treasury; divers of the council in coaches, and the ordinary guards. Alighting at the Abbey-door, the officers of the Army and the gentlemen went first; next them 4
 maces; then the commissioners of the seal, Whitlocke carrying the purse, and gen. Lambert the sword, both bare; the rest followed.
 His highness was seated over against the pulpit, and the members of parliament on both sides of him.

Cromwell's Speech to them at opening the Session.] After the sermon, preached by Mr.
 Goodwyn, his highness returned in the same equipage, to the Painted Chamber; where being seated in a chair of state, advanced up several steps, and the members upon benches round about, all bare, he put off his hat, and made the following Speech to them:*

"Gentlemen; You are met here on the greatest occasion that, I believe, England ever saw, having upon your shoulders the interest of three great nations, with the territories belonging to them. And truly, I believe I may say without any hyperbole, you have upon your shoulders the interest of all the Christian people in the world; and the expectation is, that

I should let you know, as far as I have cognizance of it, the occasion of your assembling together at this time. It hath been very well hinted to you this day, that you come hither to settle the interests before-mentioned, for it will be made of so large extention in the issue and consequence of it. In the way and manner of my speaking to you I shall study plainness, and to speak to you what is truth, and what is upon my heart, and what will in some measure reach to these concerns. After so many changes and turnings which this nation hath laboured under, to have such a day of hope as this is, and such a door of hope opened by God to us, truly, I believe some months since, would have been above all our thoughts. I confess it would have been worthy of such a meeting as this is, to have remembered that which was the rise, and gave the first beginning to all those turnings and tossings that have been upon these nations: and to have given you a series of the transactions (not of men, but) of the providence of God, all along unto our late changes; as also the ground of our first undertaking to oppose that usurpation and tyranny that was upon us, both in civils and spirituals, and the several grounds particularly applicable to the several changes that have been.—But I have two or three Reasons which divert me from such a way of proceeding at this time. If I should have gone in that way, that which is upon my heart to have said (which is written there, that if I would blot it out I could not) would have spent this day; the providences and dispensations of God have been so stupendous. As David said in the like case, Psalm xl. 5. 'Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done; and thy thoughts which are to us ward, they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered.' Truly, another Reason, new to me, you had to-day in the Sermon. Much recapitulation of providence; much allusion to a state and dispensation, in respect of discipline and correction; of mercies and deliverances; the only parallel of God's dealing with us that I know in the world, which was largely and wisely held forth to you this day, Israel's bringing out of Egypt through a wilderness, by many signs and wonders, towards a place of rest; I say towards it. And that having been so well remonstrated to you this day, is another argument why I shall not trouble you with a recapitulation of those things; though they are things that I hope will never be forgotten, because written in better books than those of paper; I am persuaded written in the heart of every good man.—The third Reason was this, that which I judge to be the end of your meeting; the great end; which was likewise remembered to you this day, to wit, healing and settling. And the remembering transactions too particularly, perhaps, instead of healing, (at least in the hearts of many of you) may set the wound fresh a-bleeding.—I must profess this to you, whatever thoughts pass upon me, that if this day (that is, this meeting) prove not healing, what shall we do? But, as I said before, seeing, I trust, it is in the minds of you all, and much more in the mind of God, which must cause healing: it must be first in his mind, and he being pleased to put it into yours, it will be a day indeed; and such a day as generations to come will bless you for. I say for this, and the other reasons, I have forborne to make a particular remembrance and enumeration of things, and of the manner of the Lord's bringing us through so many changes and turnings as have passed upon us.—Howbeit, I think it will be more than necessary to let you know, at least so well as I may, in what condition this, nay these nations were, when this government was undertaken. For order's sake; It is very natural for us to consider what our condition was in civils; in spirituals. What was our condition? Every man's hand almost was against his brother; at least, his heart: little regarding any thing that should cement, and might have a tendency in it to cause us to grow into one. All the dispensations of God, his terrible ones (he having met us in the way of his judgment in a ten-years Civil War, a very sharp one); his merciful dispensations, they did not, they did not work upon us: but we had our humours and interests: and indeed I fear our humours were more than our interests: and certainly, as it fell out in such cases, our passions were more than our judgments. Was not every thing almost grown arbitrary? Who knew where, or how, to have right without some obstruction or other intervening? Indeed we were almost grown arbitrary in every thing. What was the face that was upon our affairs as to the interest of the nation; to the authority of the nation; to the magistracy; to the ranks and orders of men, whereby England hath been known for hundreds of years? A nobleman, a gentlemen, a yeoman; that is a good interest of the nation, and a great one. The magistracy of the nation, was it not almost trampled under foot, under despite and contempt, by men of levelling principles? I beseech you, for the orders of men and ranks of men, did not that levelling principle tend to the reducing all to an equality? Did it think to do so? Or did it practise towards it for property and interest? What was the design, but to make the tenant as liberal a fortune as the landlord? which, I think, if obtained, would not have lasted long. The men of that principle, after they had served their own turns, would have cried up interest and property then fast enough. This instance is instead of many, and that it may appear that this thing did extend far, is manifest; because it was a pleasing voice to all poor men, and truly not unwelcome to all bad men. To my thinking it is a consideration that, in your endeavours after settlement, you will be so well minded of, that I might well have spared this: but let that pass.—Indeed in Spiritual things, the case was more sad and deplorable; and that was told to you this day eminently. The prodigious blasphemies, contempt of God and Christ, denying of him, contempt of him and his ordinances, and of the Scriptures; a spirit visibly acting those things foretold by Peter and Jude; yea, those things spoken of by Paul to Timothy; who, when he would remember some things to be worse than the Antichristian state, of which he had spoken in the first to Timothy, iv. 1, 2. tells them what should be the lot and portion of the last times; and says, second to Timothy iii. 2, 3, 4. 'In the last days perilous times should come, for men should be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, &c.' And when he remembers that of the Antichristian state, he tells them, first to Timothy iv. 1, 2. 'That, in the latter days' that State shall come in, 'wherein there shall be a departing from the faith, and a giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy,' &c. By which description he makes the state of the last times worse than that under Antichrist. And surely it may well be feared these are our times; for when men forget all rules of law and nature, and break all the bonds that fallen man hath upon him, the remainder of the image of God in his nature, which he cannot blot out, and yet shall endeavour to blot out, 'having a Form of Godliness, without the power;' these are sad tokens of the last times.—And indeed the character wherewith this spirit and principle is described in that place, is so legible and visible that he that runs may read it to be amongst us; for by such the 'Grace of God is turned into wantonness,' and Christ and the spirit of God made the cloak of all villainy and spurious apprehensions. And although these things will not be owned publicly, as to practice, (they being so abominable and odious) yet how this principle extends itself, and whence it had its rise, makes me to think of a second sort of men; who, it is true, as I said, will not practise nor own these things, yet can tell the magistrate that he hath nothing to do with men thus holding; for these are matters of conscience and opinion: they are matters of religion; what hath the magistrate to do with these things? He is to look to the outward man, but not to meddle with the inward. And truly it so happens, that though these things do break out visibly to all, yet the principle wherewith these things are carried on, so forbids the magistrate to meddle with them, as it hath hitherto kept the offenders from punishment.—Such considerations and pretensions of liberty, liberty of conscience, and liberty of subjects, two as glorious things to be contended for, as any God hath given us; yet both these also abused for the patronizing of villainies, in so much as that it hath been an ordinary thing to say, and in dispute to affirm, That it was not in the magistrate's power; he had nothing to do with it; not so much as the printing a Bible in the nation for the use of the people, lest it be imposed upon the consciences of men; for they must receive the same traditionally and implicitly from the power of the magistrate, if thus received. The aforementioned abominations did thus swell to this height amongst us. The axe was laid to the root of the ministry. It was Antichristian; it was Babylonish: it suffered under such a judgment, that the truth of it is, as the extremity was great on that, I wish it prove not so on this hand. The extremity was, That no man having a good testimony, having received gifts from Christ, might preach, if not ordained. So now, many on the other hand affirm, That he who is ordained hath a nullity, or Antichristianism, stamped upon his calling, so that he ought not to preach, or not be heard. I wish it may not too justly be said, That there was severity and sharpness; yea, too much of an imposing spirit in matters of conscience; a spirit unchristian enough in any times, most unfit for these; denying liberty to those who have earned it with their blood; who have gained civil liberty and religious also for those who would thus impose upon them. We may reckon among these our Spiritual Evils, an evil that hath more refinedness in it, and more colour for it, and hath deceived more people of integrity than the rest have done; for few have been caught with the former mistakes, but such as have apostatized from their holy profession; such as being corrupt in their consciences, have been forsaken by God, and left to such noisome opinions: but, I say, there are others more refined; many honest people, whose hearts are sincere, many of them belonging to God; and that is the mistaken notion of the Fifth Monarchy. A thing pretending more spirituality than any thing else: a notion, I hope, we all honour, wait, and hope for, that Jesus Christ will have a time to set up his reign in our hearts, by subduing those corruptions, and lusts, and evils that are there, which reign now more in the world than, I hope, in due time, they shall do; and when more fulness of the spirit is poured forth to subdue iniquity, and bring in everlasting righteousness, then will the approach of that glory be. The carnal divisions and contentions amongst Christians, so common, are not the symptoms of that kingdom.—But for men to entitle themselves, upon this principle, that they are the only men to rule kingdoms, govern nations, and give laws to people; to determine of property, and liberty, and every thing else, upon such a pretence as this is; truly, they had need give clear manifestations of God's presence with them, before wise men will receive or submit to their conclusions. Besides, certainly though many of these men have good meanings, as I hope in my soul they have, yet it will be the wisdom of all knowing and experienced Christians to do as Jude saith: When he had reckoned up those horrible things done upon pretences, and happily by some upon mistakes, 'Of some,' says he, 'have compassion, making a difference; others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire.' I fear they will give opportunity too often for this exercise, and I hope the same will be for their good.—If men do but pretend for justice and righteousness, and be of peaceable spirits, and will manifest this, let them be the subjects of the magistrate's encouragement. And if the magistrate, by punishing visible miscarriages, save them by that discipline, (God having ordained him for that end) I hope it will evidence love, and no hatred to punish where there is cause. Indeed this is that which doth most declare the danger of that spirit; for if these were but notions, I mean the instances that I have given you both of civil considerations and spiritual; if, I say, they were but notions, they were to be let alone. Notions will hurt none but them that have them: but when they come to such practices, as to tell us, That liberty and property are not the badges of the kingdom of Christ; and tell us, That, instead of regulating laws, laws are to be abrogated, indeed subverted; and perhaps would bring in the Judaical law, instead of our known laws settled amongst us, this is worthy of every magistrate's consideration; especially where every stone is turned to bring confusion.—Whilst these things were in the midst of us, and the nation rent and torn, in spirit and principle from one end to another, after this sort and manner I have now told you; family against family; husband against wife; parents against children; and nothing in the hearts and minds of men but 'Overturn, Overturn, Overturn,' (a scripture phrase very much abused, and applied to justify unpeaceable practices by all men of discontented spirits) the common adversary in the mean time sleeps not; and our adversaries, in civil and spiritual respects, did take advantage at these divisions and distractions, and did practice accordingly in the three nations. We know very well that emissaries of the Jesuits never came in those swarms as they have done since these things were set on foot. And I tell you, that divers gentlemen here can bear witness with me, how that they have had a consistory abroad, that rules all the affairs of things in England, from an archbishop down to the other dependents upon him. And they had fixed in England (of which we are able to produce the particular instruments in most of the limits of the cathedrals) an Episcopal power, with archdeacons, &c. And had persons authorized to exercise and distribute those things, who pervert and deceive the people. And all this, while we were in this sad, and, as I said, deplorable condition. In the mean time, all endeavours possible were used to hinder the work in Ireland, and the progress of the work of God in Scotland, by continual intelligences and correspondences, both at home and abroad; from hence into Ireland, and from hence into Scotland, persons were stirred up and encouraged, from these divisions and discomposure of affairs, to do all they could to encourage and foment the war in both these places.—To add yet to our

misery; whilst we were in this condition we were deeply engaged in a war with the Portuguese; whereby our trade ceased, and the evil consequences by that war were manifest and very considerable. And not only this, but we had a war with Holland; consuming our treasure, occasioning a vast burden upon the people; a war that cost this nation full as much as the taxes came unto; the navy being 160 ships, which cost this nation above 100,000*l.* a month, besides the contingences, which would make it 120,000*l.* a month. That very one war did engage us to so great a charge.—At the same time also we were in a war with France. The advantages that were taken at the contentions and divisions among ourselves, did also foment that war; and at least hinder us of an honourable peace; every man being confident we could not hold out long. And surely they did not calculate amiss, if the Lord had not been exceeding gracious to us. I say, at the same time, we had a war with France. And besides the sufferings, in respect of the trade of the nation, tis most evident, that the purse of the nation had not possibly been able longer to bear it, by reason of the advantages taken by other states to improve their own and spoil our manufacture of cloth, and hinder the vent thereof; which is the great staple commodity of this nation.—This was our condition: spoiled in our trade, and we at this vast expence; thus dissettled at home, and having these engagements abroad. These things being thus, what a heap of confusions were upon these poor nations? and either things must have been left to have sunk into the miseries these premises would suppose, or a remedy must be applied.—A Remedy hath been applied: That hath been this government: a thing that I shall say little unto. The thing is open and visible to be seen and read by all men; and therefore let it speak for itself. Only let me say this, because I can speak it with comfort and confidence before a greater than you all, that is, before the Lord, That, in the intention of it, as to the approving our hearts to God, let men judge as they please, it is calculated for the interest of the people; for the interest of the people alone, and for their good, without respect had to any other interest. And if that be not true, I shall be bold to say again, let it speak for itself. Truly I may (I hope humbly before God, and modestly before you) say somewhat on the behalf of the government: That is, (not to discourse of the particular heads of it) to acquaint you a little with the effects of it; and that not for ostentation's sake, but to the end that I may deal at this time faithfully with you, by acquainting you with the state of things, and what proceedings have been upon this government, that so you may know the state of our affairs. This is the main end of my putting you to this trouble. It hath had some things in desire, and it hath done some things actually. It hath desired to reform the Laws: I say, to reform them; and, for that end, it hath called together persons (without reflection) of as great ability, and as great integrity, as are in these nations, to consider how the laws might be made plain and short, and less chargeable to the people; how to lessen expence for the good of the nation; and those things are in preparation, and Bills prepared, which in due time, I make no question, will be tendered to you. There hath been care taken to put the administration of the laws into the hands of just men; men of the most known integrity and ability.—The Chancery hath been reformed, and, I hope, to the just satisfaction of all good men; and for the things depending there, which made the burden and work of the honourable persons intrusted in those services beyond their ability, it hath referred many of them to those places where Englishmen love to have their rights tried, the courts of law at Westminster. It hath endeavoured to put a stop to that heady way (touch'd of likewise this day) of every man making himself a Minister and a Preacher. It hath endeavoured to settle a way for the approbation of men of piety and ability for the discharge of that work: and, I think I may say, it hath committed that work to the trust of persons, both of the Presbyterian and Independent judgments, men of as known ability, piety, and integrity as, I believe, any this nation hath. And I believe also, that in that care they have taken, they have laboured to approve themselves to Christ, the nation, and their own consciences. And indeed I think if there be any thing of quarrel against them, it is, (though I am not here to justify the proceedings of any) I say it is, that they go upon such a character as the Scripture warrants, to put men into that great employment, and to approve men for it, who are men that have 'received gifts from him that ascended up on high, and gave gifts for the Work of the Ministry, and for the edifying of the body of Christ.' It hath taken care, we hope, for the expulsion of all those who may be judged any way unfit for this work; who are scandalous, and the common scorn and contempt of that administration.—One thing more this government hath done: It hath been instrumental to call a Free Parliament; which, blessed be God, we see here this day: I say, a free-parliament. And that it may continue so, I hope is in the heart and spirit of every good man in England; save such discontented persons as I have formerly mentioned. It is that which, as I have desired above my life, I shall desire to keep it so above my life.—I did before mention to you the plunges we were in, in respect of Foreign States, by the War with Portugal, France, the Dutch, the Danes, and the little assurance we had from any of our neighbours round about. I perhaps forgot it, but indeed it was a caution upon my mind, and I desire that it might be so understood, that if any good hath been done, it was the Lord, not we his poor instruments. I did instance in the wars which did exhaust your treasure, and put you into such a condition that you must have sunk therein, if it had continued but a few months longer: this I dare affirm, if strong probability can give me a ground. You have now, though it be not the first in time, peace with Sweedland; an honourable peace, through the endeavours of an honourable person here present, [Mr. Whitlocke,] as the instrument: I say, you have an honourable peace with a kingdom that, not many years since, was much a friend to France, and lately, perhaps, inclinable enough to the Spaniard. And I believe you expect not very much good from any of your Catholic neighbours; nor yet that they would be very willing you should have a good understanding with your Protestant friends. Yet, thanks be to God, that peace is concluded, and, as I said before, it is an honourable peace. You have a peace with the Danes: a state that lay contiguous to that part of this Island which hath given us the most trouble. And certainly, if your enemies abroad be able to annoy you, it is likely they will take their advantage, where it best lies, to give you trouble there. But you have a peace there, and an honourable one; satisfaction for your merchants ships, not only to their content, but to their rejoicing. I believe you will easily know it is so. You have the Sound open; which was obstructed. That which was, and is, the strength of this nation, the Shipping, will now be supplied thence. And whereas you were glad to have any thing of that kind at the second hand, &c. you have all manner of commerce, and at as much freedom as the Dutch themselves, there, and at the same rates and tolls; and, I think I may say, by that peace, they cannot raise the same upon you.—You have a peace with the Dutch: a peace unto which I shall say little, because so well known in the benefit and consequences of it; and I think it was as desirable and as acceptable to the spirit of this nation, as any one thing that lay before us. And, as I believe, nothing so much gratified our enemies as to see us at odds; so, I persuade myself, nothing is of more terror nor trouble to them, than to see us thus reconciled.—As a peace with the Protestant States hath much security in it, so it hath as much of honour and of assurance to the Protestant interest abroad; without which no assistance can be given thereunto. I wish it may be written upon our hearts to be zealous for that interest; for if ever it were like to come under a condition of suffering, it is now. In all the emperor's patrimonial territories, the endeavour is to drive them out as fast as they can, and they are necessitated to run to Protestant states to seek their bread; and by this conjunction of interests, I hope, you will be in a more fit capacity to help them; and it begets some reviving of their spirits that you will help them as opportunity shall serve.—You have a peace likewise with Portugal; which peace, though it hung long in hand, yet is lately concluded. It is a peace that your merchants make us believe is of good concernment to their trade; their assurance being greater, and so their profit in trade thither, than to other places. And this hath been obtained in that treaty, (which never was since the Inquisition was set up there) that our people which trade thither have liberty of conscience. Indeed peace is, as you were well told to-day, desirable with all men, as far as it may be had with conscience and honour. We are upon a treaty with France. And we may say this, that, if God give us honour in the eyes of the nations about us, we have reason to bless him for it, and so to own it. And I dare say that there is not a nation in Europe, but they are very willing to ask a good understanding with you.—I am sorry I am thus tedious; but I did judge that it was somewhat necessary to acquaint you with these things. And things being thus, I hope you will be willing to hear a little again of the sharp as well as the sweet: and I should not be faithful to you, nor to the interest of these nations which you and I serve, if I should not let you know all. As I said before, when this government was undertaken, we were in the midst of these divisions, and animosities, and scatterings: also thus engaged with these enemies round about us, at such a vast charge, 120,000*l.* a month for the very Fleet; which was the very utmost penny of your Assessments: aye, and then all your treasure was exhausted and spent when this government was undertaken; all accidental ways of bringing in treasure, to a very considerable sum, consumed: that is to say, the lands were sold; the treasures spent, rents, fee-farms, king's, queen's, princes, bishops, dean and chapters, delinquents lands, sold. These were spent when this government was undertaken.—I think it is my duty to let you know so much: and that is the reason why the taxes do yet lie so heavy upon the people; of which we have abated 30,000*l.* a month for the next 3 months. Truly I thought it my duty to let you know, that though God hath dealt thus with you, yet these are but entrances and doors of hope; wherein, through the blessing of God, you may enter into rest and peace; but you are not yet entered. You were told to-day of a people brought out of Egypt towards the land of Canaan; but through unbelief, murmuring, repining, and other temptations and sins, wherewith God was provoked, they were fain to come back again, and linger many years in the wilderness before they came to the place of rest. We are thus far through the mercy of God. We have cause to take notice of it that we are not brought into misery; but, as I said before, a door of hope open. And I may say this to you, if the Lord's blessing and his presence go along with the management of affairs at this meeting, you will be enabled to put the top-stone to this work, and make the nation happy. But this must be by knowing the true state of affairs; you are yet, like the people under circumcision, but raw; your peaces are but newly made; and it is a maxim not to be despised, though peace be made, yet it is interest that keeps peace. And I hope you will trust it no further than you see interest upon it: and therefore I wish that you may go forward, and not backward; and that you may have the blessing of God upon your endeavours. It is one of the great ends of calling this parliament, that this ship of the Commonwealth may be brought into a safe harbour; which, I assure you, it will not well be, without your counsel and advice. You have great works upon your hands. You have Ireland to look unto; there is not much done towards the planting of it, though some things leading and preparing for it are. It is a great business to settle the government of that nation upon fit terms, such as will bear that work through. You have had likewise laid before you the considerations intimating your peace with some foreign States; but yet you have not made peace with all. And if they should see we do not manage our affairs with that wisdom which becomes us, truly we may sink under disadvantages for all that is done. And our enemies will have their eyes open and be revived, if they see animosities amongst us; which indeed will be their great advantage. I do therefore persuade you to a sweet, gracious, and holy understanding of one another, and of your business, concerning which you had so good counsel this day; that indeed, as it rejoiced my heart to hear it, so I hope the Lord will imprint it upon your spirits; wherein you shall have my prayers. Having said this, and perhaps omitted many other material things through the frailty of my memory, I shall exercise plainness and freeness with you, in telling you, that I have not spoken these things as one that assumes to himself dominion over you; but as one that doth resolve to be a fellow-servant with you, to the interest of these great affairs, and of the people of these nations. I shall therefore trouble you no longer, but desire you to repair to your house, and to exercise your own liberty in the choice of a Speaker, that so you may lose no time in carrying on your work."

The Members being returned to the house, unanimously elected for their Speaker Wm. Lenthall, esq. master of the rolls. It is observable that although Cromwell had already exercised many personal acts of royalty since his advancement to the Protectorate, yet the ancient ceremony of presenting the Speaker to the king, for his approbation, was omitted to his highness; so that this officer stood solely upon the election of the house.—The first Resolution of this parliament, after the choice of Mr. Lenthall for their Speaker, Mr. Scobell, for their clerk, and Mr. Birkhead for their serjeant at arms, was to appoint a Day of public Fasting and Humiliation, to be observed by that house and the whole nation.

Sept. 5. The house proceeded to appoint a large Committee for Privileges; and ordered, That no Petition against any Election of such members as were already returned, should be received after 3 weeks; and that such members, who were elected for two or more places, should declare for which they would serve.—

A motion being made, That the house should take the matter of the Government into consideration the next morning, it was agreed to.—Accordingly, the house began with it that day; and, after long debate, a motion was made by sir Arthur Haslerig, That no Act or Ordinance, declaring what offences are Treason, should extend to prejudice the Freedom of Speech in parliament: but the house dividing upon the previous question, it passed in the negative by 187 against 130. It was next resolved, That the subject-matter of debate the next morning, should be, Whether the house shall approve that the Government should be in one Single Person and a Parliament?

Debate whether the Government should be in one Single Person and a Parliament.] Sept. 7. The house went upon the foregoing question: the Protector's party were for approving the whole Instrument of Government at once; but the Republicans were for debating it, article by article, in a committee. Upon this occasion a member stood up, and shewed the snares that were laid to entrap the people's privileges; declaring, 'That as God had made him instrumental in cutting down tyranny in one person, he could not endure to see the nation's liberties ready to be shackled by another, whose right to the government could be measured out no otherwise than by the length of his sword; which alone emboldened him to command his commanders.* Sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Scott, and serj. Bradshaw, remarkably distinguished themselves against the court party; and were very instrumental, says Ludlow, in opening the eyes of many young members, who had never before heard their interests so clearly stated and asserted:† insomuch, that it was carried by a majority of 141 against 136, That the house be Now resolved into a committee of the whole house, to debate upon the said question. The debate took up the whole day and the three following: and though the new courtiers prevailed so far as to prevent the house from coming to any Resolution upon the foregoing question, yet the motion for referring it to a committee being carried against the Protector's party in the house, by a majority of 5 voices, it so alarmed his highness, that he began to be jealous lest his new parliament should overturn their master, and thought it high time to look to himself.

Cromwell's resentful Speech to the Members, on that Occasion.] Having, therefore, given orders to the lord mayor of London, to be upon his guard to prevent disturbances in the city, he sent a Message to the parliament on the 12th, desiring them to meet him in the Painted-Chamber.‡ The members being accordingly

"Gentlemen; It is not long since I met you in this place, upon an occasion which gave me much more content and comfort than this doth. That which I have to say to you now will need no preamble to let me into my discourse; for the occasion of this meeting is plain enough. I could have wished, with all my heart, there had been no cause for it. At that meeting I did acquaint you what the first rise was of this government which hath called you hither; and in the authority of which you came hither. Among other things that I told you of then, I said you were a Free Parliament; and so you are, whilst you own the government and authority that called you hither; for certainly that word implied a reciprocation, or it implied nothing at all.—Indeed there was a reciprocation implied and expressed; and I think your actions and carriages ought to be suitable: but I see it will be necessary for me now a little to magnify my office; which I have not been apt to do. I have been of this mind, I have been always of this mind, since first I entered upon it, That if God will not bear it up, let it sink. But if a duty be incumbent upon me, to bear my testimony unto it, (which in modesty I have hitherto forborne) I am in some measure now necessitated thereunto: and therefore that will be the Prologue to my Discourse.—I called not myself to this place; I say again, I called not myself to this place; of that God is witness: and I have many witnesses who, I do believe, could readily lay down their lives to bear witness to the truth of that; that is to say, That I called not myself to this place: and, being in it, I bear not witness to myself; but God and the people of these nations have borne testimony to it also.—If my calling be from God, and my Testimony from the People, God and the People shall take it from me, else I will not part with it. I should be false to the trust that God hath placed in me, and to the interest of the people of these nations, if I should. That I called not myself to this place, is my first Assertion. That I bear not Witness to myself, but have many Witnesses, is my 2nd. These are the two things I shall take the Liberty to speak more fully to you of.—To make plain and clear that which I have said, I must take liberty to look back. I was by birth a gentleman, living neither in any considerable height, nor yet in obscurity: I have been called to several employments in the nation: to serve in parliaments; and because I would not be over-tedious, I did endeavour to discharge the duty of an honest man in those services, to God and his people's interest, and of the Commonwealth; having, when time was, a competent acceptance in the hearts of men, and some evidences thereof. I resolve not to recite the times, and occasions, and opportunities that have been appointed me by God to serve him in, nor the presence and blessings of God then bearing testimony to me.

‡ From the original Edition, printed by the same persons as the foregoing Speech, and published for the same reasons.

—Having had some occasions to see (together with my brethren and countrymen) a happy period put to our sharp wars and contests with the then common enemy, I hoped, in a private capacity, to have reaped the fruit and benefit, together with my brethren, of our hard labours and hazards; to wit the enjoyment of peace and liberty, and the privileges of a Christian and of a man, in some equality with others, according as it should please the Lord to dispense unto me. And when, I say, God hath put an end to our wars, at least brought them to a very hopeful issue, very near an end, after Worcester Fight I came up to London to pay my service and duty to the parliament that then sat; and hoping that all minds would have been disposed to answer that which seemed to be the mind of God, viz. to give peace and rest to his people, and especially to those who had bled more than others in the carrying on of the military affairs, I was much disappointed of my expectation, for the issue did not prove so; whatever may be boasted or misrepresented, it was not so nor so.—I can say, in the simplicity of my soul, I love not, I love not (I declined it in my former Speech); I say, I love not to rake into sores, or to discover nakednesses; that which I drive at is this, I say to you, I hoped to have had leave to have retired to a private life: I begged to be dismissed of my charge; I begged it again and again; and God be judge between me and all men if I lie in this matter. That I lie not in matter of fact, is known to very many; but whether I tell a lie in my heart, as labouring to represent to you that which was not upon my heart, I say the Lord be judge; let uncharitable men, that measure others by themselves, judge as they please. As to the matter of fact, I say it is true. As to the ingenuity and integrity of my heart in that desire, I do appeal, as before, upon the truth of that also: but I could not obtain what my soul longed for. And the plain truth is, I did afterwards apprehend that some did think (my judgment not suiting with theirs) that it could not well be. But this, I say to you, was between God and my soul; between me and that Assembly. I confess I am in some strait to say what I could say; and what is true of what then followed. I pressed the parliament, as a member, to period themselves, once, and again, and again, and ten, nay 20 times over. I told them (for I knew it better than any one man in the parliament could know it, because of my manner of life, which was to run up and down the nation, and so might see and know the temper and spirits of all men, the best of men) that the nation loathed their sitting: I knew it. And so far as I could discern, when they were dissolved there was not so much as the barking of a dog, or any general and visible repining at it. You are not a few here present that can assert this as well as myself.—And that there was high cause for their Dissolution, is most evident, not only in regard there was a just fear of that parliament's perpetuating themselves, but because it was their design. And had not their heels been trod upon by importunities from abroad, even to threats, I believe there would never have been thoughts of rising, or of going out of that room to the world's end.—I myself was sounded, and by no mean persons tempted, and Addresses were made to me to that very end, that it might have been thus perpetuated: that the vacant places might be supplied by new elections, and so continue from generation to generation.—I have declined, I have declined very much, to open these things to you; yet having proceeded thus far, I must tell you, that poor men, under this arbitrary power, were driven like flocks of sheep, by 40 in a morning, to the confiscation of goods and estates, without any man being able to give a reason that two of them had deserved to forfeit a shilling. I tell you the truth, and my soul, and many persons whose faces I see in this place, were exceedingly grieved at these things, and knew not which way to help it, but by their mournings, and giving their negatives when occasions served.—I have given you but a taste of Mis-carriages. I am confident you have had opportunities to hear much more of them; for nothing is more obvious. It is true this will be said, That there was a Remedy to put an end to this perpetual parliament endeavoured, by having a future Representative. How it was gotten, and by what importunities that was obtained, and how unwillingly yielded unto, is well known.—What was this Remedy? it was a seeming willingness to have successive parliaments. What was that succession? it was, that when one parliament had left their seat, another was to sit down immediately in the room thereof, without any caution to avoid that which was the danger, viz. perpetuating of the same parliaments; which is a sore now that will ever be running, so long as men are ambitious and troublesome, if a due Remedy be not found. So then, what was the business? it was a conversion from a parliament that should have been, and was perpetual, to a legislative power always sitting, and so the liberties, and interests, and lives of people, not judged by any certain known laws and power, but by an arbitrary power, which is incident and necessary to parliaments: by an arbitrary power, I say, to make men's estates liable to confiscation, and their persons to imprisonments; sometimes by laws made after the fact committed, often by taking the judgment, both in capital and criminal things, to themselves; who, in former times, were not known to exercise such a judicature.—This I suppose was the case, and, in my Opinion the Remedy was fitted to the disease; especially coming in the rear of a parliament, so exercising the power and authority as this had done but immediately before. Truly, I confess, upon these grounds, and with the satisfaction of divers other persons, seeing nothing could be had otherwise, that parliament was dissolved; and we desiring to see if a few might have been called to—gether for some short time, who might put the nation into some way of certain Settlement, did call those gentlemen out of the several parts of the nation for that purpose. And, as I have appealed to God before you already, I know, (and I hope I may say it) though it be a tender thing to make appeals to God, yet, in such exigences as these, I trust it will not offend his majesty especially to make them before persons that know God, and know what conscience is, and what it is to lie before the Lord: I say, that as a principal end in calling that Assembly, was the Settlement of the Nation; so a chief end to myself was, that I might have opportunity to lay down the power that was in my hands. I say to you again, in the presence of that God who hath blessed and been with me in all my adversities and successes, that was, as to myself, my greatest end. A desire perhaps, I am afraid, sinful enough, to be quit of the power God had most providentially put into my hand, before he called for it; and before those honest ends of our fighting were attained and settled. I say, the Authority I had in my hand being so boundless as it was, I being, by act of parliament, General of all the Forces in the 3 nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, (in which unlimited condition I did not desire to live a day) did call that meeting for the ends before expressed.—What the event and issue of that meeting was, we may sadly remember: it hath much teaching in it, and I hope will make us all wiser for the future. But this meeting not succeeding, as I have formerly said to you, and giving such a disappointment to our hopes, I shall not now make any repetition thereof; only the effect was, That they came and brought to me a parchment, signed by very much the major part of them, expressing their resigning and re-delivery of the power and authority that was committed to them back again into my hands: and I can say it, in the presence of divers persons here, that do know whether I lie in that, that I did not know one tittle of that resignation, until they all came and brought it, and delivered it into my hands: of this there are also in this presence many witnesses.—I received this resignation, having formerly used my endeavours and persuasions to keep them together; observing their differences, I thought it my duty to give advice to them, that so I might prevail with them for union: but it had the effect that I told you, and I had my disappointment.—When this was so, we were exceedingly to seek how to settle things for the future. My power again, by this resignation, was as boundless and unlimited as before; all things being subjected to arbitrariness, and myself a person having power over the three nations boundlessly and unlimited; and, upon the matter, all government dissolved, all civil administrations at an end, as will presently be made appear.—The gentlemen that undertook to frame this Government, did consult divers days together (they being of known integrity and ability) how to frame somewhat that might give us Settlement; and they did so: and that I was not privy to their councils, they know it. When they had finished their Model in some measure, or made a very good preparation of it, it became communicative. They told me that except I would undertake the government, they thought things would hardly come to a composure and settlement; but blood and confusion would break in upon us. I denied it again and again, as God and those persons know; not complimentingly, as they also know, and as God knows. I confess, after many arguments, and after the letting of me know that I did not receive any thing that put me into any higher capacity than I was in before; but that it limited me, and bound my hands to act nothing to the prejudice of these nations, without consent of a Council until the parliament, and then limited by the parliament, as the Act of Government expresseth, I did accept it.—I might repeat this again to you if it were needful; but I think I need not. I was arbitrary in power, having the Armies in the three nations under my command; and truly not very ill beloved by them, nor very ill beloved then by the people, by the good people; and I believe I should have been more beloved if they had known the truth, as things were before God, and in themselves, and before divers of those gentlemen whom I but now mentioned unto you. I did, at the intreaty of divers persons of honour and quality, at the intreaty of very many of the chief Officers of the Army then present, and at their request, I did accept of the place and title of Protector; and was in the presence of the commissioners of the great seal, the judges, the lord mayor and aldermen of London, the soldiery, divers gentlemen, citizens, and divers other people and persons of quality, &c. accompanied to Westminster-Hall, where I took my Oath to this government. This was not done in a corner; it was open and public. This Government hath been exercised by a Council, with a desire to be faithful in all things; and, amongst all other trusts, to be faithful in calling this parliament.—And thus I have given you a very bare and lean discourse; which truly I have been necessitated unto, and contracted in, because of the unexpectedness of the occasion, and because I would not quite weary you nor myself: but this is a Narrative that discovers to you the series of Providence, and of transactions leading me into this condition wherein I now stand.—The next thing I promised you, wherein I hope I shall not be so long, (though I am sure this occasion does require plainness and freedom) is, That I brought not myself into this condition, as in my own apprehension I did not; and that I did not, the things being true which I have told you, I submit it to your judgments, and there shall I leave it, let God do what he pleaseth: the other things that I say that I am to speak to you of, are, That I have not, nor do not bear witness to myself. I am far from alluding to him that said so; yet truth concerning a member of his he will own, though men do not.—But I think, if I mistake not, I have a cloud of witnesses. I think so; let men be as froward as they will. I have witness within, without, and above. But I shall speak of them that are without, having fully spoken before of the witness above, and the witness in my own conscience, upon the other account; because that subject had more obscurity in it, and I in some sort needed appeals; and, I trust, might lawfully make them, as well as take an oath, where things were not so apt to be made evident. I shall enumerate my Witnesses as well as I can. When I had consented to accept of the Government, there was some solemnity to be performed; and that was accompanied with some persons of considerableness in all respects; who were the persons before expressed, and who accompanied me, at the time of my entering upon this Government, to Westminster-Hall to take my Oath. There was an explicit consent of interested persons, and an implicit consent of many, shewing their good-liking and approbation thereof. And, gentlemen, I do not think that you are altogether strangers to it in your country: some did not nauseate it; very many did approve it. I had the approbation of the Officers of the Army in the three nations; I say of the Officers: I had that by their Remonstrances and under signature. There went along with that explicit consent, an implicit consent of persons that had somewhat to do in the world; that had been instrumental, by God, to fight down the enemies of God and his people in the three nations. And, truly, until my hands were bound, and I limited, (wherein I took full contentment, as many can bear me witness) when I had in my hands so great a power and arbitrariness, the soldiery were a very considerable part of the nations, especially all government being dissolved: I say, when all government was thus dissolved, and nothing to keep things in order but the sword, and yet they, (which many histories will not parallel) even they were desirous that things might come to a consistency, and arbitrariness might be taken away, and the government put into a person, limited and bounded, as in the Act of Settlement, whom they distrusted the least, and loved not the worst; this was another evidence.—I would not forget the honourable and civil entertainment, with the approbation I found in the great city of London; which the city knows whether I directly or indirectly sought. And, truly, I do not think it is folly to remember this; for it was very great and high, and very public; and as numerous a body of those that are known by names and titles (the several corporations and societies of citizens in this city) as hath been at any time seen in England; and not without some appearance of satisfaction also.—I had not only this witness; but I have had, from the greatest county in England, and from many cities and boroughs, and many counties, explicit approbations; not of those gathered here and there, but from the county of York and city of York, and other counties and places, assembled in their public and general assizes; the grand Jury, in the name of the noblemen, gentlemen, yeomen, and inhabitants of that county, giving very great thanks to me for undertaking this heavy burden at such a time; and giving very great approbation and encouragement to me to go through with it. These are plain; I have them to shew; and by these, in some measure, it will appear I do not bear witness to myself.—This is not all: the Judges (and truly I had almost forgotten it) thinking that there was a dissolution of government, met and consulted, and did declare one to another, that they could not administer justice to the satisfaction of their consciences, until they had received commissions from me, and they did receive commissions from me; and by virtue of those commissions they have acted, and all the justices of the peace that have acted, have acted by virtue of like commissions; which was a little more than an implicit approbation. And I believe all the justice administered in the nation hath been by this authority; which also I lay before you, desiring you to think whether all these persons before mentioned must not come before you for an Act of Oblivion and general pardon, who have acted under, and testified to, this government, if it be disowned by you.—I have two or three witnesses more, equivalent to all these I have reckoned, if I be not mistaken, and greatly mistaken. If I should say, all you that are here are my witnesses, I should say no untruth. I know you are the same persons here that you were in the country: but I will reserve to speak to this at the last; for this will be the issue of my speech.—I say, I have two or three witnesses that are more than all I have accounted and reckoned before: for all the people in England are my witnesses, and many in Ireland and Scotland. All the sheriffs in England are my witnesses; and all that came in upon the process issued out by the sheriffs are my witnesses; yea, the returns of the elections to the clerk of the crown, not a thing to be blown away with a breath, the returns on the behalf of the inhabitants in the counties, cities, and boroughs, all are my witnesses of approbation to the condition and place I stand in.—And I shall now make you my last witnesses, and ask you whether you came not hither by my writs, directed to the several sheriffs, and so to other officers in cities and liberties, to which the people gave obedience; having also had the Act of Government communicated to them, to which end great numbers of copies were sent down, on purpose to be communicated to them; and the Government also required to be distinctly read unto the people at the place of elections, to avoid surprizes; where also they signed the Indenture, with proviso, 'That the persons so chosen should not have power to alter the Government, as now settled in one single person and a parliament.' And thus I have made good my second Assertion, That I bear not witness to myself; but the good people of England, and you all, are my witnesses.—Yea, surely; and this being so, though I told you in my last Speech that you were a Free Parliament, yet I thought it was understood that I was the Protector, and the authority that called you; and that I was in possession of the Government by a good right from God and men. And, I believe, if the learnedest men in this nation were called to shew a precedent so clear, so many ways approving of a Government, they would not in all their search find it. I did not, in my other Speech to you, take upon me to justify the Government in every particular, and I told you the reason of it, which was plain: it was public, and had been long published, that it might be under the most serious inspection of all that pleased to peruse it. By what I have said, I have approved myself to God and my conscience in my actions, and in this undertaking; and I have given cause of approving myself to every one of your consciences in the sight of God. If it be so, why should we sport with it? with a business thus serious? may not this character, this stamp, bear equal poise with any hereditary interest, which may have, and hath had, in the common law, matters of dispute and trial of learning; wherein many have exercised more wit, and spilt more blood, than I hope ever to live to see or hear of in this nation? I say, I do not know why I may not balance this providence, as in the sight of God, with any hereditary interest, as being less subject to those cracks and flaws that is commonly incident unto; which Titles have cost more blood, in former times, in this nation, than we have leisure to speak of now.—Now if this be thus, and I am deriving a Title from God and men, upon such accounts as these are; although some men be froward, yet that your judgments who are persons sent from all parts of the nation, under the notion of acceptance of the Government; for you to disown, or not to own it; for you to act with parliamentary authority, especially in the disowning of it, contrary to the very fundamental things; yea, against the very root itself of this establishment; to sit, and not own the authority by which you sit, is that which, I believe, astonisheth more men than myself; and doth as dangerously disappoint and discompose the nation, as any thing could have been invented by the greatest enemy to our peace and welfare, or could well have happened.—It is true, there are some things in the establishment that are Fundamental, and some things are not so, but are Circumstantial: of such, no question but I shall easily agree to vary or leave out, as I shall be convinced by reason. Some things are Fundamentals, about which I shall deal plainly with you: these may not be parted with; but will, I trust, be delivered over to posterity, as being the fruits of our blood and travel.—The Government by a single person and a parliament is a Fundamental; it is the esse; it is constitutive. And for the person, though I may seem to plead for myself, yet I do not; no, nor can any reasonable man say it; but, if the things throughout this Speech be true, I plead for this nation, and all honest men therein, who have borne their testimony as aforesaid, and not for myself: and if things should do otherwise than well, which I would not fear, and the common enemy and discontented persons take advantage at these distractions, the issue will be put up before God: let him own, or let him disown it, as he pleases.—In every government there must be somewhat Fundamental, somewhat like a Magna Charta, that should be standing, and be unalterable. Where there is a stipulation on one part, and that fully accepted, as appears by what hath been said, surely a return ought to be; else what does that stipulation signify? if I have, upon the terms aforesaid, undertaken this great trust, and exercised it, and, by it, called you, surely it ought to be owned.—That parliaments should not make themselves perpetual, is a Fundamental. Of what assurance is a law to prevent so great an evil, if it lie in one or the same legislature to unmake it again? is this like to be lasting? it will be a rope of sand; it will give no security; for the same men may unbuild what they have built. Is not liberty of conscience in Religion a Fundamental? so long as there is liberty of conscience for the Supreme Magistrate to exercise his conscience in erecting what form of Church-Government he is satisfied he should set up, why should he not give it to others? Liberty of Conscience is a natural right; and he that would have it, ought to give it; having liberty to settle what he likes for the public. Indeed that hath been one of the vanities of our contest: every sect saith, Oh! give me liberty. But give him it, and, to his power, he will not yield it to any body else. Where is our ingenuity! truly that is a thing ought to be very reciprocal. The magistrate hath his supremacy, and he may settle Religion according to his conscience. And I may say it to you: I can say it: all the money of this nation would not have tempted men to fight, upon such an account as they have engaged, if they had not had hopes of liberty better than they had from episcopacy, or than would have been afforded them from a Scots presbytery, or an English either, if it had made such steps, or been as sharp and rigid, as it threatened when it was first set up.—This, I say, is a Fundamental. It ought to be so: it is for us and the generations to come. And if there be an absoluteness in the imposer, without fitting allowances, and exceptions from the rule, we shall have our people driven into wildernesses, as they were when those poor and afflicted people, that forsook their estates and inheritances here, where they lived plentifully and comfortably, for the enjoyment of their liberty, were necessitated to go into a vast howling wilderness in New-England; where they have, for liberty's sake, stript themselves of all their comfort, and the full enjoyment they had, embracing rather loss of friends, and want, than to be so ensnared and in bondage.—Another, which I had forgotten, is the Militia; that is judged a fundamental, if any thing be so. That it should be well and equally placed, is very necessary; for put the absolute power of the Militia into one without a check, what doth it answer? I pray you, what check is there put upon your perpetual parliaments, if it be wholly stript of this? it is equally placed, and desires were to have it so, viz. in one person, and the parliament, sitting the parliament. What signifies a provision against perpetuating of parliaments, if this be solely in them? whether without a check, the parliament have not liberty to alter the frame of government to aristocracy, to democracy, to anarchy, to any thing, if this be fully in them? yea, into all confusion, and that without remedy? and if this one thing be placed in one, that one, be it parliament, be it a supreme governor, they or he hath power to make what they please of all the rest.—Therefore, if you would have a balance at all, and that some Fundamentals must stand, which may be worthy to be delivered over to posterity, truly, I think, it is not unreasonably urged, that the Militia should be disposed, as it is laid down in the Government; and that it should be so equally placed, that one person, neither in parliament, nor out of parliament, should have the power of ordering it. The Council are the trustees of the Commonwealth, in all intervals of parliaments, who have as absolute a negative upon the supreme officer in the said intervals, as the parliament hath whilst it is sitting. It cannot be made use of, a man cannot be raised, nor a penny charged upon the people; nothing done without consent of parliament; and, in the intervals of parliament, without consent of the council, it is not to be exercised.—Give me leave to say, That there is very little power, none but what is co-ordinate in the Supreme Officer; and yet enough in him that hath the chief government in that particular: he is bound in strictness by the parliament; and out of parliament, by the Council, that do as absolutely bind him as the parliament doth when the parliament is sitting.—For that of Money; I told you some things are circumstantial; as to have 200,000*l.* to defray Civil Officers, to pay the Judges and other Officers, defraying the Charges of the Council, in sending their Embassies, in keeping intelligence, and doing that which is necessary, and for supporting the Governor in Chief; all this, is by the Instrument, supposed and intended; but it is not of the esse so much, and so limited, as so many soldiers are, that is 20,000 foot and 10,000 horse. Yet, if the spirits of men be composed, 5000 horse and 10,000 foot may serve. These things are between the Chief Officer and the parliament, to be moderated as occasion shall offer.—So there are many other circumstantial things, which are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians: but the things which shall be necessary to deliver over to posterity, these should be unalterable; else every succeeding parliament will be disputing to change and alter the government, and we shall be as often brought into confusion as we have parliaments, and so make our Remedy our disease. The Lord's providence, appearing evils, appearing good, and better judgment, will give occasion for the ordering of things for the best interest of the people; and those things are the matter of consideration between you and me.—I have indeed almost tired myself: that which I have further to say is this, I would it had not been needful for me to have called you hither to have expostulated these things with you, and in such a manner as this is; but necessity hath no law. Feigned necessities, imaginary necessities, are the greatest cozenage that men can put upon the providence of God, and make pretences to break known rules by. But it is as legal, and as carnal, and as stupid, to think that there are no necessities that are manifest necessities, because necessities may be abused or feigned; and, truly, I should be so, if I should think so; and I hope none of you think so.—I say, that the wilful throwings-away of this Government, such as it is, so owned by God, so approved by men, so testified to, in the Fundamentals of it, as is before mentioned, and that in relation to the good of these nations and posterity; I can sooner be willing to be rolled into my grave, and buried with infamy, than I can give my consent unto.—You have been called hither together to save a nation;—nations. You had the best people indeed in the Christian world in your trust, when you came hither: you had affairs and these nations delivered over to you in peace and quietness: you were, and we all were, put into an uninterrupted possession. Nobody making title to us: through the blessing of God our enemies were hopeless and scattered: we had peace at home; peace almost with all neighbours round about; fit to take advantages where God did administer them.—To have our peace and interest, that had those hopes the other day, thus shaken, and under such a confusion, and we rendered hereby almost the scorn and contempt of those strangers that are amongst us to negotiate their master's affairs; to give them opportunity to see our nakedness as they do, a people that have been unhinged this twelve-years-day, and unhinged still, as if scattering, division, and confusion should come upon us as if it were desired, which are the greatest plagues God ordinarily lays upon nations for sin: I would be loath to say these are matters of our delight; but, if not, why not the matter of our care, so wisely as we ought by uttermost endeavours to avoid? Nay, when by such actions as these are, these poor nations shall be thrown into heaps of confusion, through blood, and ruin, and trouble, upon the saddest account that ever was, if breaking should come upon us, and all because we would not settle when we might; when God put it into our hands!

Your affairs now almost settled every where; and to have all recoil upon us, and we ourselves shaken in our affections, loosened from all known and public interest, as I have mentioned to you; who shall answer for these things to God? Who can answer for these things to God, or to men? To the people that sent you hither, who looked for refreshment from you; who looked for nothing but peace, and quietness, and rest, and settlement? and when we shall come to give an account to them, we shall be able to say, Oh! we have quarrelled for, and we contested for, the liberty of England; wherein, forsooth, for the liberty of the People? I appeal to the Lord, that the desires and endeavours, and the things themselves, will speak for themselves; that the Liberty of England, the Liberty of the People, the avoiding of tyrannous Impositions, either upon men as men, or Christians as Christians, is made so safe by this Act of Settlement, that it will speak sufficiently for itself. And when it shall appear what hath been said and done, and what our transactions have been; for God can discover, and no privilege will hinder the Lord from discovering, no privilege or condition of men can hide from the Lord; he can, and will, make all manifest, if he see it for his glory. And when these shall, by the providence of God, be manifested, and the people shall come and say, gentlemen, what condition are we in? we hoped for light, and behold darkness, obscure darkness. We hoped for rest, after ten years civil wars, but are plunged into deep confusion again. Aye, we know these consequences will come upon us, if God Almighty shall not find out some way to prevent them. I had this thought within myself, that it had not been dishonest, nor dishonourable, nor against true liberty, no not of parliaments, when a parliament was so chosen, in pursuance of, in conformity to, and with such an approbation and consent to the government, so that he that runs might read by what authority you came hither, that an owning of your Call, and of the authority bringing you hither, might have been required before your entrance into the house; but this was declined, and hath not been done, because I am persuaded scarce any man could reasonably doubt you came with contrary minds. And I have reason to believe the people that sent you least doubted thereof at all; and therefore I must deal plainly with you: what I forbore upon a just confidence at first, you necessitate me unto now; that seeing the authority calling you is so little valued, and so much slighted, till some such assurance be given and made known, that the fundamental interest of the government be settled and approved, according to the proviso contained in the return, and such a consent testified as will make it appear that the same is accepted, I have caused a stop to be put to your entrance into the parliament-house.—I am sorry, I am sorry, and I could be sorry to the death, that there is cause for this: but there is cause, and if things be not satisfied that are reasonably demanded, I, for my part, shall do that which becomes me, seeking my counsel from God.—There is therefore somewhat to be offered to you, that, I hope, will answer, being understood with the Qualifications that I have told you of; reforming Circumstantials, and agreeing in the Substance and Fundamentals, which is the Government settled, as it is expressed in the Indentures, not to be altered. The making your minds known in that, by giving your assent and subscription to it, is that which will let you in to act those things as a parliament, which are for the good of the people. And this thing shewed to you, and signed as aforesaid, doth determine the controversy, and may give a happy progress and issue to this parliament. The place where you may come thus and sign, as many as God shall make free thereunto, is in the lobby without the parliament-door. The Government doth declare, that you have a legislative power without a negative from me. As the Government doth express you may make any laws, and if I give not my consent within 20 days to the passing your laws, they are, ipso facto, laws, whether I consent or no, if not contrary to the Government. You have an absolute legislative power in all things that can possibly concern the good and interest of the public; and, I think, you may make these nations happy by this Settlement; and I, for my part, shall be willing to be bound more than I am, in any thing that I may be convinced of may be for the good of the people, in preservation of the cause and interest so long contended for.”

The Members subscribe a Recognition of the Government.] The Lord Protector having thus fairly told the Parliament what they were to expect, the members returned to their house, where they found a guard placed to prevent their re-entry, till such time as they had subscribed the following Recognition; a copy of which, ingrossed on parchment, was laid upon a table in the lobby for that purpose; viz.

“ I do hereby freely promise and engage to ‘ be true and faithful to the Lord Protector,
 ‘ and the Commonwealth of England, Scot‘ land, and Ireland; and shall not, according ‘ to the tenor of the Indenture whereby I am ‘ returned to serve in this present parliament, ‘ propose, or give my consent, to alter the Go‘ verament, as it is settled in One Person and ‘ a Parliament.”

The Speaker and about 130 members subscribed this Recognition forthwith, and resumed their seats in the house: and then adjourned to the 14th.

Sept. 14. In the proceedings of this day we find a Vote of the house, which seems to have been passed with no other intent than to explain away, in great measure, the Recognition they had been compelled to subscribe, viz. “ Resolved, That some members of the house be appointed immediately to withdraw; and, upon the present debate and sense of the house, for further satisfaction in reference to the Subscription, to prepare somewhat to be offered to them for their further consideration." Soon after Mr. Whitlocke, from the said committee, reported a Paper, containing these words, viz. "The Parliament doth declare, That the Recognition of the Government by the members of this parliament, in the words following, viz" [Here follows the Form as before given] "doth not comprehend, nor shall be construed to comprehend, therein the whole Government, consisting of 42 Articles; but that the same doth only include what concerns the Government of the Commonwealth, by a Single Person and successive Parliaments." This Declaration was passed without a division, and ordered to be printed and published: and the same day the Recognition was subscribed by 193 members more.

The House resume the Debate on the Government.] The clerk of the parliament having, by order of the house, brought in the original record of the Government of the Commonwealth, as it had been drawn up by the Protector and his Council, it was read, and the debate upon it ordered to begin on the 19th. Accordingly, the first Article of it was read in a committee of the whole house, and debated all that day; and it was agreed to begin with it again the next morning; and thus the debate continued on each particular Article, de die in diem, all the rest of this month, without coming to any Resolution about it.

October 1. This month began, as the last ended, with the Debate on the Government, which was carried on from day to day, and little else was done, but regulating the Returns of some Elections.

Oct. 10. The house resolved to take into their consideration the Ordinances made by the Lord Protector and his Council, and referred it to a committee to review them all, together with such laws, ordinances, and acts as had been made by the late parliament, from the 3rd July to the 10th Dec. 1653.

Oct. 19. The house still continued their Debate upon the Government. This day, the dispute was, Whether the Government in a Single Person, as Protector of the Commonwealth, should be elective or hereditary. In this debate, Lambert, in a long speech, endeavoured to persuade the parliament that it was necessary to make the office of Protector hereditary; but that, upon the question being put, it passed in the negative by 200 against 60; which greatly surprized the public and the family of the Protector, who thought himself sure, the day before, of perpetuating this dignity to his own issue.

Nov. 1. From this day to the 16th of January, the Debate on the Government was continued, three days in every week, forenoon and afternoon, without any intermission; and numerous Resolutions were passed; all of which are preserved in the Journals.

Jan. 17. This day it was resolved, "That the Bill intituled, 'An Act declaring and settling the Government of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging,' be ingrossed, in order to its presentment to the Lord Protector, for his consideration and consent: and that if the Lord Protector and the Parliament shall not agree thereunto, and to every Article thereof, then this Bill shall be void, and of none effect."

The Parliament dissolved, without passing one single Act.] Jan. 22. The house went on every day, after the last date, debating still on the Government; and the Bill for it being read a 2nd time, more Additions and Provisions were offered to it; which, on several divisions, (no less than 7 happening in two days time) were rejected. And they might have gone on, debating and dividing, long enough, had not the Protector come down to Westminster on this day; when, sending for the Speaker and the whole house to attend him in the Painted-Chamber, he was pleased, says the Journal, to dissolve this Parliament.

Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That, in the month of January, many things were spoken in the debates of the house, concerning the Government, which gave great offence to Cromwell and his Council, and created a suspicion that no good was to be expected from them; for they were not inclinable to satisfy the Protector's desires. On the other side, the parliament made what haste they could to finish their debates and close the business, for fear a blow from his superior hand should spoil all their labours." The same Author tells us, "That the Protector grew weary of his Parliament; and though he was advised by some not to dissolve them, urging the inconveniences that had arisen by the dissolution of former parliaments, which ever caused ill blood; or, at least, not to dissolve them till after the time was past that, by the Instrument of Government, they were to sit; yet he was not very solicitous about that, but was resolved to part with them at any rate: which some of his Council, who saw his designs, were not backward to promote."—Ludlow, speaking of Cromwell, says, "The Representative sitting at Westminster, though garbled as he thought fit, proving not sufficiently inclined to serve his designs, but rather, in prudence, yielding to the strength of the present stream, in hopes the people might, in time, recover their oars, and make use of them for the public good; he grew impatient till the five months allowed for their sitting should be expired. And though they differed not in any material point from that form of government which he himself had set up, unless it were in reserving the nomination of his successor to the parliament; yet did the omission of this one thing so enrage him, that he resolved upon their Dissolution. They had prepared all things to offer to him, and had been very cautious of giving him any just occasion of offence; well knowing that, in case they had given him the least pretence of dissatisfaction, he would have laid all the blame at their door; and therefore they prudently left the settling of the Church-Government, and the Liberty that was to be extended to tender Consciences, (an engine by which Cromwell did most of his work) to the consideration of the next Assembly: whereupon he wanting wherewith justly to accuse them, unless it were for too much complying with him to the prejudice of the Commonwealth, after he had perused the Form of Government which the Assembly had agreed upon, and tendered to him for his consideration; the five months of their session, according to the soldiers account of 28 days to the month, being expired, they were ordered to attend him on the 22d of Jan. in the Painted-Chamber; where he made up with words and passion, what he wanted of matter to charge them with." Thus far Mr. Ludlow's account of this affair.

Cromwell's Speech on dissolving his Second Parliament.] The Protector's Speech upon this occasion was as follows:*

"Gentlemen; I perceive you are here as the house of parliament, by your Speaker, whom I see here, and by your faces, which are, in a great measure, known to me.—When I first met you in this room, it was, to my apprehension, the hopefulest day that ever mine eyes saw, as to considerations of this world: for I did look at (as wrapt up in you, together with myself) the hopes and the happiness of (though not of the greatest, yet a very great, and) the best people in the world; and truly and unfeignedly I thought so; as a people that have the highest and the clearest profession among them, of the greatest glory, viz. religion; as a people that have been, like other nations, some times up and some times down in our honour in the world, but yet never so low but we might measure with other nations; and a people that have had a stamp upon them from God; God having, as it were, summed up all our former glory and honour, in the things that are of glory to nations, in an epitome, within these 10 or 12 years last past; so that we knew one another at home, and are well known abroad.—And, if I be not very much mistaken, we were arrived at a very safe port, where we might sit down and contemplate the dispensations of God and our mercies; and might know our mercies not to have been like to those of the antients, who did make out their peace and prosperity, as they thought, by their own endeavours; who could not say, as we, that all ours were let down to us from God himself, whose appearances and providences amongst us are not to be outmatched by any story.—Truly this was our condition, and I know nothing else we had to do, save as Israel was commanded, in that most excellent Psalm of David, Psal. lxxviii. 'The things which we have heard and known, and our Fathers have told, us we will not hide them from their Children; &c.' This I thought had been a Song and a Work worthy of England, whereunto you might have happily invited them, had you had hearts unto it. You had this opportunity fairly delivered unto you; and if a history shall be written of these times and transactions, it will be said (it will not be denied) that these things that I have spoken are true. This talent was put into your hands; and I shall recur to that which I said at the first, I came with very great joy, and contentment, and comfort, the first time I met you in this place; but we and these nations are, for the present under some disappointment. If I had proposed to have played the orator, (which I never did affect, nor do, nor I hope shall) I doubt not but upon easy suppositions, which I am persuaded every one among you will grant, we did meet upon such hopes as these.—I met you a second time here; and, I confess, at that meeting I had much abatement of my hopes, though not a total frustration. I confess that that which damped my hopes so soon, was somewhat that did look like a parricide. It is obvious enough unto you, that the management of affairs did favour of a not owning the authority that called you hither; but God left us not without an expedient that gave a second possibility: shall I say a possibility? It seemed to me a probability, of recovering out of that dissatisfied condition we were all then in, towards some mutuality of satisfaction; and therefore, by that Recognition, suiting with the Indenture that returned you hither, to which afterwards also was added your own Declaration, conformable to, and in acceptance of that expedient; whereby you had, though with a little check, another opportunity renewed unto you to have made this nation as happy as it could have been, if every thing had smoothly run on from that first hour of your meeting.—And indeed (you will give me liberty of my thoughts and hopes) I did think, as I have formerly found in that way that I have been engaged in as a soldier, that some affronts put upon us, some disasters at the first, have made way for very great and happy successes: and I did not at all despond, but the stop put upon you would, in like manner, have made way for a blessing from God; that interruption being, as I thought, necessary to divert you from destructive and violent proceedings, to give time for better deliberations; whereby, leaving the government as you found it, you might have proceeded to have made those good and wholesome laws, which the people expected from you; and might have answered the Grievances, and settled those other things proper to you as a parliament, and for which you would have had thanks from all that entrusted you.—What hath happened since that time, I have not taken public notice of, as declining to intrench upon parliament privileges: for, sure I am, you will all bear me witness, that from your entering into the house upon the Recognition, to this very day, you have had no manner of interruption or hinderance of mine, in proceeding to that blessed issue the heart of a good man could propose to himself, to this very day.—You see you have me very much locked up as to what you have transacted among yourselves from that time to this; but some things I shall take liberty to speak of to you. As I may not take notice what you have been doing, so I think I have a very great liberty to tell you, that I do not know what you have been doing; I do not know whether you have been alive or dead; I have not once heard from you all this time; I have not, and that you all know: if that be a fault that I have not, surely it hath not been mine.—If I have had any melancholy thoughts, and have sat down by them, why might it not have been very lawful for me to think that I was a person judged unconcerned in all these businesses? I can assure you I have not reckoned myself, nor did I reckon myself, unconcerned in you; and so long as any just patience could support my expectation, I would have waited to the uttermost to have received from you the issues of your consultations and resolutions: I have been careful of your safety, and the safety of those that you represented, to whom I reckon myself a servant.—But what Messages have I disturbed you withal? What injury or indignity hath been done or offered, either to your persons, or to any privileges of parliament since you sat? I looked at myself as strictly obliged by my Oath since your recognizing the Government, in the authority of which you were called hither, and sat, to give you all possible security, and to keep you from any unparliamentary interruption.—I say I have been caring for you, for your quiet sitting; caring for your privileges, that they might not be interrupted; have been seeking of God, from the Great God, a blessing upon you, and a blessing upon these nations; I have been consulting if possibly I might in any thing promote, in my place, the real good of this parliament, of the hopefulness of which I have said so much unto you. And I did think it to be my business rather to see the utmost issue, and what God would produce by you, than unseasonably to intermeddle with you: but, as I said before, I have been caring for you, and for the peace and quiet of the nations; indeed I have, and that I shall a little presently manifest unto you.—And it leadeth me to let you know somewhat that I fear, I fear will be, through some interpretation, a little too justly put upon you, whilst you have been employed as you have been, and (in all that time expressed in the government, in that government, I say in that government) brought forth nothing that you yourselves say can be taken notice of, without infringement of your privileges.—I will tell you somewhat, that, if it be not news to you, I wish you had taken very serious consideration of; if it be news, I wish I had acquainted you with it sooner; and yet if any man will ask me why I did it not, the reason is given already, because I did make it my business to give you no interruption. There be some trees that will not grow under the shadow of other trees; there be some that chuse (a man may say so by way of allusion) to thrive under the shadow of other trees. I will tell you what hath thriven; I will not say what you have cherished under your shadow; that were too hard. Instead of peace and settlement, instead of mercy and truth being brought together, righteousness and peace kissing each other, by reconciling the honest people of these nations, and settling the woful distempers that are amongst us, which had been glorious things, and worthy of Christians to have proposed, weeds and nettles, briars and thorns, have thriven under your shadow; dissettlement and division, discontent and dissatisfaction, together with real dangers to the whole, have been more multiplied within these 5 months of your sitting, than in some years before. Foundations have been also laid for the future renewing the troubles of these nations, by all the enemies of it abroad and at home: let not these words seem too sharp, for they are true as any mathematical demonstrations are or can be. I say, the enemies of the peace of these nations, abroad and at home; the discontented humours throughout these nations, which I think no man will grudge to call by that name, or to make to allude to briars and thorns, they have nourished themselves under your shadow.—And that I may be clearly understood, they have taken the opportunities from your sitting, from the hopes they had, which with easy conjecture they might take up, and conclude that there would be no Settlement; and therefore they have framed their designs, preparing for the execution of them accordingly. Now whether (which appertains not to me to judge of on their behalf) they had any occasion ministered for this, and from whence they had it, I list not to make any scrutiny or search; but I will say this, I think they had them not from me, I am sure they had not; from whence they had it is not my business now to discourse, but that they had, is obvious to every man's sense. What preparations they have made to execute in such a season as they thought fit to take their opportunity from, that I know (not as men know things by conjecture, but) by certain demonstrable knowledge; that they have been, for some time past, furnishing themselves with arms, nothing doubting but that they should have a day for it; and verily believing, that whatsoever their former disappointments were, they should have more done for them by, and from, our own divisions, than they were able to do for themselves. I desire to be understood, that in all I have to say of this subject, you will take it that I have no reservation in my mind (as I have not) to mingle things of guess and suspicion with things of fact; but the things I am telling of are fact, things of evident demonstration.—These weeds, briars, and thorns, they have been preparing; and have brought their designs to some maturity, by the advantages given to them, as aforesaid, from your sitting and proceedings; but by the waking Eye that watched over that cause that God will bless, they have been, and yet are, disappointed. And having mentioned that cause, I say that slighted cause, let me speak a few words in behalf thereof, though it may seem too long a digression. Whosoever despiseth it, and will say it is non causa pro causa, the all-searching Eye before-mentioned will find out that man; and will judge him as one that regardeth not the works of God, nor the operations of his hands; for which God hath threatened that he will cast men down, and not build them up. That because he can dispute, and tell us he knew not where the cause begun, nor where it is, but modelleth it according to his own intellect, and submits not to the appearances of God in the world; therefore he lifts up his heel against God and mocketh at all his providences, laughing at the observations made up, not without reason and the scriptures, but by the quickening and teaching spirit which gives life to the other, calling such observations enthusiasms. Such men, I say, no wonder if they stumble and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken by the things of which they are so maliciously and wilfully ignorant. The Scriptures say, 'The Rod has a voice, and he will make himself known by the Judgments which he executeth;' and do we not think he will, and does, by the providences of mercy and kindness which he hath for his people, and for their just liberties 'whom he loves as the apple of his eye?' doth he not by them manifest himself? and is he not thereby also seen, giving kingdoms for them, giving men for them, and people for their lives? Is not this as fair a lecture, and as clear speaking, as any thing our dark reason left to the letter of the scriptures can collect from them? by this voice has God spoken very loud on the behalf of his people, by judging their enemies in the late war, and restoring them a liberty to worship with the freedom of their consciences, and freedom in their estates and persons when they do so. And thus we have found the cause of God by the works of God, which are the testimony of God; upon which rock whosoever splits shall suffer shipwreck.—But it is your glory, and it is mine, if I have any in the world, concerning the interest of those that have an interest in a better world; it is my glory that I know a cause, which yet we have not lost, but do hope we shall take a little pleasure rather to lose our lives than lose. But you will excuse this long digression.—I say unto you, whilst you have been in the midst of these transactions, that party, that Cavalier party, (I could wish some of them had thrust in here to have heard what I say) the Cavalier party have been designing and preparing to put this nation in blood again with a witness; but because I am confident there are none of that sort here, therefore I shall say the less to that; only this I must tell you, they have been making great preparations of arms; and I do believe it, will be made evident to you, that they have raked out many thousands of arms, even all that this city could afford, for divers months last past.—But it will be said, may we not arm ourselves for the defence of our houses? will any body find fault for that? no, for that the reason of their doing so hath been as explicit, and under as clear proof, as the fact of doing so; for which I hope, by the justice of the land, some will, in the face of the nation, answer it with their lives, and then the business will be pretty well out of doubt.—Banks of money have been framing for these and other such like uses; letters have been issued with privy-seals, to as great persons as most are in the nation, for the advance of monies, which have been discovered to us by the persons themselves; commissions for regiments of horse and foot, and command of castles, have been likewise given from Charles Stuart, since your sitting; and what the general insolences of that party have been, the honest people have been sensible of, and can very well testify. It hath not been only thus; but as in a quinsey or pleurisy, where the humour fixeth in one part, give it scope it will gather to that place, to the hazarding of the whole; and it is natural to do so, till it destroy nature in that person on whomsoever this befalls. So likewise will those diseases take accidental causes of aggravation of their distemper; and this was that which I did assert, That they have taken accidental causes for the growing and encreasing of those distempers, as much as would have been in the natural body, if timely remedy were not applied. And, indeed, things were come to that pass (in respect of which I shall give you a particular account) that no mortal physician, if the Great Physician had not stepped in, could have cured the distemper. Shall I lay this upon your account, or my own? I am sure I can lay it upon God's account; that if he had not stepped in, the disease had been mortal and destructive; and what is all this? truly I must needs say, a company of men still, like briars and thorns, and worse, if worse can be; of another sort than those before-mentioned to you, have been, and yet are endeavouring to put into blood, and into confusion; more desperate and dangerous confusion than England ever yet saw.—And I must say, as when Gideon commanded his son to fall upon Zeba and Zalmunna, and slay them, they thought it more noble to die by the hand of a man, than of a stripling; which shews, there is some contentment in the hand by which a man falls: so it is some satisfaction, if a Commonwealth must perish, that it perish by men, and not by the hands of persons differing little from beasts; that if it must needs suffer, it should rather suffer from rich men than from poor men; who as Solomon says, 'when they oppress, they leave nothing behind them, but are as a sweeping rain.'—Now, such as these also are grown up under your shadow. But it will be asked, What have they done? I hope, though they pretend Commonwealths interest, they have had no encouragement from you; but that, as before, rather taken it, than that you have administered any cause unto them for so doing, from delays, from hopes that this parliament would not settle; from Pamphlets, mentioning strange Votes and Resolves of yours, which I hope did abuse you. Thus you see, whatever the grounds were, these have been the effects. And thus I have laid these things before you, and you and others will be easily able to judge how far you are concerned.—And what have these men done? They have also laboured to pervert where they could, and as they could, the honest-meaning people of the nation. They have laboured to engage some in the Army; and I doubt that not only they, but some others also, very well known to you, have helped in this work of debauching and dividing the Army; they have, they have, I would be loath to say, who, where, and how, much more loath to say they were any of your own number; but I can say, endeavours have been to put the Army into a distemper, and to feed that which is the worst humour in the Army; which, though it was not a mastering humour, yet these took their advantage from delay of the Settlement, and the practices before mentioned, and stopping the pay of the Army to run us into Free Quarter, and to bring us into the inconveniencies most to be feared and avoided.—What if am I able to make it appear in fact, that some amongst you have run into the city of London, to persuade to Petitions and Addresses to you for reversing your own Votes that you have passed? Whether these practices were in favour of your liberties, or tended to beget hopes of peace and settlement from you; and whether debauching the Army in England, as is before expressed, and starving it, and putting it upon Free Quarter, and occasioning and necessitating the greatest part thereof in Scotland to march into England, leaving the remainder thereof to have their throats cut there; and kindling, by the rest, a fire in our own bosoms, were for the advantage of affairs here, let the world judge? this I tell you also, that the correspondency held with the interest of the Cavaliers, by that party of men called Levelers, and who call themselves Commonwealths Men; whose Declarations were framed to that purpose, and ready to be published at the time of their common rising, whereof we are possessed, and for which we have the confession of themselves now in custody; who confess also they built their hopes upon the assurance they had of the parliament's not agreeing to a settlement, whether these humours have not nourished themselves under your boughs, is the subject of my present discourse; and I think I say not amiss if I affirm it to be so.—And I must say it again, that that which hath been their advantage, thus to raise disturbance, hath been by the loss of those golden opportunities that God hath put into your hands for Settlement. Judge you whether these things were thus or not when you first sat down; I am sure things were not thus; there was a very great peace and sedateness throughout these nations, and great expectations of a happy Settlement, which I remembered to you at the beginning of my speech, and hoped that you would have entered upon your business as you found it.—There was a government in the possession of the people, for many months; it hath now been exercised near 15 months; and if it were needful that I should tell you how it came into their possession, and how willingly they received it; how all law and justice were distributed from it in every respect, as to life, liberty, and estate; how it was owned by God, as being the dispensation of his providence, after 12 years war, and sealed and witnessed unto by the people, I should but repeat what I said in my last speech made unto you in this place, and therefore I forbear.—When you were entered upon this government, ravelling into it, (you know I took no notice what you were doing) if you had gone upon that foot of account, to have made such good and wholesome provisions for the good of the people of these nations, for the settling of such matters in things of Religion as would have upheld and given countenance to a godly ministry; and yet would have given a just liberty to godly men of different judgments, men of the same faith with them that you call the orthodox ministry in England, as it is well known the Independants are, and many under the form of Baptism, who are sound in the faith, only may perhaps be different in judgment in some lesser matters; yet as true Christians, both looking at salvation only by faith in the blood of Christ; men professing the fear of God, having recourse to the name of God, as to a strong tower; I say you might have had opportunity to have settled peace and quietness amongst all professing godliness, and might have been instrumental, if not to have healed the breaches, yet to have kept the godly of all judgments from running one upon another; and by keeping them from being over-run by a common enemy, rendered them and these nations both secure, happy, and well satisfied.—Are these things done, or any thing towards them? is there not yet upon the spirits of men a strange itch? nothing will satisfy them, unless they can put their finger upon their brethren's consciences, to pinch them there. To do this was no part of the contest we had with the common adversary; for religion was not the thing at the first contested for; but God brought it to that issue at last, and gave it unto us by way of redundancy; and at last it proved to be that which was most dear to us; and wherein consisted this, more than in obtaining that liberty, from the tyranny of the bishops, to all species of Protestants, to worship God according to their own light and consciences? for want of which many of our brethren forsook their native countries, to seek their bread from strangers, and to live in howling wildernesses; and for which also many that remained here were imprisoned and otherwise abused, and made the scorn of the nation.—Those that were sound in the faith, how proper was it for them to labour for liberty, for a just liberty, that men should not be trampled upon for their consciences? had not they laboured but lately under the weight of persecutions, and was it fit for them to sit heavy upon others? is it ingenuous to ask liberty, and not to give it, what greater hypocrisy, than for those who were oppressed by the Bishops to become the greatest oppressors themselves, so soon as their yoke was removed? I could wish that they who call for liberty now also had not too much of that spirit, if the power were in their hands.—As for profane persons, blasphemers, such as preach sedition, the contentious railers, evil speakers, who seek, by evil words, to corrupt good manners, persons of loose conversations, punishment from the civil magistrate ought to meet with them; because, if these pretend conscience, yet walking disorderly, and not according but contrary to the gospel, and even to natural light, they are judged of all; and their sins, being open, make them subjects of the magistrates sword, who ought not to bear it in vain.—The discipline of the Army was such, that a man would not be suffered to remain there, of whom we could take notice he was guilty of such practices as these: and therefore how happy would England have been, and you, and I, if the Lord had led you on to have settled upon such good accounts as these are, and to have discountenanced such practices as the other, and left men in disputable things free to their own consciences; which was well provided for by the government, and liberty left to provide against what was apparently evil.—Judge you, whether the contesting for things that were provided for by this government hath been profitable expence of time for the good of these nations? by means whereof you may see you have wholly elapsed your time, and done just nothing. I will say this to you in behalf of the Long Parliament, that had such an expedient as this government been proposed to them, and that they could have seen the Cause of God thus provided for; and had, by debates, been enlightened in the grounds by which the difficulties might have been cleared, and the reason of the whole enforced, the circumstances of time and persons, with the temper and dispositions of the people, and affairs both abroad and at home, when it was undertaken, well weighed, (as well as they were thought to love their seats) I think in my conscience, that they would have proceeded in another manner than you have done; and not have exposed things to those difficulties and hazards they now are at; nor given occasion to leave the people so dissettled as now they are; who, I dare say, in the soberest and most judicious part of them, did expect not a questioning, but a doing things in pursuance of the government; and, if I be not misinformed, very many of you came up with this satisfaction, having had time enough to weigh and consider the same.—And when I say such an expedient as this government is, wherein I dare assert there is a just liberty to the people of God, and the just rights of the people in these nations provided for, I can put the issue thereof upon the clearest reason, whatsoever any go about to suggest to the contrary. But this not being the time and place of such an averment, for satisfaction sake herein enough is said in a Book, intituled, 'A State of the Case of the Commonwealth,' and for myself I desire not to keep it an hour longer than I may preserve England in its just rights, and may protect the people of God in such a just liberty of their consciences as I have already mentioned: and therefore if this parliament have judged things to be otherwise than as I have stated them, it had been huge friendliness between persons that had such a reciprocation, and in so great concerns to the public, for them to have convinced me in what particulars therein my error lay, of which I never yet had a word from you: but, if instead thereof, your time has been spent in setting up somewhat else upon another bottom than this stands, that looks as if the laying grounds of a quarrel had rather been designed, than to give the people Settlement; if it be thus, it is well your labours have not arrived to any maturity at all.—This government called you hither, the constitution thereof being so limited, a Single Person and a parliament; and this was thought most agreeable to the general sense of the nation, having had experience enough by trial of other conclusions, judging this most likely to avoid the extremes of monarchy on the one hand, and democracy on the other, and yet not to found Dominium in Gratia; and, if so, then certainly to make it more than a notion it was requisite that it should be as it is in the government, which puts it upon a true and equal balance. It has been already submitted to the judicious honest people, of this nation, whether the balance be not equal; and what their judgment is, is visible, by submission to it, by acting upon it, by restraining their trustees from meddling with it; and it neither asks or needs any better ratification. But when trustees in parliament shall, by experience, find any evil in any parts of the government, referred by the government itself to the consideration of the Protector and Parliament (of which time itself will be the best discoverer) how can it be reasonably imagined, that a person, or persons, coming in by election, and standing under such obligations, and so limited, and so necessitated by Oath to govern for the people's good, and to make their love, under God, the best under-propping, and his best interest to him; how can it, I say, be imagined, that the present or succeeding Protectors will refuse to agree to alter any such thing in the government that may be found to be for the good of the people, or to recede from any thing which he might be convinced casts the balance too much to the single person?

And although, for the present, the keeping up, and having in his power, the Militia, seems the most hard, yet if it should be yielded up at such a time as this, when there is as much need to keep this cause by it (which is most evidently at this time impugned by all the enemies of it) as there was to get it, what would become of all? Or if it should not be equally placed in him and the parliament, but yielded up at any time, it determines his power, either for doing the good he ought, or hindering parliaments from perpetuating themselves, or from imposing what religions they please on the consciences of men, or what government they please upon the nation; thereby subjecting us to dissettlement in every parliament, and to the desperate consequences thereof: and if the nation shall happen to fall into a blessed peace, how easily and certainly will their charge be taken off, and their forces be disbanded; and then where will the danger be to have the Militia thus stated?—What if I should say, if there should be a disproportion or disequality as to the power, it is on the other hand; and, if this be so, wherein have you had cause to quarrel? What demonstrations have you held forth to settle me to your opinion? I would you had made me so happy as to have let me have known your Grounds. I have made a free and ingenuous confession of my faith to you, and I could have wished it had been in your hearts to have agreed that some friendly and cordial debates might have been towards mutual conviction: was there none amongst you to move such a thing? No fitness to listen to it? No desire of a right understanding? If it be not folly in me to listen to town-talk, such things have been proposed and rejected with stiffness and severity, once and again; was it not likely to have been more advantageous to the good of this nation? I will say this to you for myself, and to that I have my conscience as a thousand witnesses, and I have my comfort and contentment in it; and I have the witness of divers here, that, I think, truly scorn to own me in a lye, that I would not have been averse to any alteration, of the good of which I might have been convinced, although I could not have agreed to the taking it off the foundation on which it stands, viz. the acceptation and consent of the people.—I will not presage what you have been about or doing in all this time, nor do I love to make conjectures; but I must tell you this, that as I undertook this government in the simplicity of my heart, and as before God, and to do the part of an honest man, and to be true to the interest which, in my conscience, is dear to many of you, (though it is not always understood what God in his wisdom may hide from us, as to Peace and Settlement) so I can say, that no particular interest, either of myself, estate, honour, or family, are, or have been, prevalent with me to this undertaking.—For if you had, upon the old government, offered to me this one, this one thing, (I speak, as thus advised, and before God, as having been

to this day of this opinion; and this hath been my constant judgment, well known to many that hear me speak) if this one thing had been inserted, this one thing that the government should have been placed in my family hereditarily, I would have rejected it; and I could have done no other, according to my present conscience and light; I will tell you my reason, though I cannot tell what God will do with me, nor you, nor the nation, for throwing away precious opportunities committed to us.—This hath been my principle, and I liked it when this government came first to be proposed to me, that it puts us off that hereditary way; well looking, that as God had declared what government he had delivered over to the Jews, and placed it upon such persons as had been instrumental for the conduct and deliverance of his people: and considering that promise in Isaiah, that God would 'give Rulers as at the first, and Judges as at the beginning,' I did not know but that God might begin; and though at present with a most unworthy person, yet, as to the future, it might be after this manner, and I thought this might usher it in. I am speaking as to my judgment against making it hereditary, to have men chosen for their love to God, and to truth and justice, and not to have it hereditary; for as it is in Ecclesiastes, 'Who knoweth whether he may beget a fool or a wise man,' honest or not? whatever they be, they must come in on that account, because the government is made a patrimony. And this I do perhaps declare with too much earnestness, as being my own concernment, and know not what place it may have in your hearts, and of the good people in the nation; but, however it be, I have comfort in this my truth and plainness. I have thus told you my thoughts, which, truly, I have declared to you in the fear of God, as knowing he will not be mocked; and in the strength of God, as knowing and rejoicing that I am kept in my speaking especially when I do not form or frame things without the compass of integrity and honesty, that my own conscience gives me not the lye to what I say; and then, in what I say, I can rejoice.—Now, to speak a Word or two to you: of that I must profess, in the name of the same Lord, and wish that there had been no cause that I should have thus spoken to you; and though I have told you that I came with joy the first time, with some regret the second, yet now I speak with most regret of all. I look upon you, as having among you many persons that I could lay down my life individually for; I could, through the grace of God, desire to lay down my life for you; so far am I from having an unkind or unchristian heart towards you in your particular capacities. I have this indeed as a work most incumbent upon me; I consulted what might be my duty in such a day as this, casting up all considerations. I must confess, as I told you, that I did think occasionally, this nation hath suffered extremely in the respects mentioned, as also in the disappointments of their expectations of that justice that was due to them by your sitting thus long; and what have you brought forth? I did not, nor cannot, apprehend what it is; I would be loath to call it a fate, that were too Paganish a word; but there was something in it that we have not in our expectations. I did think also, for myself, that I am like to meet with difficulties; and that this nation will not, as it is fit it should not, be deluded with pretexts of necessity in that great business of raising of Money: and were it not that I can make some dilemmas, upon which to resolve some things of my conscience, judgment, and actions, I should sink at the very prospect of my encounters; some of them are general, some are more special. Supposing this cause, or this business, must be carried on, it is either of God, or of man; if it be of man, I would I had never touched it with a finger. If I had not had a hope fixed in me that this cause, and this business, is of God, I would many years ago have run from it; if he of God, he will bear it up; if it be of man, it will tumble, as every thing that hath been of man since the world began hath done. And what are all our histories, and other traditions of actions in former times, but God manifesting himself, that he hath shaken and tumbled down, and trampled upon, every thing that he hath not planted? and as this is, so the All-wise God deal with it.—If this be of human structure and invention, and it be an old plotting and contrivance to bring things to this issue, and that they are not the births of Providence, then they will tumble: but if the Lord take pleasure in England, and if he will do us good, he is able to bear us up; let the difficulties be whatsoever they will, we shall, in his strength, be able to encounter with them. And, I bless God, I have been intred to difficulties, and I never found God failing when I trusted in him: I can laugh and sing in my heart when I speak of these things to you, or elsewhere. And though some may think it is an hard thing, without parliamentary authority, to raise money upon this nation; yet I have another argument to the good people of this nation, if they would be safe, and have no better principle; whether they prefer the having of their will, though it be their destruction, rather than comply with things of necessity? that will excuse me; but I should wrong my native country to suppose this. For I look at the people of these nations as the blessing of the Lord, and they are a people blessed by God. They have been so, and they will be so, by reason of that immortal seed which hath been and is among them, those regenerated ones in the land of several judgments who are all the flock of Christ, and lambs of Christ, though perhaps under many unruly passions and troubles of spirit, whereby they give disquiet to themselves and others; yet they are not so to God as to us; he is a God of other patience, and he will own the least of truth in the hearts of his people; and the people being the blessing of God, they will not be so angry but they will prefer their safety to their passions, and their real security to forms, when necessity calls for Supplies. Had they not well been acquainted with this principle, they had never seen this day of Gospel-Liberty.—But if any man shall object, It is an easy thing to talk of necessities, when men create necessities; would not the Lord Protector make himself great, and his family great? Doth not he make these necessities? And then he will come upon the people with this argument of necessity. This were something hard indeed; but I have not yet known what it is to make necessities, whatsoever the judgments or thoughts of men are. And I say this, not only to this assembly but to the world, that that man liveth not that can come to me and charge me that I have, in these great revolutions, made necessities; I challenge even all that fear God; and as God hath said, 'my Glory I will not give unto another;' let men take heed, and be twice advised, how they call his revolutions the things of God, and his working of things from one period to another, how, I say, they call them necessities of men's creation; for by so doing they do vilify and lessen the works of God, and rob him of his glory, which, he hath said, he 'will not give unto another,' nor suffer to be taken from him. We know what God did to Herod when he was applauded, and did not acknowledge God; and God knoweth what he will do with men when they shall call his revolutions human designs, and so detract from his glory, when they have not been forecast, but sudden providences in things, whereby carnal and worldly men are enraged; and under and at which many, I fear, (some good) have murmured and repined, because disappointed of their mistaken fancies: but still they have been the wise disposings of the Almighty, though instruments have had their passions and frailties; and I think it is an honour to God to acknowledge the necessities to have been of God's imposing, when truly they have been so, as indeed they have, when we take our sin in our actings to ourselves; and much more safe than to judge things so contingent as if there were not a God that ruled the earth. We know the Lord hath poured this nation from vessel to vessel, till he poured it into your lap, when you came first together: I am confident that it came so into your hands; and was not judged by you to be from counterfeited or feigned necessity, but by divine providence and dispensation. And this I speak with more earnestness, because I speak for God, and not for men; I would have any man to come and tell of the transactions that have been, and of those periods of time wherein God hath made these revolutions, and find where they can fix a feigned necessity. I could recite particulars, if either my strength would serve me to speak, or yours to hear; if that you would revolve the great Hand of God in his great dispensations, you would find that there is scarce a man that fell off at any period of time when God had any work to do, that can give God or his work, at this day, a good word. It was, say some, the cunning of the Lord Protector; I take it to myself: it was the craft of such a man, and his plot that hath brought it about: and, as they say in other countries, there are five or six cunning men in England that have skill, they do all these things: Oh what blasphemy is this! because men, that are without God in the world, and walk not with him, know not what it is to pray, or believe, and to receive returns from God, and to be spoken unto by the spirit of God, who speaks without a written word sometimes, yet according to it. God hath spoken heretofore in divers manner, let him speak as he pleaseth: hath he not given us liberty? Nay, is it not our duty to go to the law and to the testimony? And there we shall find that there have been impressions in extraordinary cases, as well without the written word as with it; and therefore there is no difference in the thing thus asserted from truths generally received, except we will exclude the Spirit, without whose concurrence all other teachings are ineffectual. He doth speak to the hearts and consciences of men, and leadeth them to his law and testimony; and there he speaks to them, and so gives them double teachings according to that of Job, 'God speaketh once, yea twice;' and that of David, 'God hath spoken once, yea twice have I heard this.' Those men that live upon their Mumpsimus and Sumpsimus, their masses and Service-Books, their dead and carnal worship, no marvel if they be strangers to God, and the works of God, and to spiritual dispensations. And because they say and believe thus, must we do so too? We in this land have been otherwise instructed, even by the Word, and works, and spirit of God. To say that men bring forth these things, when God doth them, judge you if God will bear this. I wish that every sober heart, though he hath had temptations upon him of deserting this cause of God, yet may take heed how he provokes, and falls into the hands of, the living God by such blasphemies as these, according to Hebrews, c. x. 'If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remains no more sacrifice for sin.' It was spoken to the Jews that, having professed Christ, apostatized from him: what then? nothing but 'a fearful falling into the hands of the living God.' They that shall attribute to this or that person the contrivances and production of those mighty things God hath wrought in the midst of us; and that they have not been the revolutions of Christ himself, upon whose shoulders the government is laid, they speak against God, and they fall under his hand without a mediator; that is, if we deny the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the glory of all his works in the world, by which he rules kingdoms, and doth administer, and is the rod of his strength, we provoke the mediator: and he may say, I will leave you to God, I will not intercede for you, let him tear you to pieces; I will leave thee to fall into God's hands; thou deniest me my sovereignty and power committed to me; I will not intercede nor mediate for thee, thou falliest into the hands of the living God: therefore whatsoever you may judge men for, and say, This man is cunning, and politic, and subtle; take heed again, I say, how you judge of his revolutions, as the products of men's inventions.—I may be thought to press too much upon this theme; but I pray God it may stick upon your hearts and mine. The worldly-minded man knows nothing of this, but is a stranger to it; and because of this, his atheisms and murmurings at instruments, yea, repining at God himself: and no wonder, considering the Lord hath done such things amongst us as have not been known in the world these thousand years; and yet, notwithstanding, is not owned by us.—There is another necessity which you have put upon us, and we have not sought. I appeal to God, angels, and men, if I shall raise Money according to the Article in the Government which had power to call you hither, and did; and, instead of seasonably providing for the Army, you have laboured to overthrow the Government, and the Army is now upon Free Quarter; and you would never so much as let me hear a tittle from you concerning it: where is the fault? has it not been as if you had a purpose to put this extremity upon us and the nation? I hope this was not in your minds, I am not willing to judge so; but this is the state unto which we are reduced. By the designs of some in the Army, who are now in custody, it was designed to get as many of them as could, (through discontent for want of money, the Army being in a barren country, near 30 weeks behind in pay, and upon other specious pretences) to march for England out of Scotland; and, in discontent, to seize their general there, a faithful and honest man, that so another might head the Army, and all this opportunity taken from your delays: whether will this be a thing of feigned necessity? what could it signify, but that the Army are in discontent already; and, we will make them live upon stones; we will make them cast off their governors and discipline; what can be said to this? I list not to unsaddle myself, and put the fault upon others backs: whether it hath been for the good of England, whilst men have been talking of this thing or the other, and pretending liberty, and many good words, whether it has been as it should have been? I am confident you cannot think it has, the nation will not think so. And, if the worst should be made of things, I know not what the Cornish men, or the Lincolnshire men, may think, or other counties; but I believe they will all think they are not safe. A temporary suspension of caring for the greatest liberties and privileges (if it were so, which is denied) would not have been of that damage, that the not providing against Free Quarter hath run the nation upon. And if it be my liberty to walk abroad in the fields, or to take a journey, yet it is not my wisdom to do so when my house is on fire.—I have troubled you with a long speech, and I believe it may not have the some resentment with all that it hath with some: but because that is unknown to me, I shall leave it to God, and conclude with this; That I think myself bound as in my duty to God and the people of these nations, to their safety and good in every respect, I think it my duty to tell you, That it is not for the profit of these nations, nor for common and public good, for you to continue here any longer; and therefore I do declare unto you, That I do dissolve this Parliament."

Ordinances passed by Cromwell and his Council.] Cromwell having now got rid of his Parliament, he and his Council applied themselves closely to the making of Laws without them. The first thing they did was to pass an Ordinance for laying an Assessment of 60,000*l.* per mensem for the maintenance of the Army and Navy; and another for enforcing the Acts and Ordinances made before the meeting of the last Parliament, touching the collecting of the Excise; besides which, some other Ordinances were also framed to soften the minds of the people, and reconcile them to the Protector's government, by lightening the burdens and inconveniences in the proceedings of the Law, and other matters.

A Plot against Cromwell defeated.] Feb. About this time, a Plot was discovered, which had been laid by the royalists, and was to have been executed in different parts of the kingdom at the same time: but being unsuccessful, it proved a lucky incident to Cromwell, by serving the more effectually to strengthen his usurpation: besides, it diverted the minds of the people from reflecting so warmly on the Protector's late actions, as they otherwise might have done. Upon the first information thereof he sent for the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London; and, acquainting them with the conspiracy against him, required them to take care of the peace of the city, for which purpose he gave them a commission to raise forces under major-gen. Skippon. He also issued a Proclamation for prohibiting Horse-Races for 6 months, lest the great concourse of people, usually frequenting such meetings, should furnish opportunities for raising fresh troubles in the Commonwealth; another, for putting in execution the Laws and Ordinances against Jesuits and Romish Priests, and for the speedy conviction of Popish Recusants; and a third, for commanding all persons, who had been of the late king's party, or his son's, to depart out of London and Westminster, and within 20 miles thereof, (unless it were their proper place of habitation) within 6 days after the publication of the said Proclamation.—Mr. Ludlow seems to blame the king of Scots, as he calls him, for engaging his friends in this desperate undertaking, which cost the lives of many, when he might see clearly his game was playing by the usurper, through the divisions he made amongst those whose interest it was to be united in opposition to the king. Cromwell, who spared no money to get intelligence of these designs, was before hand with the royalists, and seized upon many of them, ere they had time to draw together; others, that were up in arms, were discomfited and taken, and all the prisons in England were filled with them.

Cromwell appoints a number of Major-Generals to prevent Insurrections against his Government.] April. Now followed Executions upon Executions in different places; after which came Confiscations and other severe Penalties, exacted from the whole royal party; in which Cromwell broke through all their Compositions, and even the Act of Oblivion itself, in obtaining and passing of which he had so great a hand, when it was his interest to cajole the Cavalier Party: to this end, he and his Council passed an Ordinance for levying a tenth part of their Estates to maintain those extraordinary forces, which their turbulent and seditious practices obliged him to keep up; and, in order to put this detestable project in execution, he divided England into 12 Cantons, over each of which he placed a major-general, who was to have the inspection and government of inferior commissioners in every county, with orders to seize the persons and distrain the estates of such as should be refractory, and to put in execution such further directions as they should receive from him. This new tyrannous project of placing major-generals in each county, was first set on foot in the month of October this year; but they had not their Commissions to act by till the next month; when Instructions were given to them to take security of all who had been in arms for the king, for their peaceable demeanor and obedience to the Protector, as well as to exact from them the tenths aforementioned.

A New Parliament called.] July 1656. Nothing occurs worth our notice this year till July; on the 10th of which month, Writs were sealed and sent out, by order of the Lord-Protector in Council, for calling a new Parliament. In August the Elections were made throughout the three nations.

List of Cromwell's Third Parliament.] Lest the New Parliament should be as refractory as the last, Cromwell resolved to leave no means unattempted to pack together an assembly of men devoted to his own designs. In effecting this, his Major-Generals of Counties were highly serviceable; not only in procuring, by their influence and authority, themselves and their dependents, such as governors of castles and garrisons, colonels of regiments in the army, captains of county troops, civil officers, and relations of the Lord Protector, to be chosen; but also in preventing the election of many gentlemen of the best families and fortunes. Yet finding, nevertheless, that a great number of members of the last parliament, who had been the most resolute opposers of his measures, were returned to serve in the present; and apprehensive he should not, therefore, be able, by a legislative sanction, to ratify and establish his government, he determined that not a man should be permitted to sit in the house, without first producing a Certificate of his being approved by the Council of State. The following is a List of the Members of this Parliament :

Meeting of Cromwell's third Parliament. Sept. 17. The Lord Protector, attended by his Council, with the Officers of State and of the Army, the gentlemen of his household, and his guards, came to the Abbey-church, about 10 in the morning; where the members being met, a Sermon was preached before them by Dr. John Owen. After Sermon, the Lord Protector and the Parliament assembled in the Painted Chamber, where his highness was pleased to communicate to them the occasion of their meeting. We have not been able to meet with Cromwell's Speech on this occasion; nor is there the least sketch of it in the Journals, or the contemporary Writers.

Several Members denied Admittance into the House.] His Highness having finished his harangue, the members repaired to their house; where several persons, by the Lord Protector's appointment, attended at the door, to receive of each member the following Certificate, before he was permitted to enter:—'Sept. 17, 1656. County of ———, These are to certify, That A. B. is returned, by Indenture, one of the knights to serve in this present parliament for the said county, and is approved by his highness's Council. Nath. Taylor, Clerk of the Commonwealth in Chancery.'—Such of the members as produced their passport from the Council, having taken their seats in the house, the lord commissioner Lisle put them in mind, That their first work was to chuse a Speaker; and proposed sir Tho. Widdrington, serjeant at law, as a person of great integrity and experience, in relation to parliamentary business, and every way qualified for that service: which being approved of, he took the chair accordingly.

The secluded Members prefer a Letter of Complaint to the Speaker.] Sept. 18. Sir George Booth presented a Letter, directed to the Speaker, which he was ordered to read privately first; and, afterwards, it was read openly, in these words:

"Sir; We whose Names are subscribed, with others, being chosen, and accordingly returned, to serve with you in this parliament; and, in discharge of our trust, offering to go into the house, were, at the lobby door, kept back by soldiers: which, lest we should be wanting in our duty to you and to our country, we have thought it expedient to represent unto you, to be communicated to the house, that we may be admitted thereinto."

On the reading of this it was ordered, That the Clerk of the Commonwealth in Chancery be commanded to attend the house the next morning, with all the Indentures of returns of knights, citizens, and burgesses chosen to serve in this parliament, when they would take this business into farther consideration.

Sept. 19. The deputy-clerk of the Commonwealth attending at the door, he was called in; and the Speaker demanded of him, 'Where the Clerk of the Commonwealth was?' to which he answered, 'That he was at his house out of town when the warrant came; that he expected him that morning, and so did not send for him, but that he did not come.' Being asked, 'Whether he had all the Indentures with him for England and Wales?' He answered, 'Yes:' and, by command of the Speaker, produced that for the election in Norfolk, and read it; in which was returned sir Ralph Hare. Being asked, 'Why that gentleman was not returned to parliament?' He said, 'Because he had no Certificate of Approbation for him;' and gave the like Answers as to all the rest of the members, who had been refused admittance into the house. The deputy-clerk being withdrawn, the Speaker informed the house, That he had called over all the places for whom any person was chosen, whose name was subscribed to the foregoing Letter, and found them all to have been returned in the respective Indentures.—Soon after the Clerk of the Commonwealth, himself, attended the house, when the Speaker acquainted him, 'That, upon perusal of the Indentures, it appeared that divers persons elected were not returned to the house: and demanding, 'By what Order it was not done?' He answered, 'That he received an Order from his Highness's Council, to deliver Tickets to all such persons, and such only, as, being returned to serve in parliament, should be certified unto him, from the Council, as persons by them approved: and that he did receive several Orders of Approbation for several persons, and made out the Tickets accordingly.' Being asked, 'If he had the Order itself?' After some evasion he produced it, subscribed by Mr. Jessop, clerk of the council; which was read. And then the house adjourned till the next morning; when, the debate being resumed, it was resolved, 'That the Council be desired to give, on the Monday next, their Reasons why those members, returned from the several counties and boroughs, were not approved, and why they were not admitted to come into the house.' In Answer to which request, on the 22d, the lord commissioner Fiennes reported, by word of mouth, from the Council, That he was commanded by them to return this humble reply: 'That whereas, by the 21st Article of The Government, the Clerk of the Chancery was required to certify the Names of the persons returned to him, and the places for which they were chosen, unto the Council, who were authorized to peruse the said returns, and examine whether the persons so elected and returned were agreeable to the Qualifications therein prescribed, and not disabled thereby; and that no persons should be admitted to sit in parliament, but what were so approved of by the major part of the Council: and that whereas, by the 17th Article, it was declared, That the persons to be elected to serve in parliament should be such, and no other than such, as were persons of known integrity, fearing God, and of good conversation; That the Council, in pursuance of their duty, and according to the trust reposed in them, had examined the said returns; and had not refused to approve any who appeared to them to be within the description of the said Article: and as to those who were not approved, his highness had given orders to some persons to take care that they should not come into the house.' A motion being then made to adjourn till the next morning, it was carried in the negative by 115 against 80. And then it was resolved, by a majority of 125 against 29 only, 'That the persons returned from the several counties, cities, and boroughs, who have not been approved, be referred to make their application to the Council for approbation; and that the house do proceed with the great affairs of the nation.'

This last question being carried by so great a majority, sufficiently shews what influence the Protector had in this Assembly: however, the secluded Members did not rest satisfied with this arbitrary Vote; for they published a spirited Remonstrance against this outrageous act of injustice. A copy of the Remonstrance will be found in Whitlocke. The persons who subscribed it, were, Arthur Haslerig, Tho. Scott, John Bulkley, John Birch, Geo. Fenwick, Anth. Irby, Tho. Lister, Tho. Birch, Tho. Adams, Tho. Saunders, Henry Darley, John Weaver, Alex. Popham, John Goodwyn, Francis Thorpe, Anth. Ashley Cooper, John Southby, Rd. Grenville, Rd. Browne, Rd. Darley, Tho. St. Nicholas, Wm. James, John Boys, Ch. Hall, John Jones, Wm. Woolley, Rd. Radcliffe, Wm. Savile, Theophilus Biddulph, Henry Mildmay, Harbottle Grimston, Wm. Welby, Ch. Hussey, Ed. Harley, Clement Throckmorton, Daniel Wall, Henry North, Rd. Lucy, John Wittewrong, Geo. Courthorpe, Samuel Got, J. Buckland, Robert Long, J. Northcott, J. Young, J. Dodderidge, Henry Hungerford, Salisbury, Edw. Tooker, Wm. Morris, J. Hele, Edw. Turner, Chaloner Chute, Daniel Shatterden, Tho. Styles, Rd. Beale, John Selliard, Walter Moyle, Walter Vincent, J. Gell, Hen. Arthington, Henry Tempest, J. Clavering, J. Stanhope, Peniston Whaley, Abel Barker, Samuel Moore, Tho. Minors, J. Bowyer, Sam. Jones, J. Aston, Andrew Lloyd, Edw. Hooper, Tho. Rivers, Henry Peckham, Ch. Lloyd, J. Thurbarne, Wm. Fisher, J. Gore, Rowland Litton.—Animated by this Remonstrance, and resenting the infamous behaviour of a packed majority, so many members, ashamed of their companions, left the house, that, in order to save appearances, it was resolved, on the 29th, 'That all persons who had been returned to serve in this parliament, and had been, or might be, approved by the council, should give their attendance within 7 days.' As to those who had been excluded for want of such approbation, no farther notice was taken of them: but the rest proceeded to appoint Committees on public Business: and a Bill was brought in, intitled, 'An Act for the Security of his Highness the Lord Protector's Person.' On the 26th the Bill 'for renouncing and annulling the pretended Title of Charles Stuart, &c.' was passed. It was ordered at the same time, That the Lord Protector's assent be desired to this Bill. Lastly, a committee was appointed to consider of the way of Address to his Highness, with Bills, and report it to the house.

Oct. 2. This day Letters from the admirals Blake and Montague, to the Protector, were communicated to the house, giving intelligence of a considerable Victory over the Spanish West-India Fleet, and of the taking of several of their ships. On which news a day of Thanksgiving was appointed by the house, to bless God for his great mercies on this Occasion.

Nov. 27. Several Bills being now ready for the Lord Protector's assent, a committee was appointed to wait upon him, and desire to know the time when he would please to have them presented to him for that purpose. His highness appointed 10 that morning in the Painted-Chamber; but before the house went up thither, they thought proper to read another Bill 3 times, and pass it; which was, 'That his Highness's passing of Bills should not be any determination of this Session of Parliament.' They also ordered, 'That this Bill be the first that should be presented to his highness for his consent.' It was so done; and accordingly stands first in the Acts of this Session.*

Dec. The parliament now proceeded upon other Bills, both public and private; amongst which was carried on, in a committee of the whole house, a Bill for uniting the kingdoms of England and Scotland into one Commonwealth.

Proceedings against James Naylor the Qua-

ker.] The beginning of this month James Naylor, styled, by the Diaries of these times, 'The Quakers Apostle,' was brought up from Bristol, and several of his female followers along with him. On the 6th, he was brought to the bar of the house; where, keeping on his hat, the serjeant, by command of the Speaker, took it off. Being asked, If his name was James Naylor; answered, He was so called: and being also asked, How long he had been called so; answered, Ever since he could remember. The particulars of his Confession being read to him, and asked if it was his, he acknowledged it all. The next day, on debate, the house voted him guilty of horrid Blasphemy; that he was a grand Impostor, and a great Seducer of the People. But after this the parliament seemed to be under some dilemma what punishment to inflict upon him, for it was debated several days, without coming to a conclusion; till, on the 16th the question being put, That the Punishment of James Naylor, for his crimes, shall be by death, and that a bill be brought in for that purpose, it passed in the negative, by 96 against 82. Then a motion being made, That part of his punishment be to have his hair cut off, it passed in the negative, without division. After which the house came to the following Resolution: "That James Naylor be set on the pillory, with his head in the pillory, in the New-Palace, Westminster, during the space of two hours, on Thursday next; and shall be whipped by the hangman through the streets, from Westminster to the Old-Exchange, London; and there likewise be set upon the pillory, with his head in the pillory, for the space of two hours, between the hours of 11 and 1, on Saturday next; in each of the said places wearing a Paper containing an inscription of his crimes: and that at the Old Exchange his tongue shall be bored through with a hot iron; and that he be there also stigmatized in the forehead with the letter B. That he be afterwards sent to Bristol, and conveyed into and through the said city, on a horse bare ridged, with his face backward; and there also publicly whipped the next market-day after he comes thither: that from thence he be committed to prison in Bridewell, London, and there restrained from the society of all people, and kept to hard labour, till he shall be released by parliament; and during that time be debarred from the use of pen, ink, and paper, and shall have no relief, but what he earns by his daily labour."*—The next

* Upon this occasion there was published, by Authority of the Parliament, the following Paper, intitled, 'A brief Account of James Naylor, the Quaker; and the uttering of many horrible Blasphemies, the like, for all Circumstances, never heard of in any Age before, with the Judgment pronounced upon him by Mr. Speaker, he being brought to the Bar in the Commons House, for those high Crimes whereof he had been guilty, Dec. 17, 1656.' At the top of this Sheet is a Print day James Naylor being brought up to receive his Sentence, a motion was made, that he might be asked, Whether he had any thing to offer why judgment should not be passed upon him? it passed in the negative, by 107 against 85.

A Thanksgiving Day for the Discovery of Syndercombe's Plot.] Jan. 19. Secretary Thurloe made a Relation of a wicked Design to take away the Lord Protector's Life, and fire Whitehall; and read the Examination of divers persons concerned in the said Plot, taken before the Council: for the happy and timely discovery hereof the parliament ordered a Day of Thanksgiving. A Declaration, by way of Narrative of this dangerous Conspiracy, was ordered to be drawn up and published; wherein the ministers were enjoined, on all occasions for the future, to pray 'for the Lord Protector, and all that are in Authority in this Commonwealth.' The parliament also voted their Thanks to Secretary Thurloe, for his great diligence in tracing out this Plot*; and resolved to congratulate the Lord Protector upon his happy escape; which was done by the whole house, with the Speaker at their head.

The Parliament dine with the Lord Protector.] Feb. 18. The Speaker acquainted the house, That the Lord Protector had invited all the Members to dine with him, at the Banqueting-House in Whitehall, the next day, being the public Thanksgiving. The parliament accepted the invitation; when, as our Authority expresses it,† "The Lord Protector gave them a most Princely Entertainment, attended with rare music, both of instruments and voices."

engraved by Hollar, representing the manner of Naylor's sentence being put in execution. Then follows the Account itself, in hæc verba: "James Naylor, the Quaker, having been released out of Exeter goal, he began immediately to play his pranks at divers places in the West; among the rest, he passed by Wells and Glastonbury, through which towns he rode on horseback, a man going bare before him, and others walking on foot on each side of his stirrup, and others strewing their garments in the way; from thence he took his way towards Bristol, and coming to a little village called Bedminster, about a mile from Bristol, he rode through that place likewise, a young man bare-headed leading his horse by the bridle, and another man before with his hat on. There accompanied him two men, with each a woman behind him on horseback; which women alighted when they came to the suburbs of Bristol, and footed it along on each side of Naylor's horse, the man still bare-headed leading the horse; and as they advanced along they sung, and entered Bristol singing, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Israel;' and then the women led the horse with the reins in their hands, up to the high-cross of Bristol, and from thence to the White-Hart inn in Broad street. The magistrates sending for Naylor and his companions they came singing all the way 'Hosannah;' and 'Holy, Holy, Holy, &c.' His name that went bare before him was Timothy Wedlock, a Devonshire man. The one woman was named Martha Symonds, wife of Thomas Symonds, stationer of London; the other Hannah Stranger, wife of John Stranger, of London, comb-maker. The magistrates having convened Naylor and the rest, divers strange blasphemous Letters and Papers were found about them, wherein it appeared, that this deceiver had so far gained upon his followers by his impostures, that they ascribed to him divine honours, and gave him in Scripture phrase the same titles which are applicable to none but Christ himself. In a Letter of one Richard Fairman, from Dorchester goal, to Naylor, were these horrid expressions, 'I am filled with joy and rejoicing when I behold thee in the eternal unity. O my soul is melting within me, when I behold thy beauty and innocence, dear and precious son of Zion, whose mother is a virgin, and whose birth is immortal.' Another writes of him thus, 'All the wise men shall seek for him, and when they have found him, they shall open their ears, and shall give unto him of their gold, frankincense, and myrrh.' The same woman, in another letter to him, proceeds thus, 'O thou fairest of ten thousand; thou only begotten son of God, how my heart panteth after thee, O stay me with flagons, and comfort me with wine. My well-beloved, thou art like a roe, or young hart, upon the mountains of spices.' Then by way of Postscript, her husband, John Stranger, adds this, 'Thy name is no more to be called James but Jesus.' Also a maid named Dorcas Erbury, being examined, declared James Naylor, to be the Holy one of Israel, the only begotten son of God; and that she pulled off his stockings, and put her cloaths under his feet, because he was the Holy Lord of Israel, and that she knew no other Saviour but him; affirming moreover, That the Spirit of the Lord within her commanded her to call him lord and master, and to serve him: That, in Exeter goal, he had raised her from the dead after she had been dead two days; and that James Naylor shall sit at the right hand of the Father, and judge the world. Thus you see how this wretched Impostor hath prevailed upon his followers, to bewitch them to the committing of strange absurdities. An account whereof I had hitherto forbore, but have now given it in brief, that the honour and justice of the Parliaments Sentence passed upon him, may be evident to the people."

* It was called Syndercombe's Plot, which is taken notice of by most of our historians. This man was found dead in his bed the morning before his intended execution.

at this time, and the discomposure of men's minds, with the ill aspect these had upon foreign princes, trade and commerce, moved, that the Lord Protector might be desired to assume the Title of King, as the best known and most agreeable kind of government to the English people: he then presented to the Speaker a Paper, declaring it to be somewhat come to his hand, tending to the Settlement of the nation and of liberty and property, which he desired might be received and read.* This motion occasioned a great debate; but, at length, it was resolved in the affirmative, by a majority of 144 against 54, and the Paper was read accordingly, intituled, 'The humble Address and Remonstrance of the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses now assembled in the Parliament of this Commonwealth.† The next day, the debate was resumed; when it was resolved, on a division of 100 against 44, that the said Remonstrance be read in parts, beginning at the first Article after the preamble. It was also ordered, 'That all the members should constantly attend the service of the house, and not depart without leave: and the 25th was appointed to be set apart to seek the Lord for his direction in this important business.'

The Speaker presents to the Lord Protector the Parliament's Reasons for desiring him to assume the Title of King.] March 26. The Address and Remonstrance engaged the attention of the parliament almost every day this month. This day, they resolved to give it a new and more moderate name, by styling it only 'The humble Petition and Advice,' &c. The next day, It was ordered that the Speaker, attended by all the members, should present it to the Lord Protector; and, at the same time, shew the Grounds and Reasons inducing them to offer it. Then a committee was appointed to acquaint him, That the house having occasion to wait upon him, on some important affairs, they desired he would name a time and place for that purpose. The 31st being appointed accordingly, at the Banqueting-House, Whitehall, the Speaker and the whole house went up thither with their Petition; where the

He is charged, by Historians, with embezzling the Charity-Money collected for the relief of the poor Protestants in Piedmont; and also with being several thousand pounds in arrear to the Excise, in which office he was a commissioner. It is added, That all these sins were forgiven him by Cromwell, in consideration of his undertaking to make this bold Proposal to the House. Heath's Chronicle, p. 386.

Lord Protector, attended by the president of the council, and other officers of state, were assembled. After a learned Speech made to his highness by Mr. Speaker, he presented, in the name of the parliament, the said humble Petition and Advice: which was read by Henry Scobell, esq. the clerk: and that being done, his highness gave Answer thereto to this effect * * * . Thus far the Journals: but they leave us at a loss as to the result of this meeting. The hiatus, however, is, in some measure supplied by one of the Diaries of these times, which informs us, "That the Speaker took this occasion to commend the title and office of a King, in this nation, for several reasons; as that a king first settled Christianity in this Island: that the title had been long received and approved by our ancestors, who, by experience, found it to be consistent with their liberties: that it was a title best known to our laws, most agreeable to our constitution, and to the temper of the English people: and that these things be made evident, at large, by divers grave and weighty arguments. Afterwards he proceeded to open the sense of the parliament upon the several other particulars contained in that writing, which they came to present to his highness, in order to the Settlement of the three nations."

Cromwell desires time to seek God for Counsel thereupon.] In return to this the Lord Protector, after an engrossed copy of the Petition had been presented to him, was pleased to deliver himself in a Speech, expressing very much of piety, gravity, and good affection to the parliament and people of these nations. He observed, that the welfare, peace, and settlement of three nations, and all the rich treasure of the best people of the world being involved therein, it ought to beget in him the greatest reverence and fear of God, that ever possessed any man upon earth; with several other expressions intimating his fear and reverence before the Almighty, upon this so great and solemn an occasion. That among all the burdens which God had laid upon him, he, to his comfort, had found the good hand of God assisting him, when he knew not which way to stand under their weight, but by looking up to his good pleasure contained therein. That, before he came to any resolution, his intent was, first, to seek God, who had been his guide hitherto, to have an Answer put into his heart. That if he should enter upon such a work as this without due consideration, to please humours that are of this world; without seeking such an Answer from God as might prove a blessing to the person used, and make up the noble, worthy, and honest intentions of those that had prepared and effected the work, it would seem to proceed from lust and arguments of self; and that, should his motives be such, the issue might prove sad to them and the three nations, who, he believed, intended well in this business; and had none but honest and sincere ends therein, as the glory of God, the good of the people, and the rights of these nations. That therefore, since they had made such a progress in the work, he desired some short time to ask counsel of God and his own heart: and he hoped that neither the humours of any weak or unwise people, nor the desires of any who might have a lusting after things that were not good, should steer him to any other Answer but what might be ingenuous, and for the good of those that he and they served, and were made to serve. And concluded, That as the thing well deserved the utmost deliberation, so he should think himself bound to give as speedy an Answer as he could."—These, says our Journalist, are only some short heads of what was much more copiously and elegantly spoken, by his highness, to the parliament, with that majesty and authority, which appeared most eminent in all his public actions; in the repetition whereof he had only to crave pardon, lest he had been injurious to the dignity of so wise and so serene a person.

April 3. The Lord Protector sent a Letter to the Speaker, desiring the house to appoint a committee to attend him that day at Whitehall; which being done accordingly, on the next, the lord-commissioner Whitlocke reported from them, That they had waited on his Highness, according to the order of the house, and that he expressed himself to the committee to this effect:

"My lords; I am heartily sorry I did not make my desires known to the parliament before this time, which was, That I acquainted you with by letter this day. The reason was, because some infirmity of body had seized upon me these two last days. I have, as well as I could, taken consideration of the things contained in this Paper, which was presented to me by the parliament, and have sought God that I might return such an Answer as might become me, and be worthy of the parliament. I must needs bear this testimony to you, that you have been zealous of the two greatest concerns that God hath in the world; the one is that of Religion, and preservation of the professors of it; to give them all due and just liberty, and to assert the truths of God, which you have done in part in this Paper, and do refer them to be done more fully by yourselves and me. And as to the liberty of men professing godliness under the variety of forms amongst us, you have done that which was never done before; and I pray God it may not fall upon the people of God, as a fault in them, or any sort of them, if they do not put such a value on what was done, as was never put on any thing since Christ's time, for such a Catholic interest of the people of God. The other thing cared for is the Civil Liberty and the interest of the nation; which though it is, and I think ought to be, subordinate to a more peculiar interest of God, yet it is the next best that God hath given men in the world; and, if well, is better than any words to fence men in their other interests: and if any one whatsoever think the interest of the nation and the interest of the people of God inconsistent, I wish my soul may not enter into his and their secrets. These are things I must acknowledge Christian and honourable, and are provided for by you like Christian men, and men of honour, and, like yourselves, Englishmen: and to this I must and shall bear my testimony whilst I live, against all gainsayers whatsoever. And upon these two interests, if God shall count me worthy, I shall live and die; and I must say, if I were to give an account before a greater tribunal than an earthly one, and if I were asked why I have engaged all along in the late wars, I could give none; but it would be a wicked one if it did not comprehend these two ends. Only give me leave to say, and to say it seriously, the issue will prove it so, that you have one or two considerations that do stick with me; the one is, you have named me by another Title than I now bear. You do necessitate my Answer to be categorical, and you have made me without a liberty of choice; save, as to all, I question not your wisdom in doing of it, but I think myself obliged to acquiesce in your determination, knowing you are men of wisdom, and considering the trust you are under. It is a duty not to question reasons of any thing you have done. I should be very brutish should I not acknowledge the exceeding high honour and respect you have had for me in this Paper. Truly, according to what the world calls good, and hath all good in it, according to the world's comprehension, sovereign power, you have testified your value and affection, as to my person, as high as you could, more you could not do; I hope I shall always keep a grateful memory of this in my heart, and by you I will give the parliament this my grateful acknowledgement. Whatever other men's thoughts may be, I shall not know ingratitude: but I must needs say, That what may be fit for you to do, may not be fit for me to undertake. As I should reckon it a very great presumption, should I ask of you the reason of doing any one thing in this Paper, except some very few things, the Instrument bears witness to itself: so you will not take it unkindly, if I ask of you this addition of the parliament's favour, love, and indulgence to me, if it be taken in tender part, if I give such an Answer as I find in my heart to give in this business, without urging many reasons for it, saving such as are most obvious and most for my advantage in answering; to wit, I am unable for such a trust and charge; and if the answer of the tongue, as well as the preparation of the heart be from God, I must say my heart and thoughts, ever since I heard the parliament's, were upon this business. Though I could not take notice of your proceedings therein, without breach of your privileges, yet as a common person, I confess I heard of it as in common with others. I must say, I have been able to attain no further than this, that seeing the way is hedged up, as it is to me, I cannot accept of the things offered, unless I accept all. I have not been able to find it in my duty to God and you, to undertake this charge under that Title. The most I said in commendation of the Instrument, may be returned upon me thus: are there such good things so well provided for, why can you not accept? Because of such an ingredient. Nothing must make a man's conscience his servant; and really and sincerely it is my conscience that guides me to this Answer; and, if the parliament be so resolved, it will not be fit for me to use any inducements by you to alter their resolutions. This is all I have to say; I hope it will, and desire it may, be candidly, and with integrity and ingenuity, represented by you to them."

April 4. The house resumed the debate on this matter; and a question being proposed, That this house doth adhere to their humble Petition and Advice, presented to his Highness, it was resolved in the affirmative, by a majority of 78 against 65.

The House appoint a Committee to wait on Cromwell for his Answer: but he desires further Time.] April 7. The debate was renewed; when we find that the house still adhered to their last Vote, and appointed another, and a more numerous, Committee to attend the Lord Protector with the following Resolution: "That the parliament having lately presented their humble Petition and Advice to his Highness, whereunto they had not as yet received satisfaction; and the matters contained in that Petition and Advice being agreed upon by the Great Council and Representative of the three nations; and which, in their judgments, were most conducing to the good of the people thereof, both in their spiritual and civil concerns; they therefore thought fit to adhere thereto, and to put his Highness in mind of the great obligation which rested upon him, in respect of that Advice; and again to desire him to give his assent thereunto."

April 8. The parliament, in a body, attended the Lord Protector at Whitehall, when the Speaker presented to him the foregoing Resolution. To which his Highness replied:

"Mr. Speaker; No man can put a greater value than I hope I do, and shall do, upon the desires and advices of the parliament. I could in my own heart aggravate both concerning the persons advising, and concerning the advice; readily acknowledging, that it is the advice of the parliament of these three nations: and if a man could suppose it were not a parliament to some, yet doubtless it should be to me, and to us all that are engaged in this common cause, wherein we have engaged. I say, surely it ought to be a parliament to us, because it arises as a result of those issues and determinations of Settlement that we have laboured to arrive at; and therefore I do most readily acknowledge the authority of advising these things. I can aggravate also to myself the general notion of the things advised to, as being things that tend to the Settlement of the chiefest things that can fall into the hearts of men to desire, or endeavour after; and at such a time when, truly, I may think the nation is big with expectation of any thing that may add to their being: I therefore must needs put a very high esteem, and have a very reverend opinion of any thing that comes from you, and so I have had of this Instrument; and I hope so I have expressed: and what I have expressed hath been, if I flatter not myself, from a very honest heart toward the parliament and the public. I say not these things to compliment you; for we are all past those things, all considerations of that kind. We must all be very real now, if ever we will be so; for, howbeit, your title and name you give to this Paper makes me to think you intended advice, and I should transgress against all reason, should I make any other construction than that you did intend Advice. I would not lay a burden on my beast, but I would consider his strength to bear it; and if you will lay a burden upon a man that is conscious of his own infirmity and disabilities, and doth make some measure of counsels that may seem to come from heaven, counsels in the word of God, who leaves room for charity, and for men to consider their own strength, I hope it will be no evil in me to measure your advice and my own infirmities, and truly those will have some influence upon conscience; conscience in him that receives talents to know how he may answer the trust of them; and such a conscience have I had, and still have; and therefore, when I thought I had an opportunity to make an Answer, I made that Answer; and am a person, and have been before, and then, and since, lifting my heart to God, to know what might be my duty at such a time as this, and upon such an occasion and trial as this was to me.—Truly Mr. Speaker, it hath been heretofore, I think, a matter of philosophical discourse, that great places, great authority are a great burden. I know it is so; and I know a man, that is convinced in his conscience, nothing less will enable him to the discharge of it than assistance from above; that it may very well require in such a subject, so convinced, and so persuaded, to be right with the Lord in such an undertaking; and therefore, to speak very clearly and plainly to you, I had, and I have, my hesitations to that individual thing; if I undertake any thing not in faith, I shall serve you in my own unbelief, and I shall then be the most unprofitable servant that ever people or nation had. Give me leave therefore to ask counsel: I am ready to render a reason of my apprehensions, which haply may be over-swayed by better apprehensions. I think so far I have deserved no blame, nor do I take it that you will lay any upon me, only you mind me of the duty that is incumbent upon me. Truly, the same Answer, I have as to the point of duty one way, the same consideration have I as to duty another way. I would not urge to you the point of liberty; surely you have provided for liberty; I have borne my witness to it, civil and spiritual. The greatest provision that ever was made, have you made; and I know that you do not intend to exclude me. The liberty I ask is to vent my own doubts, and my own fears, and my scruples; though haply, in such cases as these are, the world hath judged that a man's conscience ought to know no scruple; surely mine doth, and I dare not dissemble; and therefore, they that are knowing in the ground of their own action, will be best able to measure advice to others. There are many things in this government, besides that one of the name and title, that deserve much information as to my judgment; it is you that can capacitate me to receive satisfaction in them, otherwise, I say truly, I must say that I am not persuaded to the performance of my trust and duty, nor informed, and so not acted, as I know you intend I should, and every man in the nation should, and you have provided for them as a freeman, as a man that does possibly, rationally, and conscientiously; and therefore I cannot tell what other return to make to you than this; I am ready to give a reason, if you will, I say, capacitate me to give it, and yourselves to receive it, and to do in other things that may inform me a little more particularly than this Vote that you have expressed yesterday, and has now been read by you to me. Truly, I hope, when I understand the ground of these things, the whole being neither for your good nor mine, but for the good of the nation, there will be no doubt but we may, even in these particulars, find out those things that may answer our duty, mine and all our duties, to those whom we serve: and this is that that I do, with a great deal of affection, and honour, and respect, offer now to you."

A Committee appointed to receive the Lord Protector's Scruples.] Apr. 9. The Speaker having reported the transactions of the foregoing day, it was resolved, "That a Committee be appointed to wait on the Lord Protector, and to receive from his highness his Doubts and Scruples touching any of the particulars contained in the humble Petition and Advice; and, in Answer thereunto, to offer to his Highness Reasons for his satisfaction, and for the maintenance of the Resolutions of the house: and such particulars as they could not satisfy his Highness in, to report to the parliament."—In pursuance of this Order, the Committee waited on the Lord Protector, but were put off, from day to day, on account of an indisposition of health and by reason of a new Plot just then discovered against him*; so that it was not till the 16th that they were admitted to an audience. The principal Speakers on this occasion were the two chief justices, Glynne and St. John, Mr. Whitlocke, Mr. Lisle and Mr. Nath. Fiennes, Commissioners of the Great Seal, lord Broghill, Mr. Lenthall, master of the rolls, sir Ch. Wolseley, sir R. Onslow, and col. Philip Jones.—The Arguments offered by this committee, with the Protector's Answers, were printed at this time; they were also reprinted in April, 1660, upon the then approaching restitution of monarchy; though extremely curious, they are, however, too extensive for our purpose.

The Lord Protector desires yet further Time to consider of an Answer.] April 17. The lord commissioner Whitlocke reported to the house, that yesterday afternoon was spent by the Committee, in giving Reasons to his Highness for his Satisfaction; which his Highness declared to be so weighty as to require mature deliberation; that therefore he could not then come to a final resolution as to the acceptance or non-acceptance of the Title proposed to him.—In consequence of this report, the house adjourned for 3 days, to give time for the committee to wait upon the Protector again; but his Highness happening to be sick the very day they waited upon him, it was not till the 20th that they were admitted to an audience, which was then put off to the next day; when,

'ance and Hope.' The device of their standard, which was brought into the house by the Secretary, was a Lion Couchant, gules, in a field argent; with this motto, 'Who shall rouse him up?' One of the persons that had been apprehended on this occasion, being asked by the Speaker, What was meant by this Lion? answered, "The Lion of the Tribe of Judah." This Standard they stiled 'The Banner that God had given to his poor scattered People.' They invited all of their opinion to gather together into one, and to be united in the work; intending, with sword in hand, according to their light and apprehension of things, (as they declared in print) to give their judgment, in respect of power, laws, government, exercise of magistracy, administration of justice, rights and privileges. And how they intended to do this, they set forth in these several Particulars, viz: 1. By executing vengeance upon the Beast and the false Prophet, the kings of the earth and their armies, and all the inhabitants and powers of Babylon; which name they fastened upon all powers beside their own. 2. By placing the Supreme Legislative Power in Christ. 3. By erecting a Sanhedrim, (as they called it) or a Supreme Council of men, to be chosen by themselves, to be the representative of the whole body of the Saints, on the behalf of Christ, whose day they said, was now come; and therefore that they were to act as princes under Christ, and to govern according to their light. * This was an intended insurrection of the Fifth Monarchy-Men, headed by major-general Harrison, col. Rich, maj. Danvers, and vice-admiral Lawson, who were taken into custody of the serjeant at arms; and for the discovery of this plot, secretary Thurloe received the parliament's thanks. This new Sect of Enthusiasts called themselves 'The Remnant who had waited for the blessed Appear-as the Journals inform us, he spoke something to them as to what had been before offered, and gave them a Paper containing several Scruples as to the matter of their Petition and Advice.—This paper it is not in our power to supply. The principal objection was the title of King; against which Cromwell urged, ‘That all the good purposes of government might be as fully answered under that of Protector.’

The Committee wait upon the Protector again, for a Definitive Answer.] April 23. The lord-commissioner Whitlocke made a report of the said Conference, and the house voted their approbation of the proceedings of the committee therein.—The rest of this month was almost wholly spent by the parliament, in canvassing their humble Petition and Advice, without hearing any further from the Lord Protector on that subject: insomuch that, on the 30th, the Committee was ordered to wait upon him with their several Resolutions touching that matter, and to desire his Highness to appoint a time when the house might attend on him for his positive Answer. In consequence hereof, the 1st of May was appointed for that purpose, and afterwards the 6th; then the 7th, at 11 in the morning, which was again deferred to 5 that afternoon; when the Committee having attended the Lord Protector once more, he only excused himself for making them stay so long, and desired them to give him another meeting the next morning.

A Petition from several Officers of the Army, against Cromwell's being made King.] May 8. The lord-commissioner Whitlocke reported, That his Highness desired the parliament to meet him, presently, in the Banqueting-House at Whitehall.—But, before they could come to any resolution thereupon, an affair happened which put an end to all Cromwell's farther evasions, and determined him to give a definitive Answer: for the Journals acquaint us, That the house being informed divers Officers of the Army were at the door with a petition, they were called in. But no mention being made, in those authorities, of the contents of this Paper, we shall supply the deficiency from Mr. Ludlow, who writes, “That some Officers of the Army, disgusted at the proceedings of the parliament, came to the door of the house; and sent in a message to gen. Desborough, signifying, That they had a Petition, which they desired him to present to the Speaker: but he knowing the contents of it, and conceiving it unfit for him to take public notice of it before it was presented, only acquainted the house, That certain Officers of the Army had a petition to present to them: and every one supposing that the sentiments of these Officers were conformable to their own, Cromwell's party concluding that none of the Army durst appear for the crossing his design, it was generally agreed that they should be called in, and have leave to present their Petition with their own hands. Lieut. col. Mason was chosen by the rest of the officers, to deliver it; which when he had done, and the officers were withdrawn, the same was read to this effect: ‘That they had hazarded their lives against monarchy, and were still ready so to do, in defence of the liberties of their country: that having observed, in some men, great endeavours to bring the nation again under their old servitude, by pressing their general to take upon him the title and government of a King, in order to destroy him, and weaken the hands of those who were faithful to the public; they therefore humbly desired the house to discountenance all such persons and endeavours, and continue steadfast to the old cause, for the preservation of which they, for their parts, were most ready to lay down their lives.’ This Petition was subscribed by 2 colonels, 7 lieut. colonels, 8 majors, and 16 captains, who, with such officers in the house as were of the same opinion, made up the majority of those which was then quartered about the town. It was difficult to determine whether the house or Cromwell were most surprised at this unexpected Address; but, certainly, both were infinitely disturbed at it. As soon as the notice of it was brought to him, he sent for lieut. gen. Fleetwood, and told him, That he wondered he would suffer such a Petition to proceed so far, which might easily have been prevented, since he knew it to be his resolution not to accept the crown without the consent of the Army; and therefore desired him to hasten to the house, and put them off from doing any thing further therein. The lieut. general immediately went thither, and told them, That the Petition ought not to be debated, much less to be answered at this time, the contents of it being to desire them not to press the Protector to be king, whereas the present business was to receive his Answer to what had been formerly offered to him; and therefore he insisted that the debate of it might be put off, for the present.”

Cromwell refuses the Title of King.] The Petitioners being withdrawn, the house, without coming to any Resolution as to the matter of the Petition, went to meet the Lord Protector at the Banqueting-House, according to his appointment; where he delivered his sentiments to them in these words:

Mr. Speaker; I come hither to answer that which was in your last Paper to the committee you sent to me, which was in relation to the Desires which were offered to me by the house, in what they called their Petition. I confess, that business hath put the house, the parliament, to a great deal of trouble, and spent much time. I am very sorry for that. It hath cost me some and some thoughts, and because I have been the unhappy occasion of the expence of so much time, I shall spend little of it now. I have, the best I can, revolved the whole business in my thoughts, and I have said so much already in testimony to the whole, that I think I shall not need to repeat any thing that I have said. I think it is a government that, in the aims of it, seeks the settling the nation on a good foot, in relation to civil rights and liberties, which are the rights of the nation: and I hope I shall never be found to be one of them that shall go about to rob the nation of those rights, but to serve them what I can to the attaining of them. It is also exceedingly well provided there, for the safety and security of honest men, in that great, natural, and religious liberty, which is liberty of conscience. These are the great fundamentals; and I must bear my testimony to them, as I have and shall do still, so long as God lets me live in this world, that the intentions and the things are very honourable and honest, and the product worthy of a parliament: I have only had the unhappiness, both in my conferences with your committees, and in the best thoughts I could take to myself, not to be convinced of the necessity of that thing that hath been so often insisted on by you; to wit, the title of King, as in itself so necessary as it seems to be apprehended by you. And yet I do, with all honour and respect to the judgment of a parliament; testify that ceteris paribus no private judgment is to lie in the balance with the judgment of parliament; but, in things that respect particular persons, every man that is to give an account to God of his actions, must, in some measure, be able to prove his own work, and to have an approbation, in his own conscience, of that that he is to do, or to forbear: and whilst you are granting others their liberties, surely you will not deny me this; it being not only a liberty, but a duty (and such a duty as I cannot, without sinning, forbear) to examine my own heart, and thoughts, and judgment, in every work which I am to set my hand to, or to appear in, or for. I must confess therefore, that though I do acknowledge all the other, yet I must be a little confident in this, That what with the circumstances that accompany human actions, whether they be circumstances of times or persons; whether circumstances that relate to the whole, or private, or particular circumstances, that compass any person that is to render an account of his own actions; I have truly thought and do still think, that if I should, at the best, do any thing on this account to answer your expectation, at the best, I should do it doubtingly; and, certainly, what is so, is not of faith: and whatsoever is not so, whatsoever is not of faith, is sin to him that doth it, whether it be with relation to the substance of the action, about which that consideration is conversant, or whether to circumstances about it, which make all indifferent actions good or evil: I say circumstances; and truly I mean good or evil to him that doth it.—I lying under this consideration, think it my duty, only I could have wished I had done it sooner, for the sake of the house, who hath laid so infinite obligations on me; I wish I had done it sooner, for your sake, and saving time and trouble; and indeed for the Committee's sake, to whom I must acknowledge publicly I have been unreasonably troublesome: I say I could have wished I had given it sooner: but truly, this is my Answer, That (although I think the Government doth consist of very excellent parts, in all but in that one thing the Title, as to me) I should not be an honest man, if I should not tell you, that I cannot accept of the government nor undertake the trouble and charge of it, which I have a little more experimented than every body, what troubles and difficulties do befall men under such trusts, and in such undertakings: I say I am persuaded to return this Answer to you, That I cannot undertake the government with the title of King: and that is my Answer to this great and weighty business."

Notwithstanding Cromwell's refusing the title of King, with such seeming earnestness, it appears, upon the evidence of Mr. Whitlocke and Secretary Thurloe, "That the Protector was not only fully satisfied in his own private judgment, that it was fit for him to accept of the parliament's proposal, but also declared to several members his resolution to do so; and that matters were prepared in order thereto." Mr. Welwood adds, That a crown was actually made ready; and it appears by several original Letters since published, that not only the Protector's own family, but even the sagacious Thurloe, was captivated with the glare of his master's expected monarchy.

The Parliament agree to style Cromwell, LORD PROTECTOR.] May 19. In canvassing and debating the foregoing Speech of the Lord Protector, the Office of Kingship, which they had put into their Humble Petition and Advice, and which he had now refused to accept, came in question: and this day the house resolved, on a division of 77 against 45, that the words 'Lord Protector' should be inserted instead of that of 'King.'

The Parliament's Humble Petition and Advice, presented to his Highness.] This knotty point being thus smoothed, put an end to all farther debates on the Petition and Advice; and it was ordered to be engrossed as soon as possible. On the 25th, the day appointed by Cromwell to receive it, he came down to Westminster; and sending for the house to attend him in the Painted Chamber, the Speaker presented the same to his highness, acquainting him with the Alterations made therein; and then the whole was read in the following terms:

To his Highness the LORD PROTECTOR of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereto belonging: The Humble PETITION and ADVICE of the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses now assembled in the Parliament of this Commonwealth.

"We the knights, citizens and burgesses in this present parliament assembled, taking into our most serious consideration the present state of these three nations, joined and united under your Highness's protection, cannot but, in the first place, with all thankfulness acknowledge the wonderful mercy of Almighty God, in delivering us from that tyranny and bondage, both in our spiritual and civil concerns, which the late king and his party designed to bring us under, and pursued the effecting thereof by a long and bloody war; and also that it hath pleased the same gracious God to preserve your person in many battles, to make you an instrument for preserving our peace, although environed with enemies abroad, and filled with turbulent, restless, and unquiet spirits in our own bowels; that as in the treading down the common enemy, and restoring us to peace and tranquillity, the Lord hath used you so eminently, and the worthy officers and soldiers of the Army, whose faithfulness to the common cause, we and all good men shall ever acknowledge, and put a just value upon; so also that he will use you and them in the settling and securing our liberties, as we are men and Christians, to us and our posterity after us; which are those great and glorious ends which the good people of these nations have so freely, with the hazard of their lives and estates so long and earnestly contended for: we consider likewise the continual danger which your life is in, from the bloody practices, both of the malignant and discontented party, (one whereof, through the goodness of God, you have been lately delivered from) it being a received principle amongst them, That no Order being settled in your life-time for the Succession in the Government, nothing is wanting to bring us into blood and confusion, and them to their desired ends, but the destruction of your person; and in case things should thus remain at your death, we are not able to express what calamities would, in all human probability, ensue thereupon, which we trust your Highness, as well as we, do hold yourself obliged to provide against; and not to leave a people, whose common peace and interest you are intrusted with, in such a condition as may hazard both, especially in this conjuncture, when there seems to be an opportunity of coming to a Settlement upon just and legal foundations. Upon these considerations, we have judged it a duty incumbent upon us, to present and declare these our most just and necessary Desires to your highness.

I. That your Highness will be pleased, by and under the name and style of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, to hold and exercise the office of chief magistrate of these nations, and to govern according to this Petition and Advice, in all things therein contained, and in all other things according to the laws of these nations, and not otherwise: That your highness will be pleased, during your life-time, to appoint and declare the person who shall, immediately after your death, succeed you in the government of these nations.

II. That your highness will, for the future, be pleased to call Parliaments, consisting of two houses, (in such manner and way as shall be more particularly afterwards agreed and declared in this Petition and Advice) once in 3 years at farthest, or oftener as the affairs of the nation shall require, that being your Great Council, and in whose affection and advice yourself and this people will be most safe and happy.

III. That the antient and undoubted liberties and privileges of Parliament (which are the birthright and inheritance of the people, and wherein every man is interested) be preserved and maintained; and that you will not break or interrupt the same, nor suffer them to be broken or interrupted; and particularly, that those person who are legally chosen by a free election of the people to serve in parliament, may not be excluded from sitting in parliament to do their duties, but by judgment and consent of that house whereof they are members.

IV. That those who have advised, assisted, or abetted the Rebellion of Ireland, and those who do or shall profess the Popish Religion, be disabled and made incapable for ever to be elected, or to give any Vote in the election of any member to sit or serve in parliament; and that all and every person and persons who have aided, abetted, advised, or assisted in any war against the parliament, since the 1st of Jan. 1641, (unless he or they have since borne arms for the parliament or your highness, or otherwise given signal testimony of his or their good affection to the Commonwealth, and continued faithful to the same); and all such as have been actually engaged in any plot, conspiracy, or design against the person of your highness, or in any insurrection or rebellion in England or Wales since the 16th of Dec. 1653, shall be for ever disabled and made incapable to be elected, or give any Vote in the election of any member to sit or serve in parliament. That for Scotland none be capable to elect, or be elected to sit or serve in parliament, who have been in arms against the parliament of England, or against the parliament in Scotland before the 1st of April, 1648, (except such as have since borne arms in the service of the parliament of England or your highness, or given other signal testimony of their good affection) nor any that, since the said 1st of April, 1648, have been in arms, or otherwise aided, abetted, advised, or assisted in any war against the parliament of England or your highness, except such as, since the 1st of March, 1651, old style, have lived peaceably, and thereby given testimony of their good affection to the parliament and your highness.—Provided, That nothing in this Article contained, shall extend to put any incapacity upon any English or Scots Protestants in Ireland, either to elect or be elected to serve in parliament, who before the 1st of March, 1649, have borne arms for the parliament or your highness, or otherwise given signal testimony of their good affection to this Commonwealth, and continued faithful to the same: that all Votes and Elections, given or made contrary, or not according to the Qualifications aforesaid, shall be void and of none effect; and that if any person or persons, so incapable as aforesaid, shall give his, or their vote for election of members to serve in parliament, all and every such person and persons so electing, shall lose and forfeit one year's value of his and their respective real estates, and one full third part of his and their respective personal estates; the one moiety thereof to your highness, and the other moiety to him or them who shall sue for the same, in any court of Record, by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, wherein no essoign, wager of law, or protection shall be allowed. And that the persons who shall be elected to serve in parliament, be such, and none other than such, as are persons of known integrity, fearing God, and of good conversation, and being of the age of 21; and not such as are disabled by the Act of the 17th year of the late king, intituled, 'An Act for disabling all persons in Holy Orders, to exercise any Temporal jurisdiction or authority, nor such as are public Ministers, or public preachers of the Gospel.' Nor such as are guilty of any of the offences mentioned in an act of parliament, bearing date the 9th Aug. 1650, intituled, 'An Act against several atheistical, blasphemous, and execrable opinions derogatory to the Honour of God, and destructive to human society.' No common scoffer, nor reviler of Religion or of any person or persons for professing thereof; no person that hath married or shall marry a wife of the Popish Religion; or hath trained or shall train up his child or children, or any other child or children under his tuition or government, in the Popish Religion, or that shall permit or suffer such child or children to be trained up in the said religion; or that hath given or shall give his consent that his son or daughter shall marry any of that religion: no person that shall deny the Scriptures to be the Word of God, or the sacraments, prayers, magistracy, and ministry to be the Ordinances of God; no common profaner of the Lord's Day, nor profane swearer or curser, no drunkard or common haunter of taverns or alehouses. And that these Qualifications may be observed, and yet the privilege of parliament maintained, we desire that it may be, by your highness's consent, ordained, That 41 Commissioners be appointed by act of parliament, who, or any 15 or more of them, shall be authorized to examine and try whether the members, to be elected for the house of commons in future parliaments, be capable to sit, according to the Qualifications mentioned in this Petition and Advice; and in case they find them not qualified accordingly, then to suspend them from sitting until the house of commons shall, upon hearing of their particular cases, admit them to sit; which commissioners are to stand so authorized, for that end, until the house of commons, in any future parliament, shall nominate the like number of other commissioners in their places; and those other commissioners, so to be nominated in any future parliament, to have the same powers and authorities. That the said commissioners shall certify, in writing, to the house of commons, on the 1st day of their meeting, the Causes and Grounds of their suspension of any persons to be elected as aforesaid: That the accusation shall be upon the oath of the informer, or some other person: That a copy of the Accusation shall be left by the party accusing, in writing under his hand, with the party accused, or, in his absence, at his house in the county, city, or town, for which he shall be chosen, if he have any such house; or if not, with the sheriff of the county, if he be chosen for a county, or with the chief magistrate of the city or borough for which he is chosen: and that the number of persons to be elected and chosen to sit and serve in parliament, for England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the distribution of the persons so chosen within the counties, cities, and boroughs of them respectively, may be according to such proportions as shall be agreed upon and declared in this present parliament.

V. That your highness will consent, That none be called to sit and vote in the other house, but such as are not disabled, but qualified according to the Qualifications mentioned in the former Article, being such as shall be nominated by your highness, and approved by this house; and that they exceed not 70 in number, nor be under the number of 40 (whereof the quorum to be 21) who shall not give any vote by proxies; and that as any of them do die, or be legally removed, no new ones be admitted to sit and vote in their rooms, but by consent of the house itself: That the other house do not proceed in any civil causes, except in writs of error, in cases adjourned from inferior courts into the parliament for difficulty, in cases of Petitions against proceedings in courts of equity, and in cases of the privileges of their own house: that they do not proceed in any criminal causes whatsoever, against any person criminally, but upon an Impeachment of the commons assembled in parliament, and by their consent: That they do not proceed in any cause, either civil or criminal, but according to the known laws of the land, and the due course and custom of parliament: That no final determinations or judgments be by any members of that house, in any cause there depending, either civil, criminal, or mixed, as commissioners or delegates, to be nominated by that house; but all such final determinations and judgments to be by the house itself, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

VI. That in all other particulars which concern the calling and holding of parliaments, your highness will be pleased, that the laws and statutes of the land be observed and kept; and that no laws be altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed, or new laws made, but by act of parliament.

VII. And to the end there may be a constant Revenue for support of the government, and for the safety and defence of these nations by sea and land, we declare our willingness to settle forthwith a yearly Revenue of 1,300,000*l.*

whereof 1,000,000*l.* for the Navy and Army, and 300,000*l.* for the support of the Government, and no part thereof to be raised by a land-tax; and this not to be altered without the consent of the three estates in parliament; and to grant such other temporary supplies, according as the commons assembled in parliament shall, from time to time, adjudge the necessities of these nations to require; and do pray your highness, that it be declared and enacted, That no charge be laid, nor no person be compelled to contribute to any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, tallage, aid or other like charge without common consent by act of parliament; which is a freedom the people of these nations ought, by the laws, to inherit.

VIII. That none may be added or admitted to the Privy Council of your highness or successors, but such as are of known piety, and undoubted affection to the rights of these nations, and a just Christian liberty in matters of Religion, nor without consent of the Council, to be afterwards approved by both houses; and shall not afterwards be removed, but by consent of parliament; but may, in the intervals of parliament, be suspended from the exercise of his place by your highness or your successors and the Council for just cause; and that the number of the Council shall not be above 21, whereof the quorum to be 7, and not under: as also that after your highness's death, the commander in chief under your successors, of such army or armies as shall be necessary to be kept in England, Scotland, or Ireland, as also all such field-officers at land, or generals at sea, which after that time shall be newly made and constituted by your successors, be by consent of the Council, and not otherwise: and that the standing forces of this Commonwealth shall be disposed of by the chief magistrate, by consent of both houses, sitting the parliament; and, in the intervals of parliament, by the chief magistrate, with the advice of the Council: and also that your highness and successors will be pleased to exercise your government over these nations by the advice of your council:

IX. And that the chancellor, keeper, or commissioners of the Great Seal of England, the treasurer or commissioners of the treasury there, the admiral, the chief governor of Ireland, the chancellor, keeper or commissioners of the great seal of Ireland, the chief justices of both the Benches, and the chief baron in England and Ireland, the commander in chief of the Forces in Scotland, and such officers of state there, as, by act of parliament in Scotland, are to be approved by parliament, and the Judges in Scotland hereafter to be made, shall be approved of by both houses of Parliament.

X. And whereas your highness, out of your zeal to the glory of God, and the propagation of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, hath been pleased to encourage a Godly Ministry in these nations; we earnestly desire that such as do openly revile them or their assemblies, or disturb them in the worship or service of God, to the dishonour of God, scandal of good men, or breach of the peace, may be punished according to law: and where the laws are defective, that your highness will give consent to such laws as shall be made in that behalf.

XI. That the true Protestant Christian Religion, as it is contained in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and no other, be held forth and asserted for the public profession of these nations: and a Confession of Faith to be agreed by your highness and the parliament, according to the rule and warrant of the Scriptures, be asserted, held forth, and recommended to the people of these nations; that none may be suffered or permitted, by opprobrious words or writing, maliciously or contemptuously to revile or reproach the Confession of Faith to be agreed upon as aforesaid. And such who profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ his eternal Son, the True God, and in the Holy Spirit, God co-equal with the Father and the Son, One God blessed for ever; and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the revealed Will and Word of God, and shall in other things differ in doctrine, worship, or discipline, from the public profession held forth, endeavours shall be used to convince them, by sound doctrine, and the example of a good conversation: but that they may not be compelled thereto by penalties, nor restrained from their profession; but protected from all injury and molestation in the profession of the Faith, and exercise of their religion, whilst they abuse not this liberty to the civil injury of others, or the disturbance of the public peace; so that this liberty be not extended to Popery or prelacy, or to the countenancing such who publish horrible blasphemies, or practise or hold forth licentiousness or profaneness under the profession of Christ: and that those ministers or public preachers, who shall agree with the public profession aforesaid in matters of faith, although in their judgment and practice they differ in matters of worship and discipline, shall not only have protection in the way of their churches and worship respectively, but be esteemed fit and capable, (notwithstanding such difference, being otherwise duly qualified and duly approved) of any trust, promotion, or employment whatsoever in these nations, that any ministers who agree in doctrine, worship, and discipline with the public profession aforesaid are capable of; and all others who agree with the public profession in matters of faith, although they differ in matters of worship and discipline as aforesaid, shall not only have protection as aforesaid, but be esteemed fit and capable (notwithstanding such difference, being otherwise duly qualified) of any civil trust, employment, or promotion in these nations; but for such persons who agree not in matters of faith with the public profession aforesaid, they shall not be capable of receiving the public maintenance appointed for the ministry. Provided, That this clause shall not be construed to extend to enable such ministers or public preachers, or pastors of congregations, but that they be disabled, and they are hereby disabled to hold any civil employment, which those in orders were or are disabled to hold, by an Act, intituled, 'An Act for disabling all persons in Holy-Orders, to exercise any Temporal Jurisdiction or Authority.' And that your highness will give your consent, 'That all laws, statutes, ordinances and clauses in any law, statute, and ordinance, so far as they are contrary to the aforesaid liberty, be repealed.'

XII. That all Acts and Ordinances of Parliament made for the abolishing of archbishops and bishops, and for the abolishing of deans, deans and chapters, canons, prebends, and other offices and titles of, or belonging to, any cathedral or collegiate church or chapel; and for the sale or other disposition of the lands, rents, and hereditaments unto any, or either of them, belonging; or for the sale or other disposition of the lands, rents, and hereditaments of the late king, queen, or prince; or of the lands of delinquents, fee-farm or other rents, forest-lands, or any of them; or any other lands, tenements, rents, or hereditaments, lately belonging to the Commonwealth, shall no way be impeached, but that they do remain good and firm; and that the security given by act and ordinance of parliament, for any sum or sums of monies, by any of the said lands, the Excise, or by any other public Revenue; and also the securities given by the public faith of the nation and the engagement of the public faith for satisfaction of Debts, may remain firm and good, and not be made void by any pretence whatsoever.

XIII. That all and every person and persons, who have aided, abetted, advised, or assisted in any war against the parliament, since the 1st of Jan. 1641, (unless he or they have since borne arms for the parliament, or your highness, or otherwise given signal testimony of his or their good affection to the Commonwealth, and continued faithful to the same) and all such as have been actually engaged in any plot, conspiracy, or design, against the person of your highness, or in any insurrection or rebellion, in England or Wales, since the 16th of Dec. 1653. And for Scotland, that all and every person and persons, who have been in arms against the parliament of England, or against the parliament in Scotland, before the 1st of April, 1648, (except such as have since borne arms in the service of the parliament of England, or your highness, or given other signal testimony of their good affection) and every person or persons that, since the said 1st of April, 1648, have been in arms, or otherwise aided, abetted, advised, or assisted in any war against the parliament of England, or your highness, except such persons, who having been in arms, or otherwise abetted, advised, or assisted in any war against the parliament of England, or your highness, since the 1st of April 1648) and were not in arms against the parliament of England, or against the parliament of Scotland, before the 1st of April, 1648, and have, since the 1st of March, 1651, old style, lived peaceably, and thereby given testimony of their good affection to the parliament, and your highness, be made incapable, for ever, of holding or enjoying of any office or place of public trust in these three nations, or any of them.—Provided, That nothing in this Article contained shall extend to put any Incapacity in this Article mentioned, upon any English or Scots Protestants in Ireland, who, before the 1st of March, 1649, have borne arms for the parliament or your highness, or otherwise given signal testimony of their good affection to this Commonwealth, and continued faithful to the same.

XIV. And that your highness will be pleased to consent, That nothing in this Petition and Advice contained, nor your highness's assent thereto, shall be construed to extend to the dissolving of this present parliament; but that the same shall continue and remain, until such time as your highness shall think fit to dissolve the same.

XV. And that nothing contained in this Petition and Advice, nor your highness's consent thereunto, shall be construed to extend to the repealing or making void of any act or ordinance which is not contrary hereunto, or to the matters herein contained; but that the said acts and ordinances, not contrary hereunto, shall continue and remain in force in such manner as if this present Petition and Advice had not at all been had or made, or your highness's consent thereunto given.

XVI. And that all writs issued out of the chancery, and all writs and patents of the justices of the one Bench and of the other, barons of the Exchequer, commissions of Oyer and Terminer, goal-delivery, and justices of the peace, and all other commissions, patents, and grants, made and passed under the great seal of England, Scotland, or Ireland, shall stand good and effectual in the law, notwithstanding this Petition and Advice, or your highness's assent thereunto, or any law, statute, or custom to the contrary: and that all writs, and all commissions, indictments, informations, process, actions, suits, bills or complaints, taken out, or now depending, in any court of record at Westminster, or any other court of record in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or in the town of Berwick upon Tweed; and all process, pleas, demurrers, continuances, and proceedings, in every such writs, indictments, informations, actions, suits, bills, and complaints, shall be returnable, stand good and effectual, and be prosecuted and sued forth, in such manner and form, and in the same state, condition and order, the style and teste of proceedings, after passing of these presents, being made conformable thereunto; this present Petition and Advice, or your highness's assent thereunto, or any law, custom, or usage to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding: and that any variance that shall be occasioned by reason thereof, touching any of the said writs, process, or proceedings, in the name, style, teste, or otherwise, shall not be in any wise material as concerning any default or error to be alledged or objected thereunto.

XVII. And that your highness and your successors will be pleased to take an Oath, in such form as shall be agreed upon by your highness and this present parliament, to govern these nations according to the law.—And in case your highness shall not be satisfied to give your consent to all the matters and things in this Humble Petition and Advice, that then nothing in the same be deemed of force, to oblige the people of these nations in any the particulars therein contained. And these our Desires being granted by your highness, we shall hope, through the rich mercy and goodness of God, that it will prove some Remedy to those dangers, distractions, and distempers which these nations are now in, and be an effectual means to remove those jealousies and fears which remain in the minds of many men concerning the Government of this Commonwealth; and thereby we shall be enabled and encouraged, with all cheerfulness, to the settling of such things which shall be further necessary for the good of these nations; and be most ready to join with you in promoting the work of reformation happily begun by your highness, the regulating Courts of Justice, and abridging both the delays and charges of Law Suits; and apply ourselves to such other courses and counsels as may be most like to heal our breaches and divisions, and to restore these poor nations to a union and consistency with themselves, and to lay a foundation of a further confidence between your highness and them, to the rejoicing of the hearts of our friends, and terror of our enemies.”

This being done, the Speaker, in the name of the parliament, desired his Highness's consent to the whole, which was read, by the clerk, in these words, “The Lord Protector doth consent.”

Cromwell's Speech at giving his Consent thereto.] After all which his Highness made the following speech:

“Mr. Speaker; I desire to offer a word or two unto you; which shall be but a word. I did well bethink myself before I came hither this day, that I came not as to a triumph, but with the most serious thoughts that ever I had in all my life, to undertake one of the greatest tasks that ever was laid upon the back of a human creature: and I make no question but you will, and so will all men, readily agree with me that, without the support of the Almighty, I shall necessarily sink under the burden of it; not only with shame and reproach to myself, but (with that that is more a thousand times, and in comparison of which, I and my family are not worthy to be mentioned) with the loss and prejudice of these three nations.—And, that being so, I must ask your help, and the help of all those that fear God, that, by their prayers, I may receive assistance from the hand of God: his presence, going along, will enable me to the discharge of so great a duty and trust as this is, and nothing else can.—Howbeit, I have some other things to desire of you, I mean of the parliament, That, seeing this is but as it were, an introduction to the carrying on of the government of these nations; and forasmuch as there are many things, which cannot be supplied, for enabling me to the carrying on of this work, without your help and assistance; I think it is my duty to ask your help in them. Not that I doubted; for I believe the same spirit that hath led you to this, will easily suggest the rest to you. The truth is, and I can say in the presence of God, that nothing would have induced me to have undertaken this unsupportable burden to flesh and blood, had it not been that I have seen, in this parliament, all along, a care of doing all those things that might truly and really answer the ends that we have been engaged for. You have satisfied me of your forwardness and readiness therein fully already. I thought it my duty, when your committee, which you were pleased to send to me, to give the Grounds and Reasons of your proceedings to help to inform my conscience and judgment; I was then bold to offer to them several considerations which were received by them, and have been presented to you: in answer to which the committee did bring me several Resolves of yours, which I have by me. I think those are not yet made so authentic and authoritative as was desired: and therefore, though I cannot doubt it, yet I thought it my duty to ask it of you, that there may be a perfecting of those things. Indeed, as I said before, I have my witness in the sight of God, that nothing would have been an argument to me (howsoever desirable great places seem to be to other men; I say nothing would have been an argument to me) to have undertaken this; but, as I said before, I saw such things determined by you, as makes clearly for the liberties of the nations, and for the liberty, and interest, and preservation of all such as fear God; of all that fear God under various forms; and, if God make not these nations thankful to you, for your care therein, it will fall as fire on their heads: and therefore I say that hath been one main encouragement. I confess there are other things that tend to reformation, to the discountenancing of vice, to the encouragement of good men and virtue, and the completing of those things, also, concerning some of which you have not yet resolved any thing; save to let me know, by your committee, that you would not be wanting in any thing for the good of these nations. Nor do I speak it, as in the least doubting it; but I do earnestly and heartily desire, to the end God may crown your work, and bless you and this Government, that, in your own time, and with what speed you judge fit, these things may be provided for.”

May 27. The house after hearing the Report of this Speech ordered, That all the Votes and Resolutions, relative to their Petition and Advice, should be referred to a committee, to peruse and methodize them; and to prepare one or more Bills thereupon.

Admiral Blake destroys the Spanish Fleet at Santa Cruz.] May 28. Mr. Secretary Thurloe acquainted the house with the good Success the Lord had been pleased to vouchsafe to the Fleet of this nation, under the command of general Blake, at the Port of Santa Cruz, on the Island of Teneriffe, on the 20th of April last; at which time the said Fleet fell in with 6 Spanish galleons, whereof were the admiral, vice-admiral, and rear-admiral, with their standards and flag aloft; and 16 other considerable Ships, some having goods brought from the Indies on board them, others who had taken in goods and provisions to carry back again, most of them furnished with brass ordnance, and their full companies of seamen and soldiers on board; all which were sunk, blown up, or destroyed. The particulars thereof being read, the house appointed the ensuing Wednesday to be set apart for a day of public Thanksgiving: they also voted 500*l.* to be laid out in the purchase of a Jewel, to be presented to the Admiral as a mark of honour, and a testimony of the Lord Protector and the Parliament's resentment of his eminent and faithful services. But the gallant Blake lived not long enough to receive these marks of the Parliament's respect; he dying on board his own ship, on his return to England, at the very entrance of the Fleet into Plymouth Sound.

June 4. The Committee appointed to consider of the Resolutions of the house, in relation to their Petition and Advice, having made their report, That they had thought it best to put the same by way of additional Articles thereto, the same were read this day.

Cromwell's Speech at passing Money Bills.] June 9. The rising of the parliament being now near at hand, and many Bills got ready for the Lord Protector's assent, this day was appointed for that purpose. About 11, the house received a Message from his highness, signifying that he was then in the Painted-Chamber, and desired to speak with them there. Accordingly, the Speaker, attended by the whole house, went up thither; and after a pithy and short Speech, touching the deliberate and grave proceedings of this parliament, did, in their name, present his highness with three Bills for an Assessment towards defraying the Charges of the Spanish War, and other occasions of the Commonwealth; together with divers other Bills, some of a public, and others of a private concernment; being but, as he styled them, grapes preceding the full vintage.—In the afternoon, the house being met again, the Speaker reported the Lord Protector's Speech, made that morning, upon presenting the Bills, which was to this effect:

"Mr. Speaker; I perceive that, among these many Acts of Parliament, there hath been a very great care had by the parliament to provide for the just and necessary support of the Commonwealth, by those Bills for the levying of money, now brought to me, which I have given my consent unto. Understanding it hath been the practice of those who have been chief governors, to acknowledge, with thanks to the commons, their care and regard of the public, I do very heartily and thankfully acknowledge their kindness herein."

Relation of the Manner of Cromwell's being invested Lord Protector by the Parliament.]

June 25. The house having resolved upon a solemn Investiture of their Lord Protector into his Office, this day they gave orders for a Robe of purple velvet lined with Ermine, a Bible, a Sceptre of massy gold, and a Sword of State, to be provided for his highness's Investiture.

June 26. Sir Oliver Flemmyng, master of the ceremonies, was ordered to wait upon the several foreign ambassadors and public ministers of state, and invite them to be present at the Ceremonial, which was performed with great state and magnificence. The following Narrative was published by the Protector's authority:

AN exact RELATION of the Manner of the solemn Investiture, or happy Inauguration, of his Highness the LORD PROTECTOR at Westminster.*

Friday the 26th of June, being agreed upon for the Investiture of his highness the Lord Protector, and a large place being raised and prepared at the upper end of Westminster-hall for that purpose, there was in the midst thereof, under the great window, a rich cloth of state set up, and under it a chair of state placed upon an ascent of two degrees, covered with carpets; and before it a table, with a Chair appointed for sir Thomas Widdrington, the Speaker of the parliament; and on each side of the hall, upon the said structure, were seats raised one above another, and decently covered for the members of parliament; and below them seats on one side, for the Judges, and on the other side, for the Aldermen of London. About 2 in the afternoon his highness came from Whitehall by water, and landing at the Parliament Stairs, went up into the Chamber called the Lords House; where having retired himself a-while, Mr. Speaker and the members of parliament being come to the Painted-Chamber, his highness attended by his council, the officers of state, and the judges, met them; and gave his consent to the Additional and Explanatory Petition and Advice of the parliament, to a Bill for an adjournment thereof to the 20th of January next, and to all such other Bills as were then presented to him. From thence the Speaker, with the members of parliament, departed to the great Hall at Westminster, where they seated themselves in the places provided for them.—His highness, after a short retirement in a room near the Painted-Chamber, returned into the house of lords. From the said house his highness passed towards the Hall in the manner following: In the first place went his highness's gentleman and other persons of quality; next, an officer of arms going before the recorder and aldermen of London in their scarlets; next, another officer of arms went before Mr. Attorney-general and the lords the Judges in their robes and order; next them, Norroy, king of arms; then 4 serjeants at arms, with their maces, going before the lords commissioners of the treasury and of the great seal, (the lord commissioner Fiennes bearing the seal) and the lord president of his highness's Council; then came Garter, principal king of arms, before the earl of Warwick, who bore the Sword before his highness; on whose left hand went the lord mayor of London, by his highness's special favour, bearing the city sword; after whom came his highness, being attended by his Council, the principal secretary of state, and divers of the nobility and other persons of great quality.—His highness being entered on the place, and standing under the cloth of state, Mr. Speaker did, in the name of the parliament, present several things, ready laid upon the table, to his highness: viz. A Robe of purple velvet, lined with ermine, being the habit antiently used at the solemn Investiture of princes; next, a large Bible, richly gilt and bossed; next, a Sword; and, lastly, a Sceptre, being of massy gold; which being so presented, Mr. Speaker came from his chair, took the robe, and therewith vested his highness, being assisted therein by the earl of Warwick, the lord Whitlocke, and others: which being done, the Bible was delivered unto his highness; after that, Mr. Speaker girt about him the Sword; and, lastly, delivered his highness the Sceptre. These things being performed, Mr. Speaker returned unto his chair, and administered to the Lord Protector the Oath, prepared by the parliament, for that purpose; which he having taken, the Speaker addressed himself to his highness in the following Speech:

"May it please your Highness; You are now upon a great theatre, in a large chore of people. You have the parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland before you; on your right hand my lords the judges; and on your left hand the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, the most noble and populous city of England. The parliament, with the interposition of your suffrage, makes laws; and the judges and governors of London are the great dispensers of those laws to the people. The occasion of this great convention and intercourse is to give an Investiture to your highness in that eminent place of Lord Protector: a name you had before; but it is now settled by the full and unanimous consent of the people of these three nations assembled in parliament. You have no new name, but a new date added to the old name; the 16th of Dec. is now changed to the 26th of June. I am commanded, by the parliament, to make oblation to your highness of four things, in order to this Inauguration.

The first is a Robe of purple; an emblem of magistracy, and imports righteousness and justice; when you have put on this vestment, I may say (and I hope without offence) that you are a gown man. This Robe is of a mixed colour to shew the mixture of justice and mercy which are then most excellent when they are well tempered together. Justice without mercy is wormwood and bitterness; and mercy without justice is of too soft a temper for government: for a magistrate must have two hands, plectentem et amplectentem.—The next thing is a Bible; a book that contains the Holy Scriptures, in which you have the honour and happiness to be well versed. This is the Book of Life, consisting of two Testaments, the Old and New. In the first we have Christum velatum, Christ in types, shadows, and figures; in the latter we have Christum revelatum, Christ revealed. This Book carries in it the grounds of the true Christian Protestant Religion; it is a Book of Books; it contains in it both precepts and examples for good government. Alexander so highly valued the books of his master Aristotle, and other great princes other books, that they have laid them every night under their pillows. These are all but legends and romances to this one book; a book to be had always in remembrance; I find it is said in a part of this book, which I shall desire to read, and it is this: Deut. xvii. 'And it shall be when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write a copy of this law in a Book, out of that which is before the priests and Levites. And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life, that he may learn to fear the Lord God, and to keep all the words of his law, and those statutes to do them. That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren; and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand or to the left, to the end he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he and his children in the midst of Israel.'—The next thing that I am to offer to your highness is a sceptre not unlike a staff, for you are to be a staff to the weak and poor. It is of antient use in this kind; it is said in scripture, in reference to Judah, the royal tribe, 'That the Sceptre shall not depart from Judah.' It was of like use in other kingdoms and governments: Homer, the prince of the Greek poets, calls kings and princes sceptre-bearers.—The last thing is a sword, not a military, but a civil sword, a sword rather for defence than offence; not to defend yourself only, but others also. This sword is an emblem of justice. The noble lord Talbot, in Henry 6th's time, wrote upon his sword, Ego sum Talboti propter occidendum inimicos meos; this gallant lord was a better soldier than a critic. If I might presume to fix a motto upon this sword, it should be this, Ego sum Domini Protectoris, ad protegendum populum meum. I say this Sword is an emblem of justice, and is to be used as king Solomon used his, for the discovery of the truth in points of justice. I may say of this sword as king David said of Goliath's sword, 'There is none like this.' Justice is the proper virtue of the imperial throne, and by justice the thrones of kings and princes are established. Justice is a royal virtue; which, as one saith of it, doth employ the other three cardinal virtues in her service. 1. Wisdom to discern the nocent from the innocent. 2. Fortitude, to prosecute and execute. 3. Temperance, so to carry justice that passion be no ingredient, and that it be without confusion or precipitation.—You have given ample testimony in all these particulars; so that this sword, in your hand, will be a right sword of justice, attended with wisdom, fortitude and temperance. When you have all these together, what a comely and glorious sight it is to behold a Lord Protector in a purple robe with a sceptre in his hand, a sword of justice girt about him, and his eyes fixed upon the Bible! Long may you prosperously enjoy them all, to your own comfort, and the comfort of the People of these three nations."

His highness standing thus adorned in princely state according to his merit and dignity, looking up unto the throne of the most High, who is prince of princes, and in whom is all his confidence, Mr. Manton, by prayer, recommended his highness, the parliament, the council, his highness's forces by sea and land, the whole government, and people of these three nations, to the blessing and protection of God Almighty. After this the people giving several great shouts, and the trumpets sounding, his highness sat down in the chair of state, holding the Sceptre in his hand.—While his highness thus sat, a herald stood up aloft, giving signal to a trumpet to sound three times; after which he did, by authority and direction of parliament, there publish and proclaim his highness Lord Protector of the Commonwealth, requiring all persons to yield him due obedience. Hereupon the trumpets sounded, and the people made several great acclamations with loud shouts, 'God save the Lord Protector.' Then an officer of arms, standing upon the top of the stairs, made proclamation again after the same manner; which was followed with shouts and loud acclamations as before. After a little pause, the whole ceremony being ended, his highness saluting the Ambassadors and public ministers, proceeded thence in his princely Habit, the train whereof was borne up by several noble persons. The aldermen, recorder, the judges, with the officers of state, and the rest, proceeded in the same order as they came from the house of lords, and passed through the hall to the great gate leading into the New Palace-Yard, where his highness entered into his coach of state, being in his robes. The earl of Warwick sat in the other end of the coach, and the lord Richard Cromwell and the lord Whitlocke on one side, the lord Whitlocke having one of the drawn swords in his hand. On the other side sat the lord viscount Lisle and general Montague, bearing the other two drawn swords, in their hands. The lord Cleypole, master of the horse, led the horse of honour in rich caparisons; the coach was attended by his highness's life guards, and other guards, with the officers of arms on horseback; the officers of state, judges, lord mayor, and aldermen, all waiting on his highness in their coaches to Whitehall; the whole being managed with state and magnificence, suitable to so high and happy a solemnity."—Thus far the narrative.

The Ceremonial being over, the members returned to their house, and made an Order for recommending it to the Lord Protector, as the desire of parliament, that his highness would be pleased to encourage all Christian Endeavours for uniting the Protestant Churches abroad; also to take some effectual course, upon advice with the Judges, for reforming the government of the Inns of Court, providing a sufficient maintenance for the encouragement of godly and able ministers there, and for reviving the readings, and keeping up exercise, by the students in those seminaries of the law. They then adjourned to the 20th of Jan. ensuing.

List of Cromwell's House of Lords.] Dec. 10. The Protector, according to the powers vested in him, nominated another House of Parliament, to sit and do business in imitation of the House of Lords. The commissioners of the great seal, with the advice of the Judges, had been ordered to prepare a writ for summoning the members of this other house, directed to such persons as the Lord Protector, under his sign manual, should appoint. Haslerig, to shew his contempt of them, took his seat in the house of commons, as member for the town of Leicester.

Cromwell's Speech at the Meeting of the Parliament.] Jan. 20. Pursuant to adjournment, the parliament met; the commons in their own house; the members of the other house, in that which was formerly the house of lords: but, there being no Journals kept of their lordships proceedings, what they did, in the little time they sat, must be gleaned out of those of the commons.—The latter employed the morning in taking the Oath, and appointing a solemn Day of Fasting. After which, being informed that the usher of the black rod, with some Message, was at the door, he was called in; and acquainted them, That his highness was in the House of Lords, and staid for them there; hereupon the Speaker, and all the members, went up, when his highness made the following Speech:

“My Lords, and gentlemen of the house of commons; I meet you here, in this capacity, by the Advice and Petition of this present parliament, after so much expence of blood and treasure, to search and try what blessings God hath in store for these nations. I cannot but with gladness of heart remember and acknowledge the labour and industry that is past, which hath been spent upon a business worthy of the best men, and the best Christians. It is very well known unto you all what difficulties we have passed through, and what we are now arrived at: we hope we may say we are arrived at what we aimed at, if not at that which is much beyond our expectations.—The State of this Cause, and the Quarrel, what that was at the first, you all very well know: I am persuaded most of you have been actors in it. It was the maintaining the Liberty of these nations; our civil liberties as men, our spiritual liberties as Christians. I shall not much look back but rather say one word concerning the state and condition we are all now in. You know very well, the first Declaration after the beginning of this war, that spake to the life, was a sense, held forth by the parliament, That, for some succession of time, designs were laid to innovate upon the civil rights of the nations; and to innovate in matters of Religion: and those very persons, that a man would have thought, should have had the least hand in the meddling with civil things, did justify them all; all transactions that were in pulpits, in presses, and otherwise; which was verily thought would have been a very good shelter to them, to innovate upon us in matters of religion also; and so to innovate as to eat out the core, and power, and heart, and life of all religion, by bringing on us a company of poisonous, Popish ceremonies, and imposing them upon those that were accounted the puritans of the nation, and professors of religion amongst us; driving them to seek their bread in an howling wilderness, as was instanced to our friends, who were forced to fly for Holland, New-England, almost any whither, to find liberty for their consciences.—Now, if this thing hath been the state and sum of our Quarrel, and of those ten years wars wherein we have been exercised: and that the good hand of God (for we are to attribute it to no other) hath brought the business thus home unto us, as it is stated in the Petition and Advice, I think we have all cause to bless God, and the nations have cause to bless him. I well remember I did a little touch upon the 85th Psalm, when I spake unto you in the beginning of this parliament, which expresseth well that we may say as truly and as well, as it was said of old by the penman of that psalm. The first verse is an acknowledgement to God, that he had been favourable to his land, and had brought back the captivity of his people; and that he had pardoned all their iniquities, and covered all their sin, and taken away all his wrath: and indeed of these unspeakable mercies, blessings, and deliverances out of captivity, pardoning national sins and national iniquities, pardoning as God pardons the man whom he justifieth, he breaks through, and overlooks iniquity, and pardoneth because he will pardon: and sometimes God pardoneth nations so; and if the enjoyment of our present peace and other mercies, may be witnesses for God, we feel and we see them every day. The greatest demonstration of his favour and love appears to us in this, That he hath given us peace and the blessings of peace; to wit, the enjoyments of our liberties, civil and spiritual; and I remember well the church falls into prayer, and into praises, great expectations of future mercies, and great thankfulness for the enjoyment of present mercies, and breaks into this expression, ‘Surely Salvation is nigh unto them that fear him, that glory may dwell in our land.’ In the beginning, he calls it his land; ‘Thou hast been favourable to our land:’ truly I hope this is his land; and, in some sense, it may be given out that it is God’s land. And he that hath the weakest knowledge, and the worst memory, can easily say we are a redeemed people, (when first God was pleased to look favourably upon us) out of the hands of popery, in that never-to-be-forgotten reformation, that most significant and greatest the nation hath felt or tasted. I would but touch upon that, and but a touch:

how hath God redeemed us, as it is this day, not from trouble, and sorrow, and anger; but unto a blessed and happy estate and condition, comprehensive of all the interest of every member, of every individual of those mercies, as you very well see! And then in what sense it is our land, through this grace and favour of God, that he hath vouchsafed unto us, and bestowed upon us, with the gospel, with peace and rest, out of ten years war, and given us what we would desire! nay, who could have forethought, when we were plunged into the midst of our troubles, that ever the people of God should have had liberty to worship God without fear of enemies? which is the very acknowledgement of the promise of Christ, That he would deliver his from fear of enemies, that they might worship him in holiness and in righteousness all the days of their life.—This is the portion that God hath given us; and I trust we shall for ever heartily acknowledge it. The Church goes on there, and makes her boast yet further; ‘His salvation is nigh them that fear him, that glory may dwell in our land,’ his glory not carnal, nor any thing else that accompanies this glory of a free possession of the Gospel; this is that we may glory in. And he says further, ‘Mercy and truth are met together, Righteousness and peace have kissed each other.’ And it shall be such righteousness as comes down from heaven; ‘Truth shall grow out of the earth, and righteousness shall come down from heaven.’ Here is the truth of all; here is the righteousness of God, under the notion of righteousness, confirming our abilities, answerable to the truth that he hath in the gospel revealed towards us: and he closeth with this; ‘Righteousness shall go before him, and shall set us in the way of his steps.’ That righteousness, that mercy, that love, and that kindness which we have seen, and have been made partakers of from the Lord; it shall be our guide to teach us to know the right and the good way; which is to tread in steps of mercy, righteousness, and goodness, that our God hath walked before us in.—We have a peace this day: I believe, in my very heart, you all think the things that I speak to you this day; I am sure you have cause. And yet we are not without the murmurings of many people, who turn all this grace and goodness into wormwood, who indeed are disappointed by the works of God: and those men are of several ranks and conditions; great ones, lesser ones, of all sorts; men that are of the episcopal spirit, with all the branches, the root and the branches; who gave themselves a fatal blow in this place, when they would needs make a protestation, That no laws were good which were made by this house, and the house of commons, in their absence; and so, without injury to themselves, cut off themselves.—Indeed men that know not God; that know not how to account upon the works of God; how to measure them out, but will trouble nations for an interest, which is but mixt at the best; made up of iron and clay, like the feet of Nebuchadnezzar’s image; whether they were more civil or spiritual, was hard to say, but their continuance was like to be known before-hand; iron and clay make no good mixtures, they are not durable at all.—You have now a Godly Ministry; you have a knowing ministry; such a one as, without vanity be it spoken, the world has not; men knowing the things of God, and able to search into the things of God; by that only that can fathom those things in some measure. The spirit of a beast knows not the spirit of a man; nor doth the spirit of man know the things of God: the things of God are known by the spirit. Truly, I will remember but this one thing of those; their greatest persecution hath been of the people of God; men of the spirit of God, as, I think, very experiences will sufficiently demonstrate.—Besides, what is the reason, think you, that men slip in this age wherein we live? As I told you before, they understand not the works of God; they consider not the operation of his laws; they consider not that God resisted and broke in pieces the powers that were, that men might fear him; might have liberty to do, and to enjoy, all that we have been speaking of: which certainly God hath manifested, that this was the end, and that he hath brought the things to pass. Therefore it is that men yet slip, and engage themselves against God; and for that very cause, in the 28th psalm, saith David, ‘He shall break them down, and not build them up.’ If therefore you would know upon what foundation you stand, own your foundation from God. He hath set you where you are; he hath set you in the enjoyment of your civil and of your spiritual liberties. I deal clearly with you: I have been under some infirmity; therefore dare not speak further unto you, but to let you know thus much, that I have, with truth and simplicity, declared the state of our cause, and attainments in it, to you, by the industry and labour of this parliament, when they last met upon this foundation, (you shall find I mean the foundation of a Cause and Quarrel thus attained to) wherein we are thus estated; I should be very glad to lay my bones with yours; and would have done it with all heartiness and cheerfulness, in the meanest capacity that I was ever yet in, to serve the parliament.—If God give you, as I trust he will, he hath, given it you; for, what have I been speaking of but what you have done? He hath given you strength to do what hath been done: and, if God should bless you in this work, and make this meeting happy upon this account, you shall all be called the Blessed of the Lord; the generations to come will bless us; you shall be ‘the Repairers of Breaches, and the Restorers of Paths to dwell in:’ and if there be any work that mortals can attain to in the world beyond this, I acknowledge my ignorance. As I told you, I have some infirmities upon me: I have not liberty to speak more unto you; but I have desired an honourable person here by me, to discourse a little more particularly, what may be more proper for this occasion, and this meeting."

The Protector having ended his harangue, the lord commissioner Piennes made a Speech to both houses, by way of enlargement thereupon. After which the commons returned to their own house, and ordered that all the Committees concerning public affairs, which had been appointed before their recess, should be revived. By the 3rd Article of the Humble Petition and Advice, no persons legally chosen by a free election of the people to serve in parliament, were to be excluded therefrom, but by the judgment and consent of that house whereof they were members. In consequence of this, all those gentlemen who had been denied their seats, at the first meeting of this parliament, on pretence of their not being approved of by the Protector's Council, were freely admitted. This opened the door to about 100 of Cromwell's most inveterate enemies, who had obtained great credit and interest in the house, by having been excluded for their fidelity to the Common-wealth.

The Commons call in question the Authority of the Other House.] Jan. 22. The commons being informed that some gentlemen were at the door, with a Message from the Lords, they were ordered to be called in; when it appeared that they were two of the judges, Wyndham and Hill; the former of whom delivered a Message to this effect: "I am commanded by the Lords, to desire of this house, that you will join with their lordships, in an humble Address to the Lord Protector, That he will be pleased to appoint a Day of public Humiliation, throughout the Three Nations." After debating this Message, it was resolved, by a majority of 75 against 51, that the house would send an Answer thereto, by messengers of their own. This Resolution gave so great disgust to the Protector, that, on the 25th, he sent a Letter, directed to the Speaker of the commons, which was this day read, desiring them to give him a meeting at the Banqueting-House, at 3 that afternoon: accordingly, they went up thither, at the time appointed, where the Protector made another Speech to them. This is not entered in the Journals, nor have we met with it any where else. Mr. Whitlocke informs us, That the purport of it was, an exhortation to unity, and to the observance of their own rules laid down in the Humble Petition and Advice; because sir Arthur Haslerig and some others, not allowing of the new House of Lords, had spoken reproachfully of them.

Jan. 28. The Speaker having made a report of the foregoing Speech, he further told them, by the Lord Protector's desire, "That his highness intended to have imparted to them a Paper, concerning the State of the Public Monies, which he had not then ready with him; but that the house should have it, whenever they did desire the same." Hereupon, it was resolved, That a committee be appointed to wait upon the Lord Protector, and desire him to cause the Speech he had last made, to be printed; also to communicate to them the Paper concerning the State of the Public Monies; and to acquaint him, that the house would take the matters, imparted to them in the said Speech, into their serious and speedy consideration. After which it was resolved, by a majority of 92 against 84, that no private business be taken into consideration for one month.

Jan. 29. Mr. Nath. Bacon,* reported, That the committee, having waited upon his highness and presented him with the foregoing Resolutions, he gave this Answer: That his highness said, "He could not have looked upon the Committee as a committee of the house of commons, had he not seen the Paper, and the persons of the committee. That what he spake in the Banqueting-House, was delivered to both the houses; and that he was exceeding tender of the breach of privilege of either house, whereunto he had sworn; and which, by the blessing of God, would maintain; and that he did not know, nor was satisfied, that it was not against the privilege of either house, for him to give an Answer to either of the houses apart. That he spoke to the houses those things that did lie upon his own heart; and that he did acquaint them, honestly and plainly, how things stood in matters of fact; but that of the particulars he did not remember four lines: that he had considered with some persons about the Papers relating to Money, and found some particulars short, and some over; but he would take them into consideration, and set them right, and would give a timely account thereof. That he desired his affections might be presented to the house; and that he would be ready to serve them, faithfully, in the capacity he was in."—The commons, after hearing this report made, began to debate what Answer they should return to the Message brought from the other house; but came to no resolution, till the next day; and then only ordered, that the first thing to be considered should be the Appellation of the persons to whom the said Answer was to be given, but this matter not to be entered into till after a call of the house.

Feb. 1. The names of the members were all called over; and then the debate upon the foregoing matter was resumed, which continued that day and the next; when, at length, it being proposed to go immediately into a grand committee, to consider touching the Appellation of the Other House, that motion passed in the negative, by 93 against 87. However, their new lordships, desirous to try the pulse of the commons once more, sent a Message to them in writing, by two of the Judges, to this effect, "That the lords desired the commons to join with them in an Address to the Lord Protector, that his highness would be pleased to issue a Proclamation by the advice of both houses, commanding all papists, and others, who had been in arms against the Commonwealth, to depart out of London and Westminster and the late lines of communication, and 20 miles of the same, by a certain day, &c." This Message being read, the commons resolved, without a division, That they would send an Answer by messengers of their own; and then adjourned the debate till the next day.

Cromwell dissolves the Parliament.] Feb. 4. The commons resumed the debate concerning the Appellation of the other house; and were in the midst of it, when the Speaker informed them, That the usher of the black rod was at the door, with a Message from the Lord Protector; being called in, and making his obeisance, he said, 'Mr. Speaker, his highness is in the house of lords, and desires 'to speak with you.' Hereupon, the commons resolved, That the debate on the Appellation of the Other House be adjourned to their return. The Speaker then left the chair, and went up with the members to attend upon the Lord Protector, where his highness declared this present parliament to be dissolved.

His Speech on that Occasion.] This is all that can be gathered from the Journals, worth our notice, touching the proceedings of this short session. But it appears by the contemporary historians, that notwithstanding the advice and intreaties of Whitlocke and others of the Protector's Council, against the dissolution of this parliament, yet the alarms from abroad daily increasing, and the fresh informations brought him concerning the diligence of his adversaries at home, quickened him to that degree in his resolution to dismiss them, that he would not stay for his coach of state; but taking the first that was at hand, went from Whitehall, attended only by lieut. col. Cromwell his nephew, and six of his guards, to Westminster; and sending for the commons to come up to him in the house of lords, he made the following Speech:

"I had very comfortable expectations that God would make the meeting of this parliament a blessing; and, the Lord be my witness, I desired the carrying on the affairs of the nation to these ends: the blessing which I mean, and which we ever climbed at, was mercy, truth, righteousness, and peace, which I desire may be improved.—That which brought me into the capacity I now stand in, was the Petition and Advice given me by you, who, in reference to the antient constitution, did draw me to accept of the place of Protector. There is not a man living can say I sought it; no, not a man nor woman treading upon English Ground; but, contemplating the sad condition of these nations, relieved from an intestine war unto a 6 or 7 years peace, I did think the nation happy therein. But to be petitioned thereunto, and advised by you to undertake such a government, a burden too heavy for any creature, and this to be done by the house that then had the legislative capacity, I did look that the same men that made the frame, should make it good unto me. I can say, in the presence of God, in comparison of whom we are but like poor creeping ants upon the earth, I would have been glad to have lived under my wood side, to have kept a flock of sheep, rather than undertaken such a government as this is; but, undertaking it by the Advice and Petition of you, I did look that you, that had offered it unto me, should make it good.—I did tell you, at a conference concerning it, that I would not undertake it, unless there might be some other persons that might interpose between me and the house of commons, who then had the power to prevent tumultuary and popular spirits; and it was granted I should name another house. I named it of men that shall meet you wheresoever you go, and shake hands with you, and tell you it is not titles, nor lords, nor party, that they value, but a Christian and an English interest: men of your own rank and quality, who will not only be a balance unto you, but to themselves, while you love England and religion.—Having proceeded upon these terms, and finding such a spirit as is too much predominant, every thing being too high or too low, when virtue, honesty, piety, and justice are omitted; I thought I had been doing that which was my duty, and thought it would have satisfied you; but if every thing must be too high or too low, you are not to be satisfied.—Again: I would not have accepted of the government, unless I knew there would be a just accord between the governor and the governed; unless they would take an Oath to make good what the parliament's Petition and Advice advised me unto; upon that I took an oath, and they took another oath upon their part answerable to mine; and did not every one know upon what condition they swore? God knows, I took it upon the conditions expressed in the government: and I did think we had been upon a foundation, and upon a bottom; and thereupon I thought myself bound to take it, and to be advised by the two houses of parliament: and we standing unsettled till we were arrived at that, the consequences would necessarily have been confusion, if that had not been settled: yet there are not constituted hereditary lords, nor hereditary kings, the power consisting in the two houses and myself. I do not say that was the meaning of your oath to you; that were to go against my own principles, to enter upon another man's conscience: God will judge between me and you; if there had been in you any intention of Settlement, you would have settled upon this basis, and have offered your judgment and opinion.—God is my witness, I speak it; it is evident to all the world and people living, that a new business hath been seeking in the Army against this actual Settlement made by your consent. I do not speak to these gentlemen, or lords," [pointing to his right hand] "whosoever you will call them. I speak not this to them, but to you. You advised me to run into this place, to be in a capacity by your advice;

yet, instead of owning a thing taken for granted some must have I know not what; and you have not only disjointed yourselves, but the whole nation, which is in likelihood of running into more confusion, in these 15 or 16 days that you have sat, than it hath been from the rising of the last session to this day, through the intention of devising a Commonwealth again, that some of the people might be the men that might rule all; and they are endeavouring to engage the Army to carry that thing. And hath that man been true to this nation, who-soever he be, especially that hath taken an Oath, thus to prevaricate? these designs have been among the Army, to break and divide us. I speak this in the presence of some of the Army, that these things have not been according to God, nor according to truth, pretend what you will. These things tend to nothing else, but the playing the king of Scots' game, if I may so call him; and I think myself bound, before God, to do what I can to prevent it.—That which I told you, in the Banqueting-House, was true, that there were preparations of force to invade us; God is my witness, it hath been confirmed to me since, within a day, that the king of Scots hath an army at the water side, ready to be shipped for England. I have it from those who have been eye-witnesses of it: and, while it is doing, there are endeavours from some, who are not far from this place, to stir up the people of this town into a tumulting: what if I said into a rebellion? and I hope I shall make it appear to be no better, if God assist me: it hath been not only your endeavour to pervert the Army, while you have been sitting, and to draw them to state the question about a Commonwealth, but some of you have been listing of persons, by commission of Charles Stuart, to join with any insurrection that may be made: and what is like to come upon this, the enemy being ready to invade us, but even present blood and confusion? and if this be so, I do assign to this cause your not assenting to what you did invite me to by the Petition and Advice, as that which might be the Settlement of the nation; and if this be the end of your sitting, and this be your carriage, I think it high time that an end be put unto your sitting; and I do dissolve this parliament: and let God judge between me and you.”—At this many of the commons cried out, Amen!

By the sudden Dissolution of this parliament all the Bills then depending in the house of commons were rendered abortive. It is obvious, from the foregoing Speech, that the commons refusing to own the Protector's Other House as a house of lords, and consequently a court of judicature, was one principal reason of his resentful manner of dissolving this parliament.

The City of London and the Officers of the Army resolve to support the Protector. Immediately after the parliament was dissolved, Orders were issued by the Council, for preventing all private assemblies under the pretence of prayers or preaching: and so jealous was Cromwell of such part of the Army as was at this time quartered about St. James's, that he took the inspection of the watch at Whitehall, for several nights successively, in his own person. And having now got rid of his parliament, and thereby become once more an absolute sovereign, he made use of his power to new-model the Army, by removing such Officers as he suspected would obstruct his design. In order thereunto he had dismissed major-gen. Lambert from his service, for refusing to take the oath of fidelity to him, as required by the Humble Petition and Advice; but at the same time, not thinking it safe intirely to disgust a man of so great interest among the soldiery, he allowed him a pension of 2000*l.* per annum, to keep him from any desperate undertaking.—Yet, notwithstanding all these precautions, he was not without continual apprehensions. Some machinations were formed against him by the Fifth-Monarchy Men, of whom Harrison was the chief: of this Plot the Protector had early intelligence, and quickly suppressed it, by imprisoning the principal conspirators. But the repeated information he daily received, from his spies in the exiled king Charles's court at Brussels, of an intended invasion in favour of that prince, so highly alarmed him, that on the 12th of March, he sent for the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London, and also the principal officers of the Army, to attend him that day at Whitehall. What passed at this meeting we shall exhibit from the Narrative thereof published by authority.—“The company being all admitted to the Lord Protector's presence, his highness represented to them the danger wherein that city, and the whole nation were involved at present, by reason of the new designs of the old enemy, Charles Stuart and his confederates abroad, and his party here at home; who had been at work secretly to imbroil the nation again in blood, as soon as he should be able to make his intended invasion. His highness told them, that he knew this to be true; that he knew it by letters of theirs intercepted; by certain intelligence, from abroad, of their proceedings; and by information from the mouths of such persons as had been engaged to act with them. He acquainted them likewise, that the lord of Ormond, in person, had been lately in England for 3 weeks together, being come over on purpose to promote the design, by encouraging and engaging as many as he could in and about the city; and that he went away again only 3 days before: That, in order to this invasion, Charles Stuart was waiting in Flanders, having about 8000 men quartered in several places near the water side; as at Bruges, Brussels, Ostend, &c. and that 22 hired ships were in readiness to transport them, waiting only for the opportunity of some dark night to slip by the English fleet; which they might the more easily perform, our ships being of great burden, drawing much water, and so not able to ride upon the flats; and therefore seeing a real danger so near at hand, and that the peace and safety of the city, and the whole nation, was highly concerned in it, he desired the citizens might be made sensible of it, and how much it behoved them to provide for their own and the nation's security. To that end his highness recommended to the lord mayor and the body of the city, the settling their Militia; and that it might be placed in the hands of pious and sober men, well-affected to the present government, and such as were free from discontent and faction; persons that might carry on the work with alacrity and discretion; to put the city in a posture of defence, that they might be in a condition to suppress all tumults and insurrections, designed by the enemies of the nation's peace and prosperity.—The citizens expressed much cheerfulness in the presence of the Lord Protector, departed highly satisfied, and immediately set about putting his highness's direction into effectual execution."—A few days after this, an address was presented to the Protector by the lord Fleetwood, in the name of the Officers of the Army, declaring, "That they not only freely and heartily engaged to stand by his highness with their lives, but also to improve their interest with the Lord God, for his gracious and mighty assistance of Cromwell in the further prosecution of the great work which the divine majesty had called him unto."

On the 8th of April the Protector received advice of a Victory his forces had obtained against those of the king of Spain, in Jamaica, with a relation of the Spaniards losing their plate-fleet.—About Midsummer the town of Dunkirk, which at this time belonged to the Spaniards, having sustained a siege of some weeks against the united forces of England and France, surrendered upon articles; and Lockhart, Cromwell's ambassador, was put into the possession of it, (by the French king in person, and in the presence of cardinal Mazarin) in the name of his master.

Cromwell's Sickness and Death.] It was not long after all these important successes, that Cromwell himself was called upon to give an account of his conduct to the Supreme Disposer of all events: for, on the 12th of August, he was taken ill at Hampton-Court, and died on the 3rd of September following, being the same day of the same month on which he had gained the two great victories of Dunbar and Worcester; and which had, during his whole protectorate, been annually observed as a general thanksgiving.

Richard Cromwell declared Protector.] "When that potent hand," says Mr. Hume, "was removed, which conducted the government, every one expected a sudden dissolution of the unwieldy and ill-jointed fabric. Cromwell's eldest son Richard, a young man of no experience, educated in the country, accustomed to a retired life, unacquainted with the Officers, and unknown to them, recommended by no military exploits, endeared by no familiarities, could not long, it was thought, maintain that authority, which his father had acquired by so many valorous achievements and such signal successes. And when it was observed, that he possessed only the virtues of private life, which in his situation were so many vices; that indolence, incapacity, irresolution, attended his facility and good nature; the various hopes of men were excited by the expectation of some great event or revolution. For some time, however, the public was disappointed in this opinion. The Council recognized the succession of Richard: Fleetwood, in whose favour it was supposed Cromwell had formerly made a will, renounced all claim or pretension to the Protectorship. Henry, Richard's brother, who governed Ireland with popularity, ensured him the obedience of that kingdom: Monk, whose authority was well established in Scotland, being much attached to the family of Cromwell, immediately proclaimed the New Protector: the Army every where, the Fleet acknowledged his title: above 90 Addresses, from the counties and most considerable corporations, congratulated him on his accession, in all the terms of dutiful allegiance: foreign ministers were forward in paying him the usual compliments: and Richard, whose moderate, unambitious character never would have led him to contend for the empire, was tempted to accept of so rich an inheritance, which seemed to be tendered to him by the consent of all mankind."

Richard Cromwell calls a Parliament.] It being found necessary to call a Parliament, in order to furnish Supplies, both for the ordinary administration, and for fulfilling those engagements with foreign princes, particularly Sweden, into which the late Protector had entered, Richard, by the advice of his Council, issued out writs, about the middle of December, to call a Parliament to meet on the 27th of Jan.

* The question before the house was this: Whether New Malton alone, or Old Malton and New Malton together, ought to elect burgesses. When a Record of 26 Edw. I. and an Order of the House of Dec. 11, 1640, and divers other records and evidences being examined, it was resolved that Old Malton had a joint-right with New Malton to elect and send members to parliament for Malton; and consequently Mr. Howard and Mr. Marwood were duly elected, Col. Lilburn and Mr. Robinson being chosen by New Malton only.—Commons Journals, March 7, 1658.

Jan. 27. According to appointment, the new Lord Protector came to Westminster with the same state and solemnity that his father had done. The commons met in their usual place; and the new Lords took their places in the house of lords.—After all the commons that appeared were sworn, and seated in the house, sir Walter Erle put them in mind that their first work was to chuse a Speaker; and that there was, amongst them, a worthy gentleman of the long robe, whom he conceived was very fitly qualified for that service. He therefore proposed Chaloner Chute, esq. who was fully approved of by the house.—After this, the house adjourned to the next day.

The Protector's Speech at Opening the Session.] There is no mention at all in the Journals of any Speech made to both houses by the Protector at this time; but we are told, by a member of this parliament, that his highness sent the usher of the black rod to summon the Commons to attend him in the Other House, for he had somewhat to speak to them there: that, at this call, not above 12 or 15 members went out of the house, though there were some more that joined them on the way, and appeared before him: and that he made, beyond expectation, a very handsome Speech to them as follows.*

“ My lords and gentlemen; I believe there are scarce any of you here, who expected, some months since, to have seen this great assembly, at this time, in this place, in peace; considering the great and unexpected change which it hath pleased the All-disposing Hand of God to make in the midst of us: I can assure you, that if things had been according to our own fears, and the hopes of our enemies, it had not been thus with us: and therefore it will become both you and me, in the first place, (as to reverence and adore the great God, possessor of heaven and earth, in whose hands our breath is, and whose are all our ways, because of his judgments) so to acknowledge him in his goodness to these lands, in that he hath not added sorrow to sorrow, and made the period of his late highness's life, and that of the nation's peace, to have been in one day.—Peace was one of the blessings of my father's government; a mercy after so long a civil war, and in the midst of so great division which that war bred, is not usually afforded, by God, unto a people in so great a measure. The cause of God, and these nations, which he was engaged in, met in all the parts of it, as you well know, with many enemies and great opposition; the archers, privily and openly, sorely grieved him, and shot at him, yet his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob. As to himself; he died full of days, spent in great and sore travail; yet his eyes were not waxed dim, neither was his natural strength abated; as it was said of Moses, He was serviceable even to the last.—As to these nations; he left them in great honour abroad, and in full peace at home: all England, Scotland, and Ireland dwelling safely, every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beersheba. He is gone to rest, and we are entered into his labours; and if the Lord hath still a blessing for these lands, (as I trust he hath) as our peace hath been lengthened out to this day, so shall we go on to reap the fruit, and gather the harvest of what his late highness hath sown, and laid the foundation of.—For my own part, being, by the providence of God and the disposition of the law, my father's successor, and bearing that place in the government that I do, I thought it for the public good to call a parliament of the three nations, now united, and conjoined together into one Common-wealth, under one government. It is agreeable not only to my trust, but to my principles, to govern these nations by the advice of my two houses of parliament: I find it asserted in the Humble Petition and Advice, (which is the corner-stone of this building, and that which I shall adhere to) 'That Parliaments are the great Council of the chief Magistrate, in whose advice both he and these nations may be most safe and happy.' I can assure you I have that esteem of them; and as I have made it the first act of my government to call you together, so I shall further let you see the value I have of you, by the Answers that I shall return to the advice that shall be given me by you, for the good of these nations. You are come up from your several countries, as the heads of your tribes, and with hearts (I persuade myself) to consult together for their good: I can say I meet you with the same desires, having nothing in my design, but the maintenance of the peace, laws, liberties, both civil and Christian, of these nations; which I shall always make the measure and rule of my government, and be ready to spend my life for. We have summoned you up at this time to let you know the state of our affairs, and to have your advice in them: and I believe a parliament was never summoned upon a more important occasion. It is true, as I have told you, we are, through the goodness of God, at this time in peace; but it is not thus with us because we have no enemies: no, there are enough both within us and without us, who would soon put an end to our peace, were it in their power, or should it at any time come into their power. It will be becoming your wisdom to consider of the securing of our peace against those, who, we all know, are, and ever will be, our implacable enemies; what the means of doing this are, I shall refer unto you. This I can assure you, That the armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, are true and faithful to the peace and good interest of these nations; and it will be found so, and that they are a consistent body, and useful for any good ends; and if they were not the best army in the world, you would have heard of many inconveniences, by reason of the great arrear of pay which is now due unto them, whereby some of them are reduced to great necessities: but you shall have a particular Account of their Arrears, and I doubt not but consideration will be had thereupon, in some speedy and effectual way. And this being matter of Money, I recommend it particularly to the house of commons.—You have, you know, a war with Spain, carried on by the advice of parliament; he is an old enemy, and a potent one, and therefore it will be necessary, both for the honour and safety of these nations, that that war be vigorously prosecuted. Furthermore, the constitution of affairs in all our neighbour countries, and round about us, (as well friends as enemies) is very considerable; and calls upon us to be upon our guard both at land and sea, and to be in a posture able to maintain and conserve our own state and interest. Great and powerful Fleets are preparing to be set forth into these seas, and considerable armies of several nations and kings are now disputing for the mastery of the Sound, with the adjacent Islands and Countries; among which is the emperor of Germany, with other Popish states. I need not tell you of what consequence these things are to this state. We have already interposed in these affairs, in such manner as we found it necessary for the interest of England; and matters are yet in such a condition in those parts, that the state may, with the assistance of God, provide that their differences may not prejudice us.—The other things that are to be said I shall refer to my lord-keeper Fiennes; and close up what I have to say, with only adding two or three particulars to what I have already said. And, 1. I recommend to your care the people of God in these nations, with their concerns: the more they are divided among themselves, the greater prudence should be used to cement them. 2. The good and necessary work of Reformation, both in manners and in the administration of justice, that profaneness may be discountenanced and suppressed, and that righteousness and justice may be executed in the land. 3. I recommend unto you the Protestant Cause abroad, which seems at this time to be in some danger, having great and powerful enemies, and very few friends; and I hope and believe that the old English zeal to that cause is still amongst us. Lastly, my lords, and you gentlemen of the house of commons, That you will, in all your debates, maintain and conserve love and unity among yourselves, that therein you may be the pattern of the nation, who have sent you up in peace, and with their prayers, that the spirit of wisdom and peace may be among you: and this shall also be my prayer for you; and to this let us all add our utmost endeavours for the making this an happy parliament."

The Recognition Bill debated.] Feb. 1. A Bill, intituled, 'An Act of Recognition of his Highness's Right and Title to be Protector, &c.' was this day read the first time. The six succeeding days were wholly taken up in debating this grand point of government, without coming to any conclusion about it: and on the 14th, the Bill was not yet so far carried through, as to come to a commitment. We shall give the whole of this day's proceedings in the very words of the Journal. "The house took into consideration a previous Vote, upon the matter of the debate of the house, before the commitment of the Bill, intituled, 'An Act of Recognition.' The question being propounded, That it be part of this Bill, to recognize and declare his highness Richard Lord Protector, to be the undoubted lord protector and chief magistrate of the Commonwealth. The question was put, That the word 'recognize' should stand in the question, which was carried in the affirmative by 191 against

168. Then a motion being made, That the word 'undoubted' should stand in the question, it passed in the negative without a division. The question then being propounded, That it be part of this Bill to recognize and declare his highness Richard Lord Protector, to be lord protector and chief magistrate of the Common-wealth, &c. it was agreed to without opposition; and then it was farther resolved, That, before this Bill be committed, this house do declare such additional Clauses to be part of the Bill, as may bound the power of the chief magistrate, and fully secure the rights and privileges of parliament, and the liberties and rights of the people; and that neither this, nor any other previous Vote, that is or shall be passed, in order to this Bill, shall be of force, or binding to the people, until the whole Bill be passed."

Feb. 18. We have yet met with no mention of the Other House in the Journals of the Commons, till this day, when a question was proposed in that house, That they should proceed to determine the power of the Negative Voice, in the Chief Magistrate, in the passing of laws, before the constitution of the parliament, as to two houses, be first resolved on. On this question the house divided, when the numbers were found to be 86 yeas, and 217 noes; whereupon it was resolved, That the house do take into consideration the Constitution of the Parliament, as to two Houses, the first business the next morning, and nothing else to intervene.

Feb. 19. The house went upon that affair; and, after much debate, they came to two Resolutions: 1. "That it shall be part of this Bill to declare the parliament to consist of two Houses. 2. That the bounds and power of another House, in relation to the former Vote, shall be taken into consideration on the 22nd."

Feb. 22. The house went into a debate, of the Bounds and Power of another House, and continued in it all this day, without coming to any other Resolution, than to order the debate to be adjourned to the 24th.

Feb. 23. The debate on Secretary Thurloe's Report, on the State of Foreign Affairs, was entered into, and this Resolution made upon it, "That a very considerable Navy be forthwith provided and put to sea, for the Safety of this Commonwealth, and the preservation of the trade and commerce thereof."

March 1. A Question was propounded, Whether it should be the matter of debate on the next morning, that this house will transact with the Persons now sitting in the Other House, as an House of Parliament? the house divided, and it was carried in the affirmative, by 177 against 113.—The house continued in this debate every day they sat, to the 8th instant; when a further Question was proposed, by way of Addition to the other, viz. "And that it is not hereby intended to exclude such Peers as have been faithful to the parliament, from their privilege of being duly summoned to be members of that house;" another division happened on this, and was carried, affirmatively, by 195 against 188; the greatest number, and the nearest division, we have yet met with in this parliament.

A New Speaker chosen.] March 9. Mr. Speaker, being in the chair, and very much indisposed in his health, acquainted the house, That he came to the chair with a great desire to serve the house; but their sittings had been so extraordinary, and their business such, and so requiring it, that he was utterly disabled to serve them, as he would, for the present: that it was a great grief of mind to him to retard the public business, though but for one half hour, or more, as it had been this morning; that he found himself grow weaker and weaker, and therefore humbly prayed he might be totally discharged; or otherwise that he might have so much respite, at least, granted to him, as that, by the blessing of God, he might recover some better measure of health, and be enabled to return again to their service: whereupon, by the leave of the house, he left the Chair, and went home to his own house; and the serjeant attended him with the mace, out of the house, to his coach; and afterwards brought the mace back, and placed it below, under the table.—The members of the house, sitting in their places, considering of appointing another of their members to take the Chair, and supply the Speaker's place during his absence, by reason of his indisposition of health; and sir Lislebone Long, knt. recorder of London, being first named, by the general consent of the house was called, and brought to the Chair by sir Walter St. John and Mr. Gerard; and being there placed, and set in the Chair, and the mace placed on the table by the Serjeant, as is usual, it was ordered, "That in respect of Mr. Speaker's present indisposition of body, and at his earnest request, sir Lislebone Long be desired to supply the Speaker's place during his absence, occasioned by his present indisposition of health, and no longer."

March 18. Mr. Chute, the Speaker, continuing still so indisposed that he was unable to serve, the house sent a deputation of their members to visit him; which, Mr. Whitlocke says, was a very great honour to him. The Answer returned was, That Mr. Chute was still so infirm, that he could not attend the serving of the house; and sir Lislebone Long, who was chosen to execute the office for him, being actually dead, the house was obliged to go to another election, when Thomas Bampffield, esq. was unanimously agreed upon to succeed him; and Chaloner Chute, esq. dying also soon after, the other continued Speaker to the end of this parliament.

The Bill for transacting Business with the Other House carried.] March 28. The house resumed the debate on the Question of transacting with the Persons now sitting in the Other House, and the Additions to that Question. This debate lasted the whole day, and two divisions of the house were made before the main question was put. The main question being at last put, the house divided upon it; when it was carried for the Question, 198 to 125: so it was resolved, &c. "That this house will transact with the Persons now sitting in the Other House, as an House of Parliament, during this present parliament; and that it is not hereby intended to exclude such peers, as have been faithful to the parliament, from their privilege of being duly summoned to be members of that House."

March 31. This day was read a 2nd time, 'A Bill for taking away all Laws, Statutes, and Ordinances, concerning the Excise and new Impost, after years, and concerning Customs, Tonnage, and Poundage, after months, after the death of his highness the now Lord Protector.'

April 2. A Declaration for a public Fast was ordered to be drawn, by a committee appointed for that purpose, and this day it was brought and read in the house, paragraph by paragraph; and, with some additions and alterations, was consented to.

April 6. A debate arose in the commons, about the manner of transacting business with the Other House; when they came to a Resolution to appoint a Committee to consider and report their opinion of this matter: but, the same day the house, on the question, resolved, "That, in all Messages unto, and Conferences with, the Other House, the like respect, and no other, be observed by the members of this house, that is observed by the persons sitting in the Other House to them."

April 8. Sir Walter Erle reported from the committee, to whom it was referred to consider of the manner of transacting with the Other House, the Resolutions of the said committee. The first of which was, "That such Messages as shall be sent from this house to the Other House, shall be carried by members of this house." Hereupon, a debate arose, and it being put to the question, the house divided, and it went in the affirmative, 136 against 102. The second Vote, now reported from the committee, was, "That such Messages as shall be sent from the Other House to this house shall not be received, unless brought by members of their own number." This occasioned another division, and was carried also in the affirmative; but on a much nearer division than any we have met with in this parliament, being only by 122 against 114.

The Army's Petition to the Protector.] This day, a Letter from the Lord Protector directed 'To our trusty and right well-beloved Thomas Bampfield, esq. Speaker of our House of Commons, to be communicated to the house.' Signed, at the head, 'Richard P.' and dated April 8, 1659, was this day read in the house. The Journals only add, That, in the said Letter, his highness represented to the parliament the Humble Representation and Petition of the General Council of the Officers of the Armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, which was also read.—Mr. Whitlocke says, that this Petition was the beginning of Richard's fall. It was, as the same Author informs us, to set forth, "Their Want of Pay, the Insolencies of the Enemy, and their Designs, together with some in power, to ruin the Army and the Good Old Cause, and to bring in the enemies thereof; to prevent which, and to provide against Free Quarter, they desired his highness to advise with the parliament, and to provide an effectual Remedy." Mr. Whitlocke adds, "That this beginning was set on foot by Richard's near relations, Desborough, who married his aunt, and Fleetwood, who married his sister, with others of their party, whilst the parliament was disputing with the Other House, and took no care to provide Money, which exasperated the Army, and laid the foundation of all their ruins."—Mr. Ludlow tells us, "That these divisions were not confined within the walls of both houses, but broke out in the Army itself; the officers growing jealous of one another, and were divided into three factions, neither of these much superior in number; that one party was known to be well affected to the Commonwealth, and consisted chiefly of the following officers, viz. col. Ashfield, col. Lilburn, col. Fitz. lieut. col. Mason, lieut. col. Moss, lieut. col. Farley, and major Creed, with divers captains, and other inferior Officers. A second Party was known by the title of the Wallingford-House, or Army-Party, who had advanced Mr. Richard Cromwell, in expectation of governing all as they pleased: of these were lieut. gen. Fleetwood, col. Desborough, col. Sydenham, col. Clark, col. Kelsey, col. Berry, major Haines, treasurer Blackwell, and some others. The third Party was that of Mr. Richard Cromwell; who, having cast off those that had taken the pains to advance him, joined himself to men that were more suitable to his inclinations; such were col. Ingoldsby, col. Gough, col. Whaley, col. Howard, col. Goodrick, lieut. col. Keins, with many others, and more particularly those that were officers in the Scots and Irish forces: but his Cabinet Council were the lord Broghill, Dr. Wilkins, and col. Philip Jones." To these he might have added Mr. Whitlocke; who, as he himself writes, "was of this Cabinet Council, and always declared his judgment honestly, and for the good of Richard, whenever his advice was required."

April 15. The house being informed, That Mr. Chaloner Chute, who, at the first meeting of the parliament, was chosen their Speaker, was dead, Mr. Thomas Bampfield, who had been called to the chair to supply the Speaker's place, during the absence and indisposition of Mr. Chute, was appointed to that office.

The Parliament vote that there shall be no General Council of Officers without the Protector's consent.] April 18. This day the house ordered their doors to be shut, and none of the members suffered to go out without leave. A question was then proposed and put, "That, during the sitting of the parliament, there shall be no General Council, or Meetings, of the Officers of the Army, without the direction, leave, and authority, of the Lord Protector and both houses of parliament." On this question the house divided, and it was carried in the affirmative, 163 to 87. Another Resolution was also agreed to, without any division, "That no person shall have, or continue, any command or trust, in any of the Armies or Navies of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the dominions or territories thereunto belonging, who shall refuse to subscribe, That he will not disturb, nor interrupt, the free Meetings in Parliament, of any the members of either house of parliament, or the freedom in their debates and counsels." Resolved, also, "That the Concurrence of the Other House be desired to these Votes; and that Mr. Stephens do carry them to that house."—"The above Votes," says Mr. Hume, "brought affairs immediately to a rupture. The Officers of the Army hastened to the Protector, and demanded of him the Dissolution of the parliament. Desborough, a man of a clownish and brutal nature, threatened him, if he should refuse compliance. The Protector wanted the resolution to deny, and possessed little ability to resist." Accordingly, the parliament was dissolved four days after, as will be seen immediately.

April 19. Mr. Stephens reported the Answer from the Other House to the above Votes, "That they would take the same into consideration, and return an Answer by messengers of their own." But no Answer to any of these matters ever came from them.

The Lord Protector dissolves the Parliament.]

April 22. After appointing a committee to attend his highness to desire him to pay Mr. Cowper, their minister, 50*l.* for his great labour and pains in performing the duty of Prayer daily in the house, since the meeting of this parliament, the house seems to have been in a great bustle. But what is said of it in the Journals is only this, "That the house taking notice, that some of their members went out of the house, it was ordered, That those gentlemen, who now went out, should be called in again to give their attendance in the house. Also, That none of the members do depart without leave of the house; and that all strangers be commanded, forthwith, to depart out of the lobby, or outward room, before the parliament door; and that none but such as are members be suffered to come in, and the door of the said outward room be kept shut. Lastly, it was resolved, That this house be adjourned until Monday next, the 25th instant; and was adjourned accordingly."—In the mean time, a Proclamation was issued on the 22d, by the Lord Protector for their Dissolution; and by the same act, he was, by every one, considered as effectually dethroned. Soon after, he signed his dismissal in form.

The LONG PARLIAMENT or RUMP restored.]

"Thus," writes Mr. Hume, "fell suddenly, and from an enormous height, but by a rare fortune, without any hurt or injury, the family of the Cromwells. Richard, continued to possess an estate which was moderate, and burthened too with a large debt which he had contracted for the interment of his father. He extended his peaceful and quiet life to an extreme old age, and died not till the latter end of queen Anne's reign. The Council of Officers, now possessed of supreme authority, deliberated what form of Government they should establish. Many of them seemed inclined to exercise the power of the sword in the most open manner; but as it was apprehended that the people would with great difficulty be induced to pay taxes, levied by arbitrary will and pleasure; it was agreed to preserve the shadow of civil administration, and to revive the Long Parliament, which had been expelled by Cromwell. That Assembly could not be dissolved, it was asserted, but by their own consent; and violence had interrupted, but was not able to destroy, their right to government. The Officers also expected that, as these members had sufficiently felt their own weakness, they would be contented to act in subordination to the military commanders, and would thenceforth allow all the authority to remain where the power was so visibly vested. The Officers applied to Lenthall the Speaker, and proposed to him, that the parliament should resume their seats. Lenthall was a low, timid spirit; and being uncertain what issue might attend these measures, was desirous of evading the proposal. He replied, that he could by no means comply with the desire of the Officers; being engaged in a business of far greater importance to himself, which he could not omit on any account, because it concerned the salvation of his own soul. The Officers pressed him to tell what it might be. He was preparing, he said, to participate of the Lord's Supper, which he resolved to take next Sabbath. They insisted, that mercy was preferable to sacrifice, and that he could not better prepare himself for that great duty, than by contributing to the public service. All their remonstrances had no effect. However, on the appointed day, the Speaker, being informed that a quorum of the house was likely to meet, thought proper, notwithstanding the salvation of his soul, as Ludlow observes, to join them; and the house immediately proceeded upon business."

The Army's Declaration.] But, the day before the old members went to take their places in the house, the following Declaration was published, called

"The public concerns of this Commonwealth being, through a vicissitude of dangers, deliverances, and backslidings of many, brought into that state and posture wherein they now stand; and ourselves also contributing there-unto, by wandering divers ways from righteous and equal paths; and although there hath been many essays to obviate the dangers, and to settle these nations in peace and prosperity, yet all have proved ineffectual; the only wise God, in the course of his providence, disappointing all endeavours therein: And also observing, to our great grief, that the good spirit which formerly appeared amongst us, in the carrying on of this great work, did daily decline, so as the Good Old Cause itself became a reproach; we have been led to look back, and examine the cause of the Lord's withdrawing his wonted presence from us, and where we turned out of the way, that, through mercy, we might return and give him the glory.—And, amongst other things, calling to mind, that the Long Parliament, consisting of the members which continued there sitting until the 20th of April, 1653, were eminent asserters of that Cause, and had a special presence of God with them, and were signally blessed in that work, (the desires of many good people concurring with ours therein) we judge it our duty to invite the aforesaid Members to return to the exercise and discharge of their trust, as before the said 20th of April, 1653. And therefore we do hereby most earnestly desire the Parliament, consisting of those Members who continued to sit since the year 1648, until the 20th of April, 1653, to return to the exercise and discharge of their trust, and we shall be ready, in our places, to yield them, as becomes us, our utmost assistance to sit in safety; for the improving the present opportunity for settling and securing the peace and freedom of this Commonwealth; praying for the presence and blessing of God upon their endeavours. Signed, by Direction of the lord Fleetwood and the Council of Officers of the Army, Tho. SANDFORD, Sec. May 6, 1659." Which Declaration was this day presented to the Speaker by lords Lambert, lord Berry, and Cooper, sir A. Haslerig, major gen. Lilburne, col. Ashfield, col. Salmon, sir Jeremy Sankey, maj.-gen. Kelsey, col. Okey, cap. Blackwell, maj. gen. Haynes, lieut. col. Allen, maj. Packer, lieut. col. Pierson.

May 7. The Journals of this house of commons now begin without any preamble, and without taking any notice of the last breaking up: after appointing Henry Middleton, esq. their serjeant at arms, and John Phelpes, esq. their clerk of parliament, the Speaker acquainted the house, "That the lord Lambert, with divers Officers of the Army, in the name of the lord Fleetwood, and Council of Officers, upon the 6th of May, 1659, came unto him, many of the members being then present, and delivered unto him a Declaration, which was then read in the presence of the said members: the said Declaration the Speaker now tendered; which was read, as before given at p. 1546. After this, a Committee of 5 members was ordered to prepare a Declaration, to the present purpose, upon the former from the Army. Like-

* Mr. Prynne says, "That of these members, there entered only 42 into the house at first; that the rest came in to them by degrees, either to keep their old preferments, gain new, or regain the places they had formerly lost, especially the lawyers; who, notwithstanding their former compliances, were turned quite out of office, and dis-judged; that 8, or more of them, came in by new writs, issued in the name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, after the king's beheading, and were no members of the Long Parliament; that there were never 160 of them together in the house at once whilst they sat, and but 97 on the 11th and 12th of Oct. last, upon the great debate between them and the Army Officers."

wise, another committee of 12, was appointed to peruse the Books, and other Records of Parliament, concerning the members of this house, who sat since Jan. 30, 1648, until April 20, 1653, and are not excluded by judgment of parliament, and to give this house an account of the said members. The following Letter was also agreed upon, to be signed by the Speaker, and sent to the several Members that are absent.—“Sir; The parliament of this Commonwealth being, by God’s blessing, now again restored to the freedom and right of sitting, where they were interrupted on the 20th of April, 1653, have commanded me to give you speedy notice thereof, to require your personal attendance forthwith, for the carrying on the great work expected from them, in settling and securing the peace and freedom of this Commonwealth, according to your duty in that behalf. Your loving Friend.”

The Parliament’s Declaration.] The committee, according to order, brought in a draught of a Declaration, concerning the wonderful providence of God, in restoring this present parliament to the exercise and discharge of their trust; which was agreed to as follows:

A DECLARATION of the Parliament assembled at Westminster.

“Whereas the Parliament of this Commonwealth having, through the eminent favour and mercy of God, sat many years in the performance of the trusts reposed in them by the people whose representatives they are; and being, in the prosecution of that duty, assembled in parliament, at Westminster, upon the 20th of April, 1653, were then interrupted, and forced out of the house from that time until this present day. And whereas the Officers of the Army raised by this present parliament, calling to mind that the same parliament, consisting of the members which continued to sit until the 20th of April, 1653, were assertors of the Good Old Cause, and had a special presence of God with them, and were signally blessed in that work; did adjudge it their duty (the desires of many good people concurring with them therein) to invite the aforesaid members to return to the exercise and discharge of their trusts, as before the said 20th of April, 1653. And for the effecting thereof, the lord Lambert, with divers other Officers of the Army, in the name of the lord Fleetwood and Council of Officers of the Army, did, upon the 6th of May, 1659, resort unto the Speaker of the said Parliament; and, in the presence of many of the said members of parliament, presented a Declaration, containing their earnest desire, that the parliament, consisting of those members, who continued to sit since the year 1648, until the 20th of April 1653, would return to the exercise and discharge of their trust; promising their readiness in their places, as became them, to yield their utmost assistance to them, to sit in safety, for improving the present opportunity for settling and securing the peace and freedom of this Commonwealth; praying for the presence and blessing of God upon their endeavours.—Whereupon the Speaker, with the aforesaid members of parliament, resolved to meet at Westminster the next morning, give notice to others of their fellow-members of such their intention. And accordingly the Speaker, with the said members, being assembled at Westminster the 7th of May, 1659, found it a duty incumbent on them not to neglect this opportunity, which the wonderful, and, as they hope, the gracious providence of God, hath held forth unto them, for the prosecution of what yet remains of their great trust.—All which the parliament taking into their consideration, do declare, That they are resolved, through the gracious assistance of Almighty God, to apply themselves to the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in them, and to endeavour the Settlement of this Commonwealth upon such a foundation, as may assert, establish, and secure the property and the liberties of the people, in reference unto all, both as men, and as Christians; and that without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Peers: and shall vigorously endeavour the carrying on of reformation so much desired, and so often declared for; to the end there may be a godly and faithful magistracy and ministry upheld and maintained in these nations, to the glory and praise of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the reviving and making glad the hearts of the upright in the land.”

A Committee of Safety appointed.] They next proceeded to constitute a Committee of Safety, pro tempore, which were the lord Fleetwood, sir A. Haslerig, sir H. Vane, lieutenant. Ludlow, col. Sydenham, major Salway, and col. John Jones, with full power to take especial and effectual care to preserve the peace and safety of this Commonwealth; and that all officers, soldiers, and ministers of justice, give due obedience to the Orders of this committee. To sit at such time and places as they, in their discretion, shall think fit; and are to continue for the space of 8 days, and no longer.—Lastly, it was ordered, That the parliament meet to-morrow morning, being Sunday, in that place, to seek the Lord for his guidance and blessing on the parliament and their proceedings; and that Dr. Owen be desired to be assistant in carrying on the duty of the day.

May 9. Major Salway reported from the Committee of Safety, “That they have received good intelligence, That Charles Stuart intends a speedy invasion, having for that purpose 1300 men, already on their march, 500 of which are come to Bruges: and that there are lately come over from Flanders into England very many of Charles Stuart’s party, several of which are excepted from pardon; and that there were endeavours used to draw over some of the Army of this Commonwealth to theirs. They desired also, that Lambert, Desborough, and col. Bury, might be added to their committee; which was granted.” It was ordered also, That such persons, heretofore members of this parliament, as have not sat in this parliament since the year 1648, and have not subscribed the Engagement, in the Roll of the Engagement of this house, shall not sit in this house till further order of parliament.

Letters from general Monk in Scotland, and from the Army, in Ireland, were read; giving an account that the Armies in both places were in great peace and quietness, and were well pleased with the present alterations in the State.—A new Great Seal was ordered to be made, and a Committee appointed to inspect into the Treasuries of the Commonwealth, and the public Revenue.

May 10. Two Petitions were presented to the house, one from the city of London, and the other from Southwark: they were ushered in by formal speeches, congratulating the parliament's return to power, and testifying their affections to the Good Old Cause.—On this day the Secluded Members made another ineffectual attempt to resume their seats in the house.

May 11. Upon report from the Committee of Safety, of renewed information given them of endeavours, by disaffected persons, to raise disturbance in several parts of the nation, it was first ordered, "That the said committee do take care for searching, seizing, and securing such persons, and their horses and arms, for the preventing of the present danger, and security of the Commonwealth." Auxiliary Forces were also ordered to be raised, and a Militia constituted in each county, and arms to be put into such hands as had given testimony of their faithfulness to the parliament and Commonwealth.

A Petition from the Army to the House.]

May 13. The house being informed that there were divers Officers of the Army at the door, they were called in. Whereupon general Lambert, col. Desborough, and divers other colonels and officers of the Army, being come to the bar, Lambert expressed himself thus:

"Mr. Speaker; We are commanded by the Officers of the Army, to present before you their Humble Petition and Address. There are several things contained in it, which have been a long time upon their hands, and no visible way of redress. Finding, to their great joy and satisfaction, that you are returned, in discharge of their trust, they thought fit not to neglect this opportunity, but have commanded us to present this Petition."

He then exhibited a Petition, which, when the Officers were withdrawn, was read; and, being called in again, the Speaker, by direction of the house, gave them the following Answer:

"I am commanded by the house to tell you, That they have read your Petition, the Petition and Address that you have made here to us: they have commanded me likewise to tell you, That, as they found your affections before they came hither, so they find that affection continuing. For the things contained in the Petition, they are things of great weight; and many more things of great weight are lying before the house. And it is concerning that Settlement, for which the Divine Providence of God hath brought us hither, who, we hope, shall never depart from us. The house find in your Advice much love and affection; and have commanded me to acknowledge that love and affection you have shewn, and to give you thanks, very hearty thanks, for your love and expressions of it: and accordingly, in their name, I do give you very hearty thanks."

There is no further notice taken of this Petition in the Journals. It was as follows:

The Humble PETITION and ADDRESS of the Officers of the Army, to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, &c.

"Calling to mind the former Declarations of parliament, and the Grounds therein inviting us to take up arms, and those many signal providences wherein he Lord hath owned you and your forces both by sea and land, in asserting that righteous Cause, wherein the civil and religious liberties of the people of these nations were involved, so as all open opposition was beaten down before you: and likewise weighing with ourselves, how, in the several late changes in government, that public spirit which appeared in that work hath since that time been discouraged, and another raised up, drawing back to the same things you had contended against, even to the hazarding the essentials of that cause; we did, upon serious thoughts of heart, think it our duty once more to appear against those backsliding ways; and providence having brought the state of affairs to the condition they were in some few days before your sitting, we found it necessary to assert, amongst ourselves, some of the fundamentals of our Good Old Cause, with some other things conducing to the preservation thereof, with a full and fixed resolution, through the assistance of God, effectually, even to the hazard of our lives, to endeavour the recovery and security of the same. And the same good providence holding forth an opportunity to us, to open unto you a way for the further discharge of your remaining trust in parliament, we did, by our Declaration of the 6th of this instant May, humbly desire you would be pleased to return to the exercise and discharge thereof, as before the 20th of April 1653.—And having, to our great rejoicing, seen your Declaration of the 7th instant, shewing, That you are resolved, through the gracious assistance of Almighty God, to apply yourselves to the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in you, and to endeavour the Settlement of this Commonwealth upon such a foundation as may assert, establish, and secure, the liberties of the people, in reference unto all, both as men and Christians, and that without a single person, kingship, or house of peers, resolving vigorously to endeavour the carrying on the work of reformation, so much desired, and so often declared for, to the end there may be a godly and faithful magistracy and ministry upheld and maintained in these nations; which so fully answers what our hearts were drawn forth to desire, that we could not any longer forbear to express our thankfulness for this door of hope, again opened towards the obtaining a consummation of those things, so much breathed after by the good people of this Commonwealth. And however we find ourselves, in some measure, prevented, by the late Declaration and Resolves of this parliament; yet, nevertheless, we have judged it our duty to represent what was chiefly and unanimously upon our hearts, when we engaged in that which made way for your return, which we humbly, as becomes us, lay before you.—I. That the liberty of the persons, and property of the estates, of all the free people of these nations, be maintained, preserved, and kept inviolable, according to law, under the Government of a Free State and Commonwealth, without a single person, kingship, or house of peers. II. That there may be such a just and due regulation of law, and courts of justice and equity, as that they may be a protection, and not vexations or oppressive, to the people of these nations. III. That, by an Act of Oblivion, all and every person and persons, who have, since the 19th of April 1653, mediately or immediately, advised, acted, or done, or commanded or appointed to be acted or done, or by command or appointment, have acted or done any matter or thing whatsoever, in reference to the several changes or alterations in the government of these nations, since the said 19th of April 1653, or in order to the public service, peace, or safety of these nations, be indemnified and saved harmless to all intents and purposes whatsoever. IV. That all laws, ordinances, orders, declarations, and establishments made in the several changes and alterations of government that have been in these nations, since the 19th of April aforesaid, and not as yet particularly repealed, be deemed good in law, until particularly repealed. V. That such debts as have been contracted for the public service and affairs of this Commonwealth, and for the Charges of the Government, since the 20th of April, 1653, be carefully paid and satisfied. VI. That all persons who profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ, his eternal son, the true God, and in the Holy Spirit God co-equal with the Father and the Son, one God blessed for ever, and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures, of the Old and New Testament, to be the revealed or written word or will of God, shall not be restrained from their profession, but have due encouragement and equal protection in the profession of their faith, and exercise of religion, whilst they abuse not this liberty to the civil injury of others, or disturbance of others in their way of worship; so that this liberty be not extended to popery or prelacy, nor to such as shall practise or hold forth licentiousness or profaneness, under the profession of religion: and that all laws, statutes, ordinances, and clauses in any laws, statutes, or ordinances to the contrary, may be declared null and void. VII. That a godly, faithful, and painful Gospel-preaching Ministry be every where encouraged, countenanced, and maintained. VIII. That the Universities and Schools of learning be so countenanced and reformed, as that they may become the nurseries of piety and learning. IX. That such persons as have, at any time, since the 20th of May, 1642, aided, or assisted, or adhered to the late king, Charles Stuart, his son, or any other person or persons whatsoever of that party, against the parliament or Commonwealth of England; and all other persons whatsoever, that have made use of any authority or power, under pretence of law or otherwise, to deprive or abridge any of the good people of these nations of their Christian liberty, or have, or shall express themselves in any way mockers, scoffers, or revilers of godliness, or of the professors thereof, or are otherwise scandalous, or loose in their conversations, or have not given good satisfaction of their affection and faithfulness to this cause, may be speedily removed out of all places of power or trust in the magistracy, or other management of the public affairs of these nations; and that no such persons may be admitted unto any such place of power or trust for the future. X. And forasmuch as no godly or other good interest can be preserved or maintained, unless the persons, who are chiefly intrusted with the management and exercise of Government, be of suitable spirits to those interests; that those who are or shall be intrusted therein, be such persons as shall be found to be most eminent for godliness, faithfulness, and constancy, to the good Cause and interests of these nations. XI. That to the end the legislative authority of this Commonwealth may not, by their long sitting, become burthensome or inconvenient, there may be effectual provision made for a due succession thereof. XII. And for the better satisfaction and more firm union of the Forces of this Commonwealth, in this juncture of affairs, for preserving and maintaining the principles, and other matters thereunto subservient, we do unanimously acknowledge and own the lord Charles Fleetwood, lieutenant-general of the Army, to be commander in chief of the land-forces of this Commonwealth. XIII. That, in order to the establishing and securing the peace, welfare, and freedom of the people of these nations, for the ends before expressed, the legislative power thereof may be in a Representative of the people, consisting of a house, successively chosen by the people, in such way and manner as this parliament shall judge meet, and of a select senate, co-ordinate in power, of able and faithful persons eminent for godliness, and such as continue adhering to this cause. XIV. That the administration of the executive power of government may be in a Council of State, consisting of a convenient number of persons, qualified in all respects as aforesaid. XV. That all Debts, contracted by his late highness, or his father, since the 15th of Dec. 1653, may be satisfied; and that an honourable Revenue of 10,000*l.* per annum, with a convenient house, may be settled upon him and his heirs for ever; and 10,000*l.* per annum more upon him during life; and upon his honourable mother 8000*l.* per annum during her life; to the end a mark of the high esteem this nation hath of the good service done by his father, our ever-reunowned general, may remain to posterity.—These having been the thoughts and desires of our hearts, unanimously agreed upon before your returning to sit, and finding the spirits of divers of the honest faithful people of this commonwealth led forth for the same things, and yourselves, by your late Declaration and Resolutions, in a great measure assisting them, we thought it our duty to the nations, to you, and to the honest people, humbly to present these; and beg the blessing and presence of the Lord with you, in the prosecution and bringing forth such a Settlement as may be for the honour of God, the union, joy and rejoicing of all the peaceable people of this Commonwealth. And we shall pray, &c. Signed in the Name, and by the Appointment, of the Council of Officers, the 12th of May, 1659. THO. SANDEFORD, Secretary.”—Presented to the parliament by lord Lambert, lord Desborough, cols. Bury, Hewson, Barkstead, Lilburne, Cooper, Hacker, Okey, Sankey, Ashfield, maj. gen. Kelsey, cols. Prittie, Salmon, Clarke, Fitch, lieut. col. Mosse, lieut. col. Mason.

A New Council of State appointed.] May 13. The Bill for constituting the new Council of State, was read a first time; and it was resolved, “That the time for the continuance of the Council of State be till the 1st Dec.; and that the number of them consist of 31.” But a question being proposed, That ten of the said number be of persons that are not members of parliament; the house divided, and it was carried in the affirmative, 25 against 19. And Thos. lord Fairfax, maj. gen. Lambert, col. Desborough, J. Bury, John Bradshaw, sir Anth. Ashley Cooper, and sir Iloratio Townsend, were immediately named of this number: the other 3 were reserved for a general ballot, which was ordered to be got ready against next day.

May 14. The house proceeded in the election of the 21 to be chosen of the members of the house, and of the remaining 3 of the ten, to be chosen of those out of the house, to be of the Council of State. All the names being read, Mr. Raleigh, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Scott, and col. Sydney, reported, That there are, in the said Papers, these 21 persons, who have the greatest number of subscriptions; viz. sir A. Haslerig, sir H. Vane, lieut. gen. Ludlow, lieut. gen. Fleetwood, maj. Salway, col. Morley, Mr. Scott, Mr. Wallop, sir J. Harrington, col. Wanton, col. Jones, col. Sydenham, col. Sydney, Mr. Nevill, Mr. Chaloner, col. Downes, lord chief justice St. John, col. Thompson, lord commissioner Whitlocke, col.

Dixwell, and Mr. Reynolds. And the Question being put upon every one of them distinctly, they were all confirmed by the house; and so the former Committee of Safety was dissolved. Two days after, the lord Warriston, sir Rob. Honeywood, and Mr. Barners, were elected, by ballot, to make up the number ten, of those who were not members of this parliament.

A New Great Seal ordered.] May 14. The late Great Seal, made by Oliver, was brought into the house and broken; and a Bill for establishing a new one was passed. The Speaker, was made keeper of it for 8 days only.

May 16. Ordered, That Whitehall and Somerset-House, with all their appurtenances, be forthwith exposed to Sale for the advantage of the Commonwealth, and towards the satisfaction of the great Arrears of Pay due to the Army.

This day, a Committee was appointed to take into consideration the present condition of the eldest son of the late lord-general Cromwell; and to inform themselves what his Estate is, and what his Debts are, and how they had been contracted: likewise, how far he doth acquiesce in the Government of this Commonwealth, as it is now declared by parliament.

May 18. A congratulatory Letter from general Monk, and other Officers of the Army in Scotland, was read; when it was ordered, “That the Council of State should prepare a Letter of good acceptance and thanks from this house, to be signed by the Speaker, in Answer to the said Letter.

May 21. The business of the Army’s Petition and Representation was debated, and every Article of it agreed to, except the 9th, 13th, 14th, and 15th, which were referred to a grand committee of the whole house.

Richard Cromwell’s Acquiescence in the present Government.] May 25. Sir Gilbert Pickering reported, That he and the lord chief justice St. John did, according to the command of this house, repair to the eldest son of the late lord-general Cromwell, and acquaint him with the sense of this house touching his subscribing a Paper sent by him to the committee, formerly appointed to communicate to him a Declaration and Order of this house: and that he did thereupon, in their presence, sign the said Paper with his name, which was as follows:

“I have perused the Resolve and Declaration, which you were pleased to deliver to me the other night; and, for your information touching what is mentioned in the said resolve, I have caused a true State of my Debts to be transcribed, and annexed to this Paper; which will shew what they are, and how they were contracted. As to that part of the Resolve whereby the committee are to inform themselves how far I do acquiesce in the Government of this Commonwealth, as it is declared by this parliament, I trust my past carriage hitherto hath manifested my acquiescence in the will and disposition of God; and that I love and value the peace of this Commonwealth much above my own concerns: and I desire that by this a measure of my future deportment may be taken; which, through the assistance of God, shall be such as shall bear the same witness; having, I hope, in some degree, learned rather to reverence and submit to the hand of God, than to be unquiet under it: and, as to the late providences that have fallen out amongst us, however, in respect of the particular engagements that lay upon me, I could not be active in making a change in the government of these nations; yet, through the goodness of God, I can freely acquiesce in it, being made; and do hold myself obliged (as, with other men, I expect protection from the present government) so to demean myself with all peaceableness under it, and to procure, to the uttermost of my power, that all in whom I have any interest do the same. RICHARD CROMWELL."

By the Schedule annexed it appeared, that, on the death of Oliver, his father, there was due unto several persons 28,000*l.* which he had reduced to 23,550*l.* but that there had been advanced for Cloathing of the Soldiers, out of the monies assigned to the Family, 3700*l.* and borrowed by him, upon his personal security, for the supply of Dunkirk, 6090*l.* which made the total of his Debts amount to 29,640*l.* His real estate, by the Schedule, appeared to be, after paying his brother Henry 2001*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* on his marriage, his sister Frances 1200*l.* his mother 2000*l.* and other annuities, 818*l.* he had only remaining 1299*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* which was incumbered with a debt of 3000*l.* contracted by him in his father's lifetime, and yet unpaid.—The parliament having read and considered the above Paper, thereupon declared, that they accepted in good part what was expressed in the said Paper; and, in testimony thereof, put in oblivion all matters passed in reference to Richard Cromwell, and took upon them his just Debts, not exceeding the sums contained in the above-mentioned Schedule, and thought it fit that he should retire from Whitehall, and dispose of himself as his private occasions should require, demeaning himself peaceably under the protection of the parliament; and ordered that it be referred to the Committee for Inspection of the Treasury to consider in what manner his Debts should be paid: they also resolved that 2000*l.* be forthwith advanced for his present occasions; and that it be referred to a committee to consider what was fit to be done as to a settlement of a comfortable and honourable subsistence upon him.

May 31. Ordered, "That Mr. Speaker do, every morning, constantly take the chair by 8 of the clock; and that the Council of State, and committee of this house do forbear to sit in council after 8, and do then give their attendance on the service of this house. That the house do rise every day at 12; no motion to be made after that time; but the Speaker was hereby enjoined to rise."

An Act was passed for making Charles Fleetwood, esq. lieutenant general and commander in chief of all the Forces in England and Scotland. Lastly, it was resolved, "That the Continuance of this parliament shall not exceed the 7th of May, 1660."

June 20. Sir A. Haslerig reported from the Council of State, "That they found the Commonwealth likely to be greatly inconvenienced for want of Monies, the necessities both of the Army and Navy being very great, and the Weekly Income bearing no proportion to the constant Charge: That there was not money in the Exchequer sufficient to answer the charge of sending the plenipotentiaries to the Sound, notwithstanding great arrears are in the hands of particular persons, due to the government; therefore they desired the parliament would please to take into their consideration the speedy bringing in of all Monies due, and give such orders therein as may be effectual."—Upon this, the house resolved, "That 5 commissioners be appointed to manage the whole Revenue of the Commonwealth, and to take care the same be duly brought in, and to give allowaunces as they should see cause.

July 4. Sir A. Haslerig, from the Council of State, reported the humble Opinion of that Council, "That the parliament would be pleased, by their Order, to exempt and secure the eldest son of the late lord-general Cromwell, for the space of 6 months, from all arrests from any debts; to the end some course might, in the mean time, be settled concerning the payment of the said debts, according to a Declaration of parliament." Which was agreed to.

Lieut. gen. Fleetwood acquainted the house, That col. Henry Cromwell was in town, and attended to give them an account of the management of Affairs in Ireland. Hereupon it was ordered, "That it should be referred to the Council of State to hear col. Henry Cromwell's Relation as touching the management of the said Affairs; and to do therein as they should think fit." By the same Order, he had liberty given him to retire into the country, where he should think proper, on his own occasions.

July 9. Lieut. gen. Ludlow received his commission as Commander in Chief over all the Forces in Ireland; and when he had put the affairs there in good order, leave was given him to come back and settle his private concerns.

July 12. The Bill of Indemnity being read a 3rd time, and put to the question, was passed.

About this time we find, by the entries in the Journals, that the parliament began to be alarmed with the breaking out of some Plot, or an Insurrection. The first notice given of it was, That the Council of State had taken up some suspected persons; which the parliament approved of. Next, we find Orders were given to raise 6 troops of horse within the city of London; and a notification made to the citizens, That the parliament expected the magistrates and other good people of the city would give all encouragement and furtherance to what might conduce to the safety and good of this Commonwealth, in this time of imminent danger.

Insurrections against the Parliament.] July 31. This day we have some further intimation of the Plot, by some persons of distinction being apprehended, and others sought after. A Proclamation was published against John Mordaunt, esq. son to the late earl of Peterborough, summoning him to render himself to parliament. Major Salway reported to the house, from the Council of State, That they had received information of a rising in Herefordshire, and of some persons being taken prisoners there. By other intelligence, also, the Council had caused lady Mary Howard, daughter to the earl of Berkshire, and Mrs. Sumpner, to be apprehended, and had committed them, in order to their trial. The house approved of the commitment of these ladies; and appointed a committee to consider how they might be brought to a speedy trial.—This is all the intimation the Journals give, as to a designed Insurrection, which about this time actually happened under sir George Booth, in Cheshire and Lancashire.

Aug. 6. This day, care was taken by the house to provide prisons for the great number of persons who were daily brought up to town. The house also ordered 14 regiments of foot, consisting of 1000 men each, to be forthwith raised, as a Guard to the respective counties where they were to be enlisted.

Aug. 9. Sir James Harrington reported, from the Council of State, That it be humbly offered to the parliament, that, by intelligence which the Council received yesterday, and by Examinations taken last night by the lord mayor of London, it doth appear that there is a Design carrying on in the city of London, to the disturbance of the public peace, and in favour, as is to be suspected, of the late Insurrection and Rebellion in Cheshire, and those parts; and, for this purpose, the very time and place of rising in this city, as also the word which is to be given, are agreed upon; and, unless prevented, the time is to be this evening at 5 of the clock: that, as well by letters as messengers express, that are come out of Cheshire, the Council hath certain information that Charles Stuart, by the name of Charles II. hath been proclaimed at Wrexham, a market-town, and other places near Chester; and that many of the Cavaliers in the first war are joined with sir George Booth in the late Insurrection; and do already fall to their wonted profane courses of drinking healths openly to Charles Stuart upon their bare knees, and declare themselves in the principles of the old Cavaliers, whatever other disguises for the present are put upon their design, to the misguiding of many good people: the Council do therefore humbly offer to the parliament, that, by some declaratory Votes of theirs forthwith to be published, the good people of these nations, and in the city of London, may be undeceived, and be warned of the danger of adhering unto, or abetting, the said insurrections, and be encouraged to shew their good affections to this Commonwealth in suppressing the same.—Resolved, “That col. Egerton, Rob. Werden, sir Geo. Booth, and sir Tho. Middleton, being now in arms against the parliament and Commonwealth, and all their adherents and partakers, are rebels and traitors to this Commonwealth, and shall be proceeded against as rebels and traitors;” and a Proclamation was ordered out accordingly.

The Cheshire Insurrection suppressed by Lambert.] Aug. 20. A messenger was sent by general Lambert, to acquaint the house with the Success the Lord had given their Forces in Cheshire, by a total rout of the enemy.—On the 22nd several more Letters were read, particularly one from Lambert himself, with a confirmation of his Victory; for which the Thanks of the house were ordered to be sent him for his great service at this time.—Soon after, Chester and Liverpool, and some other places the insurgents had taken, were delivered up to the parliament; Lambert had 1000*l.* ordered to buy him a Jewel; and thus this attempt was quashed, the parliament being rendered more strong and formidable by it than ever.—Besides the afore-mentioned affair, the house had been busy in canvassing two important Bills; the one was for uniting Scotland with England; and the other for settling the Government on so solid a basis that it should be immoveable.

Aug. 23. An Account was brought to the house of the taking of sir George Booth, at Newport-Pagnel, the night before. He was committed close prisoner to the Tower for High Treason, in levying war against the Parliament and Commonwealth.

Sept. 22. Nothing materially occurs till this day, when the house seem to have taken some alarm, by ordering their doors to be kept shut, and no member to go out till further order; after which, the house was made acquainted with the nature of an Address, intended to be made to parliament by some Officers of the Army. Upon which col. Pierson, col. Ashfield, and col. Cobbett, were ordered to bring the original Paper, or Address, intended to be presented to parliament that afternoon; and that lieut. gen. Fleetwood do give notice of this order to them.—Accordingly, in the afternoon, the lieut. general did deliver in a Paper, or Letter, signed by many persons of the Army, and superscribed, ‘To the Supreme Authority of these Nations, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, &c. The Humble Petition and Proposals of the Officers of the Army, under the command of the lord Lambert, in the late Northern Expedition.’ After reading this Paper, the house fell into a great debate about it; but growing late, it was adjourned to the next morning, the first business, and nothing to intervene.

Sept. 23. The door of the house was ordered to be again kept shut, and no member suffered to go out without leave; the lobby to be cleared of all strangers, and that door shut also. After this, the debate began on the late Petition and Proposals of the Officers, &c. but what was said in it we cannot learn from the Journals, only it was resolved, “That this debate be kept under secrecy.” But, at the conclusion of the debate, which took up the whole day, we find the house came to the following Resolution, “That this house doth declare, That to have any more General Officers in the Army, than are already settled by the parliament, is needless, chargeable, and dangerous to the Commonwealth.” But a question being proposed, That some of the matters contained in the Paper, intituled ‘The Humble Petition, &c.’ are unseasonable, and of dangerous consequence; and the question being put, That this question be now put, the house divided; when it passed in the negative, 31 against 25. After which, lieut. gen. Fleetwood was ordered to communicate the former Vote of this house to the Officers of the Army, and to admonish them of this irregular proceeding, and to take care to prevent any further proceedings therein by the soldiery.

Oct. 5. By an Entry in the Journals of this day; and, by the subsequent proceedings, we may well suppose the parliament were growing extremely jealous of their own Army at home, and were willing to curry favour with Monk in Scotland. The entry is this; “Ordered, That a Letter be prepared, to be signed by the Speaker, to general Monk, in Scotland, taking notice of the parliament’s good acceptance of his faithfulness, and expressions of the same by his Letters, and otherwise.”

A Petition from the Army to the House, which occasions another Revolution.] On the same day, the house was informed that some Officers of the Army were at the door; who, being called in, major-general Desborough, at the bar of the house, in the name of the rest, said,

“Mr. Speaker; I am ordered, by the general Council of the Army, with the rest of these gentlemen, to wait upon you, to present unto you their Humble Representation and Petition; and they humbly desire, that you would accept it, as that proceeds from the hearts of those, who desire nothing more than that the Lord would strengthen your hearts, in carrying on that good work of settling these nations upon the foundation of a Free Common-wealth, whereby the religious and civil liberties of the good people thereof may be preserved and secured."

The Officers being ordered to withdraw, their Petition was read; after which, the Speaker, by direction of the house, gave them this Answer:

"Gentlemen: The parliament hath read your Representation and Petition; and taking notice of the good expressions of your affections and faithfulness to this parliament and Common-wealth, which are therein, have commanded me to return you the thanks of the house: and, in their name, I give you thanks accordingly. I am likewise commanded to let you know, That the parliament hath already taken into consideration the relief of the poor widows, orphans, and maimed soldiers, to whom pensions have been formerly allowed, and a way for satisfaction of the Arrears due to the officers and soldiers; and shall endeavour to bring the same to speedy effect: the other matters of your Petition are appointed to be taken into consideration on Saturday next the 8th instant."

Oct. 8. An additional Bill, for enforcing Sequestrations against the unfortunate in the late attempt, was read a 2nd time. The Officers of this terrible inquisition are next named, and their respective salaries settled; amongst whom Praise God Barebone was made Comptroller, with a salary of 300*l.* a year.

The house next proceeded to take into consideration the late Petition of the Officers of the Army; but after some debate, it was adjourned to the 10th, which day was intirely taken up in debating the affair; and, first, the said Representation and Petition was read, as follows:*

The Humble REPRESENTATION and PETITION of the Officers of the Army to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, presented to them Oct. 5, 1659, by major-general Desborough;

"Sheweth; That having had, by your Order, some late Votes of parliament communicated to us by lieut. gen. Fleetwood, our commander in chief, occasioned by a debate in parliament, upon the Petition and Proposals of the Officers under the command of the lord Lambert in the late Northern Expedition; we have inquired diligently into our hearts and ways, with reference thereunto, and finding nothing amongst us but faithfulness and integrity to the parliament and this Commonwealth, we cannot but be sensible, that there hath not wanted some persons, who have endeavoured to beget misunderstanding between the parliament and Army; and to that end have represented our actions and intentions so, as it is taken for granted there hath been irregularity amongst us, at which we fear you have taken offence. Whereas we are persuaded, that if there had not been an anticipation, it would have appeared to all unprejudiced spirits, that neither we, (who, for the generality of us, were utterly ignorant of that whereat the offence is taken) nor our faithful brethren of the Northern Brigade, who signed the said Petition and Proposals, did design or intend any thing tending to the interruption of the parliament, the prejudice of the peace of this Commonwealth, or any other bye or sinister respect, not becoming the trust reposed in us. Wherefore, being sensible of the evil use that persons abroad may make from the least apprehensions of difference between the Parliament and Army, and that we may, as much as in us lie, remove all occasions of surnize, justify our own innocency before you, and frustrate the expectations of any, who, by blowing up the coals of dissention, hope to warm themselves thereby, we have thought it our duty to present our naked thoughts to you, and hope you will find so much of integrity and approved faithfulness in us, for the welfare of this Commonwealth, as may continue a firm confidence of us, and engage your zeal against all such as shall go about to reproach your faithful Army, or any member thereof for the future; especially considering, that the peace of these nations, next under God, depends so much upon a cordial and affectionate agreement and union of the parliament and Army, and an uninterrupted good understanding of each other; and therefore we do humbly and plainly declare.—1. That, notwithstanding what any persons may suggest or say to the contrary, we are not for, but against, the setting up of any Single Person whatsoever, in supreme authority: and, for a demonstration hereof, we may appeal to your own Judgments upon our late actings; wherein, since our Declaration of the 6th of May last, we have, with all industry and faithfulness, endeavoured to render ourselves serviceable to you and this Commonwealth, and have chearfully observed your commands, some of us with our lives in our hands in your late service; wherein, to our great encouragement, the lord hath once more appeared to own you and your Army, and the good old Cause for which we have contended. And, at the late return of this parliament to the discharge of their remaining trust, we did, with simplicity and plainness, in our Humble Petition and Address presented unto you, manifest our hearts and desires, and that with much unanimity and fulness of consent, which we apprehended was well accepted by you.—2. That we have not since changed our principles, (leading to a well-regulated Commonwealth, wherein the liberties of the people thereof, both spiritual and civil, may be fully secured, and persons of known integrity, piety, and ability, employed in places of trust and concernment) but resolve, by the assistance of God, to remain constant to them; and make it our humble prayer to God, that he would incline your hearts effectually to prosecute the same, and make you instrumental in bringing forth such a foundation of Government, whereby all the good people of these nations may rationally expect that such liberties and rights shall be preserved to them and their posterities. And we can truly say, that it is in our hearts earnestly to desire, that God would crown you with the honour of making these nations happy by such a Settlement, as may not be liable, at every change of governors, to have the peace thereof disturbed, by introducing new governments.—3. Whereas a Petition and Proposals were lately drawn up, by the Officers of the brigade under the command of major-gen. Lambert, that hazarded themselves in your service with good Success, whereby, through the blessing of God upon them, and others of your faithful friends and servants, the peace of this Commonwealth is still continued; and the said Petition was sent up to some Officers here, to be presented to the lord Fleetwood, which hath been by some interpreted to evil and sinister ends, and from thence suggestions derived, as if there were intentions to violate the parliament, to set up a single person, or another general, in order thereunto: we do sincerely profess (whatever the designs of any persons may be, to promote such causeless jealousies) we have had no other than faithfulness and candour in our hearts and actions towards the parliament; nor do we apprehend (with submission we speak it) any reason or cause of offence to be conceived against your faithful servants, who lately gave so ample proof of their fidelity and courage.—4. We cannot but esteem ourselves unhappy to have been so misrepresented to the parliament, as should occasion such a public admonition upon record; and considering what evil use may be made of these things by the public enemy, and to the end they may be disappointed of their hopes, and all such persons discouraged as shall go about for the future to promote jealousies, or, by misinformation, to beget divisions betwixt the parliament and their faithful servants the Army; and that a good understanding may be preserved between them, we humbly pray, I. That the Officers of the Army, and particularly those who have reason to bear the marks of your favour, for their faithfulness in the late Northern Expedition, may stand right in your opinion, and have your countenance. II. That whatsoever person or persons shall, for the future, groundlessly and causelessly inform the house against your servants, thereby creating jealousies, and casting scandalous imputations upon them, may be brought to examination, justice, and condign punishment. III. That it being an undoubted right of the people to have liberty, in a peaceable and submissive way, to petition the supreme authority; which liberty hath been by yourselves asserted, allowed, and approved of, we cannot but also assert the said liberty, and humbly conceive that your faithful servants of the Army have no way forfeited their rights as freemen; and that therefore they hope it will be no offence for them to submit their humble Desires to the parliament. And we hope and pray you will not discourage them from so doing. IV. That you would be pleased to take into your serious consideration the necessitous condition of the poor Soldiers of your Armies; and that all possible care may be taken for their timely supply, their wants being such as earnestly call for it; and that some speedy and effectual course may be taken to provide for the maimed soldiers, and the poor widows and orphans of such as have been slain in your service, that the blessing of the desolate may be upon you. V. That such who have freely offered themselves, in the several counties and cities of these nations, to own and stand by you and your cause in the late insurrection, with the hazard of all that is dear unto them, may have your encouragement, and be employed in places of trust and command. VI. That (it being a thing granted by all, that, without due execution of martial discipline, the peace, union, and good government of an Army cannot be preserved) the discipline of the Army may be preserved inviolable; and in particular, that no officer or soldier of your Army may be cashiered, or dismissed from their places, without a due proceeding at a court-martial, or by his own consent; except in cases of reducements or disbandings. VII. That it being judged necessary by the parliament, for the keeping of the Army under such a conduct as may render the same serviceable to the Commonwealth, to appoint a Committee of Nomination, for the proposing of Officers to the parliament for their approbation, we humbly pray that no officers may be brought into the Army, but such as shall first come under the consideration of the said committee, and be by them presented. VIII. The office of the commander in chief of the Army, being of so great concernment to the peace of this Commonwealth, and his commission at present, as we conceive, expiring within a few months, we humbly pray that the consideration of that matter may come before you, and some such effectual course taken therein, as may prevent our fears, and the hazard of leaving the Army to confusion. IX. And that you would retain a good opinion of your Army; and, against all discouragements whatsoever, proceed in the carrying on of that good work intrusted in your hands, for the glory of God, and advantage of these nations. In the prosecution whereof, through the help of our God, we shall be found (notwithstanding all endeavours to the contrary) faithful to you and this Commonwealth."

Lambert, Desborough, and others, cashiered by the Parliament.] The first Proposal being read, it was resolved, that the following Answer be given to it: "That the Officers of the Army have received, and shall, from time to time, receive marks of the favour of this parliament, and countenance answerable to their merit and faithfulness."—To the 2d Proposal, the following Answer was resolved to be given: "That it is the duty of all persons, especially of the members of parliament, to inform the house of any thing which, in their apprehension, may concern the public safety; and it is the undoubted right of the parliament to receive and debate those informations, and to resolve what they think fit thereupon."

Oct. 11. The 3rd Proposal was read, to which the following Answer was resolved to be given: "The parliament declareth, that every member of the Army, as freemen of England, have right of petitioning the parliament; but withal thinks fit to let them know, that the petitioners ought to be very careful, both in the manner and in the matter which they desire; that the way of promoting and presenting the same may be peaceable, and the things petitioned for not tending to the disturbance of the Commonwealth, nor to the dishonour of the parliament: and that it is the duty of petitioners to submit their Desires to the parliament, and acquiesce in the judgment thereof."—To the 4th Proposal, the following Answer was resolved to be given it: "That 2 months Pay be forthwith paid to the officers and soldiers of the Army in England, out of the 6 months assessment of 35,000*l.* per month, now due; and that the Council of State do give order that the same be paid accordingly." Resolved, "That 2 months Pay be also paid forthwith to the officers and soldiers, in Scotland and Ireland; and that the Council of State do give Order for the payment thereof accordingly."—And it was ordered, "That the former Votes for making provisions for Officers and Soldiers, and wounded and maimed Soldiers, be also part of the Answer to this 4th Proposal; and that the Council of State do take care the Monies formerly ordered to be paid, to the use of the wounded and maimed soldiers, widows and orphans, at Ely-House and the Savoy, be forthwith paid unto the old officers there; and that they pay it according to the regulation made by the trustees and contractors at Worcester-House."—It was also ordered, "That it be referred to a committee to bring in a Bill for saving to such Apprentices, as have served the parliament in the late war, their time, and to compel their masters to grant them their freedom, as if they had been in their master's service during the time they were in the parliament's service."—Then the 5th Proposal was read, to which the following Answer was resolved to be given: "That such persons as have been faithful and active for the parliament in the late Insurrection, the parliament will take care to give them all due encouragement, as occasion shall be offered."—Then it was ordered, "That the further debate on the Army's Proposals be adjourned until the next morning, and to be the first business.—This day, the house also passed the Act against raising of Monies upon the people, without their consent in parliament.

Oct. 12. The house re-assumed the debate upon the Proposals, the 6th being read, and also a Letter dated at Whitehall, Oct. 5, 1659, signed by divers Officers of the Army, directed for col. John Okey, and a Paper, in print, intituled, 'The Humble Representation and Petition of the Officers of the Army to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, presented to them Oct. the 5th, by major-gen. Desborough, accompanied with the field officers of the Army, and subscribed by 230 commission officers in and about London, together with the Parliament's Answer thereunto.'—Then they resolved, "That the several commissions of the following persons, viz. colonels John Lambert, John Desborough, James Bury, Tho. Kelsey, R. Ashfield, Ralph Cobbett, W. Packer, Rob. Barrow, and maj. R. Creed, who have subscribed the said Letter, should be made void and null, and every of them be discharged from all military employment."—They also resolved, "That the Army should be governed by 7 Commissioners; whereupon, a Bill was drawn up and passed, empowering several persons therein named Commissioners for the government of the Army.—Then, it was referred to a committee to consider of an Answer to be given to the 6th, 7th, and 8th Proposals of the Officers of the Army, and report it to the house. After which it was ordered, "That the Commissioners for the management of the Army, be enjoined forthwith to meet and give Order, that the forces may be disposed of as may be for the peace of the Commonwealth, and safety of the parliament."

The Parliament expelled.] Oct. 13. The Journals tell us, "That this day the late principal Officers of the Army whose Commissions were vacated, drew up Forces in and about Westminster, obstructed all passages both by land and water, stopped the Speaker in his way, placed and continued guards upon and about the doors of the parliament-house, and so interrupted the members from coming to the house, and attending their service there."

Having thus gone through the Journals of this dying parliament, we shall give the manner of its exit, and how it was brought about, in the words of Mr. Hume. "The late Votes," he says, "were feeble weapons in opposition to the swords of the soldiery. Lambert drew some troops together, in order to decide the controversy. Okey, who was leading his regiment to the assistance of the parliament, was deserted by them. Morley and Moss brought their regiments into Palace-yard, resolute to oppose the violence of Lambert. But that artful general knew an easy way of disappointing them. He placed his soldiers in the streets which lead to Westminster-hall. When the Speaker came in his coach, he ordered the horses to be turned, and very civilly conducted him home. The other members were in like manner intercepted. And the two regiments in Palace-yard observing that they were exposed to derision, peaceably retired to their quarters."

Committee of Safety.] Oct. 28. The Army being again invested with Supreme Authority, had many consultations how they should new model the government; and, first, they declared Fleetwood to be their Commander in Chief. They next dispatched messengers to the Armies in Scotland and Ireland, to acquaint them with what they had done. They nominated a Council of Ten; namely, Fleetwood, Lambert, Whitlocke, Vane, Desborough, Harrington, Sydenham, Bury, Salway, and Warreston, to consider of proper ways to carry on the affairs of Government. They made, as is said before, Fleetwood chief commander, and Lambert major-general of the forces in England and Scotland; which, says Whitlocke, much discontented Monk. They appointed Fleetwood, Lambert, Vane, Desborough, Ludlow, and Bury, to be a Committee for nominating Officers of the Army; and, lastly, they kept a Day of Humiliation in Whitehall Chapel.—The next thing they did was to constitute, what they called A COMMITTEE OF SAFETY, consisting of 23 persons; and letters were sent to every one of them, to undertake the trust. This day, the Committee met. The first thing they did, was to publish a Declaration from the Army, with the Grounds and Reasons of their late Proceedings.—About this time, also, came a Letter from general Monk, then at Edinburgh, to the Officers of the Army, declaring his dissatisfaction, and of those that were with him, on the late turn of affairs. This was the first smoke perceived of that fire, which so soon after broke out.

Monk's Letter to the Speaker of the Secluded Parliament.] At the same time, came also the following Letter from Monk, directed to Lenthall, the Speaker of the secluded Parliament:

"Edinburgh, Oct. 20, 1659.

"Right Honourable; Having received notice that there was a force put upon the Parliament on the 12th of this instant, I have sent this messenger to your lordship, to know whether that force doth continue; for I am resolved, by the grace and assistance of God, as a true Englishman, to stand to and assert the liberty and authority of parliament: and the Army here, praised be God, is very courageous and unanimous; and I doubt not but to give a good account of this action, to you. I have, according to your Act of the 11th inst. being constituted a Commissioner for the Government of the Army, put out such persons as would not act according to your commission. I do call God to witness, That the asserting of a Commonwealth is the only intent of my heart; and I desire, if possible, to avoid the shedding of blood, and therefore intreat you, that there may be a good understanding between the Parliament and Army: but if they will not obey your commands, I will not desert you, according to my duty and promise. Which is all at present from Your, &c. GEORGE MONK."

VOL. III.

The Committee of Safety easily foresaw what a hurricane from the North was coming upon them; and therefore cast about, with all their cunning, to prevent the evil consequences of such a storm. Some persons were sent to the General to inform him better of things, and to gain him over to their schemes of government. But, at the same time, Lambert was also ordered down to command the Forces that were quartered at York, and the northern parts of England, with some more regiments with him, in order to stop, or prevent, any sinister design that Monk might have against them.—In the mean time, the said Committee appointed a Sub-Committee, consisting of Fleetwood, Whitlocke, Vane, Ludlow, Salway, and Tichburne, to consider of a Form of Government for the three nations, as a Commonwealth. By a formal Order of State, they also constituted the lord Whitlocke, Keeper of the Great Seal, till further order.

Monk advances with his Army towards England.] Hearing that Lambert was advancing northward with his Army, Monk, says Mr. Hume, "sent Clobery and two other commissioners to London, with large professions of his inclination to peace, and with offers of terms for an accommodation. His chief aim was to gain time and relax the preparations of his enemies. The Committee of Safety fell into the snare. A Treaty was signed by Monk's Commissioners; but he refused to ratify it, and complained that they had exceeded their powers. He desired, however, to enter into a new negotiation at Newcastle (November.) The Committee willingly accepted this fallacious offer. Meanwhile, these military sovereigns found themselves surrounded on all hands with inextricable difficulties. The nation had fallen into total anarchy; and by refusing the payment of all taxes, reduced the army to the greatest necessities. While Lambert's forces were assembling at Newcastle, Haslerig and Morley took possession of Portsmouth, and declared for the parliament. A party, sent to suppress them, was persuaded by their commander to join in the same declaration. The city Apprentices rose in a tumult, and demanded a free parliament. Though they were suppressed by colonel Hewson, a man who from the profession of a cobbler had risen to a high rank in the army, the city still discovered symptoms of the most dangerous discontent. It even established a kind of separate government, and assumed the supreme authority within itself. Admiral Lawson with his squadron came into the river, and declared for the parliament. Haslerig and Morley, hearing of this important event, left Portsmouth, and advanced towards London. The regiments near that city being solicited by their old Officers, who had been cashiered by the Committee of Safety, revolted again to the parliament. Desborough's regiment, being sent by Lambert to support his friends, no sooner arrived at St. Albans, than it declared for the same assembly.—Fleetwood's hand was found too weak and unstable to support this ill-founded fabric, which, every where around him, was falling into ruins. When he received intelligence of any murmurs among the soldiers, he would prostrate himself in prayer, and could hardly be prevailed with to join the troops. Even when among them, he would, in the midst of any discourse, invite them all to prayer, and put himself on his knees before them. If any of his friends exhorted him to more vigour, they could get no other answer, than that God had spitten in his face, and would not hear him. Men now ceased to wonder, why Lambert had promoted him to the office of general, and had contented himself with the second command in the army."

The Long Parliament a third time restored.] Dec. 26. Lenthall, the Speaker, being invited by the Officers, again assumed authority and summoned together the parliament, which twice before had been expelled with so much reproach and ignominy. They met this day at Whitehall, from whence they proceeded to the parliament house, on foot; those very soldiers shouting as they now passed by, who, but a little more than two months ago, by force shut them out of the house. The Journals now begin again, and proceed without the least notice being taken of the interruption in them. Mr. Pryne, together with several of the Secluded Members, made another fruitless attempt to gain admittance.—As soon as assembled, the house proceeded to repeal the Act against the payment of Excise and Customs; they appointed Commissioners for assigning Quarters to the Army; and, without taking any notice of Lambert, they sent orders to the Forces under his command immediately to repair to those quarters which were appointed them.

Dec. 27. Resolved, "That Mr. Speaker be desired to write Letters to the several Members of this house, forthwith to give their attendance on that service." This Vote was very necessary; for, on a division this day about a Commissioner of the Customs, the numbers were only 20 to 17.

Dec. 28. Col. Ingoldsby gave an Account of his taking and securing Windsor Castle for the parliament; which action the house approved of, and gave Thanks to him and the Forces under him.

A new Council of State elected.] Dec. 30. The house began to prepare for the electing a new Council of State, consisting of 21 of their own members, and 10 of such as were not of the house. The next day, the Names of the persons who had most voices, and were members of this parliament, were reported viz. Sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Morley, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Scott, Mr. Love, Mr. St. John, Col. White, Mr. Weaver, Mr. Reynolds, Sir J. Harrington, Mr. Luke Robinson,* Col. Thompson, Mr. John Dixwell, Mr. Nevill, Col. Fagg, Mr. Corbet, Mr. Chaloner, Mr. Hen. Martin, Mr. Wm. Say, Col. Walton, Sir Tho. Widdrington.—The 10 Persons out of the house were, Sir A. A. Cooper, Gen. Monk, Admiral Lawson, Alderman Love, Josias Barners, lord Fairfax, Alderman Foote, —Tyrrill, R. Roll, S. Bethell. —The time for the continuance of this Council of State, to sit and act, was voted to be only from Jan. the 1st, 1659, to the 1st of April, 1660. Instructions were drawn up and agreed to for them to act by, which are not entered in the Journals.

Jan. 3. It was resolved, "That Writs should issue out for electing members to sit and serve in parliament, in the places of those members of this house that were dead, under such qualifications as should be agreed upon by the house."

Jan. 9. It was resolved, "That the colonels John Lambert, Desborough, Ashfield, Bury, Kelsey, Cobbet, Barrow, Packer, and major Creed, be forthwith enjoined to repair to their respective houses in the country, farthest distant from the city of London, and to continue there during the pleasure of the parliament.

Jan. 12. The house received another Letter from gen. Monk, which was sent by Mr. Gumblet, one of his chaplains, and dated from Newcastle, Jan. 6, 1659.—Upon which it was resolved, "That the parliament doth justify and approve of what gen. Monk hath done, in taking up horses, and in his marching into England, and all other things by him acted and done, in order to the service of the Parliament and Common-wealth." And the Solicitor-General was ordered to bring in an Act for justifying and approving what gen. Monk had done. The house was now almost solely employed in nominating Officers to several regiments; nothing else intervening of any consequence, save that the Speaker, being taken ill in the house, desired leave to absent himself for ten days; which was granted, and Mr. Say elected to supply his room.

Jan. 14. The Council of State was authorized and enjoined to secure the colonels Lambert, Desborough, Bury, Kelsey, Cobbet, Ashfield, Barrow, Packer, and major Creed, and all other persons whatsoever, who had been banished to their country-houses, by orders, or warrants, from parliament, and have not obeyed such orders.

£.1000 Land a Year voted for General Monk.] Jan. 16. The parliament ordered, "That 1000*l.* a year, land of inheritance, be settled upon gen. George Monk, and his heirs, as a mark of the favour and respect of the parliament, for his eminent and signal services for the parliament and Common-wealth.—It was also ordered, "That Mr. Scott and Mr.

Robinson be desired to go to commissioner Monk, to congratulate with him from the parliament, for the good success the Lord had given to his endeavours, and to let him know the sense they have of his great services; and that care is taken by the parliament to provide Money for his Officers and Soldiers."—A Letter was likewise ordered to be sent to gen. Monk, to let him know the sense the parliament had of his great services, and that they are providing Money for his soldiers: and that the parliament were glad to hear of his repairing to London, according to their desire.

Jan. 21. Ordered, "That it be referred to a committee to bring in a declaration, on Monday next, That the parliament intends forthwith to proceed to the Settlement of the Government; and will uphold a learned and pious Ministry in the nation, and their maintenance by Tythes and the known laws of the land: That they will proceed to fill up the house as soon as may be; and to settle the Common-wealth without a King, Single Person, or House of Peers, and will promote the Trade of the nation: that they will reserve due Liberty to tender consciences; and encourage and settle the Universities: That they will not meddle with the executive power of the Law, but only in case of mal-administration and appeals; and that proceedings shall be according to the laws: and also, that they will ease the Burdens of the nation as much as is consistent with the pressing necessities of the Common-wealth."—On the 23rd, a Declaration to this effect was brought in, and agreed to.

General Monk enters England with his Army.] Having now brought this month of January to a close, and given all the material transactions of parliament which happened in it, and are entered in the Journals, it will be necessary to go back a little, in order to see what General Monk and his Army were doing at this time. Mr. Hume informs us, "That Monk was advancing with his Army, which was near 6000 men: the scattered forces in England were above five times more numerous. Fairfax, who had resolved to declare for the king, not being able to make the general open his intentions, retired to his own house in Yorkshire. In all counties through which Monk passed, the prime gentry flocked to him with Addresses, expressing their earnest desire, that he would be instrumental in restoring the nation to peace and tranquillity, and to the enjoyment of those liberties, which by law were their birthright, but of which, during so many years, they had been fatally bereaved: and that, in order to this salutary purpose, he would prevail, either for the restoring of those Members who had been secluded before the king's death, or for the election of a New Parliament, who might legally, and by general consent, again govern the nation. Though Monk pretended not to favour these Addresses, that ray of hope, which the knowledge of his character and situation afforded, mightily animated all men. The tyranny and the anarchy, which now equally oppressed the kingdom; the experience of past distractions, the dread of future convulsions, the indignation against military usurpation, against sanctified hypocrisy: all these motives had united every party, except the most desperate, into ardent wishes for the King's Restoration, the only remedy for all these fatal evils.—Scot and Robinson were sent as deputies by the parliament, under pretence of congratulating the general, but in reality to serve as spies upon him. The city dispatched four of their principal citizens to perform like compliments; and at the same time to confirm the General in his inclination to a free parliament, the object of all men's prayers and endeavours. The authority of Monk could scarcely secure the parliamentary deputies from those insults, which the general hatred and contempt towards their masters drew from men of every rank and denomination.—Monk continued his march with few interruptions till he reached St. Albans.* He there sent a message to the parliament; desiring them to remove from London those regi-

* Dr. Price, in his History of the Restoration, speaking of the Quarters at St. Albans, says, "Here we spent one day extraordinary at the Church; the famous Hugh Peters, Mr. Lee of Hatfield, and another, carrying on the work of the day, which was a Fast. Peters supererogated, and prayed a long prayer in the General's Quarters too at night. As for his sermon, he managed it with some dexterity at the first, allowing the cantings of his expressions: his text was Psalm cvii. 7. 'He led them forth by the right way, that they might go to the City of Habitation.' With his fingers on the cushion he measured the right way from the Red Sea, through the Wilderness, to Canaan; told us it was not 40 days march, but God led Israel 40 years through the Wilderness before they came thither; yet this was still the Lord's right Way, who led his people crinkledum cum crankledum. And he particularly descended into the lives of the patriarchs, how they journeyed up and down, though there were promises of blessing and rest to them. Then he reviewed our Civil Wars, our intervals of peace, and fresh distractions and hopes of rest; but though the Lord's people, he said, were not yet come to the City of Habitation, he was still leading them on in the right way, how dark soever his dispensations might appear to us. Before he concluded, he seemed to me to preach his own funeral sermon. But it was in those days observed of an Army-Fast, that it commonly proved the fore-runner of some solemn mischief, and rendered their governors (whose supremacy, in causes ecclesiastical, was not owned by these kind of subjects) jealous of them: for they would not scruple religiously to meet to seek the Lord, without the mandate and direction of their masters; and, in truth, they knew so well at what turning to find him, that their Seeking was never in vain."

ments, which, though they now professed to return to their duty, had so lately offered violence to that assembly. This Message was unexpected, and exceedingly perplexed the house. Their fate, they found, must still depend on a mercenary army; and they were as distant as ever from their imaginary sovereignty. However, they found it necessary to comply. The soldiers made more difficulty. A mutiny arose among them. One regiment, in particular, quartered in Somerset-house, expressly refused to yield their place to the northern army. But those officers who would gladly, on such an occasion, have inflamed the quarrel, were absent, or in confinement; and for want of leaders, the soldiers were at last, with great reluctance, obliged to submit (Feb 3). Monk with his army took quarters in Westminster."

General Monk's first Speech to the Parliament.] Feb. 4. This day it was ordered, "That General Monk do attend the house on Monday next, to receive the sense of the parliament, in relation to his signal and faithful services; and that Mr. Scott and Mr. Robinson do accompany him."

Feb. 6. This day, we find no mention made of an interview between the General and the Parliament, in the Journals; though it certainly took place. There is an hiatus, marked with asterisks, at the end of this day's proceedings, in which, probably, the clerk should have entered it: The Speech which the General made to the house, at this their first meeting, was as follows:*

"Mr. Speaker; Amongst the many mercies of God to these poor nations, your peaceable restoration is not the least: it is his work alone, and to him belongs the glory of it. And I esteem it as a great effect of his goodness to me, that he was pleased to make me, amongst many worthier in your service, some way instrumental in it. I did nothing but my duty, and do not deserve to receive so great honour and respect as you are pleased to give me at this time and place, which I shall ever acknowledge as an high mark of your favour to me. Sir, I shall not now trouble you with large narratives, only give me leave to acquaint you, that, as I marched from Scotland hither, I observed the people in most counties in great and earnest expectations of Settlement; and they made several applications to me, with numerous subscriptions. The chiefest heads of their Desires were, For a free and full parliament, and that you would determine your sitting; a Gospel Ministry; encouragement of Learning and Universities; and for admittance of the Members secluded before 1648, without any previous oath or engagement. To which I commonly answered, That you are now in a free parliament; and if there be any force remaining upon you, I would endeavour to remove it: and that you had voted to fill up your house, and then you would be a full parliament also; and that you had already determined your sitting. And for the Ministry, their Maintenance, the Laws and Universities, you had largely declared in your last Declaration, and I was confident you would adhere to it; but as for those gentleman secluded in 1648, I told them you had given judgment in it, and all people ought to acquiesce in that judgment; but to admit any members to sit in parliament, without a previous Oath or Engagement to secure the Government in being, it was never yet done in England. And although I said it not to them, I must say it with pardon, to you, That the less Oaths and Engagements are imposed, (with respect had to the security of the Common Cause) your settlement will be the sooner attained to. I am the more particular in these matters, to let you see how grateful your present consultations about these things will be to the people. I know all the sober gentry will heartily close with you, if they may be tenderly and gently used; and I am sure you will so use them, as knowing it to be our common concern, to expatiate, and not to narrow our interests: and to be careful neither the cavalier nor fanatic party have yet a share in your civil or military power; of the last of whose impatience to government, you have had so severe experience.—I should say something of Ireland and Scotland: Indeed Ireland is in an ill condition, and made worse by your sudden interruption, which prevented the passing an Act for the Settlement of the Estates of Adventurers and Soldiers there, which I heard you intended to have done in a few days; and I presume it will be quickly done, being so necessary at this time, when the wants of the Commonwealth call for Supplies, and people will unwillingly pay Taxes for those estates of which they have no legal assurance. I need not tell you how much your favour was abused in the nomination of your Officers of your Army there: their malice hath been sufficiently manifested. I dare affirm that those now that have declared for you, will continue faithful, and thereby evince, that, as well there as here, it is the sober interest that must establish your Dominion.—As for Scotland; I must say the people of that nation deserve much to be cherished; and I believe your late Declaration will much glad their spirits; for nothing was more dreadful to them, than a fear to be over-run with fanatic notions.—I humbly recommend them to your affection and esteem, and desire the intended Act of Union may be prosecuted, and their taxes made proportionable to those in England, for which I am engaged, by promise, to be an humble suitor to you. And truly, sir, I must ask leave to entreat you to make a speedy provision for their civil government, of which they have been destitute near a year, to the ruin of many families: and except commissioners for management of the government, and judges to sit in courts of judicature, he speedily appointed, that country will be very miserable. I directed Mr. Gumble lately to present to you some names, both of commissioners and judges: but by reason of your great affairs, he was not required to deliver them in writing to you. I now humbly present them to your consideration."

"This Speech," says Mr. Hume, "containing matter which was both agreeable and disagreeable to the house as well as to the nation, still kept every one in suspense, and upheld that uncertainty, in which it seemed the general's interest to retain the public. But it was impossible for the kingdom to remain long in this doubtful situation: the people, as well as the parliament, pushed matters to a decision. During the late convulsions, the payment of Taxes had been interrupted; and though the parliament, upon their assembling, renewed the Ordinances for Impositions, yet so little reverence did the people pay to those legislators, that they gave very slow and unwilling obedience to their commands. The common-council of London flatly refused to submit to an Assessment required of them; and declared that, till a free and lawful parliament imposed taxes, they never should deem it their duty to make any payment. This resolution, if yielded to, would immediately have put an end to the dominion of the parliament: they were determined, therefore, upon this occasion to make at once a full experiment of their own power and of their general's obedience.

Feb. 9. General Monk received orders to march into the city; to seize 12 persons, the most obnoxious to the parliament; to remove the posts and chains from all the streets; and to take down and break the portcullises and gates of the city: and very few hours were allowed him to deliberate upon the execution of these violent orders: to the great surprise and consternation of all men, Monk prepared himself for obedience. Neglecting the entreaties of his friends, the remonstrances of his officers, the cries of the people, he entered the city in a military manner, he apprehended as many as he could of the proscribed persons, whom he sent to the Tower; with all the circumstances of contempt he broke the gates and portcullises; and having exposed the city to the scorn and derision of all who hated it, he returned in triumph to his quarters in Westminster.—No sooner had the General leisure to reflect, than he found, that this last measure, instead of being a continuation of that cautious ambiguity, which he had hitherto maintained, was taking party without reserve, and laying himself, as well as the nation, at the mercy of that tyrannical parliament, whose power had long been odious, as their persons contemptible, to all men. He resolved, therefore, before it was too late, to repair the dangerous mistake into which he had been betrayed, and to show the whole world, still more without reserve, that he meant no longer to be the minister of violence and usurpation."

Feb. 11. After complaining of the odious service in which he had been employed, General Monk wrote a Letter to the house, reproaching them, as well with the new cabals which they had formed with Vane and Lambert, as with the encouragement given to a fanatical Petition presented by Praise-God Barebone; and he required them, in the name of the citizens, soldiers, and whole Commonwealth, to issue writs, within a week, for the filling of their house, and to fix the time for their own dissolution and the assembling of a New Parliament. Having dispatched this Letter, which might be regarded, he thought, as an undoubted pledge of his sincerity, he marched with his Army into the city, and desired Allen, the mayor, to summon a Common-Council at Guildhall. He there made many apologies for the indignities which, two days before, he had been obliged to put upon them; assured them of his perseverance in the measures which he had adopted; and desired that they might mutually plight their faith for a strict union between City and Army, in every enterprize for the happiness and Settlement of the Commonwealth.—It would be difficult to describe the joy and exultation, which displayed itself throughout the city, as soon as intelligence was conveyed of this happy measure, embraced by the General. The prospect of peace, concord, liberty, justice, broke forth at once, from amidst the deepest darkness in which the nation had ever been involved. The view of past calamities no longer presented dismal prognostics of the future: it tended only to enhance the general exultation for those scenes of happiness and tranquillity, which all men now confidently promised themselves. The Royalists, the Presbyterians, forgetting all animosities, mingled in common joy and transport, and vowed never more to gratify the ambition of false and factious tyrants, by their calamitous divisions. The populace, more outrageous in their festivity, made the air resound with acclamations, and illuminated every street with signals of jollity and triumph. Applauses of the General were every where intermingled with detestation against the Parliament. The most ridiculous inventions were adopted, in order to express this latter passion. At every bonfire rumps were roasted,* and where these could no lon-

* "Monday at night (Feb. 13) was a great rejoicing in Oxon for the news, that then was brought, that there should suddenly be a Free-Parliament. The bells rang, and bonfires were made, and some rumps and tails of sheep were flung into a bonfire at Queen's College gate. Dr. John Palmer, a great Rumper, Warden of All Souls College in the place of Dr. Sheldon, being then very ill and weak, had a Rump thrown up from the street at his windows. He had been one of the Rump Parliament, and a great follower of Oliver." Wood's Life, written by himself. See Oxoniana, vol. iv. p. 217. London, 1807.

ger be found, pieces of flesh were cut into that shape; and the funeral of the parliament (the populace exclaimed) was celebrated by these symbols of hatred and derision.—The parliament, though in the agonies of despair, made still one effort for the recovery of their dominion. They sent a Committee with offers to gain the General. He refused to hear them, except in the presence of some of the Secluded Members. Though several persons, desperate from guilt and fanaticism, promised to invest him with the dignity of supreme magistrate, and to support his government, he would not hearken to such wild proposals. Having fixed a close correspondence with the city, and established its militia in hands whose fidelity could be relied on, he returned with his army to Westminster, and pursued every proper measure for the Settlement of the nation. While he still pretended to maintain republican principles, he was taking large steps towards the re-establishment of the ancient monarchy.

Feb. 21. The Secluded Members, upon the General's invitation, went to the house, and finding no longer any obstruction, they entered, and immediately appeared to be the majority: most of the Independents left the place. The restored members first repealed all the Ordinances, by which they had been excluded: they gave sir George Booth and his party their liberty and estates: they renewed the General's commission, and enlarged his powers."

General Monk's Speech and Declaration to the Parliament.] This day, a letter from general Monk, at Whitehall, of the 21st of Feb. 1659, was read: This is all the intimation the Journals give us of a Letter of this date; but the old Collection which we have mentioned calls it a Speech and a Declaration which the General made to the house at Whitehall, Feb. 21, from which authority we shall here introduce them:*

The SPEECH of his Excellency the Lord General Monk.

"Gentlemen; You are not, I hope, ignorant what care and endeavours have been used, and means essayed, for healing the breaches of our divisions amongst ourselves; and that, in order thereunto, divers conferences have been procured between you, though to small effect; yet having at length received fuller satisfaction from these worthy gentlemen that were secluded than formerly, I was bold to put you all to the trouble of this meeting, that I might open myself to you all, even with more freedom than formerly: but, lest I might be misapprehended or mistaken, as of late it befel me, I have committed to writing the Heads of what I intended to discourse to you, and desire it may be read openly to you all."

* These were also printed by themselves in a single Pamphlet, by the General's Order, for John Playford, in the Temple, 1659.

The DECLARATION.

"Gentlemen; It appears unto me, by what I have heard from you and the whole nation, that the peace and happy Settlement of these bleeding nations, next under God, lieth in your hands. And when I consider that wisdom, piety, and self-denial, which I have reason to be confident lodgeth in you; and how great a share of the nation's sufferings will fall upon you, in case the Lord deny us now a Settlement, I am in very good hopes there will be found in you all such melting bowels towards these poor nations, and towards one another, that you will become healers and makers-up of all its woeful breaches. And that such an opportunity may clearly appear to be in your hands, I thought good to assure you, and that in the presence of God, that I have nothing before my eyes but God's glory, and the Settlement of these nations upon Commonwealth foundations: in pursuit whereof I shall think nothing too dear; and, for my own particular, I shall throw myself down at your feet, to be any thing or nothing in order to these great ends.—As to the way of future Settlement, far be it from me to impose any thing; I desire you may be in perfect freedom; only give me leave to mind you, that the old foundations are, by God's providence, so broken, that, in the eye of reason, they cannot be restored, but upon the ruin of the people of these nations, that have engaged for their rights in defence of the parliament, and the great and main ends of the Covenant, for uniting and making the Lord's name one in the three nations. And also the liberty of the people's representatives in parliament will certainly be lost; for if the people find that, after so long and bloody a war against the king for breaking in upon their liberties, yet at last he must be taken in again, it will be out of question, and is most manifest, he may for the future govern by his will, dispose of parliaments and parliament men as he pleaseth, and yet the people will never more rise for their assistance.—And as to the interests of this famous city, (which hath been, in all ages, the bulwark of parliaments, and unto whom I am, for their great affection, so deeply engaged) certainly it must lie in a Commonwealth; that government only being capable to make them, through the Lord's blessing, the metropolis and bank of trade for all Christendom, whereunto God and nature hath fitted them above all others.—And as to a Government in the Church, the want whereof hath been no small cause of these nations distractions; it is most manifest, that, if it be Monarchical in the State, the Church must follow, and prelacy must be brought in; which these nations, I know, cannot bear, and against which they have so solemnly sworn: and indeed moderate, not rigid, Presbyterian government, with a sufficient liberty for consciences truly tender, appears at present to be the most indifferent and acceptable way to the Church's Settlement.—The main thing that seems to lie in the way is the interest of the lords, even of those lords who have shewed themselves noble indeed, by joining with the people; and, in defence of those just rights, have adventured their dearest blood and large estates. To that I shall only say, That though the State of these nations be such as cannot bear their sitting in a distinct house, yet certainly the wisdom of parliament will find out such hereditary marks of honour for them, as may make them more noble in after ages.—Gentlemen; Upon the whole matter, the best result that I can make at present for the Peace of these nations, will be, in my opinion, that you forthwith go to sit together in parliament, in order, 1. To the settling the Conduct of the Armies of the three nations in that manner as they may be serviceable to the peace and safety of them, and not to its own and the nations ruin by faction and division. 2. To the providing sufficient maintenance for them; that is, for the Forces by land, and for the Navy by sea, and all the Arrears of both, and other contingencies of the government. 3. To the appointing a Council of State, with authority to settle the civil government and judicatories in Scotland and Ireland, and to take care for the issuing of writs for the summoning a Parliament of these three nations united, to meet at Westminster the 20th of April next, with such Qualifications as may secure the public cause we are all engaged in, and according to such distributions as were used in 1654: which parliament, so called, may meet and act in freedom, for the more full establishing of this commonwealth without a king, single person, or house of lords. 4. To a legal Dissolution of this parliament, to make way for succession of parliaments.—And, in order to these good ends, the guards will not willingly only admit you, but faithfully, both myself and every the officers, under my command; and, I believe, the officers and soldiers of the three nations, will spend their blood for you and successive parliaments. If your conjunction be directed to this end, you may part honourably, having made a fair step to the Settlement of these nations, by making a way for successive parliaments.—But I must needs say, that if any different counsels should be taken, which I have no reason to fear, these nations would presently be thrown back into force and violence, and all hopes of this much-desired establishment be buried in disorder; which the Lord, in his great mercy, I hope, will prevent: and so God speed you well together, and unite your hearts for the preservation of Peace, and Settlement of these nations to his own glory, and yours and all our comforts.”

A Council of State appointed: and a Bill for the Dissolution of the Parliament brought in.]

Feb. 24. This Speech and Declaration appears to have been very pleasing to the members, for this day, the Bill for constituting Monk Captain-General and Commander in Chief of all the land-forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, was read a 1st and 2nd time, and committed. —Instructions for the new Council of State were also debated this day, and many Additions and Alterations made to them; after which they were ordered to be ingrossed. The question being put, That a particular time be limited for the continuance of the Council of State, it passed in the negative, 36 against 26, and it was agreed, that the time should be till the parliament take further order. Lastly, a Bill was ordered to be brought in, for the Dissolution of this present Parliament; and that Mr. Annesley, Mr. Pryne, and Mr. Solicitor-General do prepare and bring in the said Bill.

Feb. 25. The Bill for constituting general Monk, Captain-General, &c. was read a 3rd time.—Another Bill was read a first time, for settling the Honour and Manor of Hampton-Court, and other Lands, upon general Monk, and his heirs.—The Bill for constituting a Council of State, with Instructions, was read a 3rd time and passed.

Feb. 27. A Committee was appointed to consider who were in Prison and upon what account; who were fit to be discharged from their Imprisonment, and the Sequestrations of their Estates suspended; and present their opinions thereon to the parliament.

John Thompson and John Thurloe, esqrs. being both nominated for a Secretary of State, the house divided on the question, when Thurloe, who had been secretary to Oliver Cromwell, was elected by a majority of 65 to 38.

A Bill for dissolving this present Parliament was this day read once, and referred back to the committee who brought it in, to prepare a Form of a Writ for election of members to sit and serve in parliament, and how, and in what manner, the new parliament should be summoned.—Another Bill, for settling the Militia in the several counties of the Commonwealth, was also read a first time.

Feb. 29. The first thing the house did was to return Thanks to Mr. Calamy and Mr. Manton, for their great pains taken the day before in Margaret's Church, Westminster, in carrying on the Work of Thanksgiving for the Union of the Parliament, and restoring the Members of it to the discharge of their trust. Immediately after, a Committee was appointed to consider of settling of Ministers, and all matters concerning Religion and the Confession of Faith.

March 1. This day, a Committee was appointed to consider of the State of the Revenue of the Commonwealth; what the Charge of it is; what Obstructions hinder the bringing-in of the Revenue; how the State of the Debts stand; and how the Revenue may be managed for the best advantage of the Commonwealth. The same day the Question being put, That the Dissolution of this Parliament shall be on or before the 15th instant, it was carried in the affirmative, without any division.

March 5. An Act, declaring the public Confession of Faith of the Church of England, was read a 3rd time.—A Proclamation was ordered out, for putting all the laws and statutes against Popish Recusants, Priests, and Jesuits, in speedy and effectual execution. The Solemn League and Covenant was once more revived, and ordered to be printed and published, set up, and forthwith read in every Church; and that the said Solemn League shall be also put in the house.

March 8. The Bill for calling and holding a New Parliament, to sit at Westminster the 25th of April, 1660, was brought in and read a 1st time.

March 9. The Act for calling and holding a New Parliament was read a 2nd time and committed; but the question being put, That this Bill be committed to a Grand committee of the whole house, it passed in the Negative, 84 against 66.

March 13. The house resolved, That the Engagement, appointed to be taken by Members of Parliament and others, in these words, viz. 'I do declare and promise, That I will be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England, as the same is now established, without a King or House of Lords,' be discharged and taken off the file: also, That all Orders, enjoining the taking of the said Engagement, be, and are hereby, vacated and expunged out of the Journal-Book of parliament. Mr. Prynne, serjeant Maynard, and col. Harley, were ordered to see it done accordingly.—Ordered, "That it be referred to a committee to consider what had been done in this house concerning the Lords House, to state the matter of fact, and report it to the parliament the next morning."

March 14. A Bill for reviving the Court of the Duchy-Chamber of Lancaster was read a 3rd time, and passed. Sir Gilbert Gerrard was voted Chancellor of the Duchy-Court of Lancaster, and Nicholas Lechmere, esq. Attorney of the same.—Another Bill, for restoring Wm. Lenthall, esq. Speaker of the Parliament, to the Chamberlainship of Chester, was also passed.

March 15. An engrossed Bill for settling Lands on his excellency the lord-general Monk, and his heirs, was read a third time; and the question being put, That this Bill pass as a law, it was carried in the negative, 44 against 37: but at the same time it was resolved, "That the Sum of 20,000*l.* be conferred on his excellency the Lord-General: and that the same be charged upon the receipts of the public Exchequer."

March 15, p. m. Mr. Annesley reported from the Council of State, an Act for giving power to the said Council to act during the interval of parliament, in order to public safety: which was passed.

March 16. The Bill for conferring 20,000*l.* on General Monk, for his signal services, was read twice; but, on the third reading of it, the word 'signal' was changed for 'eninent,' and then the Bill passed. The General was also constituted by the parliament, steward of the honour and manor of Hampton-Court, and keeper of the house and parks there; with all the rights and privileges to the said Stewardship belonging, in as ample a manner as any steward of the same had heretofore enjoyed.—The Act for the Dissolution of this present Parliament was ordered to be read the first business in the afternoon, and nothing to intervene. Accordingly,

The Long Parliament dissolved.] March 16, p.m. A Bill, engrossed, for dissolving the Parliament begun and holden at Westminster, 3rd of November, 1640; and for the calling and holding of a Parliament at Westminster on the 25th of April, 1660, was read a third time, and the following Proviso was tendered: "That the single actings of this house, enforced by the pressing necessities of the present times, are not intended, in the least to infringe, much less take away, that antient native right which the House of Peers, consisting of those lords who did engage in the cause of the parliament against the Forces raised in the name of the late king and so continued to the year 1648, had and have to be a part of the parliament of England." Which proviso, being read twice, was agreed to be part of the Bill. Resolved, also, "That the day for the Dissolution of the Parliament shall be from this day, March 16, 1659." Then the Bill, so amended, being put to the question, passed, and was ordered to be printed and published.—Lastly, It was resolved, "That Friday the 6th of April next be set apart for a day of public Fasting and Humiliation, to be solemnized throughout the nation, under the sense of the great and manifold sins and provocations thereof; and to seek the Lord for his blessing upon the parliament, now shortly to be assembled, that the Lord will make them healers of our breaches, and instruments to restore and settle Peace and Government in the nation, upon foundations of Truth and Righteousness."

Thus ended the LONG PARLIAMENT, which, with innumerable alterations and several intermissions, had continued the scourge of the nation for nearly twenty years. What happened between this period and the meeting of the Parliament begun at Westminster, April the 25th, 1660, commonly called the CONVENTION PARLIAMENT, and which was sitting at the Return of King Charles II. and voted his Restoration, we shall give in the words of Mr. Hume. "On the Dissolution of the Long-Parliament, a Council of State was established, consisting of men of character and moderation; most of whom, during the Civil Wars, had made a great figure among the Presbyterians. The Militia of the kingdom was put into such hands as would promote order and settlement. These, conjoined with Monk's army, which lay united at London, were esteemed a sufficient check on the more numerous, though dispersed army, of whose inclinations there was still much reason to be diffident. Monk, however, was every day removing the more obnoxious officers, and bringing the troops to a state of discipline and obedience. Overton, governor of Hull, had declared his resolution to keep possession of that fortress till the coming of king Jesus: but when Alured produced the authority of parliament for his delivering the place to col. Fairfax, he thought proper to comply. Montague, who commanded the fleet in the Baltic, had entered into the conspiracy with sir George Booth; and pretending want of provisions, had sailed from the Sound towards the coast of England, with an intention of supporting that insurrection of the Royalists. On his arrival he received the news of Booth's defeat, and the total failure of the enterprise. The great difficulties, to which the parliament was then reduced, allowed them no leisure to examine strictly the reasons which he gave for quitting his station; and they allowed him to retire peaceably to his country-house. The Council of State now conferred on him, in conjunction with Monk, the command of the fleet; and secured the naval as well as military force in hands favourable to the public Settlement.—Notwithstanding all these steps which were taking towards the re-establishment of Monarchy, Monk still maintained the appearance of zeal for a Commonwealth, and hitherto allowed no canal of correspondence between himself and the king to be opened. To call a Free Parliament, and to restore the royal family, were visibly, in the present disposition of the kingdom, one and the same measure; yet would not the general declare, otherwise than by his actions, that he had adopted the king's interest; and nothing but necessity extorted at last the confession from him. His silence in the commencement of his enterprise, ought to be no objection to his sincerity; since he maintained the same reserve, at a time, when consistent with common sense, he could have entertained no other purpose.—There was one Morrice, a gentleman of Devonshire, of a sedentary, studious disposition, nearly related to Monk, and one who had always maintained the strictest intimacy with him. With this friend alone did Monk deliberate concerning that great enterprise which he had projected. Sir John Granville, who had a commission from the king, applied to Morrice for access to the general; but received for answer, that the general desired him to communicate his business to Morrice. Granville, though importunately urged, twice refused to deliver his message to any but Monk himself; and this cautious politician, finding him now a person, whose secrecy could be safely trusted, admitted him to his presence, and opened to him his whole intentions. Still he scrupled to commit any thing to writing: he delivered only a verbal message by Granville; assuring the king of his services, giving advice for his conduct, and exhorting him instantly to leave the Spanish territories, and retire into Holland. He was apprehensive lest Spain might detain him as a pledge for the recovery of Dunkirk and Jamaica. Charles followed these directions, and very narrowly escaped to Breda. Had he protracted his journey a few hours, he had certainly, under pretence of honour and respect, been arrested by the Spaniards.—Lockhart, who was governor of Dunkirk, and no wise averse to the king's service, was applied to on this occasion. The state of England was set before him, the certainty of the restoration represented, and the prospect of great favour displayed, if he would anticipate the vows of the kingdom, and receive the king into his fortress. Lockhart still replied, that his commission was received from an English parliament, and he would not open his gates but in obedience to the same authority. This scruple, though in the present emergence it approaches towards superstition, it is difficult for us entirely to condemn.—The elections for the new parliament went every where in favour of the king's party. This was one of those popular torrents, where the most indifferent, or even the most averse, are transported with the general passion, and zealously adopt the sentiments of the community to which they belong. The enthusiasts themselves seemed to be disarmed of their fury; and between despair and astonishment gave way to those measures, which, they found, it would be impossible for them, by their utmost efforts, to withstand. The Presbyterians and the Royalists, being united, formed the voice of the nation, which, without noise, but with infinite ardour, called for the king's restoration. The kingdom was almost entirely in the hands of the former party; and some zealous leaders among them began to renew the demand of those conditions, which had been required of the late king in the treaty of Newport: but the general opinion seemed to condemn all those rigorous and jealous capitulations with their sovereign. Harrassed with convulsions and disorders, men ardently longed for repose, and were terrified at the mention of negotiations or delays, which might afford opportunity to the seditious army still to breed new confusion. The passion too for liberty, having been carried to such violent extremes, and having produced such bloody commotions, began, by a natural movement, to give place to a spirit of loyalty and obedience; and the public was less zealous in a cause, which was become odious on account of the calamities which had so long attended it. After the legal concessions made by the late king, the constitution seemed to be sufficiently secured; and the additional conditions insisted on, as they had been framed during the greatest ardour of the contest, amounted rather to annihilation than a limitation of monarchy. Above all, the general was averse to the mention of conditions; and resolved that the crown, which he intended to restore, should be conferred on the king entirely free and unencumbered. Without farther scruple, therefore, or jealousy, the people gave their voice in elections for such as they knew to entertain sentiments favourable to monarchy; and all paid court to a party, which, they foresaw, was soon to govern the nation. Though the parliament had voted, that no one should be elected, who had himself, or whose father had borne arms for the late king, little regard was any where paid to this ordinance. The leaders of the presbyterians, the earl of Manchester, lord Fairfax, lord Roberts, Hollis, sir Anth. Ashley Cooper, Annesly, Lewis, were determined to atone for past transgressions by their present zeal for the royal interests; and from former merits, successes, and sufferings, they had acquired with their party the highest credit and authority.—The affairs of Ireland were in a condition no less favourable to the king. As soon as Monk declared against the English army, he dispatched emissaries into Ireland, and engaged the officers in that kingdom to concur with him in the same measures. Lord Broghil, president of Munster, and sir Charles Coote, president of Connaught, went so far as to enter into a correspondence with the king, and to promise their assistance for his restoration. In conjunction with sir Theophilus Jones, and other officers, they took possession of the government, and excluded Ludlow, who was zealous for the Rump-parliament, but whom they pretended to be in a confederacy with the committee of safety. They kept themselves in readiness to serve the king; but made no declarations, till they should see the turn which affairs took in England.—But all these promising views had almost been blasted by an untoward accident. Upon the admission of the Secluded Members, the Republican party, particularly the late King's Judges, were seized with the justest despair, and endeavoured to infuse the same sentiments into the Army. By themselves or their emissaries, they represented to the soldiers, that all those brave actions, which had been performed during the war, and which were so meritorious in the eyes of the parliament, would no doubt be regarded as the deepest crimes by the Royalists, and would expose the army to the severest vengeance. That in vain did that party make professions of moderation and lenity: the King's Death, the Execution of so many of the nobility and gentry, the Sequestration and imprisonment of the rest, were in their eyes crimes so deep, and offences so personal, as must be prosecuted with the most implacable resentment. That the loss of all Arrears, and the cashiering of every officer and soldier, were the lightest punishment which must be expected: after the dispersion of the Army, no farther protection remained to them, either for life or property, but the clemency of enraged victors. And that, even if the most perfect security could be obtained, it were inglorious to be reduced, by treachery and deceit, to subjection under a foe, who, in the open field, had so often yielded to their superior valour.—After these suggestions had been infused into the army, Lambert suddenly made his escape from the Tower, and threw Monk and the Council of State into great consternation. They knew Lambert's vigour and activity; they were acquainted with his popularity in the Army; they were sensible, that, though the soldiers had lately deserted him, they sufficiently expressed their remorse and their detestation of those, who, by false professions, they found, had so egregiously deceived them. It seemed necessary, therefore, to employ the greatest celerity in suppressing so dangerous a foe: col. Ingoldsbay, who had been one of the late king's Judges, but who was now entirely engaged in the Royal Cause, was dispatched after him. He overtook him at Daventry (April 22), while he had yet assembled but four troops of horse. One of them deserted him. Another quickly followed the example. He himself, endeavouring to make his escape, was seized by Ingoldsbay, to whom he made submissions not suitable to his former character of spirit and valour. Okey, Axtel, Cobbet, Crede, and other officers of that party, were taken prisoners with him. All the roads were full of soldiers hastening to join them. In a few days they had been formidable. And it was thought, that it might prove dangerous for Monk himself to have assembled any considerable body of his Republican army for their suppression: so that nothing could be more happy than the sudden extinction of this rising flame."—Thus far Mr. Hume. The New Parliament met on the 25th April, according to appointment, and with the Proceedings of this ever-memorable CONVENTION we shall commence our Fourth Volume.

TO the READER.

I suppose all but such as wilfully shut their own eyes against the greatest evidence in the world, are long since convinced what the designs, aims, interest, and projects of the ring-leaders in the late Long Parliament were in involving these nations in a miserable and destructive war. Their pretences were no doubt the most specious and plausible that could be imagined, Defence of Religion, and the Subjects Freedom, but alas! never were these things more pretended to, and less in reality designed; greatness, wealth, and command were the inducements of the most hypocritical persons in the world to profane the name of God, by calling their cursed ambition his Cause, to murder so many innocent persons both by the civil and military sword, to ruin so many noble families by depriving them of the subsistence left them for many years from their ancestors, and at length, as the top of all wickedness, (having by the divine permission defeated the force of their sovereign) to murder him under the pretence of justice, for a tyrant; when as it were no hard matter to make it good against any gainsayer whatsoever, that no nation under the sun lived more happily and freely then we, during the reign of the most excellent and religious king, nor any more miserably and slavishly, than since his death. The following Catalogue will present the perusers with an account of some of the late Parliament men's advantages by our miseries, fairly, and, as far as possible, truly collected. It must not be expected to find all those mentioned here whose hands hath been filled at the price of many thousand men's blood and destruction; nor is it to be thought, that those that were mentioned, got no more than what they are said to have gotten in this Catalogue. For such officers as were not of the house are wholly omitted, though they had their share in the spoil, and got palaces and great estates of noblemen and others, as a reward of their fidelity to the enslavers of their country; and the Members divided and got vast sums of money in the dark, and connived at one another's cheating of the public. Otherwise, what became of those incredible sums raised by sale of the revenue of the King, Bishops, Delinquents, Compositions, Excise, horrible and oppressive Taxes, whereas their common soldiers were paid after the most sordid and dishonourable way that ever was heard of; for being unable to double their arrears and purchase lands, they were enforced to sell them at extreme inconsiderable rates to their false and abominable masters, the Members of Parliament. All which being considered, it will be no wonder they were so loth to dissolve, and unwilling to hear of another representative. Which, God be thanked, is at length assembled together with the House of Peers and the King's most excellent Majesty, whose counsels and purposes Almighty God prosper and bless; but let destruction be the reward of our destroyers, let the prey be torn out of their teeth, let the blood they have shed fall upon their own heads, and let their names be detested and infamous to all posterity!

*Note, that such as have this mark * before their Names were Recruters of that Long Parliament, and illegally chosen, and those of them that were the King's Judges have this mark. †*

*William Allenson, Kt. Alderman of York, was made Clerk of the Hamper, a place worth 1000*l.* per ann. had Crable Castle worth 600*l.* per an. once the Bishop of York's, and hath purchased a vast revenue of Bishops lands at easy rates.*

*John Ash, had given him out of Master Coventry's composition 4000*l.* out of Sir Edward* Moseley's 1000*l.* out of Mr. Edward Phillips's 1200*l.* out of sir John Stowel's Estate, 8000*l.* and (which is worth all this) was the great Chairman at Goldsmiths Hall; is not this better than Cloathing.

† Francis Allen, a Goldsmith at St. Dunstan's in Fleet-Street, was made Customer of London, besides other offices and gifts, and hath purchased at low rate the Bishop of Chester's house at Winchester and Waltham, was one of his Sovereign's Judges, and a constant Rumper.

Thomas Atkins, Alderman, as honest as sweet: he was a Treasurer at War, and licked his fingers at the time the major part of the house of parliament was, by unheard-of insolence, secluded from sitting. He was the only member left in it that served for the city of Norwich, and was a constant Rumper to the last.

Edward Ash, Woollen-draper, Treasurer for providing of Cloaths for the Irish Soldiers.

* William Ayscough, Captain of a Troop of Horse.

William Armyne, Knt. Agent in Scotland for the State; a factious wicked one in his way.

William Armyne, Colonel.

— Ashurst, went a Commissioner into Scotland, had the Clerk of the Peace's place for Lancashire, and 1000*l.* in money given him.

*† John Bradshaw, Serjeant of the Law, Lord-President of the High Court of injustice, and President of the Council of State. There was given him (besides the earl of St. Albans's Manor of Summers-Hall, in Kent, worth 1500*l.* per Annum) the lord Cottington's Estate, called Fantehill, in Wiltshire, his Manor of Hanworth, near Hunslow, in Middlesex, and the Dean's House at the College at Westminster. He was one of the Judges of the Sheriffs Court in Guildhall, London, and Justice of the County Palatine of Chester. After the most notorious villanies that ever were committed, for the keeping up a Tail of a Parliament in perpetual power, he saw it interrupted for almost six years together, and at length died, during the last interruption of it by Lambert.

Edward Bishe, Garter Herald in sir Edward Walker's place, worth 3 or 400*l.* per annum: an honest man.

* John Bond, son to Dennis Bond, a parliament man, made master of Trinity-Hall, in Cambridge, which Mr. Selden refused to accept of.

* Nathaniel Bacon, had given him 3000*l.* afterwards Master of the Requests to the Cromwells, during the greatest part of their Usurpation, his salary for which was 500*l.* per Ann. and it is likely would be in the same office for whomsoever would pay him the same wages.

Sir William Brereton, Colonel, General for the Cheshire Forces, had the Sequestration of Cashioberry, and other lands of the lord Capel, worth 2000*l.* per Annum, and the Archbishop's House and Lands at Croydon, where he hath turned the chapel into a kitchen.—A goodly Reformation, and fits with his stomach as well as his religion. He was one of the Rumpers, and a base coward.

† John Blakeston, a Shop-keeper in Newcastle, was executor to the executor of sir Jo. Farmer, trusted with 6000*l.* for charitable uses, and was sued in Chancery to perform the trust, but got himself returned a burgess for Newcastle, by the Scots Garrison there; had 3000*l.* given him out of the marquis of Newcastle's and the lord Widdrington's estates, in compensation of the loss of his pedlar's ware in his shop. He had formerly given him 14,000*l.* and 560*l.* was given to his brother John, as was made appear before a committee, whereof Mr. Sandis of the Temple was chairman. He had also a coal-meter's place, worth 200*l.* per annum, and the bishop of Durham's Castle at Durham, and lands of great value. He was one of the King's Judges.

Godfrey Boswell, colonel.

Richard Brown, major-general and governor of Abingdon, was afterwards prosecuted for designing to secure the city of London, when Fairfax, by the command of his lieut. general Cromwell, marched with his Army against the City, the chiefest occasion and inlet of all our woes. He was imprisoned for the most part of the Rumps and Oliver's tyranny, and hath manifested himself, both by his actings and sufferings, a cordial lover both of his Prince and country, and hath been a very active instrument for the good of these kingdoms.

John Brown, married sir Richard Trenchard's sister, a petty Committee-Man, seized 1000*l.* of the stock and goods of Farmer Wades, in Portland, whom, though the Committee acquitted of Malignancy, yet could not his goods, (being in the hands of a member) be re-delivered: so they are malignant still, and secured in Mr. Brown's hands.

† Dennis Bond, a Woollen-draper, he takes, by his trustees, his sons and brother; one son he made Master of Trinity-Hall, in Cambridge, another Auditor of the Excise, worth 500*l.* per Annum; and his brother, Governor of Portland, Receiver of the King's Rents in Southampton and Somerset. He was one of the King's Judges.

John Bell, Apothecary to the body politic, hath as little given him as he deserves in honest times; but, to preserve the privilege of the house, is protected for what he can get. He was a Trustee for the Poor at Westminster; Receiver of Mr. Anthrobus's and others Money for the Poor; was sued for an Account, said he could not answer without breach of privilege of parliament, and that he durst not; by which means parliament-men are the surest keepers of a trust.

Thomas Boone, formerly a Tapster, had 6000*l.* given him: a cruel Committee-man, that licked his fingers, and hath got a vast Estate.

Richard Barry, colonel, Governor of Carlisle.

Francis Bacon, Recorder of Ipswich, in the place of Requests to both the Protectors, for the same salary with his brother Nat.

* Sir Thomas Barnardiston, colonel.

* Robert Blake, colonel, Governor of Taunton; and one of the Admirals of England.

† Daniel Blagrove, a counsellor at law, a great Committee-Man, Steward of Reading, and was made Treasurer of the said county; had given him the Exequer's Office of the Common Pleas, worth 500*l.* per annum. He bought the king's fee farm of the great manor of Sunninge, in Berkshire, and other estates, at very easy rates; Master Extraordinary in Chancery, a constant Rumper, and one of his majesty's most cruel Judges: he was a great persecutor of the ministers of Reading, or else they slander him, which is hardly possible.

† Oliver Cromwell. This Scourge of God was, in the beginning of these Troubles, a man of no considerable fortune. There are letters of his to be seen in the hands of a person of quality, wherein he mentions his whole estate to amount to about 1300*l.* which at that time he intended to lay out upon a purchase of drained Fen Lands. He passed through the several degrees of military command, till he was advanced to be General of the Army, during which time he received great gifts out of the estates of the duke of Buckingham, the lord Francis Villers, the marquis of Worcester's estate, worth 5 or 6000*l.* per annum, and others, besides great sums of money at several times; and, it is said, for some years, the whole revenue of near all the Benefices in Wales, employing four itinerant teachers to coast about that country, for 100*l.* per annum a man; and took occasion to dissolve the Rump of the Long Parliament, just as they were going to call for the Accounts of that Money, which amounted to a vast sum. One would have thought all this, with the General's Pay, might have satisfied such a man's appetite, whose beginning was so mean; but, having projected greatness and sovereignty to himself from the beginning, he waded to it through the blood of his natural prince, and great numbers of his fellow subjects, and made himself Supreme Governor of these nations, under the title of Protector, which power he held with much oppression, dissimulation, hypocrisy, and bloodshed, for about five years, when God cut him off before he had well provided for the establishment of his son in the Succession. His Funeral was solemnized with great pomp, they say to the expence of 30,000*l.* which is yet unpaid. He spent a vast deal of treasure to maintain his tyranny; but he is gone to his own place, and let his memory be accursed for ever.

† Miles Corbet, at the beginning of this parliament, a man of small estate, made one of the Registers in Chancery, worth 700*l.* per annum, and hath money in his purse. He was ten times one of the Commissioners in Ireland, worth what he will per annum, and one of the King's Judges, and a Rumper.

Sir John Clotworthy, Treasurer for Ireland, and, by the Army, charged with defrauding the state of 40,000*l.* which may be one reason the king could never get an Account of the Money raised for the Irish, though he much desired it.

Thomas Ceely, much indebted, if not helped out of prison by the parliament, and made Recorder of Bridgewater.

† Gregory Clements, Merchant in both senses: when he had been a member two months, protested he had scarce cleared the Purchase Monies, which was but 60*l.* but said, Trading he doubted not would mend. He was one of the King's Judges.

Sir Henry Cholmley, col. of horse, and once a zealous commissioner of Yorkshire. Since, he hath given some testimonies of loyalty.

Robert Cecil, son to the earl of Salisbury, colonel of horse, procured one Collings to be made Auditor in Chief for the Revenues of the king, queen, and prince, worth 2000*l.* per annum; but in trust for the colonel.

Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, a colonel; since, he hath manifested his loyalty to his Prince very eminently.

† William Constable, colonel, and one of the King's Judges. Sold his Lands to sir Marmaduke Langdale for 20,000*l.* and had them given him again by the parliament.

† Sir John Danvers, colonel. After the death of his brother, the earl of Denby, he proved him to be a Malignant, and, by parliamentary proceedings, endeavoured to overthrow his will, and out his sister Gargrave, and Sir Peter Osborne of the Estate worth 30,000*l.* and to have it himself. He was one of the King's Judges.

Edmund Dunge, Constable of Wallingford-Castle.

Henry Darly and Richard Darly. Given to their father, for them, 5000*l.*; a pair of zealous Rumpers; the former was extreme active in bringing in the Army of the Brethren of Scotland to the ruin of his native country. Both base.

William Ellis, Steward of Stepney, worth 200*l.* per annum, and by him sold to one of the Temple. He made haste to be rich, and was a mighty thriving Committee-Man during the late destructive wars: he was afterwards Solicitor-General to the two Protectors; was very zealous for the making of Oliver King, for which his good lord made him knight. He hath, from nothing, in a few years, got an estate supposed to be worth 3060*l.* per annum.

Sir Walter Erle, colonel of horse, and lieutenant of the Ordinance in sir John Heydon's place, worth 1000*l.* per Annum in time of peace; but, in time of war, worth 50,000*l.* per annum.

Thomas Erle, son to sir Walter, captain of a troop of horse, seldom attended the house, but followed his business in the country, where he was a great Committee-man, helping himself and his friends.

* James Fenwick, captain of a troop of horse.

William Fenwick, had but 500*l.* So small a sum deserves not a Christian name.

* Charles Fleetwood, colonel, and lord-deputy of Ireland. This pitiful Anabaptist was Oliver's son-in-law, and, upon that score, advanced to be lieutenant-general of the Army; for merit he never had any. In the dividing of the murdered king's inheritance, Woodstock, and other rich possessions, fell to his share. About a year since he, with some other officers, ungratefully dethroned Protector Richard, restored the Rump for a while, and then unroofed them again; after which, during the space of near six weeks, he acted king at Wallingford-House, (one of his palaces) but the Rump coming to sit again, the tender-hearted mock-prince melted into tears; and, his hypocritical vizard of Religion being pulled off, he went off the stage ridiculously.

John Goodwin, the other Register in Chancery, worth 700*l.* per annum.

Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Pay-Master to the Army, had 3*d.* per pound allowed, worth 60,000*l.* and was Chancellor of the Duchy, worth 1200*l.* per annum.

Gilbert Gerrard, his second son, Clerk to the Duchy, for whose benefit the Clerkship of Assize of Norfolk is granted to Mr. Edward Gerrard, his cousin, by the procurement of sir Gilbert, and was worth 500*l.* per annum.

Gyles Green, the Receiver of Yorkshire, being put out of his place, got it for his son-in-law; is Chairman for the Navy; and as for sir Thomas Dawes's Estate, and what it was worth to him, sir Thomas's Creditors will tell you, for they get nothing.

* Thomas Gell, lieutenant-colonel to sir John Gell, made Recorder of Derby in Mr. Allestrey's Place.

† Thomas lord Grey, of Groby, colonel, and hath given to him the Queen's Manor House, Park, and lands at Holmby; also purchased a large part of the lord Craven's estate, particularly Coombe-Abbey, judged worth 3000*l.* per annum, for an inconsiderable sum, and one of the King's Judges.

* John Glyn, some time a counsellor at law, and Steward of the Court at Westminster, one of the Long Parliament that helped to bait the worthy earl of Strafford, and bring him to the block; was Clerk of the Petty-Bag in sir Edward Warde's place, worth 1000*l.* per annum.

He made his father-in-law, Mr. Squib, Clarendon's Herald in sir William Neves's place, worth 400*l.* per annum, and made his creature and kinsman Falconbridge Comptroller of the Excise, a place worth 500*l.* per annum, as also a Receiver-General of the king's, queen's, and princes revenues, worth 2000*l.* per annum. Mr. Glyn conferred on his cousin Lawrence Swetnain the Wine-Office, worth 300*l.* per annum, and made him Receiver of the First-Fruits, worth 200*l.* per annum; but, Mr. Swetnam dying, he got both the places for his brother-in-law Bodardo, that they might not go out of the tribe. He was made Recorder of London; and then, being made a serjeant at law, by agreement, as it is said, resigned to Mr. William Steel, and was made a judge; and for his zeal in Conie's case, to advance the Protector's will above the law of the land, and finding him so fit for his purpose, he sent him into the west, (chief-justice Rolls refusing) to arraign that valiant gentleman col. Penruddock, and the rest of those gentlemen taken at Southmoulton, in Devon, by Article-breaking Croke; for which good services, and his complying principles to advance the Protector, he was made lord chief justice of England, and no doubt behaved himself in the place as his master would have him, by whom he was also made a lord of his Other House; but that and he fell with the idol Dick. He was one of the eleven Members impeached by the Army for Treason, and by that parliament committed to the Tower.

Thomas Grantham, colonel of foot, since dead.

* Ellis Grimes, captain.

Arthur Goodwin, colonel of foot, since dead.

Brampton Gurdon, colonel.

Sir Arthur Haslerig. This boisterous incendiary having, by base and vile courses, possessed himself of several coal-pits near Newcastle, was some years, as it may be feared, the occasion of the starving many poor people in London to death, through cold; for he, (being governor) without any public authority, laid a Tax of 4*s.* per chaldron, upon the coals there, amounting to 50,000*l.* per annum. He got three great Manors of the bishops, Auckland, Everwood, and another, for an inconsiderable matter; he hath been an implacable enemy to one Mr. Collingwood, and wronged him of a great estate: he hath a rich fleece, reported to the value of 20,000*l.* per annum; but it is hoped he will, ere long, be sheared.

Sir Edward Hungerford, colonel, famous for plundering of Warder-Castle; had the lands of the countess dowager of Rutland, worth 1500*l.* per ann. and she was allowed but 500*l.* out of them.

† Cornelius Holland. His father died in the Fleet for debt, and left him a poor boy in the court, waiting on sir Henry Vane, then comptroller of the prince's house. He was still sir Henry Vane's zany, but now, coming in with his master for the revenue of the king, queen, and prince, this pharisee was engaged with other monopolists and patentees, while they stood, his conscience scrupling not the means where profit was the prize. He was turned out of the office of the Green Cloth for fraud and breach of trust; but, with the help of his master, made himself a Farmer of the kings Feeding-Grounds at Crestoe, in Buckinghamshire, worth 1800*l.* or 2000*l.* per ann. at the rate of 20*l.* per ann. which he discounted. He possessed Somerset-House a long time, where he and his family nested themselves. He was Keeper of Richmond-House for his country retreat, and Commissary for the Garrisons at Whitehall and the Mews. He had an office in the Mint, and, having ten children, he long since gave 5000*l.* with a daughter, after which rate we must conceive he had laid aside 50,000*l.* for portions. He was one of the King's Judges, and one of the Committee of Safety.

Sir Robert Harley, Master of the Mint in the place of sir Ralph Freeman, and sir Tho. Aylesbury. Before the parliament he was much indebted, very poor, and could not pay; now he is rich, and will not pay.

Henry Herbert had given him 3000*l.* and the plunder of Ragland-Castle.

John Hampden, colonel of foot, killed at Calgrove Field, where he made his first muster. His eldest son made since a lord by Oliver Cromwell.

Col. Hacker, Governor of Lincoln, a Commissioner to bring in the Scots, and one of the three to whom the bloody Warrant, for his late majesty's execution, was directed.

* Sir Henry Hayman had given him 5000*l.*

Denzil Hollis had 5000*l.* ordered him, but refused it, and desired them to pay their Debts before they paid their Legacies. He was one of the 11 Members impeached by the Army, was very hot in the beginning of the Troubles, but is since of a better temper, and hath contributed much to the restoration of his Prince, and his nation's peace.

Roger Hill, a barrister of the Temple, of no considerable estate till he had granted him, from the house, the bishop of Winchester's Manner of Taunton-Dean, being the best in England, worth 12,000*l.* per ann. when the Estates for lives determine. He was one of the Commissioners of Haberdashers-Hall.

† John Hewson, at first a Cobler of London, or at best a Shoe-maker, went out a captain upon the Account of the Cause. His zeal brought him to be a colonel, and was afterwards made Governor of Dublin in Ireland, from whence he was sent for to be one of Barebone's parliament, and of all the mock parliaments since; was made a Knight of the new stamp, and afterwards was thought a fit person to be a lord of the Other House: and, for his wisdom and good service in all his other employments, was thought worthy to be one of the 23 honourable persons of the Committee of Safety, that were to manage all public affairs of the nation, and to consider upon a frame of government to be established; but, in the heat of that great work, he was in all haste, by his brethren of that Committee, sent in a rage into London, to kill and still the innocent boys playing at foot-ball in the streets, much like his brother Pride, who cruelly destroyed the innocent bears. Afterwards the coroner's jury, that sat upon the murdered persons, found his lordship guilty. He had been tried at the sessions house in the Old Bailey, had not the news of his majesty's happy arrival prevented the sitting of that court; and no doubt, before this time, received the reward of his works. He was likewise one of the murderous Judges sitting upon his prince.

* Oliver St. John, the son of one Mr. St. John, of Bedfordshire, who was supposed to be a bye-blow of one of the earls of Bedford. This Oliver was a gentleman of slender fortune, brought up to the profession of the law; who, by special grace of his late majesty, was both his Solicitor and Attorney-General. He deserted his master, and, adhering to the parliament, was promoted to places of very great advantage many years together. He and Walter, called lord Strickland, were sent ambassadors to the United Provinces. He had also, many years together, the passing of all Fines and Compositions, said to be worth 5000*l.* per ann. He was also lord chief justice of the Common Pleas many years, a place of vast profit. He was made Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, in the earl of Manchester's room, a person signally anti-monarchical, till the Usurpation of Oliver Cromwell.

† Henry Ireton, commissary-general and colonel, lord-deputy of Ireland, one of the King's Judges, and one of the Appointers of the time and place of his execution.

† Richard Ingoldsby, colonel, and governor of Oxford, related to Cromwell, one of the King's Judges; but since a true penitent for it.

* Sir Thomas Jarvis, had Mr. Web's place in Richmond Little Park, and had 9000*l.* given him out of the marquis of Winchester's estate.

* Philip Jones, colonel, a member of the Long Parliament. His original is from Wales; at the first of the war it is said he had not above 20*l.* per ann. but hath since very much improved his interest upon account of the Cause; became governor of a garrison, and steward of some of the Protector's Lands in Wales; was a great stickler to advance his master to be Protector, for which good service he was advanced to be one of his Council, worth 1000*l.* per ann. afterwards Comptroller of his Household, or Court. He made hay while the sun shined, and hath improved his revenue, as it is believed, to 4000*l.* per ann. if not more. He was also one of the Rump.

† John Jones, at first a serving-man, then a colonel of the Long Parliament; was sent a Commissioner into Ireland for the governing that nation. He likewise helped to change the government, was governor of the Isle of Anglesey, married the Protector's sister, and thorough-paced for his court proceedings; who was thought fit, with his namesake and countryman Philip, to be called Lords, and to be taken out of the Rump into the Other House, to have a negative voice against the people. He was also one of his Prince's Judges:

William Lenthall, of Lincoln's-Inn, a Counsellor at Law, Speaker of the house of commons, worth 2000*l.* per ann. besides rewards for courtesies; Master of the Rolls, worth 3000*l.* per ann. besides the Sale of Offices; Chamberlain of Chester in the earl of Derby's place, and until lately, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, worth 1000*l.* per ann. He was a Commissioner of the Seal, worth 1500*l.* per ann. and had 6000*l.* one time given him by the house, and the Rectory and Demesne of Burford, with a stately house belonging to the lord Falkland, worth 500*l.* per ann. Oliver once made a sponge of him, and squeezed him out of 15,000*l.* who turning him and his tribe out of doors, he veered about to save himself and his great offices; and he that had been so long bell-weather in the commons house, was thought, for his compliance and his money, to deserve to be one of the herd of Lords in the Other House.

† John Lisle, Barrister of the Temple, Master of S. Crosses', in Dr. Lewis's place, being a place for a Divine, worth 800*l.* per ann. one of the lords commissioners of the Great Seal, worth 1500*l.* per ann. one of the King's Judges, afterwards became a Cromwellian, and swore Oliver, at his first installing, chief magistrate. He was President of the High Court of Justice, (so called) which tried sir Henry Slingsby, Dr. Hewit, &c. for treason against the Protector, and passed sentence of death against them.

† Nicholas Love, the son of Dr. Love, of Winchester, Mr. Speaker's chamber fellow in Lincolns-Inn, was made one of the six clerks in chancery, in Mr. Penruddock's place, worth 1000*l.* per ann. one of the Council of State in 1651; a constant Rumper, one of his Sovereign's cruel Judges, and one of the abjurators against kingly power.

* John Lenthall, son to the Speaker, made one of the six clerks, worth 1500*l.* per ann. knighted by Oliver Cromwell; was a colonel of foot, and governor of Windsor-Castle.

Sir Oliver Luke, colonel of horse.

Sir Samuel Luke, his son, colonel and scout-master for the counties of Bedford, &c.

† Sir Michael Livesey, of the Ise of Sheppey, in Kent, heretofore a colonel under sir Wm. Waller, but a most notorious coward; a penurious sneaking person, and one that could act an hypocrite to the life, in voice and humble gesture. He was one of his sacred majesty's cruel Judges, Committee-Man General of Kent, and an eminent Rumper.

Walter Long, colonel, had 5000*l.* and the office of Register in Chancery for four years.

Henry Lawrence, a Member of the Long Parliament, fell off at the Murder of his majesty, for which the Protector, with great zeal, declared, That a neutral spirit was more to be abhorred than a cavalier spirit, and that such men as he were not fit to be used in such a day as that, when God was cutting down kingship root and branch. Yet he came into play again, and contributed much to the setting up of the Protector and a single Person, affirming that no other foundation could stand; for which worthy service he was made and continued President of the Protector's Council, where he signed many arbitrary and illegal warrants for the carrying faithful honest men to prison, for their not apostatizing with them. He was thorough paced, and one, no doubt, who hath well feathered his nest, being also one of the Lords of the Other House: and when that honour vanished, he became one of the honourable Committee of Safety. What he will be next is worth the enquiry.

Lord viscount Lisle, eldest son of the earl of Leicester. He was of the Long Parliament to the last, and at the change of government, and making Laws against his sovereign: and, no question, concurred with the rest in these sad effects. He was also of the Little Parliament, commonly stiled Barebone's Parliament; was all along of the Protector's Council, and was never to seek; who having learned so much by changing with every change, and keeping still (like his father-in-law the earl of Salisbury and Peter Sterry) on that side which hath proved trump; nothing need further be said of his fitness, being such a man of principles, to be taken out of the Rump Parliament, to have settled a negative voice in that Other House, over all the good people of these lands.

* Thomas Lister, lieut. colonel, and deputy-governor of Lincoln.

† Edmund Ludlow, colonel, governor of Wardour-Castle, lieut. general of the horse, one of the king's Judges, a great fanatic, and favourer of such. He hath much improved his fortune in Ireland; but now is gone to seek his fortune elsewhere.

* Thomas Moore, Officer in the Custom-house, and his brother was governor of Ludlow-Castle.

† Henry Martin, colonel of a regiment of horse, and a regiment of whores. He had given him 3000*l.* at one time, to put him upon the holy sisters, and take off from the Levellers. He had the reputation of a precious saint from his youth, in reference to all kinds of debauchery, uncleanness, and fraud, having sold his estate three times over. He lay many years prisoner in the King's Bench for Debt, and disgraced the place by renewing the old stews upon the Bank-Side. He had several other large sums given, and was one of the king's Judges.

Sir Thomas Middleton, major-general for Denbigh, and five other counties, who hath manifested his loyalty to his Prince, and is a true patriot of his country.

† Thomas Hammond, of Surry, was lieut. general of the Artillery under the lord Fairfax, and became a great creature of that ambitious tyrant Cromwell, and a promoter of his interests; by whom he was drawn in to be one of those most cruel Judges of his Prince, to the very great grief, and contrary to the admonitions, of his reverend bother Dr. Hammond.

† John Moore, colonel of the guards. For some time he had the benefit of passes out of London, and was one of the king's Judges.

Sir John Merrick, major-general.

† Gilbert Millington, a lawyer, had given him 1000*l.* was chairman to the committee of plundered ministers, where Phelps the clerk and he were believed to share their fees, worth God knows what. He was one of the king's Judges.

* Richard Norton, colonel, and governor of Southampton.

Anthony Nichols, Mr. Pym's nephew, by him was made Pay-Master to the Messengers of Intelligence, by which, in a short time, he put himself in a parliamentsary equipage of coaches, horses, and attendants, got money and paid his father's debts; but was afterwards suspended the house, and now would not pay his own debts by his good will.

—Nicholas, one of the Judges of the Upper Bench, and afterwards one of the barons of the Exchequer.

Michael Oldsworth, no colonel, but governor of Old Pembroke and Montgomery, and had a share with his Lordship out of sir Henry Compton's Office, worth 3000*l.* per ann. was Keeper of Windsor Park, one of the two Masters of the Prerogative Office, and made the Bailiff of Westminster give him 50*l.* per ann. to continue him there.

* Arthur Owen, colonel.

Sir John Bouchier, of Yorkshire, a person of no great note, nor estate, till by his activeness in our late distempers, and fishing in troubled waters, he angled fair, and caught a great estate, which was that he sought for: he was a man as constant at Committees as at his dinners in Hell; where he may, in time, sup with his father Satan, having been a constant Rumper, and one of the king's cruel Judges.

† Thomas Challoner, also a Yorkshireman, eminent for his speech in the house, for the delivering of his late majesty out of the Scots clutches, into whose protection he had put himself; a man most virulently invective against monarchy, having been one of his majesty's cruel Judges; also now, at the soberest, an inseparable Rumper, and to the last an eminent stickler for a Commonwealth.

† Richard Dean, Goodman Button (an Hoyman of Ipswich) his boy, after a matross in the Army, then colonel and commander in chief in Scotland, till made one of the Generals at sea; he was there killed, having left a great estate behind him, viz. Havering Manor in Essex, whose Park he unmercifully demolished; he was not only one of the king's implacable Judges, but one of those that signed the Warrant for his Death, and appointed the time and place for his execution.

John Thurloe, a servant and secretary to Oliver St. John, was after that made principal

Secretary of State to Oliver Cromwell and Richard, and chose Post-Master of England, a place of a vast income: he may be justly said to be also a principal instrument, and to have a great hand in bringing in all those abominable and wicked practices and oppressions that have been for these many years last past; by which, and his under-hand dealings, he did not only attain to much greatness and honour, but to a vast estate. He was brought into all the mock parliaments to give aim to his masters; and it is believed that he had a great hand with his brother Noel in selling some scores of those gentlemen as slaves, to the Barbadoes and other plantations, that were accused for being in the business at Salisbury with Mr. Penraddock and others; and was assisting in that Committee of Safety, whereof Fleetwood sat as Prince; but now where he is, and what will befall him next, is well worth the knowledge.

† Henry Mildmay, that prodigy of ingratitude, was servant to the late king, and not only knighted by him, but his majesty was pleased also in his own person to become an advocate for the obtaining alderman Holiday's widow for him; who, being also made Master of the King's Jewels, most impudently had the face to appear and sit as one of his gracious sovereign's Judges. He is a shallow fellow, by some surnamed sir Whimsey Mildmay; a pestilent Republican, and a Rumper.

† Augustin Garland, an old stander in the Long Parliament, an indefatigable stickler in most Committees; a notable Commonwealth's Man, and a resolute opposer of the Government in a Single Person; therefore out of date upon the intrusion of Oliver Cromwell; but in again upon the Restoration of the Rump, of which fraternity he was free. He was also one of his late majesty's most cruel Judges.

† John Barkstead, the son of Michael Barkstead, goldsmith, who also was himself in his minority a petty goldsmith in the Strand, a very empty shallow-pated person; therefore the most fit to be cajoled and wrought on, being of the malleable temper: he forsook his shop, shuffled himself into the camp, where, more by fortune than valour, he climbed up to be a colonel, and after lieutenant of the Tower; adopted to be an alderman, major-general of Middlesex, a severe persecutor of the king's party; who also was one of his Judges: a thorough-paced agent for all governments, and a most active imp of Oliver the Usurper.

† Edmund Harvey, late a poor Silk-Man, afterwards made a colonel. He got into the bishop of London's House; and by his juggling insinuation crept into the Custom House, and was one of the farmers thereof; but, being accused of fraudulent dealings there, was discarded by Cromwell, though he had feasted him before most magnificently at Fulham. I never heard any that could speak of his honesty or courage, being, as to the last, a little inconsiderable rat; and, as to the other, a factious Rumper, and one of his majesty's cruel Judges.

† Thomas Harrison, a man of very mean birth, being the son of a butcher in or near Newcastle under-Line: he was servant to Mr. Hulk an attorney at law; but, preferring war before peace, got into the Army, and, having the knack of canting, was believed to be a person of surpassing piety; and so insinuated himself from one command to another, till he became major-general of Wales, being dangerously anabaptistical in his tenets, and a perfect Hater of orthodox Divines and a Devourer of their Maintenance; he was very lately a preacher, and indeed head of a re-baptized congregation in London; he was clearly against monarchy, not only sitting a malicious Judge against his majesty, but was one of those five who appointed the time and place for the king's Execution.

† William Herveningham, of Norfolk, a gentleman of a most antient extraction, and a very fair estate, who was conceived to be drawn away more out of some animosity than interest: he was, among the rest, seduced to be one of the King's Judges, and was also one of the Rumpers.

† John Okey, his parentage was as mean as his calling, some deeming him a drayman, others a yeastman; but he was stoaker in a brew-house at Islington, and next a most poor chandler near Lion-Key in Thames-Street, where living very poor and indigent, he converted his blue apron into a buff-coat, and became a colonel of dragoons; a fellow of greater bulk than brains, and strength than wit or conscience, otherwise he would have had more grace than to have sat one of the king's Judges, and be one of that most impudent Committee that signed the Warrant for his death, and appointed the time and place for his execution.

† John Downs, colonel, a person who did strike whilst the iron was hot, and so with his sword opened the trap-door to his fortune; one that hath thriven well by the times, having raised himself to a considerable estate; an enemy to monarchy, and a main man for a commonwealth, being one of the king's Judges, and a hater of any government in one single person; one of the Council of State in fifty-one, and an inseparable Rumper to the last gasp.

† James Temple, of Sussex, one of the Long Parliament, a colonel, and governor of Banbury-Castle in Sussex, got the estate of sir Charles Shelly violently, by order from the Rump Parliament, under the notion of his being grand-child of a Papist, and possessed it without giving any due account for it, pretending his good service; and, upon the interruption of the Rump, he took to the King's Bench, and afterwards came out by the Five Pound Act. The chief service he did was to be one of his Prince's cruel Judges, and a constant Rumper to the last.

Matthew Tomlinson, before these times, was a gentleman usher to a lady, and afterwards became a major in the Army, and then a col.; was sent a Commissioner into Ireland by Oliver Cromwell, and was knighted there by Henry Cromwell, the second son of that tyrant. He was one that conducted the king to the scaffold, and hath got a great estate.

† John Dixwell, burgess for Dover in the Long Parliament; was a colonel of Foot, a great Committee-Man in Kent, one of the Council of State, one of his prince's cruel Judges, and a constant Rumper to the last.

† Isaac Euer. He was but a serving-man at first, as it is reported; his zeal led him into the wars, and so he became a colonel. He had much land given him in Ireland for his good service, and for being one of the cruel Judges of his prince.

† Sir Gregory Norton, of Sussex, a man but of a mean fortune before these times, as it is said; had Richmond-House and much of the king's Goods for an inconsiderable value, only they were the price of royal blood, he being one of his prince's Judges, and a constant Rumper to the last.

Edmund Prideaux, formerly Commissioner to the Great Seal, worth 1500*l.* per ann. did, by ordinance, practise within the bar, as one of the king's counsel, worth 5000*l.* per ann. and, after that, was attorney-general, worth what he pleased to make it; postmaster for all the inland letters, at sixpence the letter, worth 15,000*l.* per ann. and he got it thus, the lord Stanhope, the postmasters, and carriers of England, complained in parliament against Mr. Witherings and others, touching the carrying of Letters, whereupon the benefit of Foreign letters was given to the earl of Warwick, worth more than 7000*l.* per ann. and inland Letters to Mr. Prideaux. Was not this good justice?

* Thomas Pury, sen. first a Weaver in Gloucester, then an ignorant country solicitor, had 3000*l.* given him; and, Mr. Gerrard's place in the Petty-Bag, worth 400*l.* per ann.

Thomas Pury, jun. son to the elder, in the first year of the parliament, servant to Mr. Townshend, an attorney of Staples-Inn, Receiver of the King's Rents in Gloucestershire and Wilts, clerk of the peace of Gloucestershire, worth 200*l.* per ann. and captain of foot and horse.

Francis Pierpoint, hath the archbishop of York's lands, lying in Nottinghamshire.

William Pierpont hath 7000*l.* given him, and all the earl of Kingston's estate, (being sequestered) worth 10,000*l.*

* John Palmer, doctor of physick, master of All-Souls, in Oxford, in Dr. Sheldon's room; a place which was proper only for a divine.

* Sir John Palgrave, colonel at the siege of Newark.

Charles Pym, captain of a troop of horse, son to the great incendiary.

† William Purcfoy, colonel and governor of Coventry, fought resolutely against the Cross in the Market-place at Warwick; and against the antient Monuments at the Earl's Chapel in St. Mary's Church there, who took the mourners in brass to be monks and friars, for which he had 1,500*l.* given him; but, when he should have fought with the enemy, hid himself in a barley field, (for which a waterman, who had been his soldier, afterwards refused to carry him) and was one of the king's Judges.

† Isaac Pennington, once lieutenant of the Tower, a year and a half lord mayor of London before his time, had 7000*l.* given him, and hath store of Bishops lands; yet this will not yield ten shillings in the pound to his creditors. He was one of the king's Judges.

Henry Pelham, Recorder in Lincoln, in the place of sir Charles Dalison.

Alexander Popham, colonel.

* Edicard Popham, colonel, afterwards one of the generals at sea.

Francis Rous, provost of Eaton in Dr. Steward's place, worth 1000*l.* per ann. He was Speaker of the pretended parliament, which surrendered their authority to the Protector Oliver, and was afterwards one of his Council, and a Lord of his Other House.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard had 5,000*l.* given him.

Robert Reynolds had 2000*l.* given him, besides Abingdon-Hall, and the lands worth 400*l.* per ann. hath bought a good pennyworth of the Bishops Land, and, as it is reported, had 20,000*l.* beyond seas, as he made appear upon his marriage, besides the Solicitor-General's place.

Edward Rossiter, colonel and general of all the Lincolnshire forces, and governor of Belvoir-Castle, but since a promoter of the nation's happiness.

* Sir Francis Russell, colonel, brother-in-law to Oliver Cromwell, and one of his lords.

* Thomas Rainsborough, Governor of Woodstock, Taunton, and once admiral of England.

Alexander Rigby, colonel and governor of Boston, and one of the Barons of the Exchequer.

Richard Rose, hath the house and furniture of one Bailey, the king's glazier, which he got thus: He and Mr. J. Trenchard went to several houses about the Strand to hire lodgings for Malignants, gave good rates, but would have the best furniture; and they, being members of the house, would secure them; Mr. Bailey was one Mr. Rose caused to be sequestered, and got it to himself, for which he and Mr. Trenchard fell out; but Bailey, though an honest man, got not his goods again, which crosses the proverb.

John Roll, merchant, had 1500*l.* given him, out of sir John Worsenham's estate.

Humphrey Salway, the King's Remembrancer, in Mr. Fanshaw's place, worth 400*l.* per ann.

Sir Walter Strickland, Agent in Holland for the two houses of parliament, worth 5000*l.* per ann. or what more he was pleased to make it; was of all the Mock Parliaments, and of the Protector's Council, and captain of

* Richard Salway, once a Grocer's 'Prentice, and their Spokesman in one of their tumultuous hurries to the Long Parliament, and ever since was taken notice of for a great talker. He was a main man in the Committee of Safety; for which the Rump, when they sat again, rebuked him gently, as one that had gone Astray from the Good Old Cause; a major in the army, and a great purchaser.

Algernon Sydney, governor of Dover-Castle.

* Philip Skippon, serjeant-major-general of the Army, major-general of London, and governor of Bristol; a member of all the parliaments, one of Noll's Council, and a Lord of his Other House; a forward man in the decimating oppression. He hath gotten a vast estate, hath been of all parties, first a Presbyterian, till Philip Nye opened his eyes, and shewed him the way to worldly greatness.

John Sydenham, colonel of horse and foot, governor of Weymouth and Melcomb-Regis, and commander in chief in Dorsetshire, had 1000*l.* given him; one of Cromwell's Council, a Lord of his Other House, had a great command in the Isle of Wight, and was one of the lords commissioners of the treasury. He was lately one of the Committee of Safety, and a great Rumper.

Richard Shuttleworth, colonel, and had very many of the Recusants Lands in Lancashire in Sequestration, himself being chief for Sequestrations there.

Sir Thomas Trenchard had 1200*l.* given him: Thus, he married his daughter to a Malignant, gave security for the payment of 1200*l.* portion, besides parliamentary courtesies; got his son-in-law sequestered, discovers the debt, and had it given him for his fidelity to the state. A neat parliamentary way to pay portions!

John Trenchard, brother to sir Tho. Trenchard, but a better father-in-law. He was governor of Wareham, married two of his daughters to Mr. Bingham and Mr. Sydenham, procured them to be made colonels of horse and foot, and governors of several garrisons; got them to be chosen members of the house of commons, and to be made free of his own trade by their father's copy.

Thomas Toll had the Customer's Place of Lynn-Regis, in his son's name, worth 300*l.* per ann. yet it is another's grant.

His man Cozens was clerk to the committee, and got 1500 or 2000*l.* per ann. by it.

And if the Man such profits have,

What must he then that keeps the Knave?

Bulstrode Whitlocke, once a counsellor at law of the Middle-Temple, then a member of the Long parliament, where he profited much, advanced his interest, and became commissioner of the great seal. Before the troubles he was an intimate friend to sir Richard Lane, who, going to Oxford, entrusted him with his chambers in the Temple; of which, with all the goods and an excellent library, he hath kept possession ever since; and would not own that ever he knew such a man, when sir Richard's son was brought to wait upon him in his greatness. He was sent ambassador into Sweden in great state, and, when his masters were turned out, acted there for the Protector. He was since commissioner of the treasury under him, and one of his Lords of the Other House. Under Dick he was made commissioner of the Seal again; and, he being discarded, wheeled about and worshipped the Rump: and, when Lambert unseated them, he became President of the Committee of Safety; since which he has had the leisure to consider of his former honest actions, for which he had 2000*l.* given him at one time, and hath a good fleece, and heir to Lilly the astrologer.

Sir Thomas Widdrington, a lawyer. By his practice, and a formal compliance with the enslavers of these nations, he hath advanced his fortune. He was lately Commissioner of the Treasury, and of the Great Seal. He was Speaker of that parliament that betrayed the liberties of the people of England, by making acts of incredible injustice. He put on Oliver's robes at his Installation, and made him a worthy oration: for which good service he was made chief baron of the exchequer. His sly formality restored him to the Great Seal since the Rump's re-sitting. No doubt he is a weakly man, and has more of the willow than the oak.

† Edward Whaley, formerly a woollen draper, or petty merchant, in London; where not thriving, and being much in debt, he fled into Scotland till the wars began, which he hath found a more gainful trade, and in which he was commissary-general of horse. He was of the later parliaments, and a promoter of Oliver's ambitious designs and his country's slavery; for which he was made a major-general of two or three counties, and a Lord of the Other House: but the restoring of the Rump checked this little man's greatness, till Lambert turned them out, and then he was sent into Scotland to desire Monk to be quiet. He was one of the accursed crew that dared to sit in judgment upon his sovereign.

Sir Henry Vane, jun. son to the elder, totally outed sir William Russel, and was sole Treasurer to the Navy, a place at least worth 6000*l.* per ann. in time of war, especially when the lord-treasurer was his friend, more when he was his father. He was a discontent during all Oliver's and Richard's government. He is, no doubt, a man of much religion, and would become one of the Rulers of Israel, if the intended match between his son and Lambert's daughter had not been spoiled by the restitution of the Rump.

Sir William Waller lost two armies, and yet a gainer. He was afterwards one of the 11 impeached Members, and is become an honest man, and a patriot of his country.

Sir Thomas Walsingham had the honour of Eltham given him that was the earl of Dorset's, the middle park and an house which were Mr. White's, and had cut down 5000*l.* worth of Timber trees, but hath scarce one left of his own to make a gibbet.

*† Thomas Waite, colonel, governor of Burley-on-the-Hill, where he thrived so well that he bought 500*l.* per ann. He was one of the king's Judges.

† Roxland Wilson, colonel, one of his prince's Judges; and, as it is said, died with the conceit of it, being accused by a parrot for killing of his king.

Thomas Westrow, captain under sir Michael Livesey, and hath gotten the bishop of Worcester's manor of Hartlebury.

Sir Christopher Wray, colonel, since dead.

* William Wray, his son, colonel.

William White, colonel, and was treasurer of war to the Army, in the North under the command of the old lord Fairfax.

Serjeant Wylde, lord chief baron, had, after the hanging of capt. Burley, 1000*l.* out of the privy purse of Derby-House. It is thought he afforded a great pennyworth in his service, which another would not have done for 10,000*l.* and it is affirmed he had 1000*l.* more upon the acquittal of major Rolph; so it is all one to him whether he hangs or hangs not. He lived retired during the Protectorian Government, but was lately restored to the Exchequer for being a lover of the Rump.

Robert Wallop, had 11,000*l.* out of the marquis of Winchester's estate, as it is reported.

† Valentine Walton, colonel, and governor of Lynn-Regis, purchased the queen's manor of Somersham, in the Isle of Ely, for a small matter, which he has improved to a large revenue by decoys, &c. which the rage of the people has lately demolished utterly. He was one of the king's Judges.

† Sir Hardress Waller, major-general of the Army, a colonel of horse, a great Committee-Man, and one of those five who were appointed to consider of the time and place of his late majesty's execution, which they appointed before his own door. He, with his assistants, were also the king's Judges.

It was reported that Stephen Kirk, Daniel Cox, Robert Wakeman, and John Stinte, Prime Clerks and Solicitors to their Committees, shared 1100*l.* of sir Edward Seabright's money, to keep him from being a Delinquent; and that records were taken off the file, and others put in their room, who gained great estates to themselves. The truth of this were worth inquiring after.

How many of those Members have undertaken to secure Malignants houses and Goods; but, in the end, have taken them all for their own use. What castles, houses, chases, and parks have they had, and the public no benefit thereof, is worth the inquiry: besides the king's Revenues and Compositions, which amounteth to *****.

Besides these Offices, Commands, and gratuities, every Member of the house of commons, being in all 516, are, by their own order, allowed 4*l.* per week a man, which amounts to 107,328*l.* per ann. By the Ordinance for sequestering Delinquents, April 1, 1643, it was declared that their Estates should go for maintenance of the Public Affairs; and several other Ordinances designed Bishops Lands for payment of 200,000*l.* public debt; yet you may see by this that Delinquents Estates and Bishops Lands were by the members of parliament shared amongst themselves, whilst the public debt is unsatisfied, and the Excise and Taxes held up.—Besides all this, the incomes they raised upon the people, under colour of the war, amounted to three millions per ann. at least.—And did they not intend to perpetuate their parliament, and entail their session (as the Priesthood on Levi) on confiding families to furnish them with Votes, as, sir Gilbert Gerrard and his two sons, sir Robert Harley and his two sons, three Fiennes, three Ashes, four Stephens, four Pelhams, four Herberts, four Temples, sir Thomas Jervois and his son, sir Henry Vane and his son, two Purys, two Chalonsers, two Bacons, two Pierepoints, two Bonds, two Onslows, two Pools, two Lenthalls, &c. And that our Ecclesiastics may comply with our Temporal Governors, the house abolished (as superstitious, because legal) the Convocation of learned Divines, regularly chosen by the King's Writ, and duly elected by the Clergy; and the house of Commons nominated an Assembly of gifted Divines, for that there is not an Assembly Man but what is thrust into another's Benefice.
